

Brush Can Increase Wildlife On Farms

Brush is an important habitat component for many wildlife species in Texas. Total brush removal will harm more wildlife species than it will benefit, but excessive brush reduces other valuable habitat components such as forbs and grasses. Brush also competes for moisture that would nurture nesting habitat and winter food. Properly designed brush patterns coupled with proper grazing by livestock will provide excellent habitat for many wildlife species. Many people buy land with trees and brush to enjoy the wildlife, either by hunting or observation. For these potential buyers, landowners can reduce the market value of their real estate by total removal of trees and brush. Other landowners want their proerties to have a clean, manicured appearance. Taller trees trimmed, smaller brush is removed, fence rows cleaned, weed control herbicides are applied, and pastures are frequently shredded. Ironically, the wildlife habitat value, which may have been the reason these places were purchased, is reduced by these activities if they are not properly planned and applied. Soil Conservation Service personnel can assist landowners and operators through the local Soil and Water Conservation District in designing brush patterns, grazing systems and weed control programs that will benefit the wildlife. Technical guidance biologists with the Texas Parks and Wildlife Department also help design brush patterns and develop wildlife management plans.

Oh, the things we do to ourselves in the name of fun!
Saturday Thomas and I decided to give ourselves a "treat" by going to Six Flags over Texas and taking in a concert by Air Supply.
Since concert tickets were on a first come first serve basis, we got there nice and early, purchased our tickets, and proceeded to have "fun".
Did I say fun? Now, if you are thinking that its the kids that have fun at a place like that, you may be right. Every child when asked will say they had a good time. The puzzling thing is that so many of those same kids were crying, throwing up, whimpering or about to die of heat stroke when actually at the park!
The only people hotter, or wearier than the youngsters were the adults.
To put it mildly, an amusement park on a Texas Saturday afternoon in July is hot, hot hot.
The shade is scarce, the lines to rides are long, and the ice cold drinks are expensive.
But, again, we all do it. After we get home, looking back, the sweat, the waiting and the walking don't seem so bad.
I think its a little like pain...after a few days the mind refuses to recall just how bad it can be.
Of course, people who really, really enjoy theme parks will probably think I'm nuts.
But for myself, the next time I go to anyplace like that it will have to be: a. cooler b. less crowded c. cheaper d. a long time in the future!

Being In A Non-Christian Country Is Strange

By Nanalee Nichols
Being in a country that where Christians are in the minority is an experience all its own.
Egypt, like almost all of the Middle East, is a Moslem country.
There are 17 million Christians, less than a million Jews, and about 40 million Moslems.
Yet there is a great deal of Biblical history in Egypt.
Moses was found in the bulrushes along the Nile river.
The pharaoh of Egypt and the rest of the Egyptians were visited by the plagues in that terrible time which we have all read about in the Bible.
It was to Egypt where Mary, Joseph and the infant Jesus fled from Herrod.
One of the places we visited on our last day in the country was the cave-like room where tradition says the Holy Family stayed for four months.
It is the most precious of places to Coptic Christians. Shoes must be removed before coming near the entrance.
The Egyptian Moslems are a great deal more tolerant of other religions than the others in that part of the world.
However, our guide told us very sadly that Kadaffe, the "lunatic" next door in Libya, was sending infiltrators into the universities in Egypt to teach hatred to the younger people.
She felt that some of the unrest was just beginning to show up, and feared that in time something tragic would happen in a confrontation between Moslem students and young Christians.

It seems a terrible thing, for Egypt has long been a haven for oppressed in that part of the world.
Nowhere did we encounter the "Yankee Go Home Attitude" that many people have heard of in the Middle East. To us, at least, people were the soul of courtesy and genuine friendliness.
After visiting a synagogue, a Coptic Church and the Coptic Christian Museum, we went to the Mosque of Saliden.
It is located on the highest point in Cairo, and overlooks the entire city. It is surrounded by a walled fortress, a remnant of the Ottoman Turks, a fierce, violent people who once held the country.
The mosque is very beautiful. Outside sits a row of elderly men, who place cotton sacks with ties on them over your shoes, tying them firmly around the ankle.
Covering the feet is required before walking on the beautiful, rug-covered interior.
A tiny winding stairway leads up to the minaret where the holy man calls his plaintive, eery call to prayer five times daily.
Moslems are not shy about saying their prayers in front of people, and can be seen on their knees, bending forward to touch their foreheads to the floor as they pray.
The moslem takes his religion very seriously for the most part, and we asked many questions of our guide, and received long answers.
One of the most astonishing things we learned was the importance of Jesus Christ to the Moslems. He is a great prophet, and expected to return!
We ate a spicy lunch at a Nile side restaurant. Being a cat lover, I saved various tidbits to feed to the pretty calico cats waiting patiently on the low walls of the veranda where we were sitting.

They ate politely, never jumping on tables or doing more than rubbing against friendly legs.
Egyptians are a basically kind people, and the dogs and cats were sometimes thin, but never to the point of starvation. I would venture to say that they were fed quite as well as the people themselves.
The afternoon was spent at a fascinating bazaar. Winding, twisting streets with tiny storefronts seem to go on for miles.
Habiba, our guide, left us with instructions to meet her under a clock in direct line with a minaret. We were to be careful not to lose sight of the spire, for we would surely be lost if we did.
Gold work in amazing quantities is a speciality of the bazaar. Both Jayne and I purchased gold rings for our husbands. They were actually four thing rings woven into a knot. The first thing our husbands did when we took them home was to undo them...only to find that putting them back together is nearly impossible. We ended up having to take them to a jeweler to have them restored, and had them welded together!
We bought papyrus, some other pieces of jewelry, and could have purchased hundreds of other things at the bazaar.
One shop we went up stairs barely wide enough to accommodate one person that wound in a tight spiral to a room no bigger than six foot by six foot.
No shop had a front much wider than ten feet.
Finally we were forced to wander reluctantly back to the meeting place.
Returned to our hotel we were tired, but contented, and had many things more to add to our store of knowledge, and memories.

Red Oak Cemetery Association Has Work Day

Members of the Red Oak Cemetery Association met Saturday for a work-day and Homecoming July 27th and 28th. Over 80 friends and relatives gathered for a covered dish lunch and business meeting Sunday.
People from as far away as New Mexico and California came for this once a year gathering.
It started out as a graveyard working on Wednesdays and everyone brought their own lunch and just spent the day working and cleaning.
Then, during the war, attendance went down drastically.
At that time the gatherings were set up as a homecoming and it was held on the fourth Sunday each July.
When Vernon Steven's mother was buried in the cemetery he noticed that it was in sad shape and decided that he would try and remedy that.
Therefore, in 1974 he was elected president of the Red Oak Cemetery Association, Mary Louise Boren was elected Secretary Treasurer. From that point on the Red Oak Cemetery has done nothing but flourish.

Donations started coming in and a perpetual care fund was established to help with the upkeep.
Still, not enough was brought in to keep someone full time to take care of the grounds.
A mower is now hired, but the rest of the upkeep is strictly volunteer work.
It was brought to the association's attention last year to tear down the tabernacle last year. People banded together to restore it to good shape instead of destroying it.
Red Oak Cemetery is one of the prettiest in the area, and according to the area residents, graces their growing community.

Memories Of Shipboard Sounds

By Wm. C. Barnard
Nanalee Nichols mentioned in her column a few days ago about memories of sights and sounds, reminded me of some sounds that I will remember a long time. I had been on the Liberty Ship (Sad Sack) Sacajawea for about 12 days, returning to the states from the Aleutian Islands after the war. We steamed into Puget Sound in Washington after dark. There was a pea soup fog and the ship was unable to dock. We could hear the freight train and switch engines whistling over on the embarkadero at Seattle. That was sweet music, because I hadn't heard a train whistle in almost two years.
The next morning after the fog cleared, the ship docked and we disembarked. Upon walking out on the street another impressive sound was high heels clicking on the concrete sidewalk. There were no women, no high heels, and no concrete sidewalks where I had been for a long time. I have vivid memories of these sounds.
