

of death could not snap, bound him to the heavenly shore.

Just before his exit, he gave renewed assurance that all was well, and exhorted his friends to meet him in his heavenly home.

We buried him in the quiet church yard to rest in silence till the judgment morn. The many tears shed around his bier, and the sighs that swelled every bosom as the clouds fell upon the coffin, told in language not to be misunderstood, that one had fallen much loved and deeply lamented by many.

A widow and two orphan babes deplore his departure, but they may see him again, though on earth they part, though death has broken the chain that bound them together, united in heart, in glory they may link it again, to be severed no more.—Let me die the death of the righteous.
