AF, ATC leaders eye evolution of air power

by Col. Bill Henny
64th FTW commander

This week's Roundup includes several articles addressing the Air Force and Air Training Command "visions" of the future.

As at Reese, these visions focus on one goal — to produce the "world's most respected air and space force... global power and reach for America."

In all, there are four related articles appearing on this page and on Pages 2 and 3.

Two of the articles provide us with Secretary of the Air Force Donald B. Rice's picture of the future.

Another details Air Force Chief of Staff Gen. Merrill A. McPeak's evaluation of where we are and where we want to be. The fourth article is Air Training Command Commander Gen. Joseph W. Ashy's in-depth look at how the Quality Improvement program will make ATC even better.

I urge each of you to carefully read these articles. I believe that they will help you to see and understand the tremendous changes that are taking place at every level of the Air Force.

Reese is clearly at the forefront of these changes. Our reorganization effort is helping the command and the Air Force define the structure of Air Force units for decades to come. Your innovation and "can do" attitude has become the foundation for other wings to build upon.

As these articles will clearly illustrate, our senior leadership is committed to making the best Air Force in the world even more efficient. So are we!

Secretary Rice defines Global Reach — Global Power

Air Force formulates beacon to illuminate future path

WASHINGTON — During a time of declining budgets and shrinking forces, Air Force senior leaders have formulated a beacon to help servicemembers and their families see where the Air Force is headed.

The "vision" is intended to "send out a sense of what we want to be in the future," said Air Force Secretary Donald B. Rice. "It should help remind us all of what we're striving for every day and how the particular missions and objectives that each of our organizations is working toward contributes to the larger corporate goal of the whole Air Force institution."

The secretary, the chief of staff, the under secretary, and the Air Force four-star leadership together developed words that best express their view of what the Air Force should be: "Air Force people building the world's most respected air and space force... global power and reach for America."

More than a slogan, the vision statement offers a glimpse into where the Air Force plans to focus its efforts for the future, Rice said.

The Air Force began its new strategic framework 18 months ago when Rice developed the Global Reach — Global Power (See Secretary Rice, Page 3)

General McPeak cites components of vision

by TSgt. Sarah L. Hood
Air Force News Service

WASHINGTON — When the Air Force decided a major overhaul was needed to streamline operations from top to bottom, senior leaders also agreed that a blueprint, a vision, was necessary to guide the Air Force through and well beyond the challenges of this decade, Chief of Staff Gen. Merrill A. McPeak said.

"Vision is an important concept," General McPeak said. "A vision ought to be a picture of what we want to be, where we want the organization to go, what direction we want to take it."

From a meeting last month to review strengths and weaknesses of the Air Force, the top ranking general officers and Secretary Donald B. Rice emerged with the vision statement for the Air Force: "Air Force people building the world's most respected air and space force... global power and reach for America."

Breaking the vision statement down into distinct parts, General McPeak said it "identifies who we are — Air Force people — what our product is — global power and reach — and who our customer is — America."

"The vision says we are building. We're not starting from scratch," General McPeak said.

"We're already the world's best Air Force.

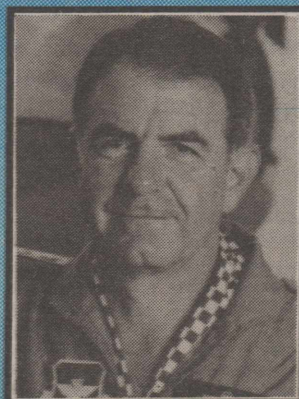

We're building on the shoulders of the many talented and capable people who came before us. We're building on top of a wonderful Air Force heritage.

"Finally, this vision statement says what we want to be — the world's most respected air and space force. We want our friends to admire us, our enemies to fear us. In our hoped for future, everyone wants to cooperate with us, no one wants to fight us."

Quality Improvement in ATC

A blueprint for training the airmen-warriors of the Air Force

by Lt. Gen. Joseph W. Ashy
Air Training Command commander

We in Air Training Command have committed ourselves to continuously improving quality — what we accomplish as assigned missions, taking care of our people in their working and living environments and preserving our people and equipment resources. This is important, and Air Force chief of staff Gen. Merrill A. McPeak has spoken to us very succinctly about this several times recently. He told us that, because of the significant changes ongoing in the world today — and the concurrent moves toward democracy in many nations — our armed forces and Air Force will now be much smaller. We are programmatically going to get smaller by 25 percent in the near term, and it may be more.

At any rate, change is inevitable and we must restructure ourselves so that we can maintain a credible air combat capability for the American people. That's our responsibility. So the reason for getting smaller is good news since it indicates our deterrent credibility worked over the past several decades. The transition to a smaller, restructured Air Force brings with it some challenges and turbulence, but our great people can handle it. And the chief of staff and secretary of the Air Force have certainly provided the leadership for that challenge. Now we need to support them and properly execute our responsibilities.

To provide a credible air combat capability, we must be as good as possible. As mentioned before, it's our responsibility, along with the fact that we will simply have less resources available. Additionally, we are in a very competitive world (as we've found out with our economy). So it behooves us to focus on the most cost effective Air Force we can muster. Therefore, the secretary and chief of staff have directed us to implement quality improvement programs (known in many circles as TQM) throughout the Air Force.

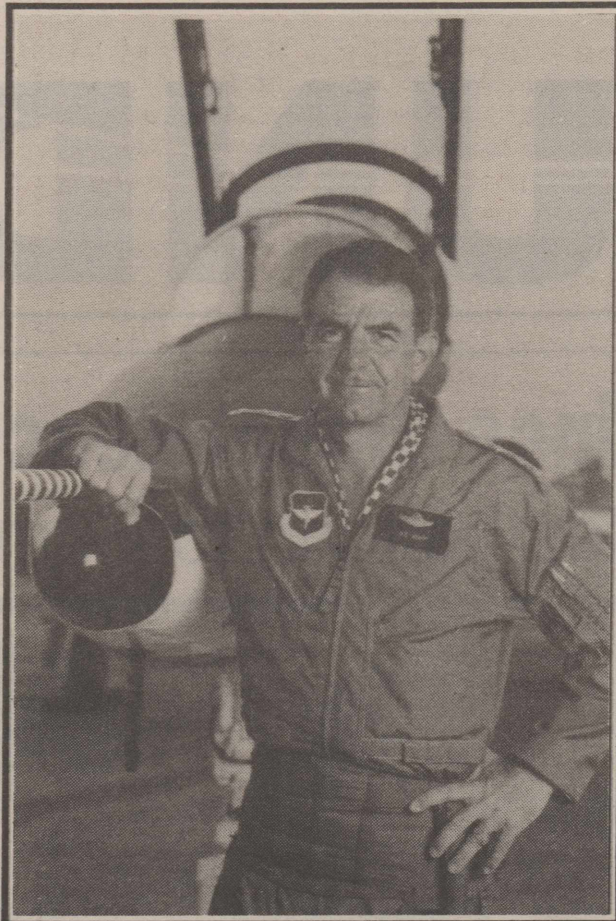

My report to you is that we've done that in Air Training Command, and I'm very proud of all of you who participated in giving us the great start toward that endeavor. We've published a Quality Improvement brochure; we've organized our various councils; we're in the process of authorizing manpower spaces for QI coordinating personnel at our bases; we've taught all our senior commanders the principles of QI (and will continue to teach at all levels); and we're training QI experts and process improvement team experts to help and advise us as we proceed. Now we need to proceed with the continuous improvement to our processes. Everyone in ATC must be involved in that!

Quality improvement is not complicated. We certainly had quality in Air Training Command before we formally embraced QI; but the principles of QI have and will guide us toward continuous improvement. Those principles start with a vision, and ours is:

To provide training for the airmen-warriors of the world's best Air Force, at the least cost and with the highest quality — and be recognized as doing such by winning the President's Award for Quality Improvement and Productivity.

Then, we must understand and articulate our missions and tasks. Ours are simple: recruit, access, commission, provide basic training, technical training, advanced training and flying training to the men and women who are members of the world's best Air Force. Based on these missions, we must then ask our "customers" — who define quality as what they expect. From those expectations, we derive our standards. Next comes measurement of how we're doing vis-a-vis the quality expectations or standards. The key to improvement is to describe the processes which produce results (trained graduates, services for our people, better safety records, etc.) and continuously improve them! Our new organizational framework, training brochure and other aids will help us do just that. This approach is not a new "fad" — it's for real and will definitely work if all will give it a chance and become familiar with the principles and use them in their respective work places.

Some words of caution. I'm extraordinarily proud of ATC quality now, so what we need to do is not revolutionary — it's evolutionary. Secondly, we must keep this effort simple. There are many books available about TQM . . . but we need to keep all that's written in perspective. That's why we have outlined our ATC approach to QI in a brochure and in our own training programs. If it gets too complicated and our people cannot understand it, then we will not be effective. It's important that all our people participate because quality improvement has to evolve in the work place. After all, the workers have first-hand knowledge of where the hurdles are — and we must empower them to let us know. And finally, leadership counts! That means leadership at all levels — at the first echelon, in our formed teams, at base level, and, yes, at headquarters level.

If you are not yet a believer, let me offer a few good examples:

At Wilford Hall Medical Center at Lackland AFB, the radiology department applied a quality improvement team to work serious problems with administration of X-ray reports. In the fall of 1989, they were averaging 17 days to interpret and file the X-ray report into the member's medical records, while the industry standard is two days. Through an exhaustive analysis of the X-ray process, they identified several shortcomings in procedures, file operations, and communications with the hospital staff. They undertook several actions to improve in-house training, filing and transcription procedures, and computer systems. The key to Wilford Hall's success was a true team approach — they involved the rest of the hospital staff, giving them a stake in the outcome. Over a period of several months, the radiology department reduced their report turnaround time from 17 days to one day, and they have sustained that superb performance.

The Randolph AFB CBPO improved their front desk customer service through a variety of common-sense methods. We have a command standard of serving our members within five minutes at least 90 percent of the time. Randolph was able to improve their rate from 86 to 97 percent in just a few short months. After analyzing their customers' expectations and the process of front desk service, they undertook three initiatives to improve the process.

First, they retrained their people to make an initial assessment of which service the customer needs when he or she walks in the door. If the customer requires a service that is available, then the member is immediately served, rather than waiting behind other customers who require busier, longer services. This was a change from their traditional "first come, first served" approach.

Second, they advertised an advance call-in service for personnel records requests, so that the CBPO could copy the needed documents and have them waiting for the member.

Third, they advertised to their customers, through base bulletins and newspapers, that many personnel actions could be handled by the member's orderly room with their Personnel Concepts III (PC-III) computer hookup. This saves the member from making an unnecessary trip to the CBPO. These initiatives improved both the timeliness and quality of Randolph's customer service.

Another of the president's, the secretary of defense's, and the secretary of the Air Force's major concerns is the environment and its impact. With this in mind, a quality improvement team at Chanute Technical Training Center's cryogenic plant looked for ways to do their job environmentally smarter. They discovered that by using an electronic analyzer (rather than the old method of using chemicals) to perform oxygen purity tests, the oxygen product would still be 99.5 percent pure and would result in yearly cost savings of $5,700. The process would also eliminate generation and disposal of hazardous waste chemicals in testing and reduce the possibility of laboratory glassware breakage. Air Force wide, this process will save approximately $125,000 a year.

One of ATC's goals pertains to quality medical care. A quality improvement team at Sheppard Technical Training Center Hospital recognized the need for additional physicians in their primary care, OB-GYN and pediatric clinics. After analyzing their problem, the Sheppard Technical Training Center Hospital initiated a partnership with local civilian providers to come in and treat their patients. The physicians bill CHAMPUS directly. As an example of the quality of improvement, the ATC goal in primary care is to see 90 percent of active duty military within one day. In the last year, Sheppard Technical Training Center Hospital raised their response rate from 76 to 93 percent.

In sum, we have a great start in institutionalizing the QI process in ATC. We must all be involved with properly understanding our missions, finding out from our customers what they expect from us in terms of quality standards, then looking at the processes through which we produce our "products" — and continuously improve them. All our people must participate for this to work, so we'll continue to educate ourselves and share the victories we attain amongst our bases in a newsletter. We'll do that through our quality improvement office here at ATC headquarters. I appreciate your efforts to date and look forward to watching us improve as our Air Force gets smaller, restructures, but continues to be the best in the world's greatest nation.

Why a vision?

To direct the Air Force to its best possible future

by Donald B. Rice
Secretary of the Air Force

Air Force people building the world's most respected air and space force... global power and reach for America. These are the words of the new Air Force vision. Created by the senior leadership of the Air Force, these words will guide us into the future. Why a vision, you ask? We have mottos and mission statements. What's the difference?

A vision is a picture of the future — more than a slogan, it's what we want to be. Our mission describes what business we're in, and why. The vision determines our direction. It's the way things could be, our best possible future, and it tells the organization what to care about in order to reach that future.

The world is changing around us. In response, we have led the Air Force into deeper, more fundamental change than it has seen since its formation. The easy part — designing the new structure — is over. We are now entering the most challenging phase — implementing the changes. For that we need the best efforts of every member of the Air Force, whether uniformed military or civilian, active or reserve component.

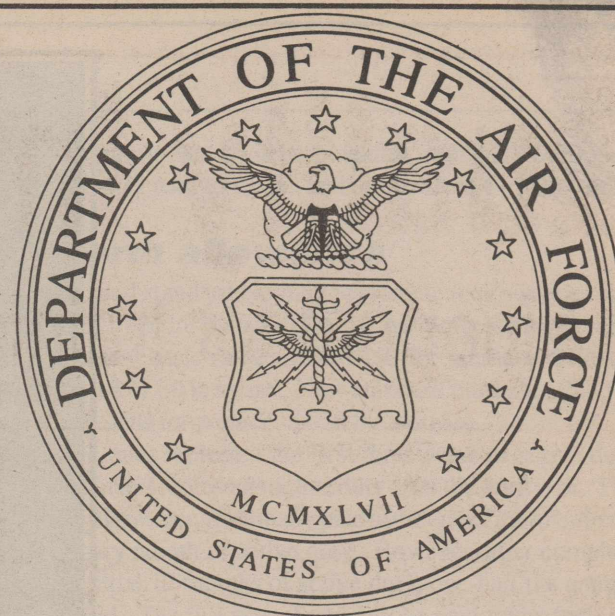

Air Force people is who we are — talented, well-trained, hard-working, deservedly proud, and the key to fulfilling our vision. Building conveys our tie from the Air Force of the past to the Air Force of the future. Those who went before us created the best Air Force in the world. Our task is to build on their work. The world's most respected air and space force describes what we always want to be. Our product is global power and reach — the full range of aerospace combat capability. And America, last and most important, is our country, our customer, our reason for existence.

As we publish this vision, and establish it throughout the Air Force and beyond, we also call upon each of you to reach for it. Listen to your commanders as they teach you the total quality approach, and seize the authority we'll be handing you to improve the processes you own or participate in. Every level of the Air Force will have to take the vision and trace from it their role in making it happen. The vision will be the same for all Air Force people, but the 'how to's' are up to the people at every level, at every base.

We are the best air force in the world today. But we want to keep improving the definition of best, then beat it and define it anew. If we are to stay the best, we must keep striving for new ways of becoming the best, most respected air force. We must continually improve and innovate because we know potential adversaries are doing the same thing.

Change is often unsettling. But change is also absolutely essential for growth. Embedded in this change are great opportunities for you, the Air Force and the nation.

Secretary Rice

concept, which laid out the role of the Air Force in a modern and changing world environment.

Global Reach — Global Power will continue to be used as a title for the force's strategic framework, Rice said. But with the vision, it's been given "a different spin."

"We're striving for a double meaning in that language," he said. "It's 'global power and reach.' And it's a 'reach for America.'"

In explaining the vision statement, Rice said: "Air Force people' is who we are. 'Building' says we didn't just start this yesterday. We already have a good outfit; we're going to make it better. 'The world's most respected air and space force' says in a nutshell what we want to be all the time. 'Global power and reach' is our mission, our contribution. And 'America' is our customer, our country."

The creation of the vision follows closely the Air Force's restructuring initiatives announced by the secretary and the chief of staff.

The fundamental decisions on restructuring have been made, Rice said. The coming year will be a year of implementation.

"And that's going to involve probably most of the people in the Air Force before it's done."

On July 1 three new commands will stand up, as five existing ones dissolve. Much of the work has already been done toward that effort.

"We already have a provisional headquarters in place for Air Force Materiel Command. We will be putting provisional headquarters in place for Air Combat Command and Air Mobility Command right after the first of the year," Rice said.

"Everyone has a lot of work to do to get ready for the transition."

Air Combat Command will project firepower where and when needed, while Air Mobility Command will provide worldwide airlift and tanker support.

Other initiatives already under way include streamlining headquarters staffs and eliminating air divisions, as well as a major overhaul of the way Air Force wings operate.

While reacting to the need to adapt to the changes in the world, the Air Force has continued to pursue the best principles of modern management as people conduct their daily business.

Most of the major commands have been working total quality management into their own operations, Rice said.

"As we worked the Air Force's overall TQM program, the chief (of staff) and I felt we should have a single vision statement for the Air Force, for the whole institution."

Total quality is a management philosophy designed to involve everyone in an organization in controlling and continuously improving how work is done.

It includes a set of principles and procedures that guide tasks ranging from managing daily work to strategic planning.

"Each of the commands and organizations under our total quality management approach will be developing their own missions and goals and objectives, right down to the lowest level of the organization," Rice said.

"Many organizations are already applying the key element of TQM — empowering people at the lowest level to participate in the process of improving the way work is done, 'improving the way we do business,'" he said.

Rice says there will be a complete process that will let all individuals relate their goals and their missions to the overall mission of the Air Force.

"It has to start with a vision for the total institution that each of the specific missions and goals can be related to," Rice said. "We also hope that all of this will help instill and sustain a sense of pride in an institution that has the right to call itself the best, the most respected in the world."

General McPeak

The vision is the latest of a series of initiatives intended to guide the service through the turbulence and uncertainty facing not only the Air Force, but other military branches as well.

The new creed also comes in the wake of recent announcements that the Air Force will combine resources from three major combat commands into two new commands, coupled with other dramatic and sweeping changes taking place Air Force-wide.

Putting Strategic Air Command, Tactical Air Command and Military Airlift Command assets and missions into two new combat commands eliminates the long-debated, artificial distinction between tactical and strategic airpower, General McPeak said in an October speech in Los Angeles.

Other back-to-basics changes involve reorganizing the Air Force wing, eliminating unnecessary layers of management at all levels, taking a closer look at the manning needs and requirements of Air Force and major command headquarters, and pushing authority and responsibility to the lowest level possible.

"I see the restructuring and the vision as complementary pieces, aimed at improving our combat capability and efficiency as an organization," General McPeak said.

"Restructuring is not a way to improve the processes, it is a way to facilitate improvement in the processes. The vision is meant to inspire people to improve the processes they're working on."

Another important step in making the vision a reality is total quality management. Total quality, a management philosophy on the national and international corporate scene, will be integral to the Air Force's conduct of day-to-day operations.

The Air Force will continue moving into the total quality management environment, General McPeak said. That means people will develop a better understanding of the new language of leadership which is associated with total quality management.

Gen. Merrill A. McPeak
Air Force Chief of Staff

"In a TQM approach, top leadership has to state the direction it wants to take the organization. Then every member in the organization has to sign up to that. The leadership and everyone else in the organization must have the will to carry it out," he said. "We want to become a total quality Air Force."

Total quality management is designed to involve everyone in an organization in continually improving how work is done. For the Air Force, this means looking for smarter ways to do business, centered on quality people doing quality work. Without widespread acceptance of this vision it will remain just that... "only a vision," he said. "It must be more than that. We must carry this vision through and make it reality. I ask all in the Air Force to read the vision (statement), think about it and help us act on it."

General McPeak sees achieving a vision as an act of "sheer will, a question of tenacity. Once the entire Air Force commits itself to this vision of our future, it will become a very powerful tool."

"I see the restructuring and the vision as complimentary pieces, aimed at improving our combat capability and efficiency as an organization."

AF Chief of Staff approves uniform changes Nov. 18

by TSgt. Sarah L. Hood
Air Force News Service

WASHINGTON — Eliminating the service dress hat from officer and enlisted clothing bags is just one of the dress and appearance policy changes approved Nov. 18 by the Air Force chief of staff.

The hats, currently included with the initial uniform items issued to new Air Force members, will be phased out through attrition.

Other recommendations from the 90th Air Force Uniform Board approved by Gen. Merrill A. McPeak are:

— Replace battle dress uniform accouterments with an aircrew-style name patch. Future guidance will include dimensions and authorized items on the patch.

— Continue authorization of the field jacket as an outer garment for wear with the BDUs. Members can get BDU field jackets when their current jacket becomes unserviceable. The field jacket will be phased out through attrition.

— Delete the authorization in Air Force Regulation 35-10 for women to carry a black suede purse with the mess dress uniform.

— Change the wording in AFR 35-10 to let the optional overcoat be modified from double-breasted to single-breasted during pregnancy.

— Conduct a full-scale wear test of the 80 percent/20 percent polyester-wool two-ply fabric for possible inclusion in the optional uniform shirt program.

— Conduct a wear test to see if it would be practical to adopt the Marine Corps women's neck tab for use on the Air Force women's blouse in an effort to standardize neck tabs among the services.

— Add an inside pocket to the A-2 leather flying jacket, at the member's expense, providing it doesn't detract from the outside appearance of the jacket. Jacket specifications will be modified for future production.

— Eliminate handkerchiefs from the men's clothing bag. Phaseout will be through attrition.

Recommended for further study were:

— Determine the impact of deleting the authorization to wear gray gloves in AFR 35-10.

— Approval of a distinctive uniform for transient alert people. Action has been deferred pending a review of all the functional uniforms by a committee of major command and air staff members with recommendations to be presented at the 91st Air Force Uniform Board.

— Defer action on eliminating the semiformal uniform pending the results of the wear test and final decision on the new service dress uniform.

The board was also briefed on the status of the wear-test to upgrade and enhance BDUs, and viewed wear-test prototypes. The Air Force is participating in an Army wear test.

Several other uniform items will be phased out of the inventory through attrition. They include:

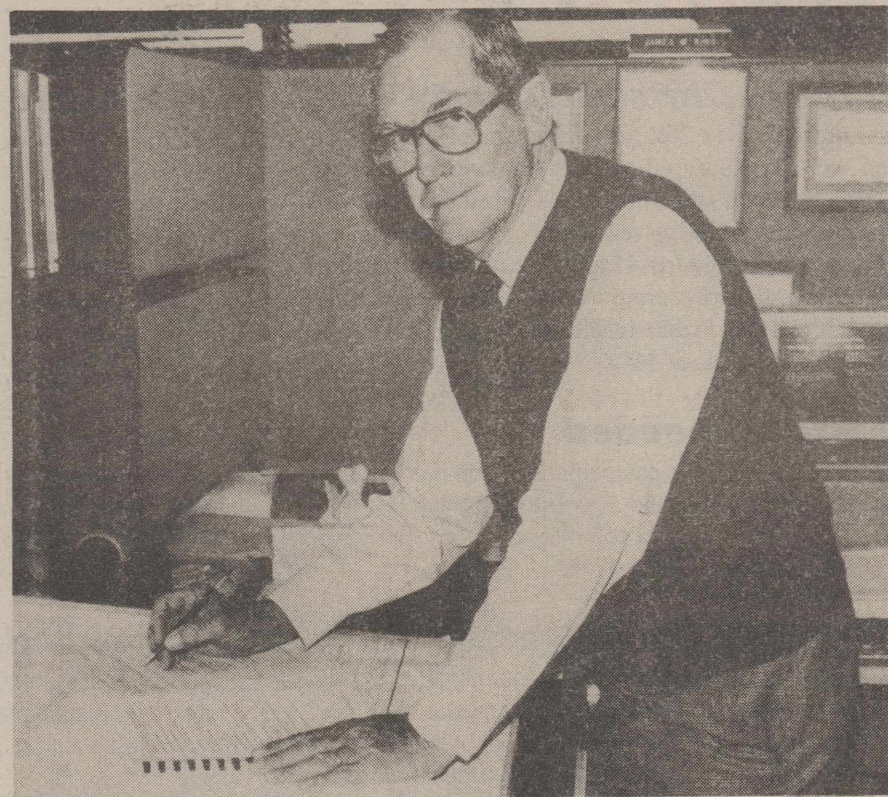

— The satin-finish belt tip and buckle.

— Regular and miniature oxidized finish badges and specialty insignia.

— Highly polished miniature badges and specialty insignia, with the exception of wings and missile crew badges.

— Embroidered badges and specialty insignia worn on the mess dress uniform.

Also, the fatigue cap was phased out Sept. 30, and AFR 35-10 was changed to eliminate exposure of the white T-shirt with an open-neck collar when worn with the service uniform. The crew-neck style undershirt can still be worn when the shirt is worn with a tie. And white crewnecks can still be worn with utility uniforms.

Mission maker

James King, 64th Civil Engineering Squadron, helped design many highways in the South Plains while working for the Texas Highway Department District 5 Lubbock office for 34 years.

Mr. King, a paving and traffic engineer, has been working for civil service and at Reese for eight years.

"After retiring from the Texas Highway Dept., I couldn't adjust to being retired so I started working here," Mr. King said. "I love doing designs for roads and streets and enjoy working with the inspectors and contractors."

Mr. King, originally from Coleman,

Texas, has been in Lubbock since 1946.

The biggest change Mr. King noticed since he started working at Reese was the new CES building. "It impressed me very much because now we have all the shops in one building and we have more room than before," he said.

Mr. King is no stranger to the military. He served with the Army Air Corps for four and a half years during World War II. "I belonged to an Air Depot Group which is an equivalence of a support group now a days," he said.

Mr. King enjoys fishing, photography and spending time with his wife, Bennie.

Comm turning up the music

Paying respect to the flag on Reese — specifically, knowing when to — is about to get easier, thanks to the Communications Squadron.

COMM members recently installed new speakers on the roof of Bldg. 800, replacing a system that was difficult to hear on certain areas of base. According to TSgt. Pilo Castillo of COMM, the system was so old that parts couldn't be found to overhaul it.

MSgt. Harold McGrew of COMM said Tuesday that the system was about half-operational as it goes through a test phase. The entire system will be running in the near future.

Although the job meant replacing the entire system, there was still a savings involved. Sergeant McGrew said that informal estimates of contractor bids were in excess of $80,000. However, the communications squadron was able to do it as a self-help job for $20,000.

The new system gives Reese quite an upgrade in its public address.

"The old system pushed out a total of less than 100 watts when it was replaced," Sergeant Castillo explained. "The new one gives you 800 watts." He added that the equipment that goes with the new speakers are professional studio recording systems.

SP Tips

The following tips are provided from the 64th Security Police Squadron:

□ Speed limit when driving through the main gate is 5 mph. Watch for gate guard instructions and signals when passing through.

□ When driving through the gate during hours of darkness, dim your headlights so the gate guard can see your decal.

□ When traffic at the gate is backed up during the morning rush, periodically break traffic for pedestrians and base housing residents trying to get on base.

□ When it snows or there is ice, ensure the decal on your vehicle is visible when entering the base. This will keep traffic from backing up while your vehicle is checked out.

□ Keep up with on-base and state registration and vehicle inspection stickers (if applicable) on your vehicle. Additionally, proof of insurance must be available if requested from Reese security police. Your vehicle could be denied entry on base if one of these items is not current.

Look for more tips in the near future. For more information, call 3333/3332 anytime.

(SSgt. Mike Breslin)

Sgt. Raymond Gregory, 64th Communications Squadron radio maintenance, assembles a new speaker on top of Bldg. 800. Comm saved the Air Force approximately $60,000 by doing the job instead of contracting it out.

Company Grade Officers Council collects one ton of food for needy

Thirty families in the wing had something extra to be thankful for this Thanksgiving thanks to the Reese Company Grade Officers Council.

The CGOC put two months of preparation into a food drive that pulled in 2,000 pounds of Thanksgiving fare. The council used collection boxes in unit orderly rooms, as well as the Reese Commissary and Main Exchange. They subsidized what they collected with funds generated from events like their mid-year golf tournament. These funds were used specifically to buy 30 turkeys.

"People on the base were great about donating," said Capt. Tim Phillips, food drive chairman. "Everyone (involved with the drive) was real happy about the support we got."

The drive is an indicator of increased CGOC activity on Reese. Captain Phillips said the council was in the process of "kick starting" its schedule, and that its activities were designed to provide company grade officers a chance to get together for "good times and good causes."

First Lt. John Pletcher, CGOC vice president, added that the council's main purpose is to enhance the professional development and job efficiency of its members through social settings.

He added that there are no formal requirements for joining, and that the council is looking to get representatives from all base units.

CGOC meetings are monthly. For details, call Lieutenant Pletcher at 3432.

The Company Grade Officer Council had a truckload of turkeys to give to needy families as part of the organization's special Thanksgiving project.

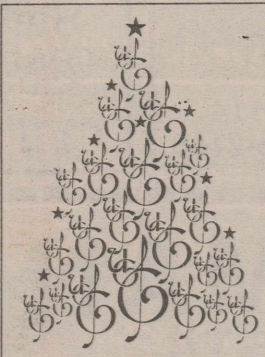

SSgt. Mike Breslin

First Lt. Pat Perkins, 64th LS, sacks up some of the food collected by the CGOC for needy families.

WWII: The war that changed the world

by David F. Barr

End to end, the gigantic gray battleships of America's Pacific-based naval fleet rested peacefully at their berths. Their crews went busily about the Sunday routines of raising the colors, eating breakfast and dressing for chapel. The day: Dec. 7, 1941.

On the opposite side of the island from the American fleet, 33 ships of the Japanese navy, a fleet that included six aircraft carriers, two battleships, two cruisers, nine destroyers and three submarines, relentlessly plowed southeast-wardly.

Without warning, at 7:55 a.m., Japanese naval aircraft attacked Pearl Harbor. It was a day President Franklin D. Roosevelt would describe the following morning as "a day that shall live in infamy." This special Sunday, amid the dread ripple of air-launched torpedoes and bombs screaming their lethal way to their targets, 19 American Navy ships would either be sunk or severely damaged. They included the battleships Arizona, California, West Virginia, Nevada and Oklahoma. From the black-streaked skies and on the ramps of the naval airfields, 87 of the Navy's 169 aircraft would be destroyed.

For almost a month the Army Air Corps' Hawaiian Air Force had concentrated its aircraft on warmup aprons to protect them from sabotage.

Hickam, Wheeler and Bellows fields held almost all of the fledgling Hawaiian Air Force's 7,460 officers and 117 aircraft. As fate would have it, one squadron was training at Haleiwa, a small field in the northern section of the island.

When the attack began, a handful of Army Air Corps pilots raced in civilian automobiles — and their P-40s and P-36s — to Haleiwa. Without knowing what they faced, the pilots found themselves in the role of American Davids facing Japanese Goliaths.

Despite being easy targets from the air, four P-40s and two P-36s took off from Wheeler Field and, in the next hour, flew 25 sorties.

Within two hours, one American lieutenant had shot down four enemy planes and another had been shot down. Three others, having already flown several sorties, were about to take off again when enemy aircraft killed two and wounded the other. Another lieutenant downed two enemy aircraft, then was blown from the sky directly over Schofield Barracks.

By the end of the aerial ambush, the enemy left 29 Air Corps aircraft smashed on Oahu's soil or in the sea around it. American families of 1,086 of these young flyers and others on military duty in Hawaii sadly would hang in their windows the soon-to-be-too-familiar gold star banner of the honored dead. More than 3,700 Americans, military and civilian, were killed in what President Roosevelt identified as a "dastardly attack by the Japanese Empire." What began that day set the stage for more than 292,131 Americans being killed in battle over the next four years. (Barr is chief, Command Products Branch, AFNEWS.)

Once is not enough

Desk-top paper recycling boxes made their way into many offices at Reese over the past few weeks. The new desk-top recycling boxes are divided into two sections, making sorting easier and stacking recyclable paper look neater.

Once the boxes are full, they can be emptied into recycling bags that have been placed in central locations of each building. The four basic types of paper that are separated into the bags are: computer paper, white paper, colored paper and newspaper.

RRRP also recycles other paper goods such as cardboard boxes. Call Danny Musil at 3815 for more information or an appointment to pick up recyclable goods on base and in base housing.

AF deleting command, AF-level sports competitions

The Air Force is deleting its command and Air Force-level sports championships and replacing them with a series of sport training camps, starting with the boxing training camp at Kelly, AFB, Texas, in January.

Under the new system, a result of budget cuts, tournaments such as the command and Air Force softball and basketball championships will not be held. Instead, individual bases will nominate their best competitors in each sport to the respective command and then on to the Air Force training camp. Following the camps, the best athletes will compete in inter-service championship tournaments.

"What we believe will happen is that some of the resources that were expended in running Air Force-level championships will be turned around and used at the base-level to strengthen the intramural programs," said Col. Roy D. Sheetz, Air Force Morale, Welfare, and Recreation Agency commander. "This actually gives more members an opportunity to participate in athletics."

Although the change may be unpopular to some, Sheetz believes it will give more folks the chance to play and thus increase the effectiveness of the program. Nor will it hamper the Air Force's competitiveness, he said.

"Certainly, for the very few that participated at the Air Force and major command level, that part of competition was increased by the tournaments. But if some of those resources are put back at the base level to strengthen intramural programs, that will certainly have a positive impact on the Air Force as a whole," Sheetz said.

The change is the best alternative available considering budget cutbacks and the force drawdown, Sheetz said, describing it as a "win-win situation." Olympic-caliber athletes will still compete under a separate program designed to help them train for international style events, he said.

Following is a list of dates and locations of training camps for 1992:

- Boxing - Jan. 6-Feb. 1, Kelly AFB, Texas.

General Motors Is Rewarding Your Efforts With An Opportunity.

The divisions of General Motors are proud of America's Armed Forces.

That's why from now until the end of the year, your Chevrolet, Pontiac, Oldsmobile, Buick, Cadillac and GMC Truck dealers are offering a Special Military Program to all active U.S. Military personnel and reservists called to active duty during the Persian Gulf War or their spouses.

While these GM divisions already have incentive plans in place that help make it easy to buy a new car or light truck, the Special Military Program makes it even easier.

Under the program, you get three hundred dollars in down-payment assistance, plus any additional down payment you make is matched up to five hundred dollars when you buy a new GM car or light truck and finance it through GMAC. That can mean as much as eight hundred dollars toward your purchase. Add that to existing GM incentives, and you can save even more. The Special Military Program is not available with the college graduate, first-time buyer or overseas vehicle purchase programs. See your participating GM dealer for qualification details.

Many of your comrades in arms have already taken advantage of the GM Special Military Program. So visit your GM dealer today, and see how much we appreciate your efforts.

Reese Air Force Base Christmas Classic

Basketball Tournament, Dec. 5, 6, 7, 1991

Prep cagers battle for tourney crowns

Classic field features boys, girls divisions

Sixteen South Plains prep boys and girls basketball teams will compete for top honors in the Reese Christmas Classic, today through Saturday.

The tournament, which features two eight-team divisions, was scheduled to tip-off at 9 a.m. this morning in the Reese Physical Fitness Center.

According to Classic coordinator, Jake Trevino, each of the 16 teams in the field is guaranteed to play three games. Trophies will be awarded for Championship, runner-up, third place, consolation and seventh place in each division.

Participating in the girls' division are: New Home, Amherst, Kress (varsity and junior varsity), Springlake Earth, Petersburg, Amarillo Christian and Plains high schools.

The boys' division includes: Petersburg, New Home, Kress (varsity and JV), Plains, Estacado (JV), Monterey (JV), and Lubbock (JV) high schools.

Basketball action begins at 9 a.m. each day with a new game starting every 90 minutes. The last game each day begins at 7:30 p.m.

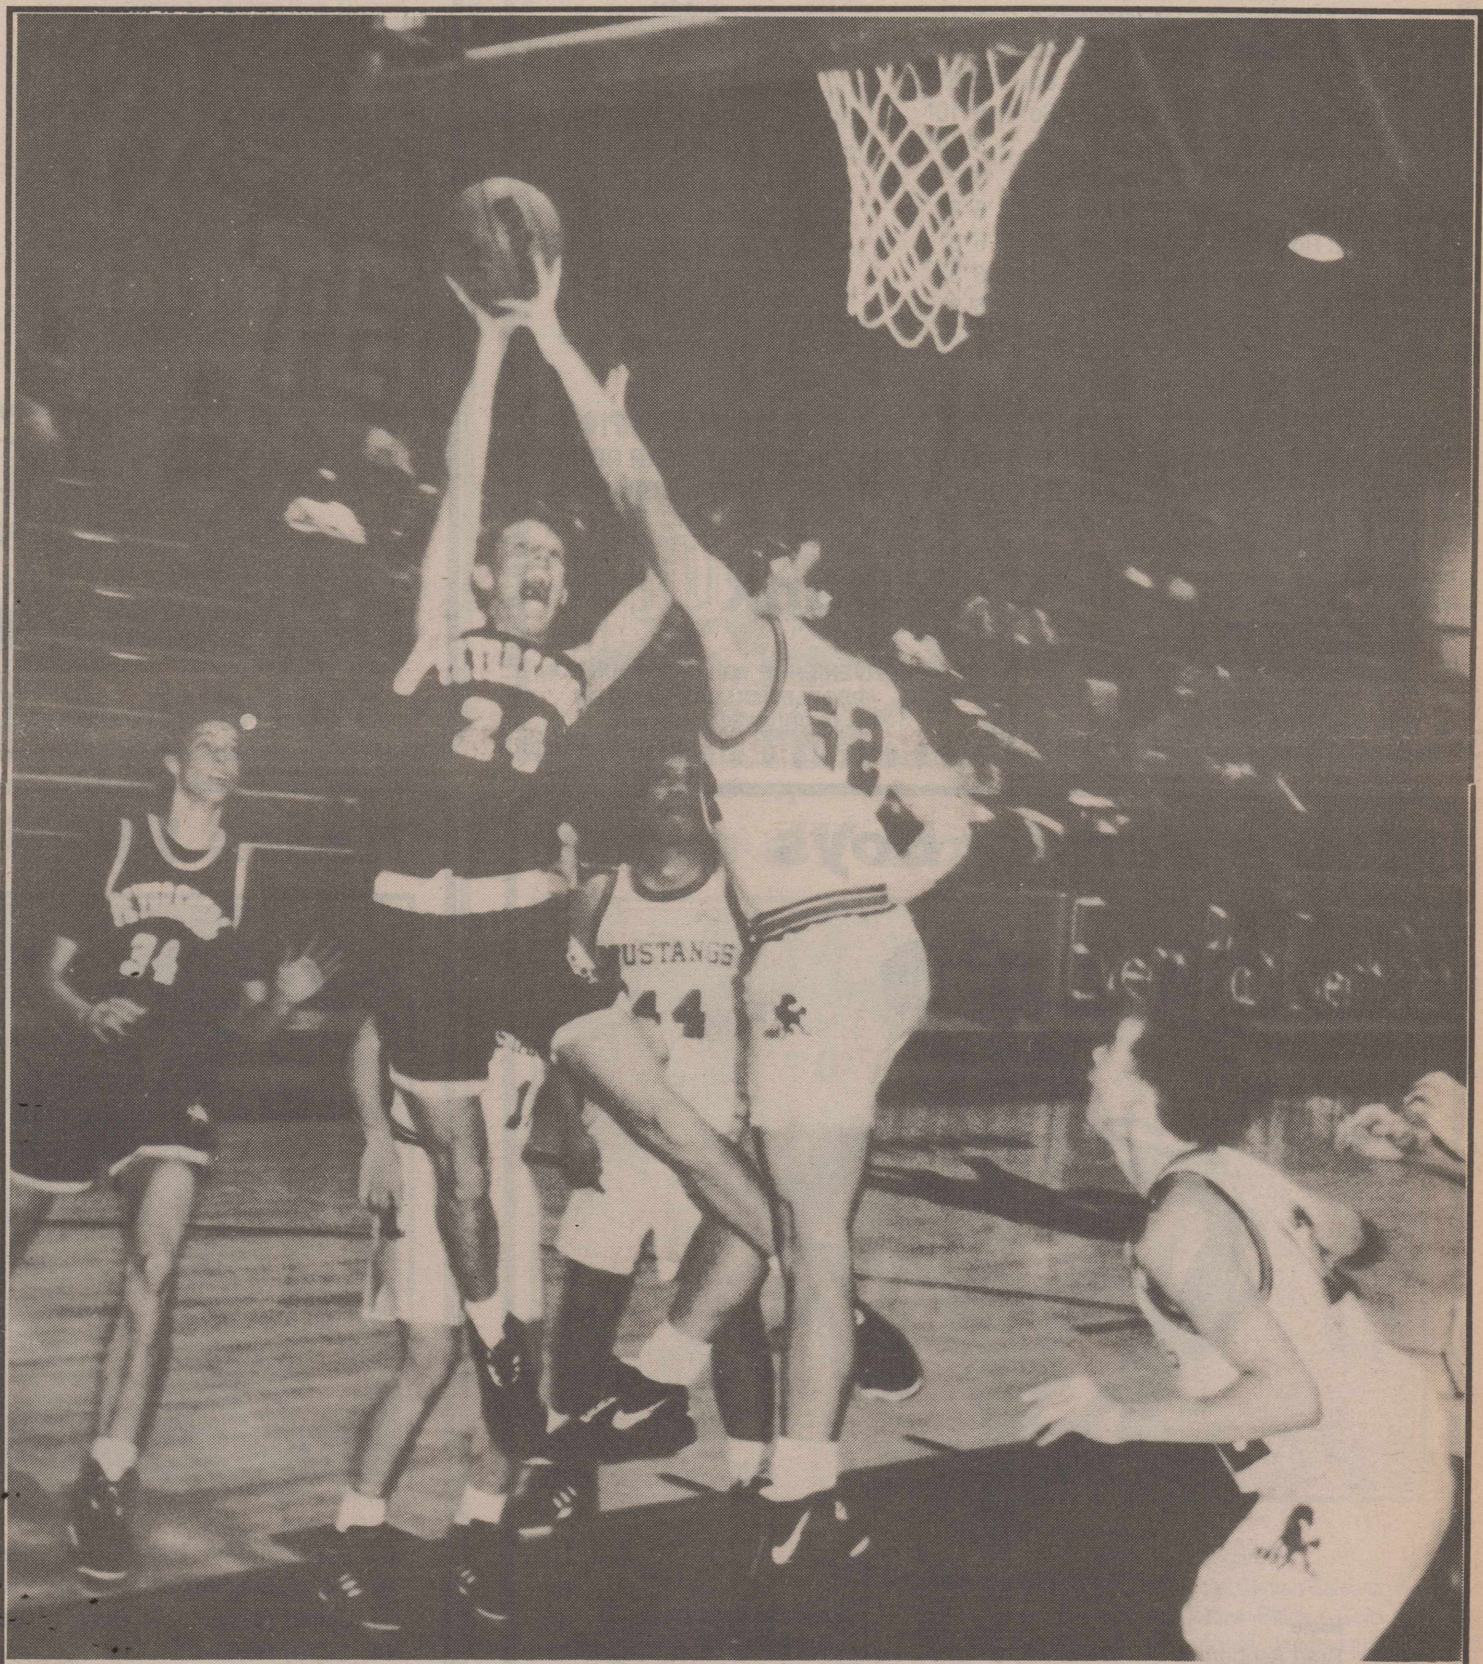

The championship game in the girls' division will be played at 6 p.m. Saturday. The boys' title game is set for 7:30 p.m. Saturday.

The daily admission fee is $2 for adults and $1 for students. Children under 6 are admitted free. Military personnel in uniform will also be admitted free.

This weekend's tournament is the first Reese Christmas Classic in three years. The tournament originated in 1975 to give area student-athletes an opportunity to get a first-hand look at the Air Force way of life.

The Reese Christmas Classic has long been considered one of the top community relations programs. It was honored as the best single community relations project in the Air Force five times.

As in past tournaments, the student-athletes will be given extensive opportunities to tour the base and facilities of interest.

Petersburg forward Doug Porter (24) tries to score inside during the Buffaloes 57-37 win over Shallowater Tuesday Night.

The Petersburg boys' team is one of 16 prep cage squads in the Reese Christmas Classic.

Sgt. Greg Spraggins

Reese Christmas Classic relies on volunteers

According to tournament director Jake Trevino, the Christmas Classic would be virtually impossible without the invaluable assistance of many local volunteers.
