Reagan calls military maneuvers 'routine'

AP Laserphoto

He has 'no plans, no desire' for war

By MARIANNE MEANS
Washington Columnist

WASHINGTON — President Reagan, frustrated by growing congressional and public concern about the rapidly escalating American military involvement in Central America, insisted at a hurriedly-called news conference that his actions are routine and that fears about another Vietnam are unjustified.

The president tried to calm mounting criticism that the highly visible, extensive military maneuvers being readied off the coast of Nicaragua amounted to gunboat diplomacy and could lead to war. He attributed public doubts about his purpose in the region to "confusion" but he did not make a serious effort to clear up the questions which have led to those doubts.

He was wearing his statesman's hat rather than his tough guy hat.

He was more restrained than in recent speeches, in which he has repeatedly described the turmoil in Central America as a threat to our national security and suggested that those who oppose him are appeasers who would bear the blame if El Salvador is "lost." He dodged several opportunities to expand on his past statements appealing for support for his military policies, preferring instead to portray himself quietly as a man of peace.

The president's sole purpose appeared to be to emphasize his desire for negotiations and squelch the war fever which has been roaring through Washington since he posted U.S. warships to the coastal waters of Central America and declared a six-month military exercise with Honduras that would involve thousands of U.S. troops.

In effect, he also pleaded for blind faith in his judgement on this issue, refusing as he has before to rule out flatly that Central America could ever become a second Vietnam. He said he had "no plans and no desire" for war but "a president should never say never." It was exactly the same phrase he had used at a prior press conference when asked a similar question seeking assurances that the war would not escalate.

The president also insisted on keeping secret the details of much of the paramilitary assistance he is now providing anti-government forces in Nicaragua, which are based in neighboring countries. The House held a rare closed session last week to hear the administration explain why more millions in such assistance is necessary and why it should be kept secret. A vote is expected Thursday on a proposal which would forbid any more covert aid through the Central Intelligence Agency to the Nicaraguan rebels and would instead grant $80 million in open aid to friendly Central American nations to help them intercept arms being shipped across their territories.

Asked why he didn't simply extend military aid openly, the president replied "what we are doing is well within the limits of common sense." This also prompted his harshest attack on his critics in a session intended to be conciliatory. "It would be a grave mistake if the legislature interferred with what we are trying to do," he said, adding later that "Those attempting to make it impossible for us to bring aid to that area are the ones who if they have their way will build up a giant headache down the road aways...."

AP Laserphoto Map

Former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, the new chairman of the president's national commission on Central America, however, may not agree with the president's insistence upon secret CIA operations. He suggested in an interview with Public Opinion magazine recently that he favored open assistance to those fighting the Sandinista government in Nicaragua. "If the stated objective is to prevent inflitration, then I would prefer an overt action," he said.

The president's introductory remarks emphasized his peaceful intentions and his desire for diplomatic negotiations but the questions with which he was peppered for a half hour stressed the expanding U.S. military role in the area. He claimed to be dumbfounded that so much fuss was being made over what he described as simple military routine.

He deplored the notion that the military exercise has led to "the suspicion that somehow we have an ulterior purpose." He said that the military has held many similar maneuvers.

No comparison

In a news conference Tuesday evening, President Reagan said there is no valid comparison between U.S. involvement in Central America and early actions in Vietnam.

Democratic hopefuls critical of Reagan's actions

WASHINGTON (AP) — Critics say President Reagan's efforts to calm public worries about his policies in Central America are failing and that they see the nation moving ever closer to war.

After the incumbent defended his policies in a nationally televised news conference Tuesday, Walter Mondale called the administration's moves a "massive escalation" of U.S. military involvement and Reagan's explanations of the policies "vague and defensive."

Republican Sen. Larry Pressler of South Dakota said Reagan's moves are "a great mistake."

Democratic Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts said "the Reagan administration has a war policy instead of a peace policy."

At his news conference, Reagan said that he wants "to usher in a new era of peace and justice" in the region, adding that confusion and misinformation is causing unjustified worries about U.S. policies in the area.

But critics — led by some of the Democrats who would like to oust Reagan from the Oval Office in the 1984 elections — were worried even more by Reagan's explanations.

"After tonight, I'm more certain than ever that the current administration policy is leading us into war in Central America," Mondale said in a telephone interview.

"The president had a duty to carefully define our purposes, but instead was vague and defensive and sought to declare this massive escalation as routine. When the president sends 4,000 troops into a war zone, it's not enough to blame the press," he added.

"The purpose of this news conference was to reassure an anxious America that sees us being drawn into war," Mondale said, adding he thought it actually "heightens anxiety about what our true purposes are."

Another Democratic presidential hopeful, Sen. Alan Cranston of California said the Reagan policies "increase the risk of American involvement in a shooting war."

"There is great resistance in Central America to Americans trying to determine the course of events there by military action," he said.

Asked about Reagan's statement that the administration wants to negotiate peace in Central America, Cranston added, "I think it is important to watch what the president does and not what the president says."

Pressler, the GOP senator from South Dakota, deplored "the show of force the president is planning in Central America." He said at a news conference after Reagan's appearance that the military maneuvers will "add to the argument the revolutionaries are making that the United States wants to dominate the area militarily."

Kennedy, who has taken himself out of the 1984 race, joined Mondale and Cranston in their criticisms.

City Council rezones land adjacent to Midland Air Park

By LANA CUNNINGHAM
Staff Writer

Land on the east side of Garfield Street and adjacent to Midland Air Park was rezoned Tuesday by the Midland City Council in anticipation of getting a higher price when it is sold. This sale could be the first stepping stone to relocating the airport, according to one councilman.

In other action during the session in City Hall Council Chambers, the board decided to woo the Federal Aviation Administration with promises and freebies, hired an architect for a fire department project, denied a profit-making idea for an evening of music and food and rezoned land for a hotel in north Midland.

The 48.34 acres of land shaped almost in a triangle next to Air Park had been zoned 1F-1, single family district. With the council's approval on second reading at the Aug. 9 meeting, the land will be divided into LR-1, local retail, O-1, office, MF-1, apartments, and TH, townhouse. The zone change was requested by the council.

Mayor G. Thane Akins said an oil company had been interested in buying the land during the oil boom and developing it into an office. The company had been talking with Midland College, which abuts the tract on the south, according to the mayor.

AKINS POINTED out the land "has been released by the FAA," indicating the federal agency doesn't think the tract necessary to stop encroachment on Air Park. Nor did Akins have any concerns about its proximity to Air Park in light of an airplane crash in September 1982 that occurred at an apartment complex on the west side of Garfield.

"How many airplanes have you seen fall out of the sky in the last 50 years?" he said. "Look at the intersections in town and the accidents. This is not a safety concern."

Another person has indicated an interest recently in buying that city tract, said Akins, and if sold as 1F-1 it would bring a lower price. "Taxpayers would be gypped out of that money," he said. The land will be advertised for sale and the city will accept the highest bid.

Councilman Gordon Marcum II said the city would be advertising the tract in major trade journals, such as the Wall Street Journal. "We hope to attract some of the large land developers in the U.S. There's 500 acres of prime land," he said, referring to all of Air Park.

Midland geologist, 64, missing since Sunday

By RICHARD ORR
Staff Writer

Police suspect foul play and today report no leads in the Sunday night disappearance of 64-year-old Midland geologist Banks Campbell, who is also a weather spotter for the city-county civil defense program.

Banks was last seen shortly after 9 p.m. Sunday when he pedaled his bicycle away from a friend's house about three blocks from his office at the Permian Basin Sample Lab, 401 N. Colorado.

According to his son, Pete Campbell, the elder Campbell attended church and had dinner with his son and his son's family earlier Sunday.

Environmental laws limit nation's energy self-sufficiency, expert says

By LESLIE HAINES
Business-Energy Writer

John J. McKetta

Environmental laws and other government regulations have prevented the United States from becoming energy self-sufficent when it has more oil, gas and coal reserves than any other country on earth, a noted energy expert told a Midland group Tuesday night.

John J. McKetta, speaking at Midland Center, said the country's energy situation is "self-inflicted and may be fatal, unless we change the rules."

In a two-hour presentation laced with humorous anecdotes about environmentalists, politicians, scientists and academicians, McKetta continually made one point: that America has the natural and/or technological resources to be energy independent, if the government would back away and let free enterprise take its natural course.

He showed numerous technical charts and graphs tracking energy production versus use and imports.

"I can show you, most any time the chart bobbles some, it's because of some law that the government has passed," he said.

McKetta, a professor at the University of Texas-Austin, has long served on various national energy policy committees and study groups. He is currently on a task force appointed by President Reagan to study acid rain. The chemical engineer specializes in advising the federal government on energy-related matters.

His speech was the second in a three-part series of free public lectures sponsored by the Permian Basin Graduate Center and the Midland Chamber of Commerce.

McKetta said the U.S. energy problem is this: In 1982 the U.S. paid $70 billion for imported oil and gas, while frantically trying to balance the import-export ratio by selling grain, food and technology to other countries. The trade deficit was still as much as $46 billion, however.

"The real sad part of it is... that we have 146,000 coal miners unemployed... and in Houston and Corpus Christi we are bringing coal in from Montana and Wyoming while we have gas wells capped in Texas and Oklahoma and Louisiana..."

Stone meets with Latin leaders

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador (AP) — U.S. special envoy Richard Stone and two Latin American presidents converged on San Salvador to discuss Central American conflicts today, hours after a Nicaraguan leader urged militiamen to prepare for a U.S.-backed invasion.

Speaking at induction ceremonies Tuesday for three new militia battalions, Nicaraguan Defense Minister Humberto Ortega Saavedra said U.S. naval forces were deployed in a "threatening attitude" 13 miles from Nicaragua's Pacific coastline.

The minister warned that if U.S. forces land in Nicaragua, they will find "a people armed and ready to defend the national territory, street by street and house by house."

There was no independent confirmation that the ships referred to by Ortega Saavedra were part of U.S. Navy task forces that will conduct war games off Nicaragua's Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

At a news conference in Washington, President Reagan said the expanded role of the U.S. military was not a step toward a Vietnam-like war, but should "underscore once and for all" the determination of democratic neighbors to deter the export of revolution from the Soviet Union and Cuba.

Stone arrived in San Salvador on Tuesday from Caracas, where he met with Venezuelan President Luis Herrera Campins and gave him a letter from Reagan supporting the efforts of the Contadora group to negotiate peace for the region. The group — which includes Venezuela, Mexico, Colombia and Panama — takes its name from the Panamanian island where those nations' foreign ministers met last January.

Salvadoran sources, who declined to be identified, said Stone would meet today with presidents Alvaro Magana of El Salvador, Belisario Betancur of Colombia and Ricardo de la Espriella of Panama.

Betancur and de la Espriella said Tuesday they were undertaking a 12-hour visit to El Salvador, Honduras and Guatemala, but they disclosed no details of the trip.

The governments of El Salvador, Honduras and Guatemala have been preparing for a possible confrontation with Nicaragua, which is ruled by leftist Sandinistas who overthrow right-wing strongman Anastasio Somoza four years ago.

The Sandinista leaders accuse Honduras and the Reagan administration of secretly helping Honduras-based rebels mount attacks to overthrow them.

Ortega Saavedra said the situation in Central America, especially in Nicaragua, "is grave" and "the threat of war exists with Honduras, or a North American intervention." He said anti-Sandinista forces are massing in Honduras for a new assault on Nicaragua.

The Reagan administration accuses the Sandinistas of threatening Central American security by smuggling weapons to guerrillas fighting for power in El Salvador and establishing close military ties with Cuba and the Soviet Union.

Stone visited Mexico, Guatemala and Panama after leaving Washington last Thursday and there was widespread speculation — none of it confirmed — he would try again to meet or had already met with Salvadoran leftist leaders.

Stone failed in an attempt July 9 to meet with them in Costa Rica, because he wanted to talk about their participating in Salvadoran elections and they wanted an open agenda with no prior conditions.

On Tuesday, Gen. John Vessey Jr., chairman of the U.S. joint chiefs of staff, arrived in Honduras to visit a U.S. military base that is training Salvadoran soldiers to fight leftist guerrillas.

Cutting support called 'mistake'

WASHINGTON (AP) — House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr. says administration critics are winning their fight for a House vote against aid to Nicaraguan rebels, but President Reagan says cutting off support would be "a very grave mistake."

"Those who are attempting to make it impossible for us to bring aid down in that area, I think are the ones who are building up — if they have their way — to a giant headache down the road a ways," Reagan said in a televised news conference Tuesday night.

"I think it would be a very grave mistake if the legislature interfered with what we're trying to do," the president said.

O'Neill said Tuesday that unless the House demonstrates its opposition to undercover aid in Nicaragua by "a strong vote," Reagan and his administration "are just going to continue the way they are."

"We are winning," O'Neill said. "It's very close, but it looks favorable for us."

O'Neill said sending Navy ships to the area and plans for sending troops to engage in maneuvers in Honduras has stiffened House resistance to the aid, which the administration argues is needed to halt the flow of arms to leftist guerrillas in El Salvador.

But whatever the outcome in the Democrat-controlled House, where a vote is expected Thursday, opponents of the aid program concede the Republican-dominated Senate would be unlikely to call a halt to it.

The administration was dispatching Secretary of State George Shultz and National Security Adviser William Clark to brief senators on Central America today.

Rep. Edward J. Markey, D-Mass., told the House, "We are at the same point today in Central America as we were almost 20 years ago with the Gulf of Tonkin resolution," which opened the way to deeper U.S. involvement in Vietnam.

Urging a vote for the aid cutoff, Markey posed the question this way: "Do we slip into another Vietnam, or do we begin to stop another Vietnam from occurring?"

Rep. Dan Burton, R-Ind., disagreed. "If they equate Central America with Vietnam, then they should look at the whole picture. If we don't do something to interdict the supply lines and stop the sanctuary we have been allowing the terrorists in Nicaragua, then surely the war will expand."

Reagan, at a news conference dominated by Central American questions, said the U.S. military role in the region is not a step toward a Vietnam-like war.

"We don't think that that's going to happen at all," he said.

But he added that if the leftist government of Nicaragua were to attack Honduras, "We would have to deal with that problem when it arose."

Administration critics, including at least one Republican, said Reagan intensified their concern about his Central American policies, particularly his planned military training exercises in Honduras and the Caribbean sea.

Sen. Alan Cranston, D-Calif., a candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination, held a news conference within minutes after the president finished speaking, and said Reagan's policies "increase the risk of American involvement in a shooting war."

Rival candidate Sen. Gary Hart, D-Colo., said he would introduce legislation designed to show "Congress' determination not to let the president lead us into war without our full knowledge and consent."

O'Neill said more than 100 amendments have been offered to the cutoff measure, which would end the aid this year and substitute $80 million in assistance to friendly Central American governments to halt gunrunning.

Not all of the amendments are expected to be brought to a vote, however.

One of the more important ones, offered by Rep. Ed Zschau, R-Calif., would allow U.S. undercover activities in Nicaragua to continue as part of an arms interdiction plan submitted by the president to Congress. Congress would have 30 days to propose changes to the plan.

In a letter to his colleagues, Markey said this amendment "would defeat the central purpose of the ... bill, which is the prompt, forthright and unequivocal end of covert operations against the Nicaraguan government."

Keeping covert aid secret during debate encouraged

WASHINGTON (AP) — Trying to keep covert aid to Nicaraguan rebels secret even though Congress is publicly considering a bill to end it "is well within the limits of common sense," President Reagan says.

Reagan, who has steadfastly refused to confirm or deny widspread reports of CIA backing for the Nicaraguan counter-revolutionaries, maintained that stance at a Tuesday evening news conference dominated by questions about widening U.S. military involvement in Central America.

Although the House is preparing to vote on a bill to cut off the aid, Reagan said "No," when a reporter askedif the United States has "reached a point where really it might make more sense to do things on an overt basis."

The president responded, "I think what we're doing is well within the limits of common sense. Those who are attempting to make it impossible for us to bring aid down in that area, I think, are the ones who are building up if they had their way to a giant headache down the road aways. We're trying to prevent such a headache from coming about."

Search for geologist continues

Campbell said his father has held the same job for more than 20 years, was "very steady" in his habits, was in good health and didn't appear worried about anything.

"He was so regular about everything," said Campbell. "That's what has us so upset. This is totally out of the ordinary."

Campbell's bike was found inside his office and his pickup truck was parked on the company lot. There was no sign of a struggle in the office or at his 1305 W. Washington Ave. address. A widower, Campbell lived alone.

His key ring, street clothes, belt, pocket change and most of his belongings were on his office desk and the building was locked. "The only things missing are him and his wallet," said Campbell, noting that the wallet contained upwards of $400. "It's very strange. It's very difficult to lock the building without keys."

Campbell was wearing blue shorts, a blue T-shirt and blue sneakers at the time he disappeared, according to his son, who said his father normally kept the bicycle at his office and apparently had changed clothes to go riding.

"I don't know of any enemies he may have had," said Campbell. "He had a habit of helping strangers and I had warned him about it. But he was a kind man who couldn't stand to see someone in need.

"It reminds me of the movie 'Without A Trace,' where a little boy vanishes just like he didn't exist."

In addition to law enforcement officers, a local amateur radio group is searching for Campbell. Anyone with information about his disappearance is urged to call Det. Sgt. Jeff Haile at the Midland Police Department, 683-4281.

Council rezones land near air park

But Akins denied this small tract is any indication the city is trying to sell Air Park. "There's no way we'd dump 550 acres on the market at one time. In today's market, 48 acres is a lot."

OPPOSING THE zone change was Beverly Vaughan, whose home at 2302 Metz Place is across the street from the tract. She cited increased problems with drainage and traffic if that land is developed according to the plan. "We know the problems with Air Park. How can we allow MF right up to Air Park?"

"Let's assume Air Park isn't there," replied Akins. "What would be reasonable zoning?"

Mrs. Vaughan then voiced her objection to the 16 acres of apartments across the street from her.

Midland lawyer Martin Allday questioned Midland College's need for that land, but was told college officials didn't oppose the city selling it.

"We are in a conflict of interest," said Marcum. "We sit as trustees for the airport property and should gain the highest and best use for the land. We also want it to be compatible with the neighborhood. You have to trust us to work out a trade to some day not have Air Park in that location."

In other aviation matters, the council decided to pursue an Federal Aviation Administration flight service station for Midland. A new one was built a few years ago, said Aviation Director Victor White. But the FAA has decided to combine 90 counties into one station, closing down the rest. That closing includes Midland, he said, but the FAA is looking for the city that will give it a new building for almost nothing.

CITIES ARE BEING encouraged to build these flight service stations according to FAA specifications and then lease the site to the FAA for $1 per year for at least 20 years. Average cost of construction is $700,000, according to White, and by time parking lots and site preparation are added the price tag can be $1 million.

Midland's building couldn't be converted to hold the additional personnel, said White. But he said the employees could bring an initial payroll of $1.3 million with it rising to $2.25 million. Over 20 years, this would generate about $40 to $60 million in total economic impact on the city.

Although no details were released about the new hotel, ClayDesta Corp. won a zone change for its land on North Big Spring Street to allow a seven-story structure. Allday declined giving an impromptu news conference.

A partner in Leo's Oyster Bar tried to sell the council on a plan to close off the Downtown Park on a Saturday evening. The restaurant would bring in an Austin band to play progressive country and blues while selling oysters, watermelon and flajitas. Because a non-profit organization wasn't involved, as it is with Juneteenth, the council rejected the idea.

ANDY HEMPHILL was hired as architect for a classroom building and drill tower for the Fire Department. His fee will run about 2.5 percent of the construction cost.

The council also:

— Approved a specific use permit for a veterinary clinic on the south side of Illinois Avenue and east of Midland Drive.

— Approved a zone change for The Exeter Corp. on 10 acres of land at North Garfield and Bluebird streets. Instead of Agricultural Estates, the land will be zoned PD, planned district for a housing and townhouse development.

— Decided to install a stop sign at the intersection of M and Tennessee streets.

— Recessed the meeting until 10 a.m. Tuesday to talk about various budget items. The meeting will resume in the City Hall Conference Room, located in the basement.

— Approved a beer and wine license for a Fast Freddy's to be located in Westwood Shopping Center. The business has pool tables and video games but, said owner Dennis Lawyer, doesn't have the atmosphere of a "pool hall. We run a tight ship and the word gets out."

Environmental laws limit self-sufficiency, expert says

McKetta blamed the energy problem on the American public, which jumped on the environmental bandwagon in the late 1960s and early 1970s. Misled by the national media and activists such as Ralph Nader, Barry Commoner and others, the public demanded cleaner air and water standards than are chemically possible, he said.

The groundswell of popular support for "environmentalism" exhibited by Earth Day, April 1970, led Congress to pass stringent laws under the Clean Air and Water Act.

"Our energy rules will bring us to our knees," McKetta said. "The extreme demands the general public places on clean air and clean water," are unrealistic.

Scientists have found, for example, that nature creates more dangerous carbon monoxide gas than does man and his industries and automobiles. Because of environmental pressures, however, man has spent millions of dollars to install catalytic converters on all cars, and more millions to remove lead from crude oil.

"I know that the grass and trees in my yard in Austin emit more carbon monoxide than a car does, but don't tell the EPA, because they'll want to put a catalytic converter on my grass and trees," McKetta said.

The results of the Clean Air Act are still being felt today, McKetta said. For example, 235 utilities were forced in 1970 to abandon burning coal and switch to oil and gas. Only two have today switched back to coal use.

The costs of complying with rigid environmental rules have damaged the economics of the energy business, McKetta said, and thrown the free enterprise system out of kilter.

McKetta said he believes the U.S. can be energy independent if conservation and exploration increase. He favors opening up federal lands to exploration.

He also advocates more conservation by both the public and private sectors. "For every barrel we save, the government should say it will save the same amount," he said. He suggested car pooling, turning down thermostats, driving 55 miles per hour and many other methods of conserving energy.

McKetta also said he favors developing as many alternative forms of energy as possible. Although these forms of energy — coal, solar, nuclear, wind power — will not meet consumer needs by the year 2000, McKetta said he thinks they should be developed to augment more traditional oil, gas and coal use.

Oil and gas will continue to supply the vast majority of American energy needs, however. "Alternate forms of energy are wonderful, but they are not going to be enough," he said. "One million barrels of oil a day is the equivalent of 3,000 square miles of solar panels..."

He said he sees the price of oil rising back to $35, $40, or $45 per barrel by 1990.

McKetta spoke strongly in favor of nuclear energy, which he showed was safer than the natural radiation emitted by rocks and minerals, brick buildings, and medical technology.

Alaskans try to rebuild village 19 years later

By the Los Angeles Times-Washington Post News Service

CHENEGA BAY, Alaska — When the 1964 Good Friday earthquake rocked Alaska, it sent a lethal tidal wave tens of feet high racing across Prince William Sound, over the shore and through the helpless Aleut fishing village of Chenega.

So thorough was the wave's destruction that rescue planes initially failed to descend on Chenega. There was not enough debris left to indicate to searchers that the tiny community had ever existed. But it had existed for at least 200 years, and no community suffered more in the earthquake than it did: 23 of its 90 residents were killed.

Now, 19 years later, the survivors are finally coming together to build a new Chenega. This summer marks the rebirth of their community, as well as their triumph over bureaucracy and time.

Drawing them back from the cities and towns in which Chenegans have been scattered since 1964 is the special quality of Alaska native village life — the sense of community and identity, of sharing and caring.

"It's been an uphill struggle," said Larry Evanoff, 35, a leader in the effort to rebuild who has moved to the new Chenega with his wife and two children. "We're finally seeing something. I'd like to get back to some semblance of what we had before.

"I know it's going to be difficult. Some of the people were little children in 1964. You can be told or taught (about village life), but if you haven't lived it, it's just not the same. My son is 14 years old, and he's never known a village life style. This is my one big present to him, to give him a chance at village life."

"The attraction is, do you want to preserve your culture?" his 34-year-old wife, Gail, said. "Do you want to say you are where you are from? If we want to preserve that culture for the future, I'm not going to do it from Los Angeles or New York or Anchorage. I'm going to have to do it living on the land here."

So a few yards behind the shore of Evans Island, in Prince William Sound in south-central Alaska, the Evanoffs have built a cabin, "Chateau Evanoff." Behind it, a newly constructed gravel road winds over the muskeg, knitting together the sites for 21 homes to be built soon under a federal housing grant. A generator grumbles in the distance in reluctant support of those settling in; the lights dim, then brighten again.

Strauss chit-chats during news conference set-up

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — Sometimes news conferences don't go quite as planned, especially when former Democratic party chief Robert Strauss is sharing the podium.

As other Democratic leaders grimaced, Strauss ignored his prepared statement at a recent news conference announcing formation of a National House Democratic Caucus and spent 15 minutes fielding questions on other subjects.

Even though reporters had been given Strauss's text, when his time came to talk about the caucus he was selected to lead, he said he didn't have a prepared statement and would just answer questions.

Well, then what was that statement with his name on it? reporters wondered.

"That's not my statement. You can throw that out," Strauss said.

Rep. Tony Coelho, D-Calif., chairman of the Democractic Congressional Committee, gently reminded Strauss that it was indeed his statement — just as Strauss had dictated it.

"Well, I'm not denying anything in it," Strauss said.

Writer searches for Indian characters, places, things

NEW YORK (AP) — During his more than 30-year writing career, Peter Matthiessen has trekked the most remote regions of the world — from the highlands of the Himalayas to the depths of the Amazon jungles — in quest of material about the Earth's little-known peoples, places, cultures and wildlife.

While in recent years the wanderings of the 56-year-old author, explorer and naturalist have been closer to home, the subject of his work remains foreign to most Americans.

Four years ago, Matthiessen — whose work includes the National Book Award-winning "The Snow Leopard" and the novel "Far Tortuga" — went to the Dakotas to explore a long-held interest.

"I was interested in Indian spiritual traditions and especially parallels with certain Asian traditions. I was doing a lot of traveling in the back country of the West, and everywhere I went the people were having trouble with transgressions of sacred ground," he said in an interview.

SOON, HE SAYS, he was immersed in the political problems of American Indians. His most recent book, "In the Spirit of Crazy Horse," an ambitious 575-page work of investigative journalism, is part of the story of what he found.

"Crazy Horse," as he calls the book, is the history of a group of rebellious young Indians who in the late 1960s formed AIM, the American Indian Movement, in an effort to breathe new hope and spirit into their largely demoralized people.

The book is woven around a single incident — a 1975 shootout on the Pine Ridge Reservation in South Dakota that left one Indian and two federal agents dead. A young AIM leader, Leonard Peltier, was convicted of killing the FBI men and is serving two consecutive life terms.

Matthiessen says his research uncovered new evidence through the federal Freedom of Information well be innocent. As he sees it, the young Indian became a "kind of symbol" to federal agents and prosecutors anxious for a conviction.

In his book, Matthiessen claims there has been a history of broken treaties, broken promises, economic exploitation and blatant discrimination.

MATTHIESSEN ALSO tells of AIM's reawakening of the warrior ethos — the spirit of Crazy Horse — through the revival of nearly lost Indian languages, mystical vision quests, painful sun dances and tribal initiation rites.

"AIM was the first group that really caught the imagination of Indians all around the country," he says.

The movement had numerous critics both in and out of the Indian community and it frightened many middle-aged Indians who had come to accept the white man's ways, Matthiessen says.

More businesses eyeing Oklahoma

OKLAHOMA CITY (AP) — Companies from out of state are once again looking at Oklahoma as a potential site for new business enterprises, according to Jay Casey, director of the Department of Economic Development.

"I'm optimistic. I'm vry optimistic," Casey said, citing figures showing the number of inquiries to his office more than doubled in June.

Casey credits the national economic recovery, which began in January, for renewed interest in Oklahoma as a business location.

The department separates its inquiries into hard prospects and casual responses to the state's national advertising.

In Februry, the department received 15 inquiries from hard prospects and 211 casual inquiries.

The mail dropped to seven inquiries from hard prospects and 79 casual inquiries in Mrch. In April, the number of inquiries from hard prospects remined at seven, but casual inquires plunged to 30.

In May' the tide turned, Casey said.

Inquires from hard prospects increased to nine, and casual inquires soared to 238, he said.

In June, the latest month available, there were 14 inquiries from hard prospects and 558 casual inquiries, Casey said.

"Yousee, there may be a different trend going on here. It's encouraging to us," Casey said.

Casey's optimism comes against a backdrop of declining state revenues and increasing concern by state officials over he state's ability to fund its programs in the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1984.

State Budget Office figures show revenues declined by 3.4 percent in fiscal year 1983, which ended June 30. Senate President Pro Tempore Marvin is predicting the Legislature will have $240 million less to appropriate when it returns in January.

Gov. George Nigh, however, remains firm in his resolve to outwait the recession in Oklahoma's economy. Casey is convinced that by the latter half of 1984, events will have proved Nigh right.

Casey said the time between an inquiry and establishment of a business is about two years, "but I think we would feel it earlier because existing industries will start filling out their inventories."

Indeed, business in Oklahoma already is beginning to respond to the national recovery, Casey said.

"Western Electric is adding 1,700 workers, Xerox is expanding in Oklahoma City — there are all kinds of positive signs," Casey said.

The types of inquiries differ little from the years of the oil boom, although Casey's department is concentrating on diversifying the economy by attracting business in service, science and technology, he said.

In recent years, about 2 percent of the inquiries received by the Department of Economic Development have resulted in new economic acitivity in the state, Casey said.

Casey's department has a $500,000 budget to promote Oklahoma through advertising in national publications.

Prosecutor: Tape will place woman at scene of ex-husband's murder

BROWNSVILLE (AP) — Prosecutor Ted Campagnolo says a tape recording he plans to play in court this week will place a La Feria mother at the scene of her former husband's murder.

Sherry Wolf, 21, is on trial for murder in state district court for the July 16, 1982, slaying of Billy Staton, whose concealed tape recorder captured the sounds of his own slaying.

Campagnolo, a Cameron County assistant district attorney, alleges Mrs. Wolf was a "willing participant" in a plan to kill Staton and his fiancee, Leticia Castro.

Prosecutors contend Mrs. Wolf and her husband Paul Wolf planned the killings to end a bitter court battle over rights Staton had been granted to visit his young daughter by Mrs. Wolf.

A man serving a life sentence for his part in the double murder told jurors during the first day of testimony Tuesday that Mrs. Wolf "was all for it" when he and the Wolfs discussed the plan to kill the pair.

Glenn Henderson, a 19-year-old ninth grade dropout, said Mrs. Wolf helped scout out a place where the bodies would be dumped and helped plan where Staton would sit when he came to the Wolf house to pick up his daughter.

The night of the slayings, Henderson said he and the Wolfs smoked some marijuana, then waited for Staton to arrive on his scheduled visit.

After Staton entered the house, Henderson testified, Mrs. Wolf placed the 2½-year-old child on her lap and kept Staton talking so Wolf could sneak up behind him and strike him with a metal bar, Henderson said.

Mrs. Wolf has pleaded innocent to the charge. Her attorney, Jim Bates of Edinburg, would not comment on the case.

Campagnolo told jurors Tuesday that Mrs. Wolf ordered her husband to "hit him again" because the first blows to Staton's head did not kill him.

Prosecutors say Miss Castro was slain by Henderson and Wolf as she waited in the car for Staton to return.

The seven-woman, five-man jury will be the second to hear the bizarre tape recording, which captured the sounds of Staton's conversation with his daughter, the attack on Staton, the child's screams and Staton's final dying gasps.

Wolf, 21, was convicted and sentenced to life in prison by a state district court jury April 20 for Miss Castro's death.

He had pleaded innocent by reason of insanity to both slayings, testifying at his trial that he "went crazy" and killed the couple after having witnessed Staton's daughter scream during visits with her father.

Judge gives probated sentences to kidnappers

ABILENE (AP) — Probated sentences were ordered for an Air Force enlisted man and his German-born wife who pleaded guilty to charges stemming from their son's kidnapping from a hospital.

Stormy Brinson, 26, and Ilona Brinson, had their infant son, Stormy Brinson Jr., now 20 months, when they were arrested at Dallas-Fort Worth Regional Airport on Jan. 10.

The pair had reserved tickets on a jet bound for West Germany, where both the mother and child are citizens.

The child, who was in the custody of Taylor County welfare officials, had been taken earlier in the day from Hendrick Medical Center in Abilene.

Welfare officials took custody of the child in December after Dyess Air Force Base officials asked for an investigation into unexplained bruises on the infant's body.

Mrs. Brinson pleaded guilty Tuesday to kidnapping, a third-degree felony. State District Judge Billy John Edwards said no conviction will go in her record if she successfully completes three years' probation.

Brinson, an enlisted man at Dyess, pleaded guilty before Taylor County Court-at-Law Judge John Saringer to enticing a child, a Class B misdemeanor offense, and sentenced to 180 days probation. He also had been indicted on a charge of kidnapping, but the charge was dismissed and refiled in county court-at-law as a misdemeanor.

The Brinsons have been granted physical custody of their child again, although he remains under supervision of welfare officials.

As a condition for his order last month returning the child to his parents, State District Judge Henry Strauss said the couple must continue to attend to attend a parental effectiveness training course taught by welfare unit personnel.

Man with new heart believes in miracles

HOUSTON (AP) — Until four months ago, Charles A. Washington didn't believe in miracles.

Washington, a 47-year-old research chemist, had suffered a heart attack and had had seven coronary bypass operations that left him in constant pain.

"I accepted the fact that I was not going to live," he said.

But Washington had a heart transplant in March and now feels "great."

"Before my heart attack and all the things that happened up to the time of the transplant, I didn't believe miracles could occur in today's world," Washington told the Houston Post in a story published Tuesday.

"I feel just great — and very grateful," he said.

Washington said he has been given a clean bill of health and will be allowed to return to work next month at Union Carbide Corp.'s Nuclear Division in Oak Ridge, Tenn., where he makes components for thermonuclear weapons.

Appeals to the Texas Heart Institute transplant team headed by Dr. Denton A. Cooley were made in late February while Washington waited at the Alabama Medical Center in Birmingham.

He was flown on March 10 to Houston. But he said his wife and three grown children had been told he probably would not survive until a suitable heart was located.

After the bypass operations, Washington said, "I got progressively worse...and it was scary. I couldn't sleep except sitting up with my head on a table...and the pain was constant. My skin began to peel off, I gasped for breath almost all the time..."

On March 27, tests on a young Houston-area man who was brain-dead showed his heart would be ideal for Washington.

"I'd been pretty much out of it for a couple of days, but I remember someone telling me to hang on, that I was about to get a new heart," Washington said.

Nine heart-only transfers and three heart-lung transplants have been performed in the current series of about 35 planned in cooperation with the University of Texas Medical School's organ transplantation division.

Two heart-only and all three heart-lung recipients have died, but the other seven patients were described as doing well with all but one out of the hospital.

Washington said he has already started talking with friends back home in Oak Ridge about the need for more public understanding of organ transplants.

"There's a lot of misunderstanding about giving organs, even among the medical community and with the churches, too," Washington said. "I hope in some small way to help correct these notions."

Hart says MX bill will fail next test

WASHINGTON (AP) — Although his two-week fight against the MX missile produced only one convert, a leading Senate opponent claims his campaign will bear fruit when the strategic nuclear weapon faces another congressional test this fall.

"I think we made it easier down the road for senators and House members to move around" to the opposition cause, Sen. Gary Hart, D-Colo., told reporters Tuesday night after the Senate voted, 58-41, to keep MX production money in a defense authorization bill.

The overall, $200 billion measure later was approved, 83-15.

The House, meantime, completed work on its own defense bill at 1:40 a.m. today, approving it 305-114 at the conclusion of a marathon session. That measure also contains MX production funds.

"...There are 10 to 15 (members) in the Senate and 13 in the House who are shaky" supporters of the MX, and can be turned around before a separate appropriations bill to provide the actual dollars for the weapon is brought to a vote, probably in September, Hart said.

Only a serious new commitment by President Reagan to obtain an arms-control agreement with the Soviet Union is likely to derail that trend, he added.

HART'S AMENDMENT to strip $2.5 billion to build the first 27 of a planned 100 MX "Peacekeepers" from the $200 billion defense bill attracted support from 34 Democrats and 7 Republicans. Twelve Democrats joined 46 GOP senators in the majority.

The lineup closely resembled the 59-39 majority that voted to free $625 million in MX engineering and flight-test money in May, with Sen. Bob Packwood, R-Ore., the only convert to Hart's cause.

In a second MX vote Tuesday night, the Senate also refused, 57-42, to block MX deployment while allowing production to proceed. Sen. Lawton Chiles, D-Fla., switched to the opposition.

The House had affirmed the decision to produce the 10-warhead MX in a 220-207 vote last week, although it cut the number of missiles to be built from 27 to 21. It also tied the MX production schedule to progress on developing a mobile, single-warhead missile that has wider congressional support.

Those and other differences between the Senate and House versions of the defense bill will have to be worked out by conferees from the two chambers.

The House passed its defense bill after dealing with 32 mostly minor amendments in a sometimes-raucous session that caused the presiding officer, Rep. Dan Rostenkowski, D-Ill., to go to his gavel often to keep order.

THE EFFORT was slowed by several riders that would ban, or require advance congressional approval of, plans by President Reagan to send more U.S. troops to Central America. The only one that succeeded would ban use of the troops to topple the leftist government of Nicaragua.

The House bill totals $187 billion, but unlike the omnibus Senate version, it does not earmark funds for military construction or nuclear programs run by the Department of Energy. These are being handled in separate measures.

Although the Senate vote on the MX was never really in doubt, the administration signaled its view of the importance of the program by dispatching Vice President George Bush to preside over the chamber in his role as president of the Senate.

In 13 days of sporadic debate over a 16-day span, Hart and 16 fellow liberals hammered repeatedly on the theme that placing the MXs in existing silos already targeted by the Soviets increased chances of a nuclear war, perhaps one started by accident.

Sen. John Tower, R-Texas, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, and other supporters acknowledged the vulnerability problems of silo basing.

BUT, THEY said, the MX must go forward to show U.S. resolve to keep pace with the Soviets' ambitious missile program, and thus force them into serious arms negotiations — a strategy that has always worked in the past.

Tower foresaw "the emergence of complete Soviet intransigence at the bargaining table in Geneva" and increased military adventurism by the Soviets around the globe should the MX be defeated.

With the MX victory, Reagan got nearly every major item he sought in the bill to sustain his big rearmament drive, including B-1 long-range bombers, Navy ships and M-1 tanks.

But because a congressional budget blueprint for the 1984 fiscal year had held the allowable increase in defense spending to 5 percent after inflation, half the boost Reagan sought, Tower's committee made trims in the number of some items to be purchased.

The bill also rejected the president's proposal for a military pay freeze and authorized a 4 percent raise, effective next April 1, for most of the nation's 2.1 million servicemen and women.

The House voted early today to make the raise effective Jan. 1.

Reagan's closest call on the Senate floor came on July 13 when members deadlocked 49-49 on whether to permit production of lethal nerve gas for the time since 1969. Bush then cast the tie-breaking vote in favor of the weapon.

However, the House had deleted nerve-gas production funds, meaning it will be up to conferees to make the final decision.

Reagan pick accused of racist leanings

WASHINGTON (AP) — Another of President Reagan's nominations is in trouble with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, this time because the nominee served on a foundation board blamed for financing research aimed at proving blacks are genetically inferior.

Sen. Paul Tsongas, D-Mass., called upon Reagan to withdraw the nomination of Thomas Ellis to the Board for International Broadcasting after a hearing Tuesday at which Ellis was questioned about his racial views and his ties with the Pioneer Fund.

Pete Roussel, a White House spokesman, said, however, "The president stands by his nominee."

Tsongas said Ellis, 62, a Raleigh, N.C., attorney, would be rejected "handily" by the committee if the president did not withdraw the nomination.

He would be the third Reagan nominee to be turned down by the panel.

Ernest Lefever withdrew from consideration on June 6, 1981, after his nomination as assistant secretary of state for human rights was rejected 13-4. Opponents charged he was insensitive to human rights considerations.

In February, the committee turned down the nomination of Kenneth L. Adelman as director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency by a vote of 8-7. The Senate confirmed the nomination despite objections that Adelman lacked the experience and convictions for the job.

In a telephone interview from Raleigh, Ellis said he had no plans to withdraw.

Reagan: No longer looking for 'token' women

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Reagan says he has named so many women to federal jobs that he doesn't have to look for "token" appointments any more, but a major feminist group says his record on appointments is not as good as former President Carter's.

The Republican incumbent, still faced with the negative views of many women that have given rise to the term "gender gap," Tuesday defended his all-male commission on Central America, saying "It just came out that these were the 12."

But Kathy Wilson, head of the National Women's Political Caucus, said the commission is just another example of the administration's inability to deal with women.

"I keep thinking they are going to understand, and they keep missing the point," said Wilson, a Republican, who has called on Reagan not to run again.

Reagan said at a nationally televised news conference that he has appointed more than 1,000 women to federal executive jobs, more than any other president. His problems with women, he said, are ones of perception.

"That's all it is, a perception," he said. "I think it's just a case of our record isn't known.

"If anyone wants to really dig into the facts, I will match our record against any other administration that has ever been here in regard to what we have accomplished for women."

In particular, Reagan said his record is better than Carter's.

"When you compare our first two years with their first two years, we're quite a ways out ahead," Reagan said.

And that record, Reagan said, meant there was no need to name a woman to the 12-member panel headed by former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger to recommend a long-term Latin American policy. U.N. Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick will be Reagan's personal liaison with the commission, but is not one of its members.

"On this particular commission, we're doing so much and appointing so many that we're no longer seeking a token or something. It just came out that these were the 12 we selected. We wanted six opponents and we wanted six on our side," Reagan said.

But the caucus, a bipartisan feminist organization that has been critical of Reagan, took issue with Reagan's claims on appointments.

Over the first two years, the caucus said Reagan had named 63 women to top-level jobs requiring Senate confirmation, 9 percent of that category. That compares to 96 women appointed in the same time period to the same level of jobs by the Carter administration.

Demetra Lambros, spokeswoman for the caucus, said the White House has been asked in the past for that list of 1,000 appointments of women and has failed to produce it. Earlier examinations of Reagan appointments of women by the caucus said he had appointed many women to part-time, non-policy making jobs, not to top-level positions.

The caucus said Reagan's "grandstand appointment" of Sandra Day O'Connor as the first woman on the Supreme Court hides his poor record on judicial appointments. The caucus said only 10 — or 8.3 percent — of Reagan's 121 judicial appointments had gone to women.

Reagan pulls old line out of hat at conference

Hearst Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — "There you go again."

That line worked magnificently for Ronald Reagan in his 1980 debate with Jimmy Carter. It worked again Tuesday night when Reagan was queried about the purloined Carter briefing documents that were used to prepare him for that debate.

In fact, Reagan's repetition of the line provided almost the only moment of levity in a press conference that was consumed by questions about his policies in beleagured Central America.

At the very end of the press session in the East Room of the White House, the president was asked "what possible crime could be involved in the Carter briefing book caper to justify calling out the FBI?"

At that moment, Reagan, who had spent a tense, unsmiling half hour jousting with reporters over the degree of the U.S. military and financial commitment in Central America, smiled the old smile that once beamed from the silver screen.

"There you go again," he said, giving the reporter the same kind of light-hearted jab that he thrust so devastatingly at Carter.

The second time around, the line didn't have quite the impact it had in Cleveland on Oct.28, 1980, when Reagan used it to refute Carter's assertion that he had opposed medical care for the aged and to impress his charm and amiability upon a national television audience.

But it evoked laughter among the reporters assembled in the East Room. A good line, as any professional actor knows, is worth repeating.

"I just couldn't help that," added the president. "I thought we were going to set a record and I was going up stairs and be able to say 'how about that, not a single question on it.'"

His reference, of course, was to the fact that his last press conference was consumed with questions about the so-called Debategate scandal just as the Tuesday night session was given over almost totally to Central America.

But after that opening moment of humor, the president became a bit emotional over the Debategate matter in which documents taken from the Carter White House and the National Security Council were turned over to Reagan campaign officials in 1980.

Forgetting possibly that he once suggested the furor over the theft of the Carter briefing papers was "much ado about nothing," Reagan declared that when the initial allegation was made "I said there is only one answer to this — certainly the best investigative force in the United States is the Federal Bureau of Investigation and I have told them to go completely to the bottom of this to see if there is any wrongdoing, to see if there is anything unethical that has taken place and I have told all of our people to make themselves available, anyone who knows anything about this and that includes me. I didn't know anything about it until I read it in the papers."

Dying Colorado boy gets liver transplant

PITTSBURGH (AP) — Surgeons with no time to spare began a delicate operation today to save the life of a dying 4-year-old Wyoming boy who was rushed across the country to receive the liver of a drowning victim from Colorado.

Clayton Conger, who was flown by private jet from Salt Lake City after a frantic search for a recipient, arrived with his parents at Children's Hospital shortly after 1 a.m. and was carried from the ambulance on a stretcher.

Forty minutes later the bright-eyed little blond boy from Rock Springs, Wyo., had been prepared to receive a liver that had been sped from Denver to Minneapolis, then to Pittsburgh.

The 10- to 16-hour operation started at about 2 a.m. EDT, doctors said.

The boy's father, Mike Conger, 27, said it was "great" to be in Pittsburgh following the four-hour flight from Utah.

"Clayton was pretty tired" during the flight, Conger said. "He just wanted us to rub his back."

Conger said he and his wife, Karen, had been ready several times to travel to Pittsburgh during the past few days. But each time, the liver went to someone else.

"Before, he didn't care too much" about getting a liver, Conger said. "But as he got sicker, he'd say, 'Daddy, I need this liver.' It was hard for me to tell him we might have a liver for you and then say, no we don't."

Dr. Thomas Starzl, the liver transplant pioneer who conducted the operation, told the family Clayton was chosen to receive the liver because of his critical condition.

The liver, which had been removed from a brain-dead boy in Denver at about 7 p.m. EDT, arrived by jet in Pittsburgh in an ice-filled container.

"A liver can stay alive no more than six hours max...They're not connected to anything," said Daryl Clemmens, a spokeswoman for the University of Pittsburgh.

Officials initially thought the liver might be transplanted to 11-month-old Ashley Bailey of Clyde, Texas, but medical authorities said the liver was too large for her. President Reagan made an appeal on Ashley's behalf in a radio broadcast during the weekend.

An unidentified 5-year-old girl was then selected to receive the liver in Minneapolis, but as the organ was on its way there, doctors discovered the child did not need the transplant.

After a fueling stop in Minneapolis, the jet carrying the organ continued on to Pittsburgh.

Clayton and his parents, meanwhile, boarded a Lear jet in Salt Lake City at 9:10 p.m. EDT after learning that a suitable liver had been found.

Clayton has been in serious condition for several weeks, suffering from a rare disorder in which his liver cannot remove harmful substances from the blood or make essential proteins.

Doctors said the child probably would not live beyond October without a new liver.

Waitresses win uniform reprieve

BOSTON (AP) — Three cocktail waitresses temporarily will be allowed to work at a motel lounge without having to wear the skimpy uniforms they claim resulted in sexual harassment, a judge ruled.

U.S. District Judge Rya Zobel on Tuesday granted a temporary restraining order against the uniform requirement by Holiday Inn's Bentley Lounge in Tewksbury. He also ordered the lounge to rehire Carol Coultas, who was fired in April for refusing to wear the shorts, and Monique Brand, who said she quit her job in March when she became the target of sexual comments from customers.

The suit was filed by the two women and Maureen Judd, 32, who still works at the motel. A full hearing was set for Aug. 3.

Dogs who mauled boy to be killed

MIAMI (AP) — Two dogs that mauled an 11-year-old boy as he rode his bicycle, biting him more than 100 times and causing him to lose a leg, will be destroyed after 10 days of observation, authorities said.

Doctors at American Hospital said late Tuesday they were forced to amputate Jorge Cuartas' left leg below the knee after it began showing signs of gangrene.

State police Tuesday captured the second of the two dogs in the attack by luring it into a trap near the attack site. The first was captured Saturday, the day after the attack.

Cult leader to be tried in death

ALLEGAN, Mich. (AP) — A cult leader and two of his followers can be tried in the beating death of a 12-year-old boy at a religious camp because they had the child "under their protection," a judge ruled.

On Tuesday, District Judge Harry A. Beach ordered William A. Lewis, known as the "prophet" of the House of Judah, his son, William L. Lewis, and Robert McGee to appear for arraignment Friday in the July 3 death of John Yarbrough. If found guilty on child cruelty charges, they could be sent to prison for four years and fined $2,000.

The boy's mother, Ethel Yarbrough, 33, has been charged with manslaughter in the death.

States war over housing of homeless

NEWARK, N.J. (AP) — Calling the case "a sad commentary on governmental leaders," a judge says a dispute over New York City's sending its homeless to New Jersey should be settled out of court.

In a suit filed by Essex and Hudson counties, Superior Court Judge Reginald Stanton refused Tuesday to stop New York City from housing poor families in New Jersey. But he set a hearing for Aug. 18 and said he hoped the matter would be resolved by officials before then.

New York says because its own shelters are full it has been paying $33 a night to house each of 300 families in Newark, East Orange and Jersey City hotels.

Partial withdrawal should be 'first step'

WASHINGTON (AP) — Israel's partial troop withdrawal from Lebanon should be "recognized and admitted" by Israel to be the first step in a complete pull-out of its troops, which could help prod the Syrians to leave as well, says President Reagan.

Reagan said at his news conference Tuesday night he is "very hopeful" Israel will do it that way. He said he will press his views on the Israelis in a meeting with Foreign Minister Yitzhak Shamir and Defense Minister Moshe Arens at the White House Thursday.

"If they withdraw in a phased withdrawal it certainly will give us a better case for breaking the roadblock that has been established by Syria and persuading them to keep their original promise that when others withdrew they would withdraw," Reagan said.

Shamir and Arens arrived Tuesday for three days of talks with administration officials. They conferred for 5½ hours Tuesday with Secretary of State George P. Shultz and plan to meet with him again today. Arens also planned to meet with Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger today.

Shamir indicated to reporters Tuesday that Israel will consider its move as part of an overall withdrawal. He said it would be taken in "the context" of the May 17 Israeli-Lebanese agreement that provides for a complete pull-out of Israel's 30,000 troops.

However, problems are sure to arise if Washington presses Israel to withdraw its troops completely without a commitment by Syria to also leave. The Israelis have said they won't get out and leave the Syrians behind, and the administration has supported that position in writing.

The administration's strategy reflects the hope that Syria, which so far has refused to budge, will decide to pull out if the Israeli withdrawal appears unrelated to what Damascus will do, even though in reality the two withdrawals would be connected.

One State Department official, who insisted on anonymity, said it would give Syria a way to save face as the Syrians don't want the rest of the world to think they are responding to Israeli moves. Syria has denounced the Israeli-Lebanese agreement and refused even to discuss it with U.S. officials.

However, Reagan's new Mideast peace envoy, Robert McFarlane, plans to visit Damascus following the talks with Israeli officials here and is expected to press Syria to go along with an overall troop withdrawal.

U.S. officials have disclosed previously that the administration had decided against opposing the Israeli plan for a partial withdrawal, but said Shultz might press the Israelis to delay it until substitute security arrangements can be worked out for areas the Israelis will evacuate, such as the violence-ridden Chouf mountain region east of Beirut.

The Israelis plan to redeploy their troops into more secure positions in southern Lebanon and remove some of them from Lebanon altogether. There are an estimated 30,000 Israeli troops in Lebanon and 50,000 Syrian troops. There are another 10,000 Palestinian troops who are expected to pull out if and when the Syrians leave.

While no public date has been set by the Israelis for starting their pull-back, Israeli press reports say it could start next week and continue over the next eight to 10 weeks.

Shamir told reporters after Tuesday's meeting with Shultz at the State Department, "We had very good talks," but didn't disclose any details.

He declined to respond when asked whether Shultz had asked for a delay in the withdrawal. But Shamir later told Israeli Army Radio that Shultz did not ask Israel to stall the pull-back. "We were not asked, the American feeling is that this is our decisions and they do not oppose it and they are not interfering with the matter."

Israeli troops patrolling Hebron

TEL AVIV, Israel (AP) — Reinforced Israeli troops patrolled the West Bank city of Hebron today with orders to keep residents off the streets after the occupied territory's worst terrorist violence in three years.

Prime Minister Menachem Begin denounced the masked gunmen who killed three Arab university students and wounded 33 in Hebron on Tuesday. He vowed to bring the killers to justice and called their act "a despicable crime."

But Palestinian activists blamed the violence on Jewish settlers encouraged by Begin's government to move into the West Bank. The Palestine Liberation Organization demanded an emergency U.N. Security Council meeting to discuss "the massacre of Palestinian students in Hebron."

In east Lebanon's Bekaa Valley town of Jdeita, PLO chairman Yasser Arafat's elite "Squad 17" guerrilla unit repelled an attack by mutineers in house-to-house combat Tuesday that killed 14 people, wounded 25, downed telephone lines and riddled buildings with shell holes.

Reporters who reached the town 19 miles east of Beirut late Tuesday said Arafat's men were digging foxholes and barricading streets to repel more attacks, despite a cease-fire mediated by leftist Lebanese political groups.

Arafat's loyalists in east Lebanon have been fighting a mutiny since May 7, when several officers in his Fatah faction rebelled. The mutineers claim Arafat is not militant enough in the campaign against Israel.

No group claimed responsibility for the killings at the Hebron university, where gunmen raked the campus with rifle fire and escaped by car. Outraged Palestinian residents shuttered shops and stoned Israeli occupation troops, who slapped a curfew on the predominantly Arab city of 70,000 and banned the press.

In Nablus, troops shot an Arab woman protester dead and wounded another Tuesday during a Palestinian demonstration protesting the Hebron attack. An Israeli soldier was reported injured by hurled rocks.

Israel's military command put the entire West Bank occupation force on alert, rushed in reinforcements and erected roadblocks in attempts to catch the killers and avert widespread Arab protests.

The Hebron attack was the worst West Bank violence since 1980, when six Jewish settlers were slain in an ambush and bombs maimed two radical Palestinian mayors.

Arab-Jewish tension has flared in the West Bank since Israel captured the territory from Jordan in the 1967 Middle East War and began encouraging Jewish settlers to move in.

A persistent flashpoint has been Hebron, where militant Israeli settlers have established a community just outside the city and have been occupying areas of the old Jewish quarter in the city center despite Arab protests.

In Washington, President Reagan said Tuesday he hoped Israel's partial pullback from Lebanon's central mountains to a line 25 miles south of Beirut would be the first step in a complete pullout of its troops from that country.

Israel announced last week it was withdrawing from the central mountains, where sectarian feuding and guerrilla ambushes have plagued the Israelis with casualties and raised opposition at home to the 13-month-old Lebanon war.

Lebanese officials have criticized the Israeli pullback, saying it could lead to the permenant partition of Lebanon into the Syrian-held north and east and Israeli-controlled south, with only Beirut under government control.

Israel has said it will withdraw its 28,000 troops from Lebanon when Syria agrees to pull out its 50,000 soldiers and the PLO agrees to withdraw its 12,000 guerrillas.

The Israelis invaded Lebanon in June 1982 to rout the PLO.

Arab merchants close shops in protest

TEL AVIV, Israel (AP) — Arab merchants in East Jerusalem closed their stores today to protest the shooting rampage in the West Bank city of Hebron, and Israeli troops clamped curfews in Hebron and part of Nablus to forestall trouble.

Israeli authorities promised intensive efforts to capture the gunmen who raked a Hebron university campus with gunfire and threw a grenade on Tuesday, killing three Arabs and wounding 33.

Prime Minister Menachem Begin called the attack a "despicable crime" and ordered security forces in the occupied territory to find the killers, who wore masks throughout the assault lasting four to seven minutes.

Military authorities put Hebron under curfew and deployed reinforced squads of Israeli troops on the streets to keep residents of the predominantly Arab city of 70,000 indoors.

Authorities also slapped a curfew on the central marketplace of Nablus after a stone-throwing demonstration on Tuesday. An Arab woman was killed there and a second woman was wounded, but it was not clear how they had died.

"The government is guilty in allowing in recent years certain Jewish groups supported by it to act as though they are the authority in the West Bank. What happened yesterday in Hebron is none other than a logical outcome of the actions and failures of the government."

— Israeli daily Haaretz

Israel television reported the bullet taken from the dead woman was not of a type used by Israeli troops. The military command said it was still investigating how the women were shot.

Although authorities carefully refrained from blaming Jewish extremists for the attack, West Bank Palestinians blamed Israelis, and the ousted mayor of Hebron, Mustafa Natshe, called for the disarming of all Jewish settlers.

"The only one who is armed must be the Israeli army," Natshe said. He said he thought the attack was revenge for the stabbing of 18-year-old Jewish student Aharon Gross by Arabs in the center of Hebron three weeks ago.

The Maariv newspaper reported it received a telephone threat Monday, the day before the Hebron shooting. "We will avenge the death of Aharon Gross. It will be soon," the caller was quoted as saying.

Some Israeli newspapers blamed Begin's government for failing to curb extremist settlers. A Jerusalem Post editorial said Israeli security forces' record "in solving crimes committed against Arabs in the territories is not very impressive."

The editorial in the Haaretz daily, which like the Post is often critical of the government's West Bank policy, said, "The government is guilty in allowing in recent years certain Jewish groups supported by it to act as though they are the authority in the West Bank. What happened yesterday in Hebron is none other than a logical outcome of the actions and failures of the government."

The Hebron attack was the worst West Bank violence since 1980, when six Jewish settlers were slain in an ambush and bombs maimed two radical Palestinian mayors.

Arab-Jewish tension has flared in the West Bank since Israel captured the territory from Jordan in the 1967 Middle East War and began encouraging Jewish settlers to move in.

A persistent flashpoint has been Hebron, where militant Israeli settlers have established a community just outside the city and have been occupying areas of the old Jewish quarter in the city center despite Arab protests.

El Salvador planning troop buildup

By KNUT ROYCE
Hearst Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — El Salvador is planning a major buildup of its armed forces this year and next, placing further pressure on the United States to provide additional arms and advisors to the war-torn nation.

The Salvadoran military, which now numbers 21,000, is expected to increase by 7,000 by the end of this year and an additional 7,000 next year, bringing the total force to 35,000 — or a 40 percent increase — The Hearst Newspapers have learned.

The disclosure was made by a senior Army official in a closed-door briefing to Senate aides assessing the growing militarization of Central America.

Two aides present at the meeting agreed to discuss the substance of the brefing on condition neither they nor the Army official, who has extensive experience in Central America, be identified.

In discussing the Salvadoran military buildup, the Army official also asserted that additional U.S. advisors would be needed, although he said that the reported Pentagon recommendation of a total of 125 — up from the current 55 — was not a "magic number."

The Army official was unavailable for comment this morning, Army spokesmen said.

In a related and highly controversial subject, he told the aides that he "sort of knows" the names of 15 of the top 20 Salvadorans involved in the notorious right-wing "death squads", but did not volunteer — and was not pressed for — the names.

He further disclosed that three significant events this year had improved the Salvadoran government's offensive against leftist guerrillas. He identified them as:

—A "significant improvement" in the quality of the military's general staff.

—Effective interdiction by El Salvador's navy, which has halted the flow of weapons from Nicaragua into El Salvador from the sea.

—A recently launched National Campaign Plan, which involves the breaking up of the army into 74 companies scattered around the country, and further dividing the companies into small reconnaissance units that are particuarly effective at night.

The disclosure of the planned military buildup by El Salvador coincides with a recent spate of leaks and announcements that America's military might would be put on show in Central America and its coastal waters.

The announced deployment of two carrier groups and a surface action group off the coast of Nicaragua, and land exercises that would put up to 4,000 American troops in Honduras at one time, has evoked expressions of concern from both Republicans and Democrats in Congress.

Sen. Paul Tsongas, D-Mass., a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, this morning voiced misgiving about the purported reason for the show of strength this morning: "I wonder what they (the administration) have in mind."

As a demonstration of force, he said in an interview, the planned exercises would be more harmful than beneficial in their impact on leftists, rightists and moderates.

Leftist guerrillas and Sandinistas, he said, "you won't be able to frighten." He said that if a foreign nation were to mount similar exercises in the United States, "We'd get our back up."

Moderates, such as the Contadora Group governments who have advocated a negotiated solution to the turmoil, "have already expressed misgivings."

Finally, he said, rightists will perceive the exercises "as an encouragement to the blind military solutions."

Peasants ousted from land provided by U.S. program

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador (AP) — Salvadoran peasant leaders contend that an increasing number of impoverished peasants are being kicked off the small plots they received in a U.S.-sponsored land reform program.

In many cases, the land is being repossessed by former owners with the help of military or security forces, they say.

The problem was cited in a special report, released in preliminary form Tuesday, that a U.S. government agency helped prepare. The report said one of every eight participating tenant families has been evicted, a finding which conflicts with the report made by the Reagan administration to Congress on July 20 when it certified that agrarian reform is progressing in El Salvador.

Such certification is required in order for the administration to receive congressional approval of continued aid to the Salvadoran armed forces in their fight against leftist guerrillas.

"One out of every 100 peasants who come into our offices, 30 are evicted peasants," said Gregorio Elias Valladares, a leader of the Association of Integrated Farm Cooperatives.

"These people are hungry and they have no other way of life. They have pending accounts in the banks," he said in an interview Tuesday. "If they don't work, they can't eat, and they can't pay back the banks."

He said the number of peasants complaining of forcible eviction has increased.

Peasant leaders say the evictions mostly affect peasants who gained plots under the so-called "land to the tiller" decree — a law that gives them the right to acquire the land they have been working on.

200 queried in kidnapping

ROME (AP) — Police said today they have rounded up more than 200 people for questioning about Emanuela Orlandi, the teenage girl whose self-proclaimed kidnappers are demanding the release of papal attacker Mehmet Ali Agca.

Authorities said many of those taken into temporary custody for questioning Tuesday night and early today were stopped near the city's main railroad station and in Piazza Navona in the city's historic center.

Both areas are known as hangouts for drug pushers and petty criminals.

There was no immediate word on whether the interrogations produced any significant leads in the case.

Emanuela, the 15-year-old daughter of a Vatican messenger, disappeared June 22 after a music lesson in downtown Rome.

The girl's self-proclaimed abductors had threatened to kill her if Agca was not released from prison by midnight July 20, and police say they do not know if the girl is still alive. Agca, a Turkish terrorist, is serving a life prison sentence for the May 13, 1981 attack in St. Peter's Square which wounded Pope John Paul II.

The pope has made six public appeals for Emanuela's release.

Church group seeks other counsel

By GEORGE W. CORNELL
AP Religion Writer

VANCOUVER, British Columbia — A global conference of Christians is seeking the counsel of other faiths for the first time in its search for a way to stop "the helpless drift toward apocalyptic annihilation" of the modern world.

As part of an agenda weighing essentials for peace, the World Council of Churches heard a Jew, a Hindu and a Moslem speak Tuesday.

The assembly, which formed 35 years ago and meets once each decade, had never before invited a non-Christian to participate in its plenary program, which this year is focusing on threats to peace and racial and economic justice.

"The central moral crisis of our time is the dignity of human life which is being battered on every continent on earth," an American rabbi, Marc H. Tanenbaum, told church representatives on the third day of the 18-day assembly.

Tanenbaum, the interreligious affairs director of the American Jewish Committee, cited the plight of 12 million refugees and the ravages of mass poverty while the world devotes $400 billion annually to nuclear armaments.

"What unites Jews and Christians, as well as Moslems and others, what binds them more powerfully than anything that separates them, is their conviction that every human life is precious in the eyes of God. None is expendable.

"Millions of Jews join hands with you ...in the cause of God's human family," he added.

The assembly also heard Yusuf Khan Shakirov of the Soviet Union, a Moslem, and Shri Shrivatsa Goswami of India, a Hindu.

"Moslems consider life to be the greatest gift of God.... To take away life given by God to any living being is a great sin, which the Almighty Allah will never pardon," said Shakirov.

Goswami said that "whatever there is in creation is the Lord.... Each of us therefore partakes in this manfestation of God."

The assembly's 900 voting delegates, from 300 Protestant, Eastern Orthodox, Old Catholic, Anglican, Pentecostal and other denominations, represent nearly 500 million Christians.

Proceedings are relayed in five languages — English, French, Spanish, German and Russian — via translation headphones.

Earlier in the day, the Rev. Philip Potter, general secretary and chief administrator of the council, spoke of the need for Christian unity to fight the "deadly military policies" of the superpowers.

Work for reconciliation "is particularly urgent at a time of fierce confrontation, the hurling of anathemas between nations and peoples, especially the powerful ones, and the helpless drift to apocalyptic annihilation" of the inhabited earth, he said.

"I hope that we...will take a clear and unequivocal stand for God's will for peace and justice and will not be tempted to echo the doomed policies of the nations from which we come," he said.

Soviet Union building radar system

By ROWLAND EVANS and ROBERT NOVAK

WASHINGTON — The Soviet Union is building an immense new radar system some 500 miles north of the Mongolian border in central U.S.S.R. that U.S. specialists are convinced is a dangerous new violation of the SALT I treaty that sharply limits anti-ballistic missile defenses.

A top-secret "warning" from the intelligence community was sent to the White House July 15. It said, "The new radar's location appears to be inconsistent with the provisions of the 1972 SALT I ABM (anti-ballistic missile) Treaty."

Article I of that treaty prohibits any ABM system "for the defense of the territory" of the U.S. or Soviet Union. But the treaty goes further. It even prohibits early-warning radars — not just the radars that control the firing of anti-missile missiles — from being built anywhere except "along the periphery" of Soviet (and U.S.) territory and "oriented outward."

The discovery of the new system, called a phased-array radar, was made by U.S. spy satellites in a routine sweep of that portion of the Soviet Union, 3,000 or so miles from the Pacific Coast. No effort to conceal the construction appears to have been made by the Soviets.

What deeply disturbs U.S. officials is that the new radar, which is oriented toward Alaska, is "almost identical" with the large missile-tracking radars now being tested at Pechora in the Soviet Northwest, at Lyaki near the Caspian Sea and at two other locations — all "along the periphery." The new construction is the first that appears to be an unambiguous violation of the "periphery."

The new radar, with a transmitter building nearly 500 feet long and 300 feet wide, would close a gap in Soviet coverage to the Northeast against incoming U.S. ICBMs targeted on Eastern Soviet territory and possible submarine-launched missiles from the Pacific.

Secret disclosure of the new system to the president and high administration officials reinforces the dilemma that has plagued every administration since the first SALT agreement: What should the U.S. do after detecting Soviet violations? The problem was raised directly with President Reagan in a June 22 letter signed by 34 Republican senators. They quoted Secretary of State George Shultz as testifying to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on June 15 that Moscow has been "stretching a series of treaties and agreements to the brink of violation and beyond."

These suspected violations specifically include the phased-array radars being built for only one discernible purpose: to protect the Soviet Union with an ABM system which both countries agreed not to build. In the hands of only one country, it could bestow an insurmountable advantage over an unprotected adversary.

Sinn Fein leader shunned

LONDON (AP) — Gerry Adams, a leader of the IRA's political front who is in London today on a self-proclaimed peace visit, is getting the cold shoulder from most British politicians.

In a television interview ahown by the British Broadcasting Corp. Tuesday night, Adams said his visit is "part of an attempt by Sinn Fein (Ourselves Alone) to open up a dialogue with British people and with their representatives to try and offset and penetrate the wall of disinformation that the British government has thrown up around our country."

Adams is vice president of Sinn Fein, the legal political arm of the outlawed Irish Republican Army. He is accompanied on the trip by Joe Austen, Sinn Fein's Belfast chairman.

Thirty of the 48 Laborites on the council refused to meet him and when he went to the House of Commons.

Soviet controls to be relaxed

MOSCOW (AP) — The government says it plans to loosen its rigid central control of some industries in "experiments" designed to boost production of heavy machinery, electrical equipment, food and other goods.

The move appears to be the most wide-ranging economic innovation planned since Yuri V. Andropov became leader of the Soviet Union last November.

Mexican students protest

MEXICO CITY (AP) — Thousands of student demonstrators snarled traffic and chanted anti-U.S. slogans outside the U.S. Embassy during a protest of President Reagan's Central American policy.

Some of the protesters burned an American flag, but there was no violence and the crowd of about 2,000 disperesed peacefully after the two-hour rally Tuesday evening.Police in riot gear and fire-trucks with water hoses stood by but did not interfere.

The crowd, shouting "Down with Reagan" and "Yankees No, Cuba Si," slowed traffic for more than two hours during the evening rush along Reforma Avenue, a main thoroughfare where the embassy is located.

Tougher laws anticipated

WARSAW, Poland (AP) — A government spokesman says Parliament is expected to approve laws Thursday toughening restrictions on anti-government activity and tightening censorship despite objections from the Roman Catholic Church.

"Legislation is the right of Parliament," said the spokesman, Jerzy Urban, who declined to disclose details of consultations between government and church leaders.

His announcement Tuesday ended a week of delay that followed a request by the nation's Roman Catholic primate, Cardinal Josef Glemp, that the government reconsider the legislation.

China offers cash rewards

PEKING (AP) — Chinese police are offering cash rewards to tipsters and aspiring bounty hunters who nab the notorious Wangs, two brothers on a spree of murder and mayhem in the countryside, diplomatic sources reported today.

The sources, who declined to be identified, said police have tacked up wanted posters for the Wangs in public places frequented by tourists, such as railway station in Hangzhou, capital of Zhejiang province in eastern China.

It is believed the first time since the Communist Party came to power in 1949 that police have offered cash for citizen help in catching outlaws.

Korean armistice marked

SEOUL, South Korea (AP) — Military leaders honored fallen soldiers at cemeteries and old battlegrounds today to commemorate the 30th anniversary of the armistice that brought an uneasy halt to the Korean War.

Led by Vice Defense Minister Kwon Yung-kak, a group of high-ranking South Korean soldiers visited the National Cemetery in southern Seoul.

Gen. Robert W. Sennewald, top American and United Nations Forces commander in South Korea, placed a wreath at a monument near the Freedom Bridge north of Seoul to commemorate the U.N. Forces that fought in the three-year war.

Similar ceremonies at 14 other battle monuments were held at 10:00 a.m. local time, the hour the truce agreement was signed by Communist North Korea and the U.N. Command on July 27, 1953.

Shark attacks explained

SYDNEY, Australia (AP) — A boat captain said today that sharks bit off his deckhand's leg and killed his female cook, leaving him the lone survivor after their trawler sank in rough seas.

The deckhand, Dennis Murphy, 24, bravely swam away from his companions to give them a chance to escape the maneaters before he died, said skipper Ray Boundy, 28.

But the sharks returned a few hours later and grabbed Linda Ann Horton, 21, Boundy said.

Two huge waves swamped and sank the trawler New Venture off Townsville, 690 miles northwest of Brisbane, on Sunday night.

Soviets perceive MX threat

MOSCOW (AP) — Soviet media said today that U.S. Senate approval of funds to build a first batch of MX missiles represents an increased threat to already difficult talks on limiting strategic nuclear weapons.

Radio Moscow said in an English-language newscast that the MX program "undermines the possibility to reach agreements between the two superpowers on reducing strategic arms."

The official news agency Tass noted that approval came only after two weeks of "stormy debate" in which Reagan's policy was criticized.

Student defecting to U.S.

TOKYO (AP) — A 22-year-old Soviet student left for the United States today after defecting and receiving political asylum, a spokesman for the Japanese Foreign Ministry said.

The student, identified as Andrei Yevgenievich Sorokun, an exchange student from Moscow State University studying at Tokai University, went to Japanese authorities on Monday and said he wanted to defect to America, the spokesman said.

A U.S. Embassy spokesman, Hugh Hara, said Sorokun visited the embassy first and was told he must either go to Japanese authorities or the United Nations Office of High Commissioner for Refugees.

Turkish ambassador attacked

LISBON, Portugal (AP) — Four gunmen shot their way into home of Turkey's ambassador to Portugal today, killing a policeman and seizing several hostages, authorities said.

A second police guard was reported seriously wounded in the shooting, which erupted after the attackers failed in an attempt to storm the nearby Turkish Embassy.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Romance is fine! Weed out nonessential tasks from your work schedule and you will have more time to devote to a pet project. Pay bills on time to preserve your credit rating.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Mate or partner gives you some excellent inside information. You could be in line for a glamorous job. The social pace accelerates. You may want to stay home tonight and rest up!

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): To save time and increase your productivity, get better organized. Business trips are lucky now. Be more sensitive to the needs of others. Someone responds when you wear your heart on your sleeve.

Watergate hearings air tonight

NEW YORK (AP) — Famous forevermore as chairman of the Senate Watergate Committee, Sam Ervin still believes, 10 years later, that Watergate was the greatest tragedy in the country's history, even worse than the Civil War.

"In the Civil War, there were many redeeming features of sacrifice and valor displayed on both sides," he says. "But there was no sacrifice or spirit of sacrifice, or no valor, really, displayed on the part of those responsible for the Watergate hearings, except to sacrifice their character."

Ervin is interviewed tonight on public television's "Summer of Judgment: The Watergate Hearings," which includes clips of the Senate's televised hearings of the "Boys of Summer '73," interspersed with current recollections from some senators and investigators on the Watergate panel.

The nostalgically emotional broadcast comes 10 years after Ervin and his colleagues exposed, on live TV, President Richard Nixon and All The President's Men mugging the Constitution.

The hearings were filled with power, scandal and intrigue. They were grand soap opera, only more unbelievable. The gavel-to-gavel coverage by the then-infant Public Broadcasting Service demonstrated the purest value of non-commercial TV — keeping a citizenry informed — and it may have been television's finest hour.

"If we'd had to depend on the printed page, as powerful as it is, we'd have the handicap that the testimony of a liar like Ananais (who's mentioned in the Bible) and that of a truthful man like George Washington looks just the same in print," says Ervin. "But when the people can see a person testify in person, they know by intuition whether he's telling the truth or whether he's not."

The program's hindsight is 20-20. There are no 18-minute gaps.

H.R. Haldemann, Nixon's former chief of staff, tells the committee that he heard one tape, in which there was a presidential discussion of hush-money payments for the Watergate burglars. Then, with a straight face, he says it confirms his version, not John Dean's. Haldemann subsequently was found guilty of perjury in a separate federal court proceeding.

Most of the principals are brought back from our TV memory banks.

Right from the the moment he picked up the cards to deal the first hand, Trump Coup Tommy felt that it was going to be his day. As you know, Tommy is the club hack who becomes a genius the moment things begin breaking badly. Club members are convinced that, if world championships could be played with preset hands in which all the distributions are abominable, Tommy would be unbeatable.

Tommy's bid of three hearts was forcing, and it invited his partner to bid three no trump with a stopper in hearts. North's four club denied a heart stopper, and Tommy settled for the club game.

West led the four of hearts, East won the ace and continued the suit. Tommy ruffed, and he beamed with delight when East showed out on the king of clubs. Now the contract could only be made via a trump coup, and to accomplish that declarer had to shorten his trumps, then strip the hand.

A lesser mortal might first have tackled the spade suit, but he would have been defeated as the cards lie. Tommy realized that he could not make his contract unless West held at least three diamonds. So he cashed three rounds of diamonds, and when East showed out on the third round, Tommy ruffed a diamond. He crossed to the ace of spades, ruffed a heart, crossed back to the queen of spades and ruffed another heart.

Tommy was down to the king-jack of trumps and king of spades, while West had three trumps. Tommy simply exited with the king of spades. West was forced to ruff, and then had to lead a trump from his queen into Tommy's king-jack tenace. Tommy lost only a heart trick and a spade ruff.

Jobs outlook

Only the unemployed or those who've recently found jobs can truly comprehend the despair of the jobless. Their sad eyes are a stark testimonial that any unemployment, regardless how small, is measured in human misery.

Midland and Odessa's infamous boom-bust cycle — inherent in the oil industry — has kept the despair just around the corner for many workers over the decades. The most recent downturn is keeping unemployment figures at relatively high levels in both cities — high being what's normally termed attractive levels in other parts of the nation.

That's small consolation, of course, for the 11,000 or so out of work in the two cities. To them, only one thing will make the outlook rosier — jobs!

Midland's unemployment stood at 6.4 percent in June, down slightly from the 7.7 percent of a year ago but up a notch from the previous month. Odessa's jobless constituted 10.3 percent of that city's workforce. The level is above both the month and the year before.

In an earlier time, economists listed 3 percent unemployment as, realistically, no unemployment. Although it's been awhile since either Midland or Odessa approached such a low level of unemployment, it's encouraging to consider that many economists say today's job market demands a high percentage to reflect the same level of those out of work.

That's understandable. There's more demand for jobs today, what with women having joined men in the workforce and all the World War II "baby boom" babies now holding or seeking jobs. That means June's 6.4 percent unemployment rate for Midland actually reflected a very low number of jobless and Odessa's 10.3 percent level actually wasn't too high.

And the economic tone for the two cities is upbeat currently. "In general," says Charm Carl with the Midland office of the Texas Employment Commission, "the tenor of things seems to be on the upbeat. Overall, I would say we may be on our way back up."

All predictions are calling for this recovery to be slow, steady and sustained. More than a few local officials have expressed a preference for that type of growth rather than the high, rapid growth experienced during the booming years of the late '70s and early '80s. If the recovery does shape up that way, it will point to what likely will be steady growth in the market of jobs that will be around for awhile.

That would be nothing but pure delight for Midland and Odessa's unemployed.

Another View:

Reagan should listen

Whatever inspired it — the reality of U.S. gunboats? common sense? Fidel Castro? — the peace feeler extended by Nicaraguan junta leader Daniel Ortega speaks directly to the concerns of the Reagan administration. Let's talk, he said, about the issue of arms supplies to El Salvador. Let's discuss a non-aggression pact with next-door Honduras. Let's negotiate an "absolute end" to material support for forces opposed to any Central American government and agree to keep foreign bases out of the region.

Those are the very stumbling blocks that Mr. Reagan has identified in his increasingly unrestrained attacks on Nicaragua. It would be a waste indeed if, hogtied by his own rhetoric, the president could not bring himself to test Ortega's offer — cast as it is in a framework that would include not just the United States and Nicaragua, but regionwide participants (or victims) of the conflict.

Official Washington is using words such as positive and first step to address the proposal, but Mr. Reagan did not fail to add last week that he found the likelihood of regional peace "extremely difficult" as long as the current Sandinista regime is in power.

There are those who would say, on the contrary, that it is Mr. Reagan — with his misfocused perceptions of the conflict and his enthusiasm for military settlement — who has been the roadblock to peace.

Certainly, by stocking Honduras with advisers, building airfields and ordering extensive naval maneuvers off Nicaragua, Mr. Reagan is doing little to lessen volatility in the region. Would he like to goad Nicaragua by protecting anti-Sandinista sanctuaries in Honduras? Is he searching for excuses for direct U.S. intervention?

In his initiative, echoed by important leaders on the Salvadoran left, Ortega said he was seeking to invalidate those "excuses" and join in multinational talks advocated by the presidents of the Contadora Group of nations — Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia and Panama. If the proposal is flawed, as the Reagan administration feels, it still bears full and encouraging investigation.

There is shaky and flagging support for Mr. Reagan's current course, based as it is on backdoor funding of Nicaragua's anti-Sandinista rebels, overlooking — through continued certification — the inability of El Salvador's government to rein in free-roaming death squads and a blue-ribbon, bipartisan commission whose composition is somewhat suspect.

As next week's round of meetings among Central and South American countries approaches, Mr. Reagan must make it clear that if Nicaragua is prepared to talk in good faith, the United States — skeptical though its leaders may be — stands ready to hear what it has to say.

WASHINGTON MERRY-GO-ROUND

King papers still locked in files

WASHINGTON — Civil rights leaders are planning to commemorate Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s epochal 1963 march on Washington with another march on the nation's capital Aug. 27.

Undeserving of emulation — but not easy to forget — was the FBI's march on the march on Washington. The late J. Edgar Hoover's agents dogged the footsteps of King and his associates, bugged them and tapped their telephones, squandering millions of the taxpayers' dollars on this disgraceful surveillance operation.

Now, 20 years later, tens of thousands of documents — perhaps hundreds of thousands — relating to the King family and other civil rights leaders, as well as to the historic march itself, are still locked tight in the FBI's files, unavailable to researchers, historians and the public.

The existence of the FBI's voluminous files on King was discovered by Harold Weisburg of Frederick, Md., an indefatigable researcher on American political assassinations. He obtained a 404-page partial inventory of documents that are stored in 59 FBI field offices across the country. A single entry in the inventory could refer to one page or a thousand pages of hidden material.

The inventory for the New York City field office is instructive. It gives an indication of the staggering amount of material on King that sits under lock and key in FBI files.

The inventory takes up 15 pages of index, and mentions "100 volumes" of unreleased documents. The general estimate of a "volume" is 200 pages, though it could run anywhere from six pages to several hundred pages.

The New York listing has 2,610 entries on a single King aide. The material includes formal and informal FBI memos, logs and reports of physical surveillance, teletypes, informants' reports, old newspaper clippings and copies of documents in the files of other field offices.

Much of the FBI material is classified and is still withheld because of "national security." This was a favorite Nixon-era device used to hide information that might embarrass the federal government, often when there wasn't the faintest connection to the nation's security.

Other data is being withheld by the FBI, even in the face of litigation, on grounds that it was supplied by confidential informants whose identities must still be protected. But after 20 years, the informants who are still alive could be protected easily by simply deleting their names or other identifying hints.

Oddly enough, there's a whole raft of King material that would be freely available at FBI field offices — but only if someone knew specifically what to ask for. And thousands of documents are already open to inspection in the FBI reading room.

In fairness to the FBI, employees spent hours trying to sort out the facts on the unreleased material for my associate Les Whitten. But they admitted that they have no idea — even to the nearest hundred thousand — how many documents remain hidden on the most influential black leader of our time.

Footnote: At the very time that Hoover was pursuing his vendetta against Dr. King at enormous cost to the taxpayers, the Mafia was spreading its malignant tentacles throughout American society. If the money spent harassing King had been used to fight the mob, the true security of the nation would have been better served.

GIMME A W!: James McAvoy, deputy director of the Bureau of Mines, went off recently on a cheerleading effort for his boss, Interior Secretary James Watt. But his rah-rah effort went sis-boom-bah-humbug with some bureau employees in Amarillo, Texas.

George Lucich and Ernest Loya were so outraged at being ordered to listen to what they considered a political speech by McAvoy that they complained to Rep. Pat Schroeder, D-Colo. They griped that McAvoy "spoke for nearly an hour extolling the virtues of his boss and the administration," and said they considered the meeting a waste of their time and the taxpayers' money.

A bureau spokesman laid the responsibility on Watt, noting that he has "given talks... recounting the accomplishments of his administration and encouraged employees to do the same." McAvoy "responded to that and vocalized the wishes of the secretary," the spokesman explained.

Schroeder has demanded an explanation of Watt's taxpayer-funded self-advertising.

FTC FRIPPERIES: Although drastic budget cuts have caused retrenchment in some federal agencies, they haven't discouraged some high Federal Trade Commission officials from spending heavily to redecorate their private offices.

Chairman James Miller spent more than $9,000 gussying up his office from October 1981 to May 1983. Among the items he couldn't do without were lamps, a refrigerator, some new secretarial chairs and new table tops.

Executive Director Bruce Yandle outdid his boss. Since joining the FTC in May 1982, he has run up almost $20,000 in office refurbishing bills. An agency spokesman explained that Yandle's office had been occupied previously by the same person for five years and needed repainting; also, repairs had to be made to "the ancient heating and cooling system."

A House subcommittee on commerce, consumers and monetary affairs will be asking about the redecoration expenses at upcoming hearings.

HEMISPHERE REPORT

Panama threatened by neighbors

WASHINGTON — Some U.S. congressmen and commentators may think that the Reagan administration is exaggerating the Cuban-Nicaraguan threat in Central America, but knowledgeable Panamanians don't seem to.

William Giandoni

In fact, Gen. Ruben Dario Paredes, the power behind the throng in Panama, says that unless Nicaragua and Cuba stop exporting "violence, revolution and blood" to Central America, the isthmian republic will have to break diplomatic relations with the two Marxist-run countries.

The general's statements shocked Panamanian political circles, particularly because he signaled the zigzag in his country's policy while outside Panama, during a brief visit to neighboring Costa Rica.

Paredes spoke after talking with Costa Rican President Luis Alberto Monge who has been trying for a year now to draw attention to the threat the Sandinistas pose to his country. Costa Rica has no army and would be virtually defenseless against the heavily armed Nicaraguans.

The general, who is retiring as commander of the National Guard, presumably to participate in the 1984 presidential elections, declared his support for Costa Rica "in case of aggression." He also indicated that Panama would take action if Costa Rica's northern border with Nicaragua were violated.

Until Paredes spoke out, Panama had seemed to place its hopes for a solution to Central America's problems with the Nicaraguan "revolution without frontiers" on the efforts of the so-called Contadora Group. The group takes its name from the Panamanian island where the foreign ministers of Mexico, Colombia, Venezuela and Panama met last January and decided on an exclusively Latin effort to resolve the regional troubles.

Despite considerable shuttle diplomacy, the Contadora four have little to show for their travels and deliberations, other than an impression in Central America that they were more interested in protecting the Sandinistas than the other Central American countries.

Three members of the group — Mexico, Panama and Venezuela — were among those Latin countries that helped arm, supply and finance the Sandinista campaign that forced Gen. Anastasio Somoza to resign the Nicaraguan presidency in July 1979. Ironically, Costa Rica, which now considers itself a Sandinista target, served as a conduit through which arms and munitions from Cuba, Venezuela and elsewhere, were transshipped from Panama, another original Sandinista supporter, to Nicaragua.

However, during the months-long Contadora effort, it had seemed that only Venezuela, where a Christian Democratic regime succeeded that of the socialist Democratic Action Party that had been so enthusiastic in its backing of the Sandinistas, took the Central American governments' views into consideration. The Central Americans, that is Costa Rica, Honduras, Guatemala and El Salvador, all consider themselves menaced by the Sandinistas.

Now that Panama has apparently come around to recognition of what President Reagan has termed "the military challenge from Cuba and Nicaragua — to their deliberate use of force to spread tyranny," presumably the Contadora group will be split down the middle, Mexico and Colombia, vs. Venezuela and Panama.

In Panama, the initial impression was that Paredes caught the administration of President Ricardo de la Espriella by surprise. Nearly a week passed before Foreign Minister Juan Jose Amado declared that Paredes' statement "echoes the executive branch's concern" about the Central American situation.

Amado conceded the possibility of severing relations with Cuba and Nicaragua.

"When the capacity to hold a dialogue decreases, when the limit of tolerance is reached and communication is no longer effective due to an arrogant attitude or by repressive actions, or when you have complementary actions of illegal arms trafficking among nations, when the attitudes and activities violate the sovereign rights of countries, it is time for diplomacy to give way to other means of resolving conflicts," Amado said.

ART BUCHWALD

Pentagon isn't looking for bargains

The Department of Defense's inspector general has revealed that 15,000 Air Force and Navy spare parts have sky rocketed more than 50 percent from 1980-82. Twenty seven percent of 4,000 items checked had risen more than 500 percent. These were not sophisticated items but things you can buy in any hardware store.

Art Buchwald

I was skeptical of the figures until I went into a hardware store near the Pentagon for a few household items.

"I would like a two and a half inch bolt," I told the man.

"Is this for yourself or for the Air Force?" the man asked.

"It's for me," I replied. "What's the difference?"

"Well if you were buying it for the Air Force it would cost you $17.59. But since it's for you I can let you have it for 67 cents."

"How come there are two prices?"

"If we charged the Air Force 67 cents they wouldn't believe the bolt was any good. But if they pay $17.59 they feel they're getting something for their money."

"I also need a connector socket."

"For your private use or the Navy's?"

"I'm not sure yet."

"Well please make up your mind. If you're buying it for yourself it will cost you our advertised price of $13.03. But if you're with Navy procurement we'll have to charge you $143.28."

"How come the Navy has to pay so much more for a connector socket?"

"Quality control."

"Won't they wind up with the same one I'm buying?"

"Of course. But whoever heard of the Navy paying wholesale for a connector socket."

"You must like doing business with the armed srvices."

"We certainly do. This engine bushing which sells for $2.83 to the man on the street costs the military $57.52."

"Don't you feel bad about overcharging the defense people?"

"We don't set the prices. They're dictated by the defense contractors who make equipment for the armed forces. There's a spare parts list for the Pentagon and there is another for the consumer. If the people who buy spare parts for the Navy and Air Force are willing to pay the price, we're not going to fight them."

"As a taxpayer I think this is outrageous. Surely they must have comparison shoppers in the military who keep track of what things really cost."

"They do. They're called whistleblowers. Everytime one reports that the Air Force and Navy is paying too much for its spare parts he gets moved to another department where he can't do any damage."

"How do the defense contractors get away with it?"

"Spare parts are the key to a war machine. The contractors have to bid openly on a plane or ship, so they can only make a reasonable profit on it — but once they build it they can charge anything they please for spares that go with it."

"I thought that Casper Weinberger said there was no waste in the military budget."

"He says a lot of things, because he doesn't want to rock the Pentagon boat with Congress. But between you and me he doesn't know beans about spare parts."

"Is the inspector general going to catch it for his report that the spare parts situation is out of control?"

"On the contrary, they'll probably send him to the Aleutians, for a few years to further his Pentagon career."

"Why doesn't the Pentagon just send their men in civilian clothes out to all the hardware stores in the country and buy what the military needs at the same price you sell it to us?"

"I asked that question of an Air Force procurement officer the other day," the hardware salesman replied, "and the only reason he could think of is that when the military purchases spare parts they insist on having them gift wrapped."

TODAY IN HISTORY

In 1955, Austria regained sovereignty after 17 years of occupation by foreign troops.

One year ago: President Ronald Reagan certified to Congress that El Salvador was making progress on human rights and political and social changes, even though "serious problems" remained.

Today's birthdays: Former major-league baseball manager Leo Durocher is 77. Actor Keenan Wynn is 67.

Thought for today: "It is characteristic of wisdom not to do desperate things." — Henry David Thoreau, American writer-naturalist (1817-1862).

Aftermath of coal boom: Poor miners

TAGAWA, Japan (AP) — The old men wheeze and cough from black lung disease. Pyramids of slag tower over row on row of ramshackle wooden company houses. Fields sink into old tunnels.

These are the few remaining signs of a long-gone coal boom in the "Appalachia" of Japan — these, and the highest percentage of welfare recipients in the nation.

Thirty years ago, more than 100,000 men made their living mining coal in the green valleys of the Chikuho region of Fukuoka prefecture on the southernmost main island of Kyushu. Today, three do.

Like the coal mining regions of the eastern United States, this area once enjoyed relative prosperity. But that faded in the 1960s, when mining companies decided that cutting coal from deeper and deeper seams had become too costly at a time when industry was turning to cheaper oil for fuel.

In 1950, nearly 250 coal mines ribbed the hills around Tagawa. The giant Mitsui conglomerate's mining division was the biggest employer, with about 15,000 workers, said Shizuyoshi Taninobu, a former miner, labor organizer and city councilman.

Taninobu, now 59 and white-haired, said that after one 63-day strike for higher pay, Mitsui decided to slash the number of workers by 7,000. And by March 1964, after smaller mines plagued by flooding and gas leaks began to close, the company laid off 8,000 more.

About 50,000 miners trekked to the mines of the northern island of Hokkaido or to new trades in Tokyo and Osaka.

Those who stayed searched, often in vain, for work. Official records show 28,593 men were seeking jobs here in 1963, 21,143 by 1965.

Tagawa became a pocket of poverty with one of Japan's highest unemployment rates — 9.9 percent against 1.4 percent nationwide in 1960; 9.7 percent against 2.3 percent in 1975; 8.9 percent against 1.9 percent in 1980.

Kiyotaka Murata, a third-generation miner who has suffered from black lung disease for 20 of his 54 years, pushed his grandson in a stroller as he talked about his life. He lives with his wife, grown son, divorced daughter and her two children in one of 7,000 old company houses on land still owned by Mitsui.

After the mines closed, he said, he earned 2,500 yen — about $10 — a day as a part-time carpenter. Since losing that job two years ago, he and his wife, Sumiko, drawing no public assistance, have lived off savings.

Since the 1960s, the government has dealt with the miners' plight by hiring them on occasion for unskilled heavy labor. Some were put to work cleaning up environmental damage from the mines — hacking away at more than 300 mountains of slag, smoothing buckled roads and fixing the nearly 80 percent of the town's homes that have been damaged by sinking earth.

Others have had part-time jobs with steel contractors, road gangs or earthmoving teams to help build a foundation for new industries, and a few were hired as government drivers or security guards, said Katsuhisa Kumamoto, a prefectural planning official.

"But since the miners were aging, we began looking for job opportunities for the next generation," he said.

Of more than 70,000 jobs in a thousand new businesses set up in the region from 1967 to 1981, almost none have gone to ex-miners.

Drop-out offers Swiss accounts

CORONA DEL MAR, Calif. (AP) — Your "Swiss" watch may be an imitation, but your Swiss bank account can be the real thing — with a 26-year-old entrepreneur acting as middleman.

For $25, Mark Knass will open an account with four Swiss francs — that's $2 — and provide an authentic passbook as well as scratch pad and book of matches carrying the impressive logo and name of Schwanen Effekten AG, a Lucerne, Switzerland, securities firm.

Each kit-account is numbered and registered with E. Gutzwiller & Cie., Banquiers, of Basel.

"I'm taking something that the super elite and the very wealthy are known to enjoy and making it affordable," said Knass, a resident of the posh seaside community of Corona del Mar, 40 miles southeast of Los Angeles.

"The theme for the '80s is, 'How rich I am,'" Knass said. "And if I'm not rich, I certainly want to look like it. So the Cadillac Seville looks like a Mercedes, and the Ford Granada looks like a Seville. There are imitation Rolex and Cartier watches, but all of these things are phony.

Abductions big business in Italy

ROME (AP) — Despite repeated crackdowns and self-defense measures by the rich, police are unable to halt Italy's plague of kidnappings — a cruel and lucrative business that netted abductors $21 million last year.

Those who claim to have kidnapped Emanuela Orlandi, the 15-year-old daughter of a Vatican employee, have said they were holding her in exchange for the release of papal assailant Mehmet Ali Agca.

However, police say they think the kidnappers are probably after money and not the release of Agca, who is serving a life sentence for shooting Pope John Paul II in 1981. The Turkish terrorist has condemned the kidnapping and reportedly has never made the required request for a pardon which would permit his release.

Investigators say kidnapping is booming and new criminal bands have formed, lured by the prospect of hefty ransoms.

Several judges have tried to freeze the assets of kidnap victims and their families to prevent ransom payments. But officials say families often keep ransom demands secret in an effort to deliver the money and avoid risk to those held captive.

Officials say $21 million in ransoms was paid in 1982.

There also have been many political abductions in Italy, some masterminded by the Red Brigades leftist terror gang.

The terrorists kidnapped and murdered former Premier Aldo Moro five years ago after the government refused to negotiate his release.

Moro, a Christian Democrat, was abducted in Rome on March 16, 1978 by gunmen who killed his five bodyguards. His bullet-riddled corpse was found 55 days later.

In December 1981, U.S. Brig. Gen. James L. Dozier, the highest-ranking American at the NATO base in Verona, was grabbed from his apartment. He was rescued after 42 days of captivity in an apartment in the northern Italian city of Padua.

Nudity prevalent on Poland's beaches

SWIDRY MALE, Poland (AP) — On the pebbly beaches near this tiny Vistula River town, people are shucking off their clothes in growing numbers. Some say it's for fun, and some say it's for sun, and some say it's to escape reality.

But some don't seem to like it very much.

As nudism grows by leaps and bounds, prudery is raising its voice.

"Good Lord, what is going on?" said a local old woman, quoted in one of a host of recent newspaper articles on the trend. "It's because of this crisis. People lose their minds from starvation and strip themselves naked."

A visit to Warsaw's most famous nude beach, however, proves amply in a few moments that nobody here is starving. Despite the food shortage, in fact, most people look pretty happy and well fed.

Nudism — or naturalism, as adherents like to call it — is indeed on the rise in Poland. The Polish Naturalist Society, headed by a Dr. Marczak who likes to give lectures on the beauty of nakedness while standing in the buff on the beach, estimates there are now 30,000 nudists in the country.

"I think it's a gust of fresh wind from the West," said a cheerful elderly gentleman, his white hair and mustache bristling out around a deeply tanned face. "People are losing their prudery."

And here, on the beach at Swidry Male (pronounced swidree mowi, indeed they are.

About 10 miles south of Warsaw, hundreds of parked cars mark the spot where bathers begin a lengthy walk through bushes to the isolated beach. On the way, vendors sell soft drinks, blueberries and cherries, and even bigos, the traditional sausage and cabbage stew.

"I come here for rest and health," said the elderly man, a retired manager of a cooperative. "It all started three years ago. A couple of people came here and took off their clothes, and later more joined them.

Lawyer gives legal advice in courtroom and on daytime drama

CHICAGO (AP) — Sherman Magidson's world turns on cops and criminals. Sometimes he defends them in court. Sometimes he helps bump them off with millions of Americans watching.

It's money, not morality, guiding Magidson, who earns two paychecks — as a criminal lawyer for 24 years and as a writer and legal adviser to the television soap opera "The Young and the Restless."

In trials, Magidson has defended mobsters, cops, politicians and some people with household names, including former Teamsters union boss James Hoffa.

On the tube, he has concocted torrid love affairs, criminal dilemmas, and tear-jerking child custody battles for fictitious characters named Leslie, Laurie, Paul and Nikki — also household names to millions.

It adds up to schizophrenic 80-hour work weeks for Magidson, who says he has successfully separated daytime drama from real-life drama.

"I generally don't mirror clients," Magidson said. "A client's personal business is their personal business. Never does anything confidential or personal go into a script. ... But I might steal a gesture."

Unlike the disciplined, somewhat mundane courtroom world, glamour is the stuff of the soaps, Magidson said.

"People don't like to watch ugliness," said the 50-year-old attorney, who has a deep, mellow voice and a quick wit. "If people wanted to watch life, they wouldn't own a TV. If people wanted a slice of life, they wouldn't buy Penthouse, Playboy or Cosmopolitan."

Soaps are successful, Magidson added, because they create a "level above life which is attractive to the viewer."

Still, Magidson says soaps strive for accuracy, especially in medical and legal predicaments. That's where he becomes important.

As a legal adviser, Magidson, who has written for "As the World Turns" and advised for "Days of Our Lives," creates and researches legal situations for "The Young and the Restless" and writes question-answer dialogue for trials.

Once he was asked to develop a situation in which a doctor would be sued for conduct that was morally forgiveable but legally inexcusable.

The solution: a doctor who takes on a patient with a peptic ulcer. The patient doesn't call the doctor frequently. One night the doctor's wife attempts suicide, he ignores calls to his answering service and the patient dies.

The doctor, the attorney argues in the script, was legally obligated to treat the patient. The doctor is acquitted.

Magidson has also done story lines on euthanasia, rape, a woman wrongly accused of killing her mother-in-law and a child custody battle between the biological and adoptive mothers.

Another time, Magidson, who represented a reputed mobster in last year's Teamsters bribery trial and a police captain several years ago in an extortion scheme, developed a story for "The Young and the Restless" in which a hoodlum and a corrupt cop working for him kill each other in a shootout.

U.S. waterways still dirty despite progress under Clean Water Act

By the Los Angeles Times-
Washington Post News Service

WASHINGTON — Despite a decade of progress under the federal Clean Water Act, many of the nation's waterways remain dirty. The reason, environmentalists and policy experts now agree, is that the act has effectively attacked only half the problem.

It has done a fairly good job of regulating pollution from specific points, such as municipal sewage plants and industrial outfall pipes, experts say. But pollution from non-specific sources such as storm runoff from streets, parking lots, farms and construction sites poses an equally serious threat.

On Long Island, N.Y., for example, such "non-point source pollution" has led to the closing of nearly 20,000 acres of clam beds in the Great South Bay. Planners estimate it will cost $70 million to control the flow of polluted stormwater runoff into the bay.

In addition to Great South Bay, Peconic Bay and Long Island Sound also are being contaminated by runoff. The same is true for such other large bodies of water as the Chesapeake Bay and the lower Great Lakes.

Long Island's groundwater supply also has been affected by non-point discharges — oil wastes, pesticides, fertilizers, cesspool chemicals — leaching into the underground acquifer.

"Non-point pollution is one of the most significant contamination problems we face," said Lee Koppelman, executive director of the Long Island Regional Planning Board. Koppelman said efforts to control runoff into the Great South Bay would be "more cost effective than point controls." As much as 95 percent of the bacterial contamination in the bay comes from runoff. Controlling a few outfall pipes does little to solve this more general problem, Koppelman said.

Koppelman said runoff control methods are available — diking, use of special leaching basins, diversion of runoff into dry stream beds, better street sweeping, stricter dog litter laws. Another remedy: placing bales of hay around construction sites to trap debris that otherwise would be washed away.

But the priorities in federal and state pollution control efforts have been elsewhere. That may be starting to change as the scope of the problem becomes more apparent.

Daniel Weiss of the Izaak Walton League, a private conservation group, said that non-point pollution may become the water quality issue of the 1980s. "During the 1970s, localities started to clean up industrial and municipal pollution, yet the waters are still dirty," Weiss said. "And the reason they are dirty is because of non-point pollution."

Oatmeal meat remembered

CEDAR RAPIDS, Iowa (AP) — At a news conference last month, President Reagan told reporters, "Someday let me give you my recipe for oatmeal meat. I thought it was a luxury when I was a kid."

Maybe the White House press corps didn't know what he was talking about, but Nina Swan did.

She's director of consumer relations for National Oats Co., and had spent several days last summer answering a consumer's request for an oatmeal meat recipe.

Her first clue came from Guy Ames, executive vice president of the company.

"He recalled eating a cornmeal dish during the Depression that was referred to as meat," she said. "He also remembered that many people made the dish with oatmeal. The name of the dish was goetta."

Ms. Swan on Thursday sent a box containing the recipe and oatmeal products to Reagan, who made the remark in discussing his economic policies June 28.

She also extended an invitation to President and Mrs. Reagan to attend the annual oatmeal festival on Labor Day weekend at Oatmeal, Texas.

Goetta is a mixture of lean ground meats, oatmeal and seasonings. Cooked ingredients are shaped into loaves and chilled. Slices of the loaves are fried in hot oil and served with butter and syrup.

A second recipe for fried oatmeal also was sent along to the president. It was developed by Donna Muhlenbruch, home economist at National Oats.

The women are optimistic that Reagan will try both dishes, despite the fact that first family chef Frank Ruta says the Reagans haven't had oatmeal since they moved into the White House.

Pets have dog's life

ATHENS, Greece (AP) — First came limits on swimming, then on riding in taxis — now even their walking is limited. It's a dog's life for Athenian canines, curbed as they are by laws designed just for them.

Dog owners in Athens can only walk their pets early in the morning, late at night or when everyone else is taking an afternoon siesta, the City Council declared last week.

Jackson forces Cubs' A.J. Hill to mound

By ROBERT BRUNDAGE
Sports Writer

Midland Cub fans had four good things to cheer about Tuesday night in the series finale against the Jackson Mets:

Max Patkin, the Clown Prince of Baseball, was at Cubs Stadium; baseball bingo was played; shortstop/relief pitcher A.J. Hill was on the mound, and...shortstop/relief pitcher A.J. Hill was on the mound.

Things went so badly in the 21-8 fiasco that the Cubs had to dig deeper than their designated pitcher to find someone to finish the game.

In the bottom of the seventh inning, while Midland hitters were busy going down one-two-three, designated pitcher Don Hyman, a catcher by trade, was warming up in the bullpen. He didn't make it to the mound for the same reason he didn't start the game: His arm was tender and designated manager Glenn Gregson (Tommy Harmon was ejected for fighting) opted for Hill.

Hill, who hasn't pitched since his high school days, cheerfully went to the mound. At least he seemed cheerful. He was smiling the whole time he was out there.

"I was having fun," said Hill. "As long as they don't hurt me. If they would have hit one up the middle on me it might not have been fun."

The hitters he was facing seemed to be enjoying themselves also. They too were smiling, probably more from nervousness than anything else.

"They don't want to strike out against a designated pitcher," explained Hill. "If they do, the team won't let them live it down. When they got down two strikes (as several did), they'd get a little nervous. I know when I face a designated pitcher, striking out is the last thing I want to do."

None of the Mets struckout, but, on the flip side, only two got hits. Hill didn't walk anyone either and the only run he gave up was unearned.

"I was just throwing batting practice pitches," said Hill. "My ball runs naturally, down and in, and that's all I was throwing while hoping they wouldn't hit up the middle. I do throw a little bit, but not enough to call me a pitcher."

Will he see another stint on the mound in the future?

"Hopefully not, I doubt it," said Harmon. "I hope we don't get down so far that he has to pitch. You hate to put someone on the mound that isn't a pitcher."

BEFORE HILL took the mound, the only excitement for the 1,014 fans were the antics of Patkin — his base coaching, hitting instruction and final ejection from the grounds (staged) — and the two player gatherings (brawls) in the fifth inning which saw Harmon and Jackson third baseman Kevin Mitchell ejected from the game.

Harmon led the first Cub charge out of the dugout, running straight into Mitchell who was standing on third. The Mets crossed the field to defend their player.

As play was about to get under way again, the second fight broke out by the Mets dugout and again players from both teams met.

"There were some words back and forth, said Harmon. "They felt like we were throwing intentionally at them which we didn't (three Mets were hit by pitches Tuesday, two on Monday). The way things were going tonight, four or five could have been hit and not been intentional."

If court was convened, the Cub pitching stats would be strong evidence in favor of the defense.

Joe Housey, Jim Gerlach and Ray Soff were each shelled by the Mets (a total of 17 hits, 16 earned runs, one walk, three wild pitches and three hit batters, all in 4⅓ innings) as was Carlos Gil, who didn't hit anybody but saw three of his pitches clear the fence.

OVERALL, THE 21 Jackson runs were scored on 25 hits, of which five were home runs including Billy Beane's grand slam in the fight-marred fifth (following the fights). Sergio Beltre hit back-to-back home runs in the sixth and seventh for his first two round-trippers of the year, while Jim Woodward picked up his fourth and John Gibbons his 12th.

Jackson pitcher Calvin Schiraldi, now 2-3, picked up the victory while newly-acquired hurler Bobby Randolph picked up his first save for four innings of shutout relief.

Schiraldi was pitching a good game until the bottom of the sixth when the Cubs connected for six straight hits which produced five runs.

CUB PRINTS: With the lop-sided victory, the Mets took the five-game series by a 3-2 count...Rick Baker led the Cubs' 13-hit attack with a 3-for-5 performance (one triple) while Bill Hatcher, Mike Anicich and George Borges added two hits each...Tonight, Stan Kyles, 6-10, will start for Midland as the Cubs begin a five-game series against Arkansas...

Calvin Schiraldi faces long year

By ROBERT BRUNDAGE
Sports Writer

Jackson pitcher Calvin Schiraldi has had a busy year, a long year of practicing and playing baseball.

In mid January, the 6-foot-5, 215-pound left-handed pitcher started practicing with his University of Texas teammates for what would be one of the highlights of his life: the 1983 College World Series championship.

"So far it (the year) has been (a highlight), there is no doubt about it. Playing on the College World Series championship team will always be a highlight of my life," said Schiraldi. "I can't change that and I don't want to try."

With a national championship came futher honors for Schiraldi, who went 14-2 on the mound for the Longhorns. He was named the CWS Most Valuable Player and that obvioulsy helped impress the New York Mets, who honored him as their No. 1 draft pick this spring.

Since joining Jackson, Schiraldi has figured in five pitching decisions, including the 21-8 victory over the Midland Cubs Tuesday night. That victory gives him a 2-3 record in his brief second season with the Mets.

"This has been a very long year," said Schiraldi, "I've pitched a lot of innings, including intra-squad, and it's adding up. Not that I'm complaining. I'm now getting paid for what I like to do."

COMING STRAIGHT from UT to Texas League AA ball might seem like a quick step for most ball players, but Schiradli isn't "finding it to be that much different except the hitting is more consistant," he said. "You're not going to strike out 10 a game in AA as easily. Instead, you try to get the ball hit into the field of play which is the same as I did in college. I'm pitching the same as I did in college and it's working. They are getting the hits, but they're not hitting the ball hard."

Tuesday against the Cubs he did give up six straight hits in the sixth inning, which produced five runs (11 hits in the game), but by then Midland was trailing 18-3 and Schiraldi could afford it. He claims only one of the hits was hard hit and "if the game had been closer, I wouldn't have been throwing fastballs," he said. "That's all they hit."

Since turning pro, Schiraldi has not felt as comfortable on the mound as he did in college and in the World Series, which possibly accounts for his not using breaking pitches in the sixth.

"I know I'm off right now, I can tell," he said. "I'm not throwing anything like I did in the World Series. I don't have the right break on my pitches like I did. I seem to give up one or two hits early and then they get to me in the later innings. I'd like to show them I am a No. 1 draft pick, but lately I haven't."

BEING THE Mets' No. 1 pick "didn't come as a surprise," said Schiraldi. "I had the kind of year I wanted to have. I threw the ball hard and that's what they (the pro scouts) wanted."

The scouts told the Mets they liked what they saw and the Mets offered a contract. Or rather somebody connected with the team did.

"I've never talked to the Mets in my life," said Schiraldi. "I'm happy to be here. I couldn't have picked a better organization to come to."

He didn't elaborate on who he talked to when he signed, but if he finds the stuff he was throwing in the CWS to be as effective as he wants it to be in the pros, the big guys in New York will get in touch.

"If ever they were going to turn around the problem by having players come forth, they just turned off the faucet. There it goes, right into the closet," said former NFL All-Pro Alan Page after NFL commissioner Pete Rozelle suspended four players for four games for using cocaine.

Junior plans appeal on Rozelle decision

NEW YORK (AP) — E.J. Junior of the St. Louis Cardinals, one of four National Football League suspended by Commissioner Pete Rozelle players for using cocaine, is considering an appeal of the decision.

When the suspensions were announced by Rozelle Monday, Junior had said the decision "was in the best interests" of the league and the fans. But on Tuesday, the Cardinals and the linebacker looked into the possibility of appealing.

"I don't know if we have the standing to appeal," said Bob Wallace, a Cardinals attorney. "We're still discussing it. The suspension came without warning. The club had been happy with everything E.J. has done from the point of his arrest. We felt that he had taken the proper steps toward rehabilitation."

Junior's attorney, Marvin Demoff, said a decision on an appeal would not be made until Demoff had further discussions with the Cardinals.

Gene Upshaw, the NFL Players Association executive director, also said the disciplined players have the right to appeal the decision.

"We will be available to any player subject to commissioner discipline to make certain his rights under the collective bargaining agreement are observed and protected," Upshaw aid.

But in general, Upshaw said the players association supported Rozelle.

"I believe that Rozelle listened to how the players in the league feel about this problem," Upshaw said.

Rozelle, who suspended Junior, defensive end Ross Browner and running back Pete Johnson of the Cincinnati Bengals and defensive back Greg Stemrick of the New Orleans Saints, called the league drug program two-pronged.

"If a player has a dependency, we treat it as an illness and offer to help," he said. "If they don't come forward and they violate our policy, there will be discipline."

But Alan Page, a former NFL defensive star for the Minnesota Vikings and Chicago Bears, said Rozelle's suspension of four players has done more harm than good in the attempt to eliminate the league's drug problems.

"If ever they were going to turn around the problem by having players come forth, they just turned off the faucet," Page said in Chicago Tuesday, a day after Rozelle banished the players from their respective training camps, as well as benching them for a minumum of four regular-season games because of their involvement with cocaine.

"There it goes, right into the closet," said Page, now a Minneapolis attorney. He said the suspensions would have the opposite effect on players who otherwise might voluntarily have come forward with their drug problems.

He called the suspensions "bizarre" and said they could lead to "a very interesting court case."

Rozelle said Tuesday that he hopes the suspensions — the first ever imposed by the commissioner for violating the league's drug policies — will serve as an incentive for other players to come forward for rehabilitation.

He also said he expected no action to be taken against Rick Upchurch of the Denver Broncos, who underwent rehabilitation for a drug dependency and was quoted last week as saying he might use marijuana again. Upchurch has denied saying that and volunteered for urinalysis by the Broncos.

Mets win brawl-ball over Atlanta

By The Associated Press

Mookie Wilson, the New York Mets' center fielder, was certainly the center of attention. In more ways than one.

Rarely a long-ball threat, Wilson hit a 10th-inning game-winning homer Tuesday night as the Mets beat the Braves 2-1.

He was also hit by a pitch in the fifth inning by Braves' starter Rick Camp, leading to a brawl an inning later when Mets' pitcher Mike Torrez hit Camp in the hip with a pitch and Camp charged the mound. Both benches emptied, but calm was restored without injury and both pitchers stayed in the game.

It was the second straight win by a team with the worst record in the National League over the team with the best. And it marked the first time since June 23 that New York had won two in a row.

"It's hard to believe the Mets are as bad as their record," said Atlanta Manager Joe Torre, who saw the Braves' lead over Los Angeles in the West cut to 3½ games. "I had hoped they wouldn't wake up until they left here."

Elsewhere, the Pittsburgh Pirates held on to first place in the East by beating San Diego 10-5 in the second game of a doubleheader after the Padres had taken the first 6-1.

The Los Angeles Dodgers topped the Chicago Cubs, 5-2 as Fernando Valenzuela won his 10th game.

Montreal moved to within a half-game of Pittsburgh as Bill Gullickson shut out Cincinnati 5-0.

And Joe Morgan's fourth-inning home run off Nolan Ryan gave Philadelphia a 1-0 win over Houston on Charlie Hudson and Al Holland's combined six-hitter. Ryan struck out six to move back ahead of Steve Carlton in the all-time strikeout race.

In the ruckus in New York, it was unclear whether Torrez was actually throwing at Camp — he would not come out of the trainers' room to comment. But Wilson said "whether it was intentional or not, I respect Mike. I tip my cap to him."

And Torre said: "It's awfully tough for Camp not to charge him when it was thrown at him on purpose."

Wilson's home run, his third, was almost lost in the hubbub.

"It's time that I do a little more for this club than catch fly balls," said the league's second-leading base-stealer, a .250 hitter most of the season. "I can hit the ball out of the park. I'm not like (Dave) Kingman or (Dale) Murphy, but if I get it good, it'll go out.

National League

Dodgers 5, Cubs 2

Ken Landreaux got four hits, including a home run, and drove in three runs but acted like he'd taken the collar.

"I don't like this ball park," he said of Wrigley Field. "It's hard to see the ball."

Landreaux was also upset because he was called out for interference on what might have been his fifth hit — a topped ball down the first-base line.

Padres 6-5, Pirates 1-10

Ruppert Jones, who drove in three runs in each game for San Diego, belted a three-run, second-inning home run that put San Diego on the way to its first game win. Mark Thurmond, 4-1, was the winner with help from Luis DeLeon.

But the Pirates exploded in the second game to stay a half-game ahead of Montreal in the tightly-bunched East. Mike Easler, Marvell Wynne and Bill Madlock all homered and Johnny Ray had two doubles and a triple.

Phillies 1, Astros 0

Morgan, breaking a month-long slump with a home run, didn't know what kind of pitch he hit. But Ryan, who lost his third straight and fell to 9-4, sure knew.

"It was a hanging curve ball. I've had problems with my curve the last two or three outings and tonight it cost me the ball game," he said.

Ryan, who fell to 9-4, struck out six, putting him three ahead of Steve Carlton as the all-time strikeout leader with 3,591.

Expos 5, Reds 0

Gullickson, whose three-hitter was his first shutout in two years, said the difference this time was responding to pressure.

The key moment came in the bottom of the eighth when Cincinnati's Duane Walker doubled with one out and Montreal nursing a 1-0 lead.

"In the past, I'd pitch five or six innings and then get challenged," he said. "I wouldn't get that guy out and boom, I'd get beat."

Cards 6, Giants 5

Herr's game-winning single came after reliever Greg Minton walked Darrell Porter intentionally to load the bases with two out in the ninth.

But Herr promptly stroked the ball up the middle to salvage a game the Cards thought they had won earlier with a 5-0 lead.

But a triple by Joel Youngblood and doubles by Bob Brenly and Johnny Rabb tied it in the eighth after Darrell Evans had driven in a run and Jeff Leonard two in a three-run fifth.

South overcomes nervousness to beat North

FORT WORTH, Texas (AP) — Forward Carlton McKinney of Nixon says that he had to overcome last-minute nervousness in the Texas High School Coaches Association All-Star game before leading a fourth-quarter run that gave the South a 91-86 win.

"I thought we played pretty well as a team the last half," said the Tulsa-bound McKinney, who gave the North a 77-71 lead with a shot from the corner after snagging a loose ball with 6:07 remaining.

South roundballers "were nervous, but they settled down later," he said after Tuesday's victory before 4,200 fans at Tarrant County Convention Center.

Less than two minutes later, the 6-5 forward scored a baseline shot, assisted by guard Daryl Derryberry, to make it 79-73 with 4:54 remaining.

South forward David Grissom said his nervousness affected him earlier in the game, before his lay-in and 15-foot throw that cinched the win.

The South tied the cage series at 19-19.

"I was jittery at first," said Grissom, who is bound for San Diego State. "I had been uncomfortable during the practices, and I was mad at myself because I wasn't handling the ball well and playing aggressively."

Grissom is the third player from Gladewater Sabine to be an all-star.

"I had grown timid in my passing and my inside play," he said. "I needed that blocked shot, and that dunk helped me."

McKinney said the South was frustrated by the North's zone defense for much of the contest.

But guard Randy Meador of La Poyner scored a fourth-quarter layin, assisted by Clear Lake's Brad Meyer, that broke a 69-69 tie with 7:55 remaining.

Mississippi recruit Sylvester Kincheon of Austin Travis, the South's 6-10 center, led a shot-blocking defense that kept the North from coming back.

"They had a pretty good press. It took us a while to get our offense working. Kincheon played real well tonight. We realy went to him when he needed it," said McKinney.

North Coach Frank Bice said his team "couldn't connect when we got it."

"Our running game was there, more than we took advantage of. We just didn't connect on transition after we made the play defensively," said Bice, of Andrews.

Hassey hassles running Royals

By The Associated Press

The Kansas City Royals were running all around the bases. Unfortunately, so was Cleveland catcher Ron Hassey — tagging them out.

With nobody out in the bottom of the fifth inning and Cleveland clinging to a 1-0 lead Tuesday night, Onix Concepcion and Pat Sheridan singled, putting Royals at the corners. Then John Wathan drilled a shot to third.

Toby Harrah snared it and fired home to Hassey. Concepcion, halfway down the line, headed back to third with Hassey in pursuit. The Cleveland catcher caught and tagged him — then wheeled and headed for second base.

There he found Sheridan — and Wathan, who had gone to second without realizing Sheridan had stopped there. Hassey tagged Wathen for the double play that killed the threat and helped Lary Sorensen and the Indians hold on for a 2-0 victory.

"I was not supposed to go on a slow-hit ball," Concepcion said, "but the way the ball was hit, Harrah caught it right under the bag.

"If I go back to the bag he tags me, so I just try to get in a rundown and make only one out while the other guy (Sheridan) goes to third. But that's not the way it worked out. They played it right and they won the game."

They also won because Sorenson limited the Royals to seven hits. "Lary pitched a great ballgame," said Harrah, who scored one run and drove in one. "When you shut out this team in this park, it's a great win."

With two out in the fifth inning, Steve Renko gave up consecutive singles by Mike Fischlin, Mike Hargrove and Harrah for the only run Sorensen needed, then singles by Harrah, Bake McBride and Andre Thornton loaded the bases in the eighth, leading to Pat Tabler's sacrifice fly.

Elsewhere in the American League, New York blanked Texas 5-0, Minnesota edged Milwaukee 6-5, Baltimore shaded California 5-4, Detroit shelled Seattle 8-3 and, in a pair of twi-night doubleheaders, Boston split with Oakland, losing 9-2 and winning 5-3, while Toronto split with Chicago, winning 6-4 and losing 4-3.

Yankees 5, Rangers 0

The Yanks waved "Bye, Bye, Balboni" again — but for a change it wasn't Steve Balboni they were waving at. It was his first major-league grand slam.

Balboni, who has shuttled between the Yanks and their Columbus farm club for the past three seasons, gave Manager Billy Martin something to think about. Martin will have to made a decision when Ken Griffey comes off the disabled list.

"This is a tough ballpark to hit home runs in," said Balboni. "I'll remember this one." So will Ray Fontenot, who pitched a six-hitter for his first big-league shutout.

Roy Smalley singled, Dave Winfield doubled and Lou Piniella was intentionally walked by Frank Tanana to load the bases before Balboni unloaded his third homer of the year. The Yanks have won 11 of their last 12 games, the Rangers have lost 15 of 20 since the All-Star break.

Twins 6, Brewers 5

Minnesota, fresh from an eight-game losing streak, won its fifth in a row, and handed the Brewers their sixth loss in eight visits to the Metrodome as John Castino broke a tie with a two-out, ninth-inning single.

"We don't seem to play very well here," said Milwaukee Manager Harvey Kuenn. "I wish I knew why or I would remedy it. You can't blame the dome either because we didn't play well at the Met (Metropolitan Stadium) either. For some reason, we don't play our best here."

Orioles 5, Angels 4

Dennis Martinez of Baltimore, taking over for Paul Mirabella at the start of the fourth inning, pitched six innings of three-hit relief and rode Eddie Murray's two-run homer in the fifth to victory over the Angels.

Murray's homer, on a 3-1 pitch from Geoff Zahn, followed a two-out single by Cal Ripken Jr. Bobby Grich had a two-run single in the bottom of the third inning for California.

Tigers 8, Mariners 3

Chet Lemon and Alan Trammell hit two-run homers and Lance Parrish added a bases-empty blast into the Tiger Stadium seats as Detroit wiped out Seattle's 2-0 first-inning lead built on RBI singles by Rick Nelson and Dave Henderson. Tony Bernazard homered for Seattle.

A's 9-3, Red Sox 2-5

Wade Boggs drove in Boston's first four runs in the nightcap, including the game-winner in the top of the ninth inning, and took over the AL batting lead, .373 to Rod Carew's .372, as the Red Sox earned their split.

In the opener Oakland wiped out Boston's 2-0 lead with seven runs in the seventh inning. Carney Lansford had two singles in the burst and catcher Rich Gedman allowed two runs to score when he missed a throw home from pitcher Bob Stanley on Donnie Hill's bases-loaded grounder. Stanley lost the opener but won the second game.

Blue Jays 6-3, White Sox 4-4

Jesse Barfield and Cliff Johnson hit first-game homers for Toronto and Barfield put one out of the park in the nightcap. But the latter homer wasn't enough to overcome Chicago's three-run third inning, two of the runs scoring on Julio Cruz' double, that gave the visiting White Sox their split.

Brett bat fiasco has hint of irony

By HAL BOCK
AP Sports Writer

Perhaps the most wonderful bit of irony in the George Brett bat fiasco at Yankee Stadium Sunday was that when the pine tar hit the fan, it was Graig Nettles who blew the whistle and Gaylord Perry who tried to stash the evidence.

Nettles knows all about illegal bats. He once had a hit disallowed because the bat he had used started spilling little bouncing rubber balls around home plate as he ran to first base. It was, you see, filled with something other than wood.

Perry knows all about stashing evidence. For years, he has made baseballs do funny tricks thanks to any number of substances from saliva to grease. He may even, for all we know, occasionally have applied pine tar as well.

Brett is pleading innocent in this nasty affair and he probably really is free of guilt.

Cheaters pack their bats with all sorts of innovative ingredients like cork and nails and little rubber balls, the better to get the baseball to travel great distances. Some pitchers would feel more comfortable on the mound wearing a janitor's utility belt complete with sandpaper, files and assorted paraphenalia with which to affect the flight of the ball from mound to plate.

The message here is some players ... hush, not so loud ... cheat.

But a couple of extra inches of pine tar? Be serious. If you're going to cheat, you can do better than that.

Brett is one of the game's most talented hitters. He hardly needs any illegal help. Don't for one moment think that the extra pine tar on his bat made the difference in him taking Goose Gossage downtown for the home run that wasn't a home run.

He has, remember, hit memorable home runs off Gossage before. See the 1980 American League playoffs when he beat the Goose with a three-run shot that nailed down ... oops ... uhh, clinched the pennant for the Royals.

Still, Brett is a professional and it is his responsibility to know the rules. The pine tar rule is silly — no less an authority on the rulebook than Billy Martin, who benefitted most from the extra stain — pointed that out. But it is the rule, and as a man who earns his living with his bat, Brett should have been aware of the fact that the pine tar on his wood was creeping dangerously close to the illegal zone.

Texan makes bank detour

CHEYENNE, Wyo. (AP) — Bull rider Wacey Cathey is continuing his quest for his second bull riding championship at the Cheyenne Frontier Days Rodeo, with just a brief detour to the bank.

The Big Spring, Texas, cowboy hadn't ridden since scoring 82 points Sunday, but he pocketed a check for $3,624 Tuesday after winning the rodeo's first go-round with the best ride in four days.

Other first go-round winners included bronc riders Derek Clark and Mickey Young and steer wrestler Dick Schneider, who like Cathey watched challengers fall short during the final performance of the first go-round of the "Daddy of 'Em All," the world's largest regular season rodeo.

The only contestant to take the lead during the final day of the first-go-round was Chip Whitaker of Chambers, Neb., who won $6,490 in calf roping. Whitaker roped his calf in 11.6 seconds in slack roping before the arena performance, relegating previous leader Ralph McKinley of Bosque Farms, N.M., to second.

There are so many contestants in roping events at Frontier Days that some are timed early in the day, hours before the arena performance.

Cathey, who finished 12th in bull riding in national standards last year, was challenged Tuesday by Mike Bandy of San Antonio, Texas, and Burt Williams of Mount Criee, British Columbia.

Bandy scored a 77 to take second in the go-round, and Williams posted a 76 to share third with Kevin Rockabar of Alberta, Canada. But Tuesday generally was a day when the bulls had the better of the riders.

Clark, a Concord, Okla., bronc rider, won the first go-round in saddle bronc competition with 79 points and pocketed $3,283.

Midland Eastern wins District III title

The Midland Eastern All-Stars went 5-0 in the Big Spring Little League All-Star Tournament to capture the District III title.

In their first game, Eastern beat Midland Tower, 4-3, and followed with victories over Midland Mid-City, 3-2, Coahoma, 13-3, Big Spring American, 6-1 and Midland North Central in the championship, 3-0.

In the title game, Nicky Villarreal struck out nine while giving up only two hits. Eastern collected singles by Farris Strambler, Charlie Johnson and Ray Soria. Juan Dominguez added a double.

The victory puts Eastern into the bi-district tournament in San Angelo on Friday.

Villarreal, who made two starts in the tournament (as did Pete Reyes), and Johnson each had two tournament home runs. Johnson's two blasts accounted for six runs batted in. Both of Villarreal's were solo shots.

TV football back to usual business

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — After months of legal battles and backroom politicking, it turns out that the 1983 college football season will be business as usual as far as television rights are concerned.

The College Football Association announced Tuesday it will ask its 60 member schools to go ahead and voluntarily abide by the NCAA's football contracts with ABC, CBS and Turner Broadcasting System.

The CFA's action came in the wake of a stay of a lower-court ruling issued last week by Supreme Court Justice Byron White.

The net effect of the CFA action is to head off what might have turned into a messy, chaotic situation this fall.

CFA executive director Charles M. Neinas, who has led the fight to wrest control of football telecasts away from the NCAA, said the board's decision was aimed at "maintaining orderliness" and does not signal an end to the struggle.

White granted the stay in connection with an appeal the NCAA is making to the Supreme Court of a lower court ruling in an action filed by Oklahoma and Georgia. The possibility exists that the Supreme Court could announce when it reconvenes in October that it will not review the case. At that time, the stay would presumably be dissolved and the contracts declared void, causing great disarray in the midst of the season.

"The board believes that it is in the best interests of college football not to have a disruption occur at midseason," Neinas said from his office in Boulder, Colo. "Therefore, to insure another exciting and successful season of college football, adherence to the current television contracts would appear to be the appropriate and reasonable course to follow."

Strock is in a corner

By The Associated Press

For years, Don Strock has been a backup quarterback in Miami. Now the Dolphins may have him backed into a corner.

The Dolphins have been unable to reach agreement on a contract with Strock, a 10-year pro who has been employed most of the past few years by Coach Don Shula as a reliever for the younger David Woodley.

Strock has occasionally expressed his displeasure with that role. Now they have a new potential No. 2, rookie Dan Marino of Pitt — and on Tuesday they signed No.3 on their depth chart, third-year pro Jim Jensen.

JOE ROBBIE, the Dolphins' owner, said Strock and the team had reached an impasse in their negotiations. "The remaining contract issues . . . are basically coaching decisions," Robbie said Tuesday in an obvious reference to Shula's use of Woodley as a starter and Strock as a reliever, "and there's not much I can do about them."

Strock's status changed when the Dolphins made Marino their No.1 draft choice this year. Strock has said he is talking with the Oklahoma Outlaws, a United States Football League expansion team.

"If Strock wants to play football in Miami, the offer is a good offer," Robbie said. "If he wants to shop in the U.S. Football League, there isn't much to talk about."

And Shula noted: "If Strock decides not to sign, we're better equipped to handle it this year than last year, with Woodley further along in his career and the addition of Marino. Jim Jensen in my mind is a good football player, too."

The Los Angeles Raiders added a seventh quarterback to their roster Tuesday with the signing of David Humm, who began his speckled pro career with them as a fifth-round draft choice out of Nebraska in 1975. Humm, who signed a one-year contract, will be attempting to land a third-string role behind Jim Plunkett and Marc Wilson.

Humm spent his first five years with the Raiders, was cut, hooked up for a year as a reserve in Buffalo, then spent two virtually idle years in Baltimore before hooking on again with the Raiders.

The Raiders also said last week's cornerback trade, in which they sent Monte Jackson to the Los Angeles Rams for Pat Thomas, fell through when Thomas failed the Raiders' physical because of a knee condition.

"It would have been tough for him to make our club as a starter," Coach Tom Flores said of Thomas, a starter for the Rams last year. "But we wanted to see if he could help us in the various substitution situations."

NFL Roundup

IN PHILADELPHIA, Harold Carmichael came to terms with the Eagles. The 33-year-old, 6-foot-8 wide receiver for the Eagles signed a pair of one-year contracts with the Eagles. Details were not disclosed.

Carmichael holds the NFL record for consecutive games with at least one catch (172) and the Eagles' records for consecutive games (154), receptions (551) and receiving yards (8,403). He also has scored 76 touchdowns, one shy of Steve van Buren's team record.

Meanwhile, in Chicago, Ted Albrecht, a guard and tackle for the Bears, called it quits for good. Their No.1 draft choice out of the University of California in 1977 and one of their iron men on the line — he played 75 of 77 games in one stretch — announced his retirement. Albrecht missed the entire 1982 season because of a back injury.

Among the players reamining out of training camp were Gary "Big Hands" Johnson, a defensive tackle, one-time All-Pro and four-time Pro Bowl player for the San Diego Chargers, and Lawrence Taylor, a linebacker and Defensive Player of the Year in each of his first two pro seasons with the New York Giants.

Each is seeking a renegotiated contract. Each is being fined $1,000 a day, the maximum allowable, during his absence.

Daryl Hunt welcomes Matthews to Oilers

SAN ANGELO, Texas (AP) — First round draft choice Bruce Matthews of the Houston Oilers had wondered how his teammates would react to his first workout as a professional.

Today he knows.

Linebacker Daryl Hunt sent him sprawling on Matthews' first play of a scrimmage session. Later in Tuesday's opening session, Matthews' offensive line mates reminded him it was time for post-practice wind sprints.

Throughout his welcome to the National Football League,, Matthews recalled what his brother Clay, a 1978 first round draft choice of the Cleveland Browns, had advised.

"I had asked him how the people would react and he told me as long as I showed them that I could play, that would justify everything," Matthews said.

What Matthews is trying to justify is the almost $1.3 million four-year contract he signed Monday night in Houston before reporting for his first workout on the Angelo State University campus.

MGF wins battle, bankruptcy suit dismissed

By LESLIE HAINES
Business-Energy Writer

MGF Oil Corporation won its court battle Tuesday to prevent three creditors from forcing the company into involuntary bankruptcy.

Judge Joseph Elliott ruled in favor of MGF at a hearing late Tuesday afternoon in United States bankruptcy court in San Antonio. He dismissed a suit filed against the company June 28 by three disgruntled creditors holding MGF's 14 1/2 percent senior subordinated debentures.

Elliott took time on the record to praise MGF's efforts, saying the company had tried in good faith to meet its debts. Attorneys involved in the case said it was most unusual, almost without precedent, for a bankruptcy judge to dismiss such a suit.

The decision cannot be appealed, so the Midland oil and gas firm is out of the courts, according to executive vice president W. Phillip Marcum.

MGF will thus not have to liquidate its assets to satisfy its approximately $250 million debt, nor will it seek protection from creditors under Chapter 11 of the bankruptcy code.

The company is projecting losses for the quarter ended June 30, however, and through the rest of 1983 and possibly beyond, Marcum said. MGF lost more than $80 million in 1982 and another $10 million in the first quarter of this year. It blamed the losses on a depressed drilling market, uncollected accounts receivable and higher interest on its debts.

Now that the threat of bankruptcy has been removed, MGF will "go back to the oil and gas business as soon as possible," Marcum said.

"This is the best morning this company has had in months," Marcum said today. "The attitude around here is just great." He credited the long hours and hard work of MGF personnel, especially its accounting department, with helping the company succeed Tuesday.

MGF also reported it has now reached agreement with virtually all its debt holders. While in San Antonio, Marcum and other MGF officials settled with the company's leveraged, institutional lease lenders in the amount of $22 million related to four drilling rigs, and also with unsecured trade creditors, primarily in Oklahoma, for $3.7 million.

The company had announced earlier it had renegotiated its $153 million bank debt with its major secured lenders, which include First National Bank of Midland.

MGF's success in court was never assured. Marcum said company attorneys believed it had only a 20 percent chance of pursuading Judge Elliott to dismiss the suit asking for MGF's liquidation.

Representatives from all the major debt holders — from banks to trade creditors — came to San Antonio at their own expense to testify in MGF's behalf, Marcum said.

The fate of the company hung on MGF's being able to report that fully 64 percent of the $75 million debt in debentures had agreed to swap them for a new 6 percent issue.

The swap agreement was reached after a one day tender offer made Monday, Marcum said. The offer expires August 5, 1983. Out of 120 people who hold the 14 1/2 percent bonds, for a total of $75 million, 10 hold 64 percent.

These 10 had the most to win or lose, if MGF had had to go into bankruptcy.

Under Chapter 7, secured creditors such as a bank holding a loan with collateral would have been paid first. Next in line would be trade creditors such as suppliers and lessors, followed by investors owning the company's 14 1/2 percent senior subordinated debentures. Last in line to receive any money would have been people who own the 15.7 million outstanding shares of MGF common stock.

That stock closed Tuesday at $1.25 per share.

Creditors Stanford N. Phelps, Katherine Cimmino and Megan Mahoney filed suit June 28 asking the bankruptcy court to liquidate MGF's assets to satisfy unpaid debts, including a May 1 interest payment of $5.4 million due on the company's $75 million issue of senior subordinated debentures due 2001.

MGF offered to swap those issues for a new senior issue due in 1988, plus some MGF common stock or warrants to buy additional stock.

If the three creditors had succeeded in their suit, MGF would have been placed under the jurisdiction of a specially-appointed bankruptcy trustee charged with selling off all the company's assets — 46 drilling rigs, other equipment, and production and reserves.

Marcum said last week if at least 70 percent of the bond holders agreed to the swap, it would probably be enough to convince Judge Elliott to dismiss the involuntary bankruptcy petition against MGF and allow the company to continue its struggle to regain financial health.

Phelps and MGF entered face to face negotiations the first week in July in San Francisco, but Phelps apparently rejected the swap arrangement and pressed for the interest payment on the original issue.

Phelps has still not agreed to swap the original debentures for new ones, Marcum said.

Eighty-nine employees presented MGF officers with a petition of support Monday before company officials, attorneys and others left for San Antonio, where bankruptcy matters concerning Midland-Odessa firms are heard.

Marcum, executive vice president of the firm, is to be named president and chief executive officer at the annual meeting scheduled in the next 60 to 90 days. Current president R. O. "Jack" Major will step up to the chairman of the board position.

Natura restructures bank debt

By LESLIE HAINES
Business-Energy Writer

Natura Energy Corporation, beset with cash flow problems, staff reductions and decreasing oil and gas reserve estimates, said Tuesday it has successfully restructured its bank debt.

First National Bank of Midland has extended until mid-October the due date for Natura's payment of principal on a $636,000 note.

Before the Midland oil and gas firm receives a long-term extension of its debt, however, it will probably have to make further concessions to the bank and provide more collateral, said vice president Larry A. Stapp.

"I think we have made the changes we've got to make to be a survivor," Stapp said late Tuesday. "There have been easier times in the past, but we are committed to keeping Natura together."

The company disclosed last week it was having "significant" cash flow problems and had instituted an "austerity program" in early June.

Changes made recently include staff reductions, renegotiating the bank debt, and attempting to renegotiate an office space lease.

The company reported losses of $212,000 in 1982 and $94,000 in the first quarter 1983. Increased expenses for delay rentals and interest on bank debt were blamed for the losses.

Natura has several other problems as well. The two main producing wells in which it has significant interest are shut in at the moment and the company's industry partners owe it money on these wells. Natura was the operator.

Selling up to one half of the company's position on an East Texas prospect is first on Natura's list of things to be done to rescue the company, Stapp said.

Natura's oil and gas well in Polk County potentialed in March at 560 Mcf gas and 112 barrels of oil per day. The well is shut in awaiting a pipeline connection.

Stapp said he hopes construction of the three-mile pipeline can begin by mid-August. The estimated cost is $237,000; Natura's share would be 19.25 percent of that.

Selling a portion of the prospect should bring between $400,000 and $500,000, which would be used to reduce the bank loan, he said.

Natura and First National are not seeing eye to eye on the value of the company's reserves. The bank recently said those reserves were substantially less than an evaluation prepared by Sipes, Williamson & Associates Inc., independent engineers, at December 31, 1982.

Because of this, First National had requested additional collateral as a condition of renewing the bank debt.

Natura said July 18 it was talking with other potential lenders.

The company announced last week it is in the throws of an austerity program in an attempt to correct its cash-poor condition. The staff was reduced from seven to two, leaving just Stapp and president Chris F. Bosecker. They accepted a 30 percent salary cut as well, according to papers filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission recently.

Natura vice president of operations Steve Wright and company treasurer Leigh Prieto resigned July 15. Director Dedric B. Baxter also resigned on that date.

Stapp said the company will replace Baxter eventually.

Natura is currently negotiating with the Hightower Building to reduce the financial burdens of its office space lease there, or in the alternative, move to another location.

As a result of the many adjustments Natura has made or is trying to make, the company said it believes it will experience positive cash flow, "at least for the next few months," according to a press release issued last week.

Natura is also considering a private placement of equity securities to bolster the company's balance sheet, but this has been pushed into the background in favor of concentrating on selling half of the East Texas prospect, Stapp said.

Crude oil stocks up

Crude oil stocks increased last week, the American Petroleum Institute told the Reporter-Telegram today. In the week ending July 22, 345,239,000 barrels of crude were in the inventory, compared to 343,426,000 two weeks ago. One year ago, 345,610,000 barrels were gauged.

API REPORT

U.S. refineries operated at 77.8 percent of capacity last week, up from 76.3 the previous week, and 73.7 percent one year ago. Operable capacity is 16,294,000 barrels, down from last year's figure of 17,382,000 barrels.

A total of 12,369,000 barrels of crude were run through distillation units last week. The previous week 12,088,000 were processed. One year ago 12,384,000 were input.

Crude oil imports increased last week to 3,903,000 barrels, up from 3,310,000 the previous week, but less than the 4,443,000 imported one year ago. In addition, 1,611,000 barrels of product were imported last week. Two weeks ago, 1,868,000 were received. One year ago the U.S. imported 1,223,000 barrels of petroleum products.

The API estimates total U.S. crude oil production for July will reach 86,984,000 barrels. During July, 1982, 86,561,000 were lifted.

Lease sale response meager

WASHINGTON (AP) — Interior Secretary James Watt's first area-wide offering of oil and gas tracts in the South Atlantic brought a meager response Tuesday from the oil industry as only 11 of 3,582 tracts received bids.

The tracts brought in high bids of $13.36 million, far below the record of $3.4 billion received for 623 tracts sold in the Gulf of Mexico last May.

But Interior Department officials said the lack of industry interest was not surprising since the area from North Carolina to Florida has no proven commercial-size deposits of oil and gas.

The department has estimated there are 2.28 million barrels of oil and 860 billion cubic feet of gas in the South Atlantic, but six wells drilled so far have been dry.

Only seven oil companies participated in the bidding and only one of the tracts attracted bids from more than one company. The largest price — $2.02 million — was paid by Shell Oil Co. for a nine-square-mile area about 50 miles off the North Carolina coast.

Ten of the 11 tracts were located 40 to 50 miles off North Carolina and the 11th was off the South Carolina coastline.

Watt, bowing to pressure from the governors of North Carolina and Florida, deleted 12 million acres, including tracts closest to North Carolina and all 11 million acres off the Florida coast.

Both states has expressed concern about possible damage to popular beaches, tourism and the fishing industry from an oil spill. Florida officials had the support of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, which had argued that oil rigs could interefer with rocket launches from Cape Canaveral.

Majors report improved profits

Assoicated Press

Four major U.S. oil companies say their second-quarter profits improved from a year earlier, but Getty Oil Co. says it lost $86 million because of a $250 million charge against earnings that stemmed from a pricing lawsuit.

Texaco Inc. said Tuesday its net income rose 7 percent; Standard Oil Co. of California's was up 40 percent; and Shell Oil Co.'s edged up 3 percent.

Occidental Petroleum Corp. said its profit soared 128 percent, but that was due mainly to an extraordinary gain of $141.1 million.

Texaco, the nation's third-largest oil concern, said its profit rose to $327 million, or $1.28 a share, from $305 million, or $1.17 a share, a year earlier. But Texaco's revenue fell 14 percent to $9.9 billion from $11.5 billion.

Socal, ranked No. 4 and headquartered in San Francisco, said second-quarter net income rose to $368 million, or $1.07 a share.

Energy Committee OKs gas bill, opposition ready

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Republican-controlled Senate Energy Committee Tuesday approved a measure to remove all federal price ceilings on natural gas over a three-year period.

Three Democrats joined eight Republicans on the panel to approve a gradual decontrol program that would raise prices on "old" gas in monthly increments over 36 months while bringing down prices on "new" gas in 12 monthly phases and freezing them there for another six months.

"Old" gas, discovered before March 1977, now makes up about half of the nation's supply of the fuel. "New" gas has been found since then.

Under the 1978 Natural Gas Policy Act, old gas was to be under price ceilings forever. But the law, designed to encourage new drilling and exploration after a severe shortage of gas in the 1976-77 winter, gradually removed price ceilings on new gas discovered after 1977.

The Senate committee's gradual decontrol plan was approved as a compromise to the Reagan administration's desires to remove all federal price controls in 1985.

Energy Secretary Donald Hodel has endorsed the Senate committee's package even though it lacks some of the consumer protection measures that were in the administration's bill last February.

The panel deleted a provision in the administration package that would have prevented gas prices from rising above the rate of inflation during the decontrol period.

Residential gas rates for the nation's 45 million homes heated by the fuel rose an average 21 percent last year and are predicted to rise another 16 percent next winter, according to the latest government estimates.

The Citizen-Labor Energy Coalition, an organization of unions and consumer groups, estimates that the Senate committee's decontrol program will raise gas prices an average of $1.5 billion in the first year by raising the ceiling on old gas prices.

The old gas is selling at an average price of $1.40 per thousand cubic foot. New gas is now selling at a price of $3.41 per thousand cubic feet...

Senate Majority Leader Howard Baker, R-Tenn., has said the bill won't be scheduled for floor action until the fall.

Meanwhile, the House Energy fossil fuel subcommittee is bogged down in a disagreement among six producer-state Democrats and five Republicans on how to handle old gas.

Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — Critics of the natural gas deregulation bill that was approved by the Senate Energy committee Tuesday have already launched their attacks against congressional passage of the measure.

In the House, a compromise bill has been put together but cannot get out of committee until one more vote is obtained, Rep. Ralph Hall (D—Rockwall) reported. He is hopeful then that a full House Commerce and Energy committee will vote to send it to the floor.

The Senate members voted 11 to 9 for the bill. There is no Texan on this committee. Senator Pete Domenici (R—N.M.) voted against it and Senator Don Nickles (R—Okla.) voted for it.

Later, Sen. James McClure (R—Idaho) chairman of the committee said this bill will probably not come up on the Senate floor until September. He admitted that the bill will have a "tough" time passing then.

McClure pointed out that the bill which took 31 Senate committee sessions and 50 hours to draft faces more amendments on the Senate floor.

Already lines are forming of Senate opponents to specific provisions who plan amendments on the Senate floor. It faces a threat of filibuster by Sen. Howard Metzenbaum (D—Ohio).

He has said he is totally opposed to deregulation. His last effort to amend the bill in committee concerned an amendment to point out the fact that the price of "old" gas is not affected by deregulation in this bill. But he lost even that amendment in the committee which seemed always to be controlled by two senators, both Democrats, Wendell Ford, Ky., and Bennett Johnston, La.

Johnston in the end was able to get the committee to agree with him that there be no recommendations from the committee, just a vote to pass the bill out to the floor.

The bill continues to polarize the nation on natural gas — it puts producers against pipelines and both against consumers in northern states, suffering severe unemployment and high prices for industry and home use; and it sustains complaints that producer states and those in the Sun Belt are getting cheaper gas and therefore are more attractive to industry.

One amendment sure to come up will be from Sen. John Heinz (R—Pa.) who rallies a crowd of men from both parties opposed to the bill. Heinz will seek lower consumer prices and will help Metzenbaum.

Nickles who has been unsuccessful most of the time in trying to pass amendments in committee may have more on the floor to help both producers and pipelines.

Sen. John Melcher (D—Montana) wants to regulate Canadian gas at the well head before it comes into the U.S. to heat homes in the North and West.

At one point, Sen. Dale Bumpers (D—Ark.) said he sympathized with Melcher but "for the U.S. Senate to try to abrogate contracts made with Canadian gas producers and shippers might be an act that would induce the Canadian Parliament to try to dictate contracts in the U.S."

Official 'shocked' at attempt to get quick judgment in Barefoot case

AUSTIN (AP) — John B. Duncan, executive director of the Texas Civil Liberties Union, said he was "shocked" that Attorney General Jim Mattox would attempt "another procedural shortcut" in the execution of Thomas Barefoot.

The attorney general's office filed a motion July 6 urging the U.S. Supreme Court to make a quick judgment in Barefoot's appeal. The motion said Barefoot was convicted of capital murder Nov. 14, 1978, and the case has been on appeal since then.

"It would seem that common decency and a concern that the public believe that a person condemned to death has had every opportunity the law allows to challenge the most final of sentences before it is carried out would preclude the filing of such motions," Duncan said in a statement Tuesday.

Boy sentenced for beating ducks

HOUSTON (AP) — A teen-ager who told authorities he got drunk and beat five ducks to death has been sentenced to one year in jail.

Edward Torres Gamez, 18, of Pasadena, pleaded guilty Tuesday to a misdemeanor charge of cruelty to animals and was sentenced bu County Court-at-Law Judge Don Hendrix.

Prosecutor Jim Peacock said Gamez got drunk early Saturday, went to Pasadena Memorial Park and killed the ducks. Gamez smashed the ducks' heads with a hammer and slammed them against a bridge rail, he said.

Chemical firm to sell businesses

HOUSTON (AP) — The Occidental Chemical Corp. says it has signed two separate agreements under which its metal-finishing businesses will be divested.

Ford Motor Co. will acquire Occidental Chemical's Parker division, a manufacturer of metal surface-treating products and processes headquartered in Madison Heights, Mich. Under a separate agreement a management group will buy out the metal-plating businesses, including the Sel-Rex and Udylite lines. Plating Systems is headquartered in Warren, Mich.

In 1982, the metal-finishing operations of Occidental Chemical accounted for less than 10 percent of the company's approximately $2 billion in sales.

More nursing-home nurses hired

AUSTIN (AP) — Three more full-time nurses will be hired to monitor patients in a Mesquite nursing home as part of an agreement with state officials.

Attorney General Jim Mattox said officials of Trailwood Manor, where 12 patients have died since April 1, agreed to provide round-the-clock care by registered nurses after Mattox said he would take them to court.

According to the Texas Department of Health, which inspected Trailwood Manor this month, "necessary intervention was not taken" at the nursing home. TDH inspectors reported "instances of acute illness, sudden changes in patient conditions and deterioration of the patient" in several cases.

Couple donates $1 million to A&M

COLLEGE STATION (AP) — A Houston couple gave the Texas A&M University Development Foundation $1 million to a build a new campus residence for the university's system chancellor.

Dr. Chester J. Reed, a 1947 Texas A&M veterinary medicine graduate, and his wife, Billie Jean Reed, made the donation, because said Reed "there was a need; I love A&M."

In the past, Reed and his wife have also donated to A&M, including two tracts of land valued at $674,000 to fund approximately 40 scholarships for the University's Corps of Cadets.

Judge stops city housing project

HOUSTON — A state district judge has ordered the Houston Housing Authority to stop plans to build an 86-unit low-income housing project in southeast Houston bordering Pasadena.

Judge Michael O'Brien, after seven days of testimony, ruled Tuesday that state law precludes construction of housing projects on the border of an adjoining municipality where there is evidence that such a project would cause an adverse effect on services of that municipality.

O'Brien also said the authority failed in its legal duty to notify the residents who live within a quarter-mile radius of the proposed housing development.

Judge reverses murder conviction

LOS ANGELES (AP) — A judge has thrown out the murder conviction of a fired deputy sheriff who staged a phony raid on a pregnant woman's home, saying the shooting that killed her unborn son was a "classic case" of involuntary manslaughter.

Superior Court Judge William B. Keene, superseding last month's jury verdict, on Tuesday sentenced Robert Armstrong to one year in county jail, five years' probation and fined him $2,000.

The judge also dismissed Armstrong's conviction for the attempted murder of Delois Young, whose fetus was shot to death during the April 1982 raid staged by Armstrong and other deputies who hoped to make a drug arrest.

Armstrong had been convicted of second-degree murder in the fetus' death, but Keene said there was no evidence of malice.

"I don't believe that conviction of murder in the second degree is supported either by the law or the evidence," Keene said. "This is a classic case of involuntary manslaughter."

Armstrong, 28, could have received 15 years to life in prison on a murder conviction.

"We are very disapponted," said prosecutor Abe Weisbrot. "It's the kind of disposition that is going to make some people wonder whether there is equal justice."

Ms. Young said later that although she was unsure whether 15 years would have been appropriate, just one year was not.

"I know my son is dead," she said. "I have a bullet in me. I wasn't born that way. I just don't understand."

Ms. Young, 22, was nine months pregnant at the time.

Defense attorney George Franscell said Armstrong was "pleasantly surprised" by Keene's action, which gave Armstrong credit for 42 days already served in jail.

Armstrong's partner, Rene LaBelle, 27, convicted of conspiracy to obstruct justice, was given three years' probation and fined $2,000.

Trial witnesses said Armstrong and other deputies called in a phony disturbance complaint so they would be dispatched to Ms. Young's Duarte home, where they believed they would find a PCP, or "angel dust," operation. No search warrant was obtained.

Armstrong testified that he knocked on Ms. Young's door about 2 a.m. on April 15, 1982, and identified himself as a civilian fleeing police.

When the door opened, he said he saw Ms. Young with a rifle in hand. He said he identified himself as a deputy and ordered her to drop the weapon, then "instinctively" opened fire in self-defense when she did not comply.

No drugs were found in the house, and two other deputies testified they never heard Armstrong identify himself as an officer or order anyone to drop a weapon.

Lawyer records conversation with Mattox, Dallas paper says

AUSTIN (AP) — A Houston lawyer who said Attorney General Jim Mattox threatened his law firm was among five witnesses who testified before a grand jury investigating Attorney General Jim Mattox' 1982 campaign finance report.

The Dallas Morning News reported in a copyright story in today's editions that the lawyer, Thomas McDade, a partner in Fulbright & Jaworski, recorded two June 20 conversations with Mattox and turned the tapes over to the grand jury.

McDade refused to comment about reports he had tape-recorded his conversation with Mattox, but a tape-recorder was seen carried into the grand jury room Tuesday.

Grand jurors retired after 9 p.m. Tuesday without returning any indictments, and Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle said the Mattox case is not over.

"The investigation is continuing," Earle said. "The grand jury will meet again on Thursday."

Witnesses subpoened included three lawyers of the Houston firm of Fulbright & Jaworski and two people from Mattox' office — Assistant Attorney General Robert T. "Buddy" Lewis and attorney Susan Voss, both of the division that oversees the approval of bonds.

Ms. Voss and Lewis were subpoenaed because of accusations by McDade that Mattox threatened last month to put the law firm out of the bond business because of a dispute in another case.

McDade, who made the accusation to several reporters last week, and two colleagues in his firm, Wiley Caldwell and Edward Esquivel, testified before the grand jury Tuesday and left without comment.

McDade said last week the attorney general threatened to put Fulbright & Jaworski out of the bond business unless McDade agreed not to question Janice Mattox, the attorney general's sister, a Dallas attorney.

Mattox denied making the threat, although he said he told McDade the state would give "close scrutiny" to bond packages handled by McDade's firm.

The Dallas Morning News said sources who heard the tapes allegedly made by McDade said that Mattox, while discussing the suubpoena of his sister, told McDade: "We are both in a trap."

The newspaper said McDade told fellow attorneys the stalemate Mattox referred to was McDade's refusal to withdraw the subpoena.

The sources told the News the tapes also record Mattox saying, "You've got to find a way to get us out of this trap, McDade."

The News said the sources also said when Arthur Mitchell, a top Mattox aide, joined in the conversation and offered to try to work out a compromise, Mattox said: "Arthur, you don't have the power to negotiate that anymore."

Mattox and the Houston law firm are opponents in a $1.7 billion lawsuit filed by South Texas rancher-oilman Clinton Manges against Mobil Oil Corp. Manges sued Mobil over oil and gas taken from his ranch. Mattox intervened on Manges' behalf because the state owns some of the mineral rights to the land.

McDade said he wanted to question Ms. Mattox about her $125,000 loan from a Seattle bank and any financial ties with Manges.

McDade accused Mattox of holding up a $329 million bond issue by the Lower Colorado River Authority, which also is represented by Fulbright & Jaworski.

However, Esquivel said the LCRA delay was caused simply by an incorrect interest rate on the printed bonds that had to be corrected.

Anchorwoman testifies in lawsuit

Christine Craft

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — An anchorwoman charging her former TV station with sex discrimination testified at the start of her trial that even though she's no "monster," the station wanted her to wear makeup so thick it was hard to open her mouth.

Christine Craft, 38, taking the stand Tuesday in her $1.2 million suit, said KMBC-TV officials had promised her that journalistic skills were the key qualification for co-anchoring the station's nightly 6 p.m. and 10 p.m. newscasts.

However, Ms. Craft testified, from her first day on the job in January 1981 she was bombarded with criticism of her appearance and hints for improving her makeup and wardrobe and creating the "illusion of credibility."

Ms. Craft was demoted from co-anchor to reporter in August 1981, when KMBC says it concluded from a survey that the audience did not like the way she looked. She resigned shortly afterward.

She contends she was demoted because the surveys found her "unattractive, too old and not deferential to men."

Ms. Craft also alleges she was paid less than a male counterpart for doing the same work and that KMBC and its former owners, Metromedia Inc., fraudulently misrepresented the job to her.

Attorneys for KMBC and Metromedia have denied the charges and any sex discrimination. Ms. Craft's salary was based on factors other than sex, said Donald W. Giffin, attorney for the defendants.

Although station officials never found fault with her reporting and the show was rated No.1 in its market, Ms. Craft testified, the criticism of her appearance was unrelenting.

Ms. Craft testified she was told in January 1981 "my appearance just wasn't working." An employee of the station's consulting firm, Media Associates of Dallas, then applied makeup to Ms. Craft so heavily that she said she found it "physically hard to open my mouth," she said.

"I think I have a normal face — not a monster, not a beauty queen," she added.

Ms. Craft also testified that although she had been promised a "co-equal, co-anchor" job, her male counterpart, Scott Feldman, "did not have requirements vis-a-vis his clothing."

Ms. Craft testified that KMBC News Director Ridge Shannon approached her in November 1980 about becoming a co-anchor at the Kansas City station. She was working then at KEYT-TV in Santa Barbara, Calif., a position to which she has returned.

NBC, ABC revamp nightly news

NEW YORK (AP) — When vacationers return from the beach and their news-watching hiatus in September, they may not recognize the network nightly news. NBC and ABC will have revamped anchor lineups, while public television plans a ground-breaking hour-long evening newscast.

Beginning Sept. 5, Roger Mudd will not co-anchor the "NBC Nightly News," leaving Tom Brokaw as sole anchor. In an announcement Tuesday, NBC said Mudd will become principal reporter of NBC's "White Paper" documentary series and senior political correspondent.

Mudd, 55, did not mention the job shift on Tuesday's "Nightly News," which he signed off with a smile and the words, "Good night from all of us at NBC News."

But he would have liked to say "from all of them at NBC News," Mudd said in an interview after the broadcast.

"I did not and do not agree with the decision," Mudd said. "I think it was short-sighted and based on ratings."

Reuven Frank, president of NBC News, said in a statement: "We have assured Roger that the decision was not based on considerations of journalistic merit. But it was our judgment, after 16 months, that the anchoring of 'NBC Nightly News' should be done in New York, and not split between two cities."

Mudd worked out of Washington, Brokaw from New York.

It was the second time Mudd lost a prized anchor position. He was passed over in favor of Dan Rather when Walter Cronkite retired from the "CBS Evening News."

Mudd said it was different this time because he has only been at NBC three years compared to 19 years at CBS. But he said, "It's not that I'm taking this one easy."

With seven years left on his NBC agreement, Mudd said he has not decided whether to ask out of his contract. A no-nonsense newsman with a nose for politics, Mudd said he liked documentaries, which "get you close to straight, unadorned journalism."

Mudd said he and ABC have had no job discussions, either before or after the death last week of Frank Reynolds, the Washington-based anchor on ABC's "World News Tonight."

Richard Wald, senior vice president of ABC News, said Tuesday that ABC would consider talking to Mudd, but not to replace Reynolds. "We're 99 percent sure that we will find a replacement for Frank Reynolds internally," he said.

Peter Jennings, ABC's London-based anchor, is filling in for Reynolds, at least through September.

Wald said there are three or four major candidates, but would not be specific. Speculation has put Jennings on top of the list, along with Ted Koppel, anchor of ABC's "Nightline."

Wald said any new arrangement should be in place by the fall's new television season, when ABC could end the three-anchor format.

"When we initiated that format, we didn't think we could compete successfully with a single anchor," said Wald. "The questions we are currently asking is when we pick a replacement for Frank, do we hold on to the other two, or replace the other two?"

On Sept. 5, public television undertakes the first 60-minute suppertime newscast, "The MacNeil-Lehrer Newshour." Anchors Robert MacNeil and Jim Lehrer might then occupy the only two-headed broadcast.

CPB, NPR fail to negotiate life-saving loan

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Corporation for Public Broadcasting and National Public Radio have started pointing fingers at each other over their failure to negotiate a life-saving loan for NPR.

NPR and CPB executives spent their day Tuesday exchanging letters and official statements and holding press conferences, unable to bring themselves to the bargaining table.

Both sides suggested the other was being unreasonable. NPR is facing bankruptcy on Friday.

Acting NPR chief Ronald C. Bornstein told reporters CPB had, in effect, "broken off negotiations" by making an unnecessary "take-it-or-leave-it demand" that could force the organization to close its doors.

CPB President Edward J. Pfister responded by saying his demands were vitally necessary, because the corporation's confidence in NPR's ability to survive even with a loan has been shaken.

"If the system is lost, if NPR forces itself into bankruptcy, that would speak in my view to the highest possible level of irresponsibility (on their part)...," Pfister added. "There is absolutely no reason for bankruptcy to occur."

At the center of the impasse is a request that NPR give up title to its satellite network equipment either to the corporation or to a small group of stations. CPB maintains that requirement is essential collateral for a loan, because it is the safest way to protect the equipment against creditors should NPR default or declare bankruptcy.

NPR says its member stations still have faith in the organization and do not wish to restructure it in any way, particularly when NPR is locked in a desperate fight to survive. The organization faces more than $5 million in past-due bills and an overall deficit projected at $9.1 million. It does not have the money to meet Friday's payroll.

Bornstein, in an interview Tuesday morning, said he did not believe the issue of protecting the equipment against bankruptcy was a valid one. If CPB lends NPR the money it needs, CPB will gain "extraordinary" control over NPR's finances, he said.

"There's no chance of bankruptcy with that kind of oversight if CPB does its job," Bornstein said. "The question, then, is why, under the duress of these negotiations, does CPB wish to pursue transfer of title...? I don't have a satisfactory answer to that."

Pfister had a simple answer Tuesday at his news conference.

"NPR's credibility right now is a little tarred," he said, and CPB is not convinced that even with a loan, the organization can overcome its problems.

"We hope (new financial) controls will be extraordinary enough to guarantee against this happening again," Pfister said. "But I must say, we thought we had controls in place (in 1983). I am persuaded NPR found ways to get around those controls. I think we have a responsibility to the American people to safeguard as much as we can."

Baby panda died of pneumonia

WASHINGTON (AP) — A panda cub born at the National Zoo last week died of pneumonia and zookeepers say there is "some concern" its mother, Ling-Ling, may also have the disease.

Zoo spokesman Michael Morgan reported Tuesday that the panda cub died three hours after it was born of acute prenatal bronchopneumonia.

The cub, the first born in the United States, died last Thursday.

"There is some concern Ling-Ling may have it, but she has shown no signs yet," Morgan said, adding that the 13-year-old panda is being watched closely for symptoms.

Morgan said that microscopic examinations of the cub's lung tissue show that the infection became strong about two days before the panda was born. Preliminary autopsy reports showed the panda died from a buildup of fluid in its lungs.

Morgan said Ling-Ling has shown no ill effects of the birth, but that she continues to display maternal instincts by cradling apples.

Zoo officials are hopeful that Ling-Ling will conceive again next spring.

Charley Pride says he's still hot after 16 years and 38 albums

Charley Pride

CHEYENNE, Wyo. (AP) — After 16 years and 38 albums, country singer Charley Pride coolly says he's hotter than ever.

"I think I sing as well or better than some people who are as hot or hotter than I am," he said Monday, before appearing at the annual Cheyenne Frontier Days rodeo and western celebration. He said he's had the staying power to "compete with the Willie Nelsons, the Alabamas, the Kenny Rogers that come along."

Pride, a Grammy Award winner with 14 gold albums, has a new album coming out next month and a new single on the charts, "Night Games," which he describes as "hotter than a match."

The 44-year-old entertainer, who began singing as a boy while picking cotton in rural Mississippi, says his voice has improved with age, especially since he quit smoking eight years ago. And he wants to continue making music for "at least another 40 years."

"Think of me as someone like a Bob Hope or a George Burns," he said.

NEW YORK (AP) — Count Basie's former accountant has been indicted on charges of swindling thousands of dollars from the famed bandleader by using checks drawn on Basie's bank account to pay his own bills, according to federal prosecutors.

Albert Gaines, 59, was charged with writing and mailing two of Basie's checks to American Express and two to the Internal Revenue Service, all in 1979. He faces up to five years in prison and $4,000 in fines if found guilty, prosecutors said Tuesday.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Stuart E. Abrams said that when Basie's lawyers discovered the accountant's activities in 1981, Gaines told them he had taken "at least $50,000" since 1977.

Prosecutors said Gaines, who worked for the 78-year-old musician from the early 1960s until 1981, used blank checks signed by Basie, who believed his own expenses were being paid.

SAN JOSE, Calif. (AP) — Apple Computer co-founder Steve Wozniak, who's been known to take a few risks, has been fined $500 for crashing an airplane he was not certified to fly, the Federal Aviation Administration said.

"It's a trivial amount," Wozniak said Monday on learning of the fine. The 32-year-old multimillionaire, who earned his fortune in the fledgling home computer market, has spent millions over the past two years on the popular but financially draining US music festivals.

The $200,000 single-engine Beechcraft Bonanza crashed on takeoff from an airport near Scotts Valley on Feb. 7, 1981, injuring Wozniak and two passengers.

An investigation by the National Transportation Safety Board showed the crash occurred because Wozniak tried to get the plane off the ground too soon. FAA spokeswoman Barbara Abel said Wozniak was fined because his 10-week-old pilot's license did not show he had been checked out in the Beechcraft by an approved instructor.

Investigator Charles Johnson of the FAA's San Jose office said his probe showed Wozniak had had only four hours of experience in the Bonanza. Wozniak said he thought he had been flying legally.

LONDON (AP) — Not that he needs any brushing up on his legal skills, but U.S. Supreme Court Chief Justice Warren E. Burger is getting back to the basics of American law this week — with a trip to London to dedicate Notre Dame University's new London Law Center.

Burger, 75, who has headed the country's highest court since 1969, has long been an admirer of English common law, on which U.S. law is based. So it's only natural that he was chosen to speak at the dedication of the 3-year-old law center, which Notre Dame says is the first to offer American law students credit for studying abroad.

The Indiana school has been offering law courses in London since 1968, but had no home of its own until a $4 million bequest enabled it to purchase and renovate an 18th century mansion.

Burger arrived here Tuesday and will attend the center's official opening Friday before speaking at a dedication dinner that night.

PASADENA, Calif. (AP) — Dr. Robert M. Ashby, a scientist whose radar research helped win World War II, died Monday after a lengthy illness. He was 71.

As chief engineer of the autonetics division of North American Rockwell Corp., Ashby supervised development of inertial navigation systems for submarines from 1949 to 1973, resulting in the historic trips of the Nautilus and Skate submarines under the polar ice cap to the North Pole.

Selective Service calls registration program a success

WASHINGTON (AP) — Three years after men resumed signing up with Selective Service, the threatened Vietnam-style protests have failed to materialize, and government officials say the registration program is a success.

Although there are still dedicated opponents of registration struggling to bring it to an end, the courtroom has been their forum more often than the street.

"I think this is just not an era for big protests about any subject. It's very difficult to get people to come out, be it for peace through strength rallies or anti-MX or anti-draft rallies," said Barry Lynn, former head of the anti-registration group Draft Action.

Lynn and others led protest demonstrations in July 1980 when registration was resumed. But since then the opposition has mainly been court suits, with the government — for its part — only occasionally prosecuting a draft resister.

Meanwhile, about 5,000 men are registered each day, with more than 10 million now on the rolls.

REGISTRATION HAS climbed to more than 98 percent of youths born between 1960 and 1963, Selective Service Director Thomas K. Turnage said, and while it is less for some later years, overall registration is more than 95 percent.

"We're ready," Turnage said in an interview. "Tomorrow we could have a random lottery and before the day would end we would be sending telegrams to the individuals that would be first selected. And within the first 30 days we would have the first 100,000 people in the training base."

There could not be a draft lottery "tomorrow," of course, because Congress would have to act before any actual drafting of young men could occur.

Readiness was the intent when registration was proposed by President Carter and approved by Congress after the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan.

IN THE 1980 presidential campaign, Republican candidate Ronald Reagan opposed peacetime registration. But in the tense days after martial law was imposed in Poland, President Reagan decided to continue it.

So the program remains in place, and disagreement continues over whether it works or should continue.

"One of my biggest regrets is that the public has been deceived into thinking that this ineptly run bureaucracy called Selective Service will somehow aid the national security of our country, when it in fact will not," Lynn said in an interview. Although Lynn left his unpaid post as head of Draft Action at the end of June because of other responsibilities, he is still involved in draft issues. He directed the organization for two years.

Even with more than 95 percent of eligible men signed up, some 400,000 have not done so, addresses of those who did register are outdated and, in general, registration is unenforceable, he said.

"Registration has never been a symbol of national resolve," Lynn said. "On the contrary, I'd say that the prosecution of moral objectors is a mark of infamy of which our government should be ashamed."

ONLY ABOUT 15 registration opponents have been prosecuted, fewer than even Lynn anticipated.

"I have always said it would be unenforceable," he said, "but I never quite thought that three years after the fact there would be these few active cases."

Among those who are being prosecuted is David Alan Wayte, a 22-year-old former Yale University philosophy student whose indictment was reinstated last week after a federal appeals court in San Francisco rejected his contention that he was selected for prosecution only because of his vocal opposition.

Some resisters have already been sentenced:

Gary John Eklund of Davenport, Iowa, who said he opposed a U.S. foreign policy that "condoned atrocities" in Central America, is appealing a two-year prison sentence.

ENTER ELLER, a pacifist, last month started serving two years working in a food bank in Roanoke, Va. A federal judge in Wichita, Kan., in March ordered two years of unsupervised probation for Kendal Lee Warkentine, who said he refused to register because of his anti-war religious beliefs.

Turnage's agency is using computers to find men who should be registered, sending out letters to get them to sign up, and sending others to keep address lists updated. Response to these update letters has been 94.5 percent, he said.

But Turnage, asked about the prosecutions, responds that his interest is in getting young men to sign up, not in prosecuting them.

Queries answered about 1973 act

WASHINGTON (AP) — Some members of Congress are saying the War Powers Act should be invoked as the Reagan administration steps up the U.S. military presence in Central America.

Here is a primer, in question and answer form, on the act, its history and what the future may hold as Congress considers both the crisis in Central America and the impact of a recent Supreme Court decision:

Q: What is the War Powers Act?

A. The War Powers Act, also known as the War Powers Resolution, requires the president to notify Congress within 48 hours any time he sends troops equipped for combat into a foreign country or "substantially enlarges" the number of troops already there.

If the troops are sent into hostilities or into "situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated," they must be withdrawn after 60 days unless Congress declares war or otherwise authorizes them to remain.

Q: When was it enacted?

A. The act was passed on Nov. 7, 1973, over the veto of President Richard M. Nixon.

Q. Why was it enacted?

A. The Constitution, although it makes the president the commander in chief of the armed forces, gives Congress the power to declare war. The last time this was done was after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, which brought the United States into World War II. Congress did not declare either the Korean or the Vietnamese war.

As the Vietnamese war deepened, critics in and outside Congress said they believed that the administration was exercising powers that were intended to belong only to Congress. The act, they said, would return the balance to what the framers of the Constitution intended.

Q. Why did Nixon veto it?

A. He said it usurped "authorities which the president has properly exercised under the Constitution for almost 200 years." He also said that setting a 60-day deadline would tempt adversaries of the United States to step up hostilities instead of negotiating.

Q. Who favored it?

A. The resolution was sponsored by then Sen. Jacob Javits, R-N.Y. Those voting to override Nixon's veto included Speaker of the House Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., D-Mass., then the majority leader, and both Republican Leader Howard H. Baker Jr., and Democratic Leader Robert C. Byrd in the Senate. Rep. Robert H. Michel of Illinois, now the House Republican leader, voted to uphold the veto.

The vote to override the Republican president's veto was 75-18 in the Senate and 284-135 in the House, well over the two-thirds majority in both cases. Both the House and Senate were controlled by Democrats.

Q. How frequently has the act been invoked?

A. It was called into play in President Ford's report on the Cambodian seizure of the unarmed U.S. merchant ship Mayaguez, President Carter's report on the doomed Iranian hostage rescue attempt, and President Reagan's two reports on the dispatch of Marines to Lebanon.

All of these cases, however, have involved only the reporting requirement. Carter did not tell Congress about the rescue attempt, for instance, until it had already ended in disaster. Congressional leaders wanted to apply the 60-dy limit in Lebanon, but the administration argued that this would give the wrong impression, since the United States did not foresee that its troops would get into hostile action.

White House spokesman Larry Speakes, asked Monday about the applicability of the act in Central America, said, "Congress is fully informed, fully consulted."

Q. What about the recent Supreme Court decision outlawing congressional vetoes of administration actions? Doesn't that make the act unconstitutional?

A. Javits says it doesn't, because the 60-day limit "relates to exclusive congressional power to declare war, granted by the Constitution." And even if that part were struck down, Javits argued in a New York Daily News article, the "critically important" requirement for presidential reports would remain intact. Leaders of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee say the high court decision does not affect the act's requirement for congressional authorization of "any prolonged U.S. military involvement in hostilities." The committee plans hearings in the fall.

Q. In the meantime, what about Central America?

A. Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., called on Monday for "an urgent meeting" between the Foreign Relations Committee and Secretary of State George P. Shultz to discuss the application of the War Powers Act and other issues. A spokesman for Sen. Charles H. Percy, R-Ill., the committee chairman, said Percy was out of town and no decision had been made on whether to seek such a meeting.

Musician to play all Beethoven's sonatas

PHILADELPHIA (AP) — In a concerted effort that will go on well past "Moonlight," a cocktail pianist plans to play all 32 Beethoven piano sonatas in what he calls a unique musical marathon.

"I'm the only person in the world capable of doing it," said Gary Goldschneider, 44, who claims his concert will set a record as the longest Beethoven performance ever.

He says he'll start at 10 a.m. Saturday at The Bourse, a downtown shopping mall. He expects to wind up with the last note of an encore at approximately 10 p.m.

"The reason it is being done is to present to the public the life work of the greatest Western composer," Goldschneider said.

"People are really hungry for this kind of thing, but this is not somebody playing piano 82 hours in a bar. This is the highest quality of music in the West."

He'll play barefoot, wearing a white tunic and drawstring pants, to try to stay relaxed. "The fingers are not so much the problem as the back," he said.

MISD has math, science teacher shortage

By RHONDA RIGENHAGEN
Staff Writer

Although Midland is not suffering from a teacher shortage in general, the pickin's in the areas of mathematics and science are not only slim, they're on the verge of anorexic.

As the State Board of Education begins two days of hearings in Midland County today, one of the proposals to be discussed calls for an additional year of mathematics to meet high school graduation requirements. At the same time, a 64-page report released today proclaims a nationwide shortage of math and science teachers.

The report, conducted by Education Week newspaper and underwritten by a grant from the Exxon Education Foundation, says at least 40 states report a shortage of teachers in the two fields, and a number of them — including Texas — say the situation is critical.

"There's no shortage in terms of the number of people who apply," explained Ron Whitmore, director of personnel for Midland Independent School District. "But when we start the selection process, in those two areas it can get pretty thin, and in some places we could be out of luck. We will fill three openings in math this fall. But if we needed five or six I don't think I could go to our files and find them."

Last year, for example, the district chose a high school physics teacher to participate in its administrative internship program. The first semester a teacher who was not certified had to teach his classes. The second semester another physics teacher had to handle both class loads. It wasn't until spring a qualified teacher was hired to replace him.

"There's no question at all the figures are rather startling," Whitmore said. "Texas is not going to produce enough math and science teachers to meet our own in-state demand unless there's a drastic increase in college enrollment in those courses."

The shortage also extends to the college level. "The problem we're facing is we don't have enough applicants," asserted Dr. Hosni Nabi, division chairman of science and mathematics at Midland College. "We may have three or four when at one time we had 20 or 30. We don't have the people to select from. Most of them have gone into industry and there's a definite shortage. It's a national problem — it's not just a local or state problem."

The concern has been raised that this shortage, coupled with increased math requirements at the high school level, may result in emergency or temporary certification of less-qualified teachers. J. Murphy Horton, the district's representative on the State Board of Education, conceded such certification may be necessary, at least on a short-term basis.

The obvious cause of the situation — that prospective teachers are lured away by high-paying jobs in business — is only part of the reason, according to the Education Week report. A lack of achievement, participation and interest in the fields also are cited. A recent report by the National Science Board Commission documents a decline in various tests' scores in the areas of math and science.

In the report, some experts contend current curriculum "is designed for the 10 percent of all students who intend to be professional scientists; it literally turns off millions of others." While local administrators qualified their answers, they did think the point had some validity.

"We need to improve the instruction approaches, make (the courses) more interesting and more applicable," Nabi said.

"Sometimes we become too theoretical in teaching our courses," Whitmore agreed. "Math is not always taught effectively going all the way back to elementary grades. Consequently, at the college level, there's a reluctance on (students') parts to select math as a major or minor."

Some suggest paying higher wages to attract more people into the teaching field. But hoped-for increases in teachers' salaries did not come about this year at either the local or state level. Other financial incentives, including "forgiveable" loans and scholarships to prospective teachers, are being enacted or considered by half the nation's states.

In addition, retraining programs for teachers in other fields are being implemented. A bill which has passed the U.S. House and is before the Senate would channel more than $400 million to improve instruction and training in science and mathematics education.

"For the first time we are getting the attention of the legislative branch of government," Nabi said. "For a long time education was ignored, but now the governor and the government are beginning to see the problems we are having, and they're trying to do something about it."

$288,000 has been allocated for new YMCA

By LANA CUNNINGHAM
Staff Writer

The Black Advisory Council did its homework and got an A, with the reward being a third of the city's Community Development Block Grant money for 1983-84.

In its Tuesday session before a room packed with east- and southside residents, the council earmarked $288,000 — out of $818,000 coming from the federal government — for constructing a Northeast YMCA. The advisory panel had requested $300,000.

The rest of the money will be allocated as follows: Southside fire station, $50,000; code enforcement, $50,000; housing rehabilitation, $100,000; paving and drainage, $100,000; paving two streets, $40,000; parks improvements, $100,000; Senior Citizens Center, $40,000; and administration, $50,000.

After the council's vote, a grinning Kenneth Barnes, executive director of the Park Center and Washington YMCAs, said, "I was hoping they would let our case be a top priority and apparently it was."

The YMCA plans to close down the two branches and consolidate all programs into a new $2.5 million structure on former city park land now owned by the YMCA. That tract is adjacent to Lee Freshmen High School.

"This money will provide some input from the total community to get on board and let the building come to reality. It has been part of our corporate planning for the last three years. But fund-raising has been a no-no based on our economy. The project was put on the back burner," said Barnes.

The economy is beginning to look up again, he said, and the board decided, "If we don't jump on it now, it's now or never."

James Clay, vice chairman of the Washington YMCA board, told the council the new facility would provide a wholesome atmosphere.

In a typed proposal to the council, Barnes noted in that northeast area of the city "there are no city or non-profit agencies — no day care, no recreational area, no pool facility in operation and nothing for the senior citizens."

The new Y's goal will be to change directions that foster alienation, delinquency and crime. "It would be a hub where we can work with the youth and teen-agers, providing leadership they can look to," Barnes added.

Durwood Owen, general director of the Metropolitan YMCA, acknowledged the amount requested wouldn't build the facility "but it will provide the necessary motivation to move ahead with a major fund-raising campaign that will start in early 1984."

Teen juveniles to be punished by peers

By GAIL BURKE
Staff Writer

ODESSA — A new method of processing juvenile offenders, approved by the Odessa City Council Tuesday, could reduce the youth recidivism rate, said Teen Court coordinator Natalie Rothstein.

Research initiated by the Odessa Junior League, spurred an alternative court program for Odessa juvenile offenders — the Teen Court.

Youngsters — ages 10 through the teen years — who have committed misdemeanors, including traffic violations, will be go before a court of their peers, beginning November, Mrs. Rothstein said.

"Teen jurors have been known to be a lot tougher," Mrs. Rothstein said, explaining that research indicates the return to delinquent activity has been reduced to 15 percent in cities using this program, as opposed to a 50 percent recividism rate in areas where the juvenile goes though the traditional court process.

"This kind of court is operational in several cities (across the nation)," she said, adding that Denver's teen court program has been effectively hearing all types of offenses for 10 years. Odessa's Teen Court will hear traffic and Class C misdemeanors.

"It is a three-faceted program which will include diversion, accountability and restitution."

Mrs. Rothstein said the Odessa Teen Court will rely on referrals from the municipal and juvenile courts and the police, sheriff and junvenile probation departments.

Once the child has been referred to the Teen Court, the juvenile and his parent will meet with Mrs. Rothstein in her office in Odessa's new municipal building. The referral meeting will provide explanation of the program and the youth's rights.

Men accused of wildlife law violation

Two charged with killing eagles

By ED TODD
Staff Writer

Three Midlanders and an Odessa sportsman were indicted Tuesday by a Midland federal grand jury for violating federal wildlife laws.

Two are charged with hunting wildlife, including eagles, from a helicopter piloted by James Clyde Short Jr. of Midland; another is charged with arranging airborne hunts; and the fourth man is charged with doing taxidermy work on wildlife killed from an airborne craft.

Indicted were Short; Lee Milton Bell, a Midland County farmer; Karl Douglas Brosig, the taxidermist; and Larry Weldon Todd of Odessa.

Bell and Todd were released after each posted $25,000 bonds, and Brosig was set free after posting a $5,000 bond.

Each appeared before U.S. Magistrate Darrell F. Smith for the bond setting after they were arrested Tuesday afternoon by U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service agents. The federal investigation is being headed up by U.S. F&WS Agent Jim Stinebaugh of Fort Worth. Working with federal agents are employees of the Texas Parks and Wildlife Department.

Short, reportedly flying in Wyoming, has not been arrested but is "not running," according to a source. He is permitted to kill predators, including coyotes, while airborne.

The four men are charged with violating the Lacey Act in August 1981 by transporting, receiving, acquiring or selling wildlife killed in violation of the U.S. Airborne Hunting Act. That offense in punishable by a five-year prison term and the imposition of a $10,000 fine.

The indictments come less than a week after U.S. District Judge Lucius D. Bunton on July 20 sentenced Midlanders Steve Dudley Quain, 40, and Frankie Keller, 30, each to 179 days in federal confinement, fined them $6,000 and placed them on three five-year probated sentences.

They were convicted by a federal jury of violating U.S. Customs laws for shooting and killing three bears from an airborne helicopter piloted by Short in Mexico in June 1981.

In the lastest indictment, the federal government is alleging that Todd arranged for sportsmen to go airborne hunting from a helicopter flown by Short. In doing so, Todd paid Short a $9,000 check in November 1981 and a $15,000 check in December 1981, the government alleges.

Further, the government says Todd offered a hunting trip to Bruce Young for $2,500 to $3,000 in April 1982 and offered a similar trip to Brooks Harmon Jr. in October 1981 for several thousand dollars.

During the conspiracy, Brosig did taxidermy work on game animals killed by the hunters, the government says.

On Jan. 22, 1982, Bell and Short were charged with violating the law by allegedly being involved in the sale of wildlife — a mule deer, barbado sheep and a javelina — shot from an airborne craft. That violation is punishable by a five-year prison term and a fine of $20,000.

In addition, Bell and Short are charged with killing an eagle "without having a permit to do so" on Jan. 22 in violation of the Bald Eagle Protection Act. Such a deed is punishable by a one-year jail term and a $5,000 fine.

Todd is accused of perjury by lying to a federal grand jury on Nov. 30, 1982.

In that grand jury investigation, Todd denied — said it was "ridiculous" — that he had made any offer to take anyone airborne elk hunting in Texas.

"I have approached some people at times and asked if they would like to go coyote hunting with us, which I don't recall anybody ever wanting to go," Todd testified, according to the indictment.

He denied that he had ever arranged for airborne hunts of game animals, including deer or elk.

Further, Todd said he "might" have told Bruce Young that he had agreed with Short to go on a coyote-hunting venture by helicopter "but not for game animals."

"I didn't arrange any hunts (for game via airborne helicopter)," Todd told the grand jury. Perjury is punishable by a five-year prison term and a $10,000 fine.

Federal prosecutor Jose A. Toro of the U.S. Department of Justice on Tuesday said the government is "not getting selective" in indicting and prosecuting violators of the U.S. Airborne Hunting Act. "We are trying to prosecute anybody (suspect) we can."

Midland chapter of Young Democrats organized

Lauri Anderson

By LANA CUNNINGHAM
Staff Writer

They'll start with voter registration, concentrating on certain areas of the city. Then they'll add some organization and enticements for members. And it should add up to the winning numbers for Democrats in the 1984 elections.

This was the formula outlined by Lauri Anderson to a fledgling group of Democratic supporters in an organizational meeting Tuesday afternoon. President of the Young Democrats of Texas, Ms. Anderson spent her few hours in Midland getting the 12 persons melded into a group, with temporary officers selected. She then told the Midlanders what they will have to do this year.

Elected were Michael Higgins, president; Nancy Hart, vice president; JoAnne DeWitt, secretary-treasurer; and Sandy Torres, representative to the State Executive Committee. Dues were set at $5.

During the planning, Higgins said, "In the future we need more visibility for Democrats in Midland," and that elicited several chuckles. The reason is that Midland is a Republican oasis with few Democrats running for offices.

But this group hopes to change that. Higgins outlined ideas for voter registration, a rally and getting major speakers to Midland.

"You need to make a big pitch for voter registration," advised Ms. Anderson. "But you don't want to go out and just register anybody. You'll be cutting off your nose." Minority areas of the city and large apartment complexes were mentioned as places where Democrats hole up in Midland.

The Young Democrats is open to anyone between the ages of 14 and 35. Ms. Anderson, at 24, has been involved in the group since her freshman year in college. A goverment major, she now teaches social studies in Mexia.

Midland isn't the only city devoid of a Young Democrats group. And by the time the presidential election rolls around, Ms. Anderson hopes to see an organization in most counties. Nor does she think it impossible.

"It's such a viable outlet for people under the age of 35 to concentrate their efforts," she said of the organization.

"We're really trying to expand our membership this year. We're getting clubs in places we never had clubs, such as Montgomery County, Rusk, Smith and Alvin. There's been an increase in the number of phone calls I've gotten from people in the last two to three weeks. It looks like a great year for Young Democrats."

Part of the increase she attributed to the headway made by Democrats in 1982 and feels the movement is still going. Another reason is a mass of little things that all point to President Reagan and the Republican administration.

"A lot of people are coming in now and saying they're sick and tired of it. Reagan's administration's tendency to ignore us or dump on us has done it. If the economy is bad and you're poor, it hits worse," she said.

Women will play a larger role in the 1984 elections, but so will other special interest groups, such as minorities, teachers and poor people. "I do see more women becoming aware of the political process," she said, attributing part of that increase to the rise in the numbers of professional working women.

"Reagan gets in office and the ERA (Equal Right Amendment) is cut out," she added. "It's an obvious direct link to women getting involved."

In her second term as president, Ms. Anderson is trying to get the statewide group away from its past fighting to "real political effectiveness."

Four years ago Reagan was campaigning on the theme "The time is now." For Democrats this time, Ms. Anderson concluded, "The time is right."

Man shoots wife, kills himself

ODESSA — Ector County Justice of the Peace Jimmy Harris has ruled murder-suicide in the Tuesday night shooting deaths of an Odessa couple who had been divorced earlier in the day.

Police said 37-year-old Danny George Parkhurst of 6415 Opal walked into the Sherwood Lanes Bowling Lanes on east 45th Street about 9:20 p.m. and shot his ex-wife, Cynthia Hale Parkhurst, once in the face with a .380 caliber automatic pistol. She was a Realtor for an Odessa realty firm.

Parkhurst, an employee of the Sivalls oilfield tank manufacturing company in Odessa, then took his own life by shooting himself in the right temple. Police said the shootings occurred near the concession stand of the bowling alley and was witnessed by numerous patrons.

The couple's divorce was final Tuesday morning, according to police. Judge Harris pronounced them dead at the scene and their bodies were taken to the Hubbard-Kelly Funeral Home.

Sam Burnett Auxiliary gets recepits

The American Legion auxiliary unit mentioned in Tuesday's editions of The Reporter-Telegram as taking in $82,038.85 in bingo receipts for the April-May-June quarter was the American Legion's Sam Burnett Auxiliary Unit 574 at 101 N. Mineola St.

Midland's other American Legion, Woods W. Lynch Post and Unit 19 off Air Park Road, does not play bingo, according to Joni Porter, incoming Lynch auxiliary president.

Organizations playing bingo are required by law to report their revenue, expenses, cash prizes and net proceeds to Texas Comptroller Bob Bullock.

On Monday, the Midland County Commissioners' Court voted to levy a 2 percent tax on gross receipts from bingo games.

Odessa teen injured in wreck

An Odessa teenager was severely injured in a two-vehicle traffic accident near High Sky Girls Ranch Tuesday morning.

In "very critical condition" today at Midland Memorial Hospital, according to a hospital spokeswoman, was 14-year-old Victor McKane.

He suffered massive head injuries when he was thrown from a GMC flatbed truck that collided with a car at the intersection of Texas Highway 158 and County Road 60 West about 9:30 a.m. Tuesday.

According to the Department of Public Safety, the youth was a passenger in the truck, which was driven by 43-year-old Gordon McKane, also of Odessa. He was released following emergency treatment for head lacerations.

The driver of the car, a 1980 Mercedes, was identified as 49-year-old Wanda Hearon of Andrews. She was released following treatment for bruises and lacerations.

The DPS said McKane was eastbound on CR-60 and Hearon was eastbound on 158 when the accident occurred. The truck skidded broadside and rolled over 2½ times, throwing the youth from the vehicle.

Paraplegic monitors emergencies

ATHENS (AP) — Ask any Frankston firefighter.

William "Bill" Morgan may be paralyzed below the chest, but he stands tall in the eyes of all who know him.

Morgan is the volunteer "nerve center" of Frankston fire and police communications, a one-man, 24-hours-a-day, 7-days-a-week dispatcher for official radio and telephone communications.

"He belongs to us but people in three counties try to claim him," stated Frankston Fire Chief Clem Cecil Jr. "We needed a central dispatcher in the late 70s and were having coordinations problems at major fires."

Cecil said Morgan was down at a local garage having his truck fixed when he started talking to the owner, who was a firefighter. Morgan wanted to be the volunteer dispatcher and the department wanted him.

"The rest is history," Cecil said.

Morgan is a humble man dedicated to his job.

"This is a job that has to be done. That's all," he said. "I am lucky to be the person the firefighters and police wanted to do the work. I do not see why I should have praise."

This attitude is typical of Morgan's approach to life. He has a polite way of dealing withh people, a calmness of purpose and manner, perhaps the most important characteristic for a good dispatcher, Henderson County Chief Deputy Maurienne Pagit wrote in an article on dispatchers.

Morgan lives atop a 600-foot hill. Four years ago he constructed a 180-foot tower, giving him a reach of 780 feet in the air for several frequencies, both low and high band. He rents the tower to private companies, but his greatest love is volunteer work.

Morgan dispatches for four fire departments in Frankston, Berryville, Poynor and Coffee City. He monitors 11 trucks and more than 50 firefighters.

Morgan also has individual pagers for the majority of these 50 men and is responsible for alerting them when a fire occurs.

"I always alert at least two fire departments when a fire occurs," he said. "We never know how many volunteers will be able to respond to fires, especially during working hours, so this procedure helps insure good response to a major emergency."

William Morgan sits at the two-way communications center in Frankston where he volunteers as a one-man, 24-hour-a-day dispatching service for fire and police departments in a three-county area of East Texas. Morgan has been paralyzed from the chest down since an car accident in 1968.

Morgan, 54, hails from LeCompte, La., and is a Frenchman at heart.

He graduated from high school in the early 1940s and drove trucks for over 20 years, based in Houston and California at different times.

In March 1968, he was driving near Muskogee, Okla., when he rounded a curve and found a car headed directly toward him. He chose to run off the road rather than collide with the car, and the accident cost him the use of his legs.

He spent several months in an Oklahoma City hospital and a year and a half in the Texas Rehabiliation Center in Houston.

In 1970 he moved to Frankston with his wife and built a home.

Local firefighters have pitched in to help Morgan with his duties, purchasing for him a programmable scanner and other equipment.

"Bill is a dedicated man," Cecil said. "It is almost impossible to drag him away from his job."

Two brothers indicted for robbing local bank

Two brothers charged with robbing the Midland American Bank of $18,000 on June 29, a 59-year-old Midlander accused of threatening Internal Revenue Service agents and beating up an IRS inspector, and an Odessa carpenter suspected of holding up two savings associations were indicted Tuesday by a federal grand jury in Midland.

Indicted for the robbery of the Midland American Bank are Randy George Pridemore, 31, of Andrews and Ralph Harold Pridemore, 34, of 2413 Emerson Court, Midland. Both are free under $25,000 bonds.

The younger brother was arrested by police on the bank's parking lot after his motorcycle spilled on gravel as he was fleeing the bank. The other brother was arrested in the bank, though he protested that the armed robbery was just a "joke" on the bank's president.

If convicted, each could be sentenced up to 20 years in prison and fined $5,000 for the robbery and sentenced up to five years and fined $10,000 for planning the heist.

Retired Midland electrician James E. "Jim" Winter, indicted for threatening IRS agents via telephone calls on July 12 and 13 and assaulting an IRS inspector at his (Winter's) home at 4104 Harlowe Drive on July 14, was released from Midland City Jail late Tuesday afternoon after he posted $25,000 in bonds set by U.S. Magistrate Darrell F. Smith.

The threat by intimidation carries a penalty of one year in prison and a $3,000 fine. Assault on a federal officer is punishable by a three-year prison term and a $5,000 fine. Winter is to be arraigned before U.S. District Judge Lucius D. Bunton.

A 28-year-old Odessa man charged with possession of the stimulants methamphetamine on May 13 and amphetamine on May 17 in Odessa was indicted for those offenses. He is being held in the Midland City Jail in lieu of posting $200,000 in bail.

The man, Bryce Aldon Frazier who also is known as Bryan Allen Frazier, if convicted could be sentenced up to five years in prison and fined $15,000.

Frazier is suspected of dressing in woman's clothing and makeup and robbing the Odessa Savings Association of $10,685 on Dec. 9. Federal Bureau of Investigation special agents say witnesses spotted a 6-foot man wearing "heavy facial makeup," a shoulder-length black wig, peach-colored pants, a tan ladies' coat and cheap sunglasses in the savings building. He was carrying a grocery sack and drove off in a stolen Volkswagen.

Frazier is suspected of robbing the First Federal Savings Association of Midland of $1,940 on March 4. Witnesses say the robber was wearing a cowboy hat, blue jacket, a shoulder-length black wig and a rubber Halloween mask at time of the holdup. He had a "peculiar rolling gait" in his walk, the FBI quoted witnesses.

Each drug offense could net Frazier a five-year prison sentence and a $15,000 fine.

Richard Lee Atkins, 25, of Garland was indicted for conspiring to manufacture and for producing 12 ounces of the stimulant amphetamine from March 30 to April 12.

Atkins, who is in jail in Oklahoma City in lieu of posting a $100,000 bail-bond, could be sentenced up to five years and fined $15,000 should he be convicted on each count of the indictment.

Teens to be punished by other teen-agers

"The parent and child must agree to go through this court. If they don't, then the youngster will be referred back to the appropriate court and processed as usual.

"The big difference is when the youngster is diverted to the Teen Court, his record will be wiped clean at the end of the sentence.

"The cooperation has been great. Without the referrals and cooperation from the schools, the program would go down the tubes," Mrs. Rothstein added.

Retired Crane Judge Ken G. Spencer has volunteered to reside over the Teen Court which will be entirely manned by teens acting as the jury, baliff, court clerk and defending and prosecuting attorneys. Although the teen jury will not decide guilt or innocence, it will pass sentence.

"The punishment will fit the crime," Mrs. Rothstein said. "Rarely, will monetary restitution be required. For example, a child who has vandalized someone would be sentenced to do X-amount of hours of work for that victim.

"At the end of the sentence, the youngster will be required to serve twice on the teen jury.

"Before a teen-ager sits on the jury, he must go through orientation," she added. "This process — of going before a court of his peers and then sit on the jury — not only makes the youngster accountable for what he did, but also provides restitution and teaches the teen-ager about the judicial system."

Mrs. Rothstein said children under 15, "in general, will not serve on the jury. I don't think a 10- or 11-year-old, although they are mature nowadays, can make those kind of decisions, and the older kids would probably walk all over them."

The court session, plannned once every two weeks from 5:30 to 8:30 p.m. in Odessa's new municipal building, may be increased, Mrs. Rothstein said.

"I ran a random tally of traffic offenses. The average was six to seven a day. Now, how many of these we'll get, will depend on the referrals. I'm predicting that the Teen Court will eventually meet once a week."

The court will include two jury panels with six jurors each. While one jury is hearing a case the other will retire to the judge's chambers to determine sentencing.

Because research has indicated a reduced recividism rate and the court will meet in the evening, the program should be cost effective, Mrs. Rothstein said.

"Overall, the youngster needs more help than counseling — from the system and his parents. He needs more than a slap on the wrist and a fine. He needs the positive reinforcement that this type of court will provide.

"I'm hoping youngsters coming before this court will be accountable, make their restitution and then be involved in the justice system — maybe, we can hook them on the opposite side of the coin."

Judge spares Fort Worth man

TOROTLA, British Virgin Islands (AP) — A Fort Worth man was spared from a date with the hangman when an appeals court reduced his murder conviction to manslaughter.

Thomas Henry Ball, 31, had been sentenced to hanging after being convicted Oct. 13, 1982 of killing Justin Williams, a boat worker, on this small island just east of St. Thomas.

But the West Indies Associated States Court of Appeals reduced the charge to manslaughter and sentenced Ball to five years in prison Monday.

Williams died Aug. 12, 1982, in waters just off Nanny Cay Marine Center, a few miles from Road Town, capital of the British Virgin Islands.

In its ruling, the three-judge appeals court said the trial judge failed to direct the jury on the use of provocation for a defense.

The maximum sentence for manslaughter is 10 years.

During his trial, Ball made an unsworn statement that he and a date were walking toward a restaurant near a dock when a man grabbed the woman, then grabbed at Ball. The two men "tussled" and fell into the water, Ball said.

New YMCA to be built

The $50,000 for the fire station at Baird and New Jersey streets will go to enlarge a bedroom area, add a bathroom and do some drainage and paving work. The station was built in 1951 and still has the original heating system.

The $40,000 for the Senior Citizens Center will be used to buy land separating the center from the parking lot. The owner has indicated she wants to sell her property, the council was told.

The $100,000 for housing rehabilitation will continue the program started two years ago. To date, almost $1 million has been received for upgrading homes of elderly and/or handicapped persons.

The Dorsey and Walton Streets paving is necessary if the city is awarded a federal loan to construct a housing complex for elderly persons, according to Susan Howell, CD coordinator.

Under the street paving category, Ms. Howell said she would check on some streets mentioned that morning. The two streets — South Loraine and Collins — had been included in an assessment paving program where the property owners would pay a part of the cost. But some of the landowners objected, with one saying, "We're mostly old people and are not able to pay for it."

Ms. Howell said both streets fall into the CD target area, which means they can be paved with federal money.

Consumers want less caffeine

The Los Angeles Times—
Washington Post News Service

When actor Geoffrey Holder sat regally in his wicker chair and confidently told America that Seven-Up was the choice because it has no artificial colors, flavors or caffeine, America bought it.

Since nothing succeeds like success, Seven-Up's profitable product has taught its competition a lesson. Competitors, too, rushed into the market with their own caffeine-free soft drinks. Although most soft drinks still contain the artificial ingredients that Seven-Up scoffs at, the supermarket shelf space devoted to caffeine-free soft drinks has grown considerably.

Coca-Cola alone recently has introduced three new caffeine-free brands to accompany its regular Coke, Diet Coke and Tab. In addition to its standard Pepsi, Diet Pepsi and Pepsi Light, PepsiCo also manufactures two versions of Pepsi Free — decaffeinated variations of Pepsi and Diet Pepsi.

COCA-COLA WAS THE last of the major soft drink companies to introduce caffeine-free colas, but, Coke spokesman Robert Martin said, "Our philosophy ... is that we never have to be first, but we must always be right. When it became clear that the consumer wanted a choice, we wanted to be there."

Research at Seven-Up revealed similar sentiments among consumers, even before the caffeine-free craze. "The one thing that we have noticed time and time again is the concern about caffeine," Terry Moore, a spokesman for Seven-Up, said. "People were thinking that all soft drinks had caffeine, but we never had it."

After the new ads emphasized that Seven-Up is caffeine-free, the company became, according to Moore, " the only significant share gainer in the soft drink industry last year." Sales for diet and regular Seven-Up increased an average of 10 percent last year, when its caffeine-free campaign began, according to Emanuel Goldman, an industry researcher. "The caffeine-awareness campaign Seven-Up introduced really has had a significant effect on the industry," Goldman said. "It has forced Coke and Pepsi to come up with caffeine-free colas."

Martin Friedman, editor of the New Products News, said the recent deluge of caffeine-free colas is part of the country's new interest in "nutritionally emphasized foods. Consumers are more concerned with what goes into their bodies."

DESPITE INCREASED CONSUMER awareness, confusion still exists as to the properties and effects of caffeine. In pure form, caffeine is a methylxanthine, a white, bitter-tasting crystal that appears naturally in 63 species of plants including tea leaves, coffee beans and the kola nut.

Although caffeine appears in colas naturally in very small amounts, most of it is added by the cola companies, Moore said. Kirk Johnson at the Center for Science in the Public Interest said soda companies claim it is added because the bitterness of the caffeine counteracts the sweetness of the syrup. But another spokesman from the same office said, "I think there's good reason to believe that caffeine is put into soda pop because it does give you a zip." Because of recent concern over the physical effects of caffeine, soda companies have found it necessary to offer consumers a caffeine-free alternative.

All the evidence against caffeine isn't in yet, and sometimes there are conflicting opinions. According to Bambi Batts Young, also of the Center for Science in the Public Interest, caffeine figures in several health-related concerns. Among these, she said, are breast disease in women and possible adverse effects on unborn children, brain development in children, coordination, behavior and the heart.

TESTS CONDUCTED BY the Food and Drug Administration have shown that female rats exposed to high levels of caffeine produce offspring with low birth weights and, often, missing toes. But there is no evidence that caffeine can produce such defects in humans. Caffeine is suspected of causing benign breast lumps in women, but there is no precise evidence for this. (Malignant breast lumps have not been linked to caffeine.) There also is no evidence that caffeine causes cancer of the pancreas or increased risk of heart attack.

The effects of caffeine on the brain development of children, avid soft drink consumers, also are being investigated. The Federation of American Society for Experimental Biology published a report on caffeine in 1978 that showed that children who consumed too much caffeine became fidgety, nervous and irritable, Young said. It has also been shown that withdrawal from habitual consumption of caffeine equivalent to five cups of coffee or more daily can result in several days of symptoms that may include headache, irritability, lassitude and sometimes nausea.

"The worry is that it could literally interfere with brain development," Young said. "The concern is, do you really give a psychoactive drug to your children? What happens when you give large doses to children over a long period of time? No one knows."

BY FDA REGULATION, a soft drink must contain caffeine to be called a cola because colas naturally contain a small amount of caffeine. But the public's apprehension about caffeine influenced the Food and Drug Administration to consider taking action.

AT WIT'S END

Hubby always culinary pacifist

By ERMA BOMBECK

I don't know how to explain the fact that all my friends married men who cook while I got stuck with a man who thinks that a "marinade" is a place to park your boat.

My mother said I reached the age of 34 and panicked.

I do know that if you marry a culinary pacifist, he will not be born again, no matter how hard you try. You can lead a man to the stove, but you can't make him cook!

My friends said men need praise for everything they do. I tried that. One night I whispered to him, "Why don't you go to the kitchen and get something for our guests to munch on before dinner?"

He returned five minutes later, set a jar of olives in the middle of the coffee table and said, "Where do you hide the plates?"

"Sweetheart," I said, "it's my fault. I concealed them behind the big doors called cupboards to keep them away from the children, but this is wonderful. You see, you can cook if you just wanted to." He sensed my insincerity.

Others said men love to dress up in costumes when they cook. They like the funny little barbecue aprons that say "GENIUS AT WORK" and the little tools that fit in the pockets and the pack of dogs that follow them around all night. We tried outdoor cooking once. The steaks were done an hour and 15 minutes before the potatoes. The salad was the last course, and for a week we had charcoal breath and were afraid to breathe near an open flame.

Next month, we will celebrate 34 years of marriage. That means I have served up 37,128 meals – make that 37,125. For one full day in February of 1951, I was confined to my bed with a cold.

It was the best of times and the worst of times. As I clutched my bedsprings I could only imagine what was happening in the kitchen. It was like attending a war via radio. Mixers stopped too suddenly. Dogs let out human-like screams. Children fought and bodies dropped. Metal clashed. Strange odors permeated the air. Cries were muffled. Doors slammed.

Finally, the meal appeared. A hamburger four inches thick and two inches in circumference. Potatoes slashed to ribbons and a mound of apple sauce. There was a cup of tea that had been hemlock in a former life.

"I only dirtied one paring knife," he said proudly.

I was to always wonder if I had waited until I was 35, I might have met James Beard.

FOOD

Barbecued turkey parts are a tasty change of pace for summertime meals.

Eaters will gobble barbecued turkey

If you've never tasted turkey on the grill, you're in for a flavorful surprise.

The Turkey En Brochette is a quick way to enjoy crunchy vegetables on a skewer with tender white meat marinated in lemon juice spiced with catsup and bay leaves.

GRILLED TURKEY EN BROCHETTE

4 turkey tenderloin steaks (about 1 pound)
⅓ cup chili sauce
2 tablespoons lemon juice
1 tablespoon sugar
2 bay leaves
8 medium cherry tomatoes
8 medium mushrooms
1 large, seeded green pepper, cut into eighths
2 small peeled, quartered onions
1 medium zucchini, cut into ½-inch slices
2 tablespoons vegetable oil

Cut turkey steaks into 2-inch cubes and place in bowl. Combine chili sauce, lemon juice, sugar and bay leaves and pour over turkey cubes. Refrigerate at least 4 hours or overnight. Stir to coat several times during marinating.

Thread turkey on skewers, alternating with tomatoes, mushrooms, green pepper, onion and zucchini. Brush lightly with oil Grill over hot coals 6 inches from heat source, turning occasionally, about 10-15 minutes. Brush with reserved marinade while turning. Makes 4 servings.

Barbecue sauce tangy

Select 3 pounds turkey wings, wing drummettes, drumsticks, thighs and other pieces and wrap parts in heavy duty aluminum foil, dull side out. Place on grill 6 to 8 inches from coals, turning occasionally, for 1 hour. Remove foil, brush with barbecue sauce until meat is tender, about 30 to 40 minutes.

Makes 6 servings.

TANGY TURKEY BARBECUE SAUCE

2 tablespoons margarine
1 medium onion, minced
¾ cup catsup
3 tablespoons brown sugar
2 tablespoons prepared mustard
1 tablespoon Worcestershire sauce
1 teaspoon salt

Combine all ingredients. Simmer 15 minutes. Brush on turkey parts as described above. Makes 1¼ cups.

Turkey great grilled

TURKEY DRUMSTICKS ON THE GRILL

The soy sauce, sherry and garlic in this barbecue grill delight are reminiscent of Oriental cooking. Serve with rice salad and crisply cooked broccoli.

4 turkey drumsticks (about 4 pounds)
¼ cup butter
⅓ cup vegetable oil
⅓ cup sherry
⅓ cup soy sauce
1 clove garlic
¼ cup chopped chives
¼ cup chopped parsley
½ teaspoon salt
¼ teaspoon pepper

Melt butter and add remaining ingredients. Pour marinade over turkey drumsticks and place in refrigerator. Marinate for at least 8 hours, turning several times. When ready to grill, divide marinade into 4 equal portions, about ¼ cup each. Wrap each drumstick and ¼ cup marinade in heavy duty aluminum foil, dull side out. Place on charcoal grill 6 to 8 inches from hot coals and grill, turning occasionally for 1 hour. Remove foil and continue cooking and turning for an additional 30 to 40 minutes. Makes 8 servings.

Try Herb Glaze for Grilled Turkey to add a fresh garden taste to your barbecued bird.

HERB GLAZE FOR GRILLED TURKEY

½ cup vegetable oil
¼ cup light corn syrup
¼ cup finely chopped onion
1 tablespoon lemon juice
½ teaspoon dried oregano, crushed
½ teaspoon dried basil, crushed
1 teaspoon caraway seed
salt to taste

Combine all ingredients. Brush on turkey parts until meat is tender, about 30-40 minutes.

New twist on turkey

Turkey is excellent for hot or cold lunches and snacks. Turkey Nuggets are great finger food for kids at the beach or concert-going grown-ups.

Store the cooled, cooked nuggets in a wide-mouth thermos for a cold treat, or reheat them in foil fora hot snack.

TURKEY NUGGETS

1 pound boneless turkey breast
3 tablespoons parmesan cheese
3 tablespoons finely grated cheddar cheese
¾ cup fine dry bread crumbs
½ teaspoon thyme
½ teaspoon basil
¼ teaspoon salt
freshly ground black pepper, to taste
¼ cup butter or margarine

Cut turkey into 1-inch cubes. In a bowl, mix parmesan cheese, cheddar cheese, breadcrumbs, thyme, basil, salt, and pepper. Melt butter. Dip turkey pieces in butter, then roll in dry crumb mixture to coat completely. Arrange in a foil-lined baking sheet sprayed with non-stick coating. Bake at 400 degrees for 10 to 12 minutes. Serve hot or cold.

Gourmet cooks: A new breed

By CECILY BROWNSTONE
AP Food Editor

They were both under 30, a couple of years ago, when they opened their fairyland of a gourmet take-out and catering shop. Now their business is going well. A year ago they got married. He is Paul Neuman. She keeps her maiden name: Stacy Bogdonoff. The sign on their shop, on New York City's uptown East Side, reads "Neuman & Bogdonoff."

They have a good staff but they themselves do everything: invent recipes; cook; book-keep; attend to their catering; choose merchandise to sell — from the finest brands of olive oil to preserves and cheeses. They're no slouches when it comes to work. "Too many hours, too many days," they say. But they take off some weekends to go to the country or the shore. Both smiled as they told me "We're besiegd with invitations, because our hosts know we'll arrive loaded with food."

They designed the interior of their shop with invention and care. Wonder of wonders are the huge custom-made bins, clad in stainless steel, whose tops hold deep layers of chipped ice in which to sink some of their bowls of take-out food. Marvelously robust Caponata (the recipe follows). Delicious Curry Chicken Salad. An exotic cold Seafood Combination. Good Chili (to heat up). Paul and Stacy are part of America's new breed of young cooks who have both imagination and good taste.

Paul comes from a "food" background. Several generations ago his family started the first retail seafood store in New York City and it's still going strong. As a youngster, Paul tagged along in the early early morning to wholesale markets with his father. "I didn't want to go, but my father was so busy it was one way of getting to know him."

What advice do Paul and Stacy have to give to other young people who want to start their own gourmet take-out shops?

"Start small. Keep your attention on the quality of the food. Limit your focus — become known for specialties. Establish and keep your identity. Be prepared for trial and error.

"On the whole we sell the foods we like, the dishes we find people really enjoy."

PAUL AND STACY'S CAPONATA

1 small (¾-lb.) eggplant, quartered but unpeeled
1 tsp. salt
2 tblsp. brown sugar
¼ cup red wine vinegar
⅛ cup tomato paste
1 tsp. finely chopped fresh or dried basil
⅛ cup pitted Greek-style black olives
2 tblsp. capers, with their juice
Olive oil
1-3rd cup diced (½-inch) onion
1-3rd cup diced (½-inch) celery
1-3rd cup diced (½-inch) green pepper
1-3rd cup diced (½-inch) red pepper

Cut eggplant quarters crosswise into ½-inch slices. Sprinkle with salt; drain in a colander for 1 hour.

In a 1-quart saucepan, over very low heat, stir together sugar and vinegar until sugar dissolves. Stir in tomato paste, basil, olives and capers and, stirring occasionally, continue heating the thick mixture for about 20 minutes; reserve.

In a 12-inch skillet, in 1-3rd cup oil, fry a single layer of eggplant slices until very brown on both sides. Drain on paper towels. Repeat with remaining eggplant, adding more oil if necessary.

In the same skillet, in 2 tablespoons oil, over low heat, cook onion, celery and pepper until tender — about 15 minutes. Off heat, stir in reserved tomato mixture; Add eggplant and toss gently. Chill.

Makes 2½ cups.

Soft-cover original cookbooks can be thrifty

By CECILY BROWNSTONE
Associated Press Food Editor

Nowadays not all good softcover cookbooks are reprints of hardcover editions. An increasing number of them are "originals" — appearing for the first time in soft cover. Although they are paperbacks, they have glossy covers and some color illustrations. Here are descriptions of five of these; a sixth, "Great Peasant Dishes" by Howard Hillman, appeared simultaneously in hardcover and softcover.

"Indian Cooking" by Madhur Jaffrey (Barrons) was first published to accompany her BBC television series. Born in Delhi, the author's permanent home is in New York City, and she is well known for two former cookbooks. "Indian Cookery" has good thick paper and is illustrated in both color and black and white.

A short chapter is devoted to "Menu Guides and How to Eat Indian Food." Another brief chapter discusses equipment that makes the cooking of Indian food simpler than it once was. Although, as Madhur Jaffrey writes, the "good knives, sturdy pots with a good distribution of heat, rolling pins, grater, bowls, slotted spoons, pestle and mortar and frying pans" of the well-equipped kitchen are the basic requirements.

The spices, seasonings and flavorings used in her recipes are also discussed. She says: "Many of the spices used in Indian foods can now be found in supermarkets. Others can be searched out in specialty stores and Indian or Pakistani groceries in major cities and small towns or by mail." Best of all, the Jaffrey recipes are excellent and about a dozen major Indian cooking techniques are explained.

"On location" research is responsible for "Great Peasant Dishes" by Howard Hillman (Houghton Mifflin). In talking and eating with housewives and cooks during his travels in 52 different countries, Hillman learned authentic versions of traditional recipes. Because these dishes were in many cases prepared as part of a daily routine, they may differ from other versions you may have come upon. All the recipes in the book fall into the budget category.

Californian Rhoda Yee returned to China, her homeland, to research her latest book, "Szechwan and Northern Cooking" (Taylor & Ng). Hence the feeling of authenticity in this informal book of recipes from this spicy regional Chinese cuisine. Cooks unfamiliar with Chinese ingredients will find the illustrated glossary particularly helpful; difficult or unusual techniques are illustrated with "how-to" photographs.

"Carry-Out Cuisine" by Phyllis Meras (Houghton Mifflin) is an unusual cookbook. The last few years have found "gourmet" takeout shops springing up coast-to-coast; here is a collection of recipes of the foods about 60 of these shops sell, including some of their delicious adaptations of well-known favorites.

"Pickles and Relishes" by Andrea Chesman (Garden Way) is both an informative and informal book. The author's friends and colleagues taste-tested her own pickles and relishes over a one-year period and contributed their own cherished recipes. Ingredients, equipment, fresh pack and brining methods, altitude adjustments and weights and measures are all treated in this attractive book.

"The Inn Cook Book" by Igor and Marjorie Kropotkin (Little Brown) may persuade readers to say "Goodby motels, hello inns." The Kropotkins sampled about 50 of New England's more than 500 inns and give useful descriptions of those they visited. Scores of recipes — from appetizers to desserts — contributed by the 50 inns and reworked for practical household use make a pleasantly eclectic collection. There are recipes for such New England dishes as scrapple that includes buckwheat flour, Vermont-style Fish Soup and Chocolate-Chip Pie; there are also recipes for Viennese Sachertorte, Spanish Paella and Italian Insalata di Fontina. In other words, what helps make the inns and this cookbook interesting is diversity.

Ground beef quick, thrifty

Copley News Service

Unless you're a vegetarian or a millionaire, you probably resort to serving ground beef at least a couple of times a month.

Ground beef is an economical and flexible mainstay in most of our kitchens, and combined with the ease of microwave cooking, makes quick meals even quicker. There's never a need to tenderize ground beef, and it can be used in a variety of ways that will stretch your food budget deliciously.

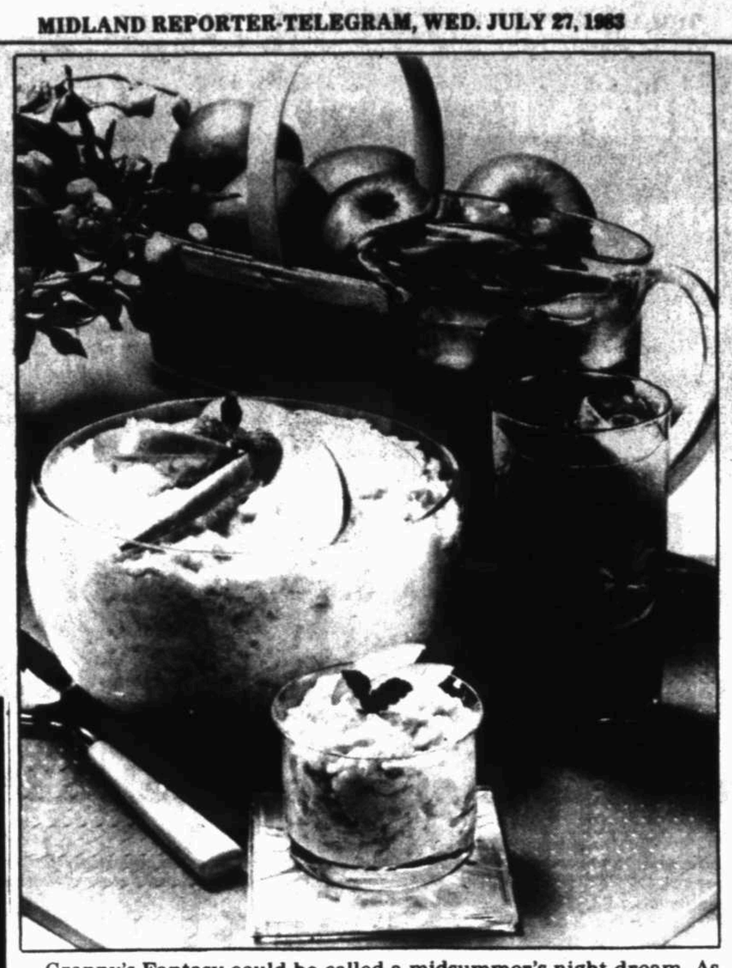
To thaw frozen ground beef, microwave on defrost setting and remove outer portions as they soften to prevent cooking. This also allows the inner part of the meat to thaw more rapidly. Meat should always be completely thawed before cooking.

If you're using lean ground beef there's no need to drain, but if there is excess fat to discard from regular ground beef, remember to add seasonings after draining the meat. This way you won't drain off your spices.

To prepare chunks of ground beef for a recipe, crumble meat into a shallow baking dish and microwave about 5 minutes on high setting, stirring several times to cook evenly. Cover with a paper towel to prevent splattering. Then break up meat with the back of a spoon into smaller chunks of desired size.

Always add salt after the meat is cooked — adding it before tends to toughen meat. Also, salt sprinkled on the surface can distort the microwave pattern for an uneven distribution of microwaves (it's fine mixed into liquids, however).

Because microwave ovens do not brown, you may want to coat ground beef patties with a brown gravy mix for color, or you may cook them on a browning plate. If you choose the latter method, use only the browning plate specifically made for your oven and follow directions for its use. One patty takes about 1 to 2 minutes.



Granny's Fantasy could be called a midsummer's night dream. As ethereal as it might taste, however, this luscious dessert is easily prepared from down-to-earth ingredients.

Apple mousse tasty dessert

What do you look for in a summertime dessert? If you're like most homemakers, the answer is convenience with that fresh-picked, fruity flavor.

GRANNY'S FANTASY

2 envelopes unflavored gelatin
1 cup orange juice, divided
4 Granny Smith apples, cored, peeled and shredded
¾ cup cream of coconut
2 tablespoons lemon juice
1 cup heavy cream

In small saucepan mix gelatin with ½ cup orange juice; let stand 1 minute. Stir over low heat until gelatin dissolves. Remove from heat. In large bowl combine apples, cream of coconut, remaining ½ cup orange juice and lemon juice. Stir in gelatin mixture. Chill until mixture mounds slightly when dropped from a spoon. Fold in whipped cream. Spoon into a 1½ quart serving bowl. Chill until set. Makes 8 to 10 servings.

Apple dessert crunchy treat

APPLE CRUNCH

1 cup quick oats, uncooked
½ cup sunflower seeds
¼ cup all purpose flour
¼ cup brown sugar
½ teaspoon ground cinnamon
¼ teaspoon ground mace
¼ teaspoon salt
6 tablespoons butter or margarine
4 Granny Smith apples, cored, thinly sliced, divided
¼ cup chopped dates, divided
1½ cups orange juice

In medium bowl combine oats, sunflower seeds, flour, brown sugar, cinnamon, mace and salt; mix well. With a pastry blender, cut in butter until mixture is crumbly. In a 9x9 inch baking dish arrange half the apple slices; sprinkle with half the chopped dates. Sprinkle with half the oat mixture. Layer remaining apples, dates and oat mixture. Pour orange juice over all. Bake, uncovered, in a 375 degree oven 35-45 minutes.

Grape season here again

By The Associated Press

California table grapes have been appearing in markets across America over the past weeks amid predictions that this will be a banner harvest year.

West Coast growers actually supply grapes to American tables through February, but summer is the peak season. There are 13 major varieties — from pale green Thompsons to lustrous red Cardinals and regal black Ribiers.

The grape has origins that go back into ancient history. In fact, ancient Egyptian mosaics describe grape growing around 2440 B.C.

Grapes were a prized delicacy in ancient Greece. And when the Vikings landed in North America, they found an abundance of grapes growing wild. They were so impressed by the huge vines that they christened the territory "Vinland."

European varieties of grape were tried out on America's eastern coast by English settlers, but they soon fell prey to the harsh climate and various diseases. But in the West, European vines flourished and the Spanish Mission fathers helped things along by introducing the fruit throughout California.

1 package (3 ounces) lemon-flavored gelatin
Water
3 tablespoons lemon juice
¼ teaspoon salt
1 cup halved seedless green grapes
¼ cup each of chopped green pepper, sliced celery, shredded carrots and chopped walnuts
Grape clusters
Carrot curls

Dissolve gelatin in 1 cup boiling water; stir in ¾ cup cold water, lemon juice and salt. Chill until partially set. Stir in remaining ingredients, except grape clusters and carrot curls. Pour into 3-cup mold; chill until set. Unmold salad onto platter. Garnish with grape clusters and carrot curls. Makes four servings.

Buckwheat not wheat or grain

By SHIRLEY BRIGHT BOODY
Registered Dietitian
Copley News Service

DEAR SHIRLEY: I am allergic to wheat and I can't take anything containing wheat flour.

A friend told me that I should try buckwheat flour instead, because she says it doesn't contain wheat. Is that true? I always thought buckwheat was a certain kind of wheat, and I am afraid to try it.

What do you think? Can you give me some information about it? — Mrs. R.G.

DEAR MRS. R.G.: Yes. You may be able to take buckwheat, because it is not a grain and is not a special kind of wheat. It is a genus of an herbaceous plant distantly related to rhubarb. Buckwheat, in spite of its name is really a plant that is raised for its edible seeds.

However, you should be careful when buying buckwheat flour because it is very often mixed with wheat flour or other grain flours for use in breads and pancakes.

DEAR SHIRLEY: I have a bad kidney problem and my doctor has put me on a very low protein diet. I am supposed to eat more carbohydrate foods, but I don't know why and I sure don't want to gain any weight.

Do you think I will gain on a diet like that? Don't people need more protein? I know that most doctors don't know much about diets, so do you think that is the right kind for me? — M.P.

DEAR M.P.: The reason that people with kidney disease are put on low protein diets is that the end products of protein metabolism are excreted through the kidneys and therefore may place an additional strain on them. Urea, uric acid, creatinine, sulphates and organic acids are normally gotten rid of through the urine.

Carbohydrate foods, in contrast, are broken down into carbon dioxide and water and can be excreted through the lungs, perspiration and intestinal waste. without creating excessive strain on diseased kidneys.

The end products of dietary fats are also excreted in much the same way as carbohydrate foods. The calories are exactly the same for protein and carbohydrate — four calories per gram. You are not apt to gain weight on a higher carbohydrate diet, that is, more fruits, vegetables, breads and cereals unless you add a lot of fat to it. Fats are the real culprits in gaining weight because they give more than twice the number of calories — nine per gram.

Your doctor has given you good advice, and I hope you will follow it.

DEAR SHIRLEY: I had a baby girl three months ago and I am nursing her. I live in Massachusetts and sometimes I wonder if we get enough sunshine and vitamin D.

I am a little worried about her getting that childhood disease called rickets. Is there enough vitamin D in breast milk to prevent that? That is all she gets.

Do you have any suggestions that I can use to prevent rickets? I have always been afraid of that disease because when I was a child, our neighbor's baby got it. Thanks for any help you can give me. — Mrs. A.D.

DEAR MRS. A.D.: Breast milk alone is not adequate in vitamin D. Breast-fed infants not exposed to sunlight can certainly become difficient in vitamin D. Even half an hour of sunlight can produce enough vitamin D to be protective.

DEAR ABBY

Nickname in ear of hearer

By ABIGAIL VAN BUREN

DEAR ABBY: You touched a nerve with that letter from "Barbara," who hated to be called "Barb," "Barbie," "Babs" or anything but Barbara. I'm sure she was speaking for all the Victorias, Catherines, Suzannes and Patricias who are called "Vicki," "Cathy," "Suzie" and "Patty" by people they hardly know.

Americans are the worst offenders. At first meeting, Robert becomes "Bob," William is "Bill," and Richard becomes "Rich" or, worse yet, "Dick"!

However, there is a sure cure for such rudeness. The offender should be stopped cold with a direct and simple, "My name is Barbara, Catherine, Robert or William," or whatever the person's name is. If the offender "forgets," a second reminder, or even a third, is in order.

By the way, I prefer Abigail to Abby, and please don't tell me that which we call a rose by any other name would smell as sweet. I am no rose. — CALL ME DOROTHY (NOT DOTTY OR DOT)

DEAR DOROTHY: Offensiveness lies in the ear of the hearer. Many appreciate a friendly nickname, providing it's not a put-down such as "Fatso," "Skinny," "Motor Mouth," "Schnoz" or "Busty."

DEAR ABBY: I'm a newlywed with my own home. I told my mother that I always put out pretty little guest towels for guests to use, but nobody ever used them, and she said you ran a cute poem in your column about that problem a few years ago.

If you run it again, I'll cut it out, frame it and hang it in my powder room. Thanks. — SHIRLEY

DEAR SHIRLEY: It was written over 30 years ago by Mabel Craddock of Ventura, Calif., who said she had grown weary of having her guests dry their hands on toilet paper, bath mats and even curtains, leaving her guest towels untouched. She framed it and hung it over her guest towels.

A Guest Towel Speaks
Please use me, Guest;
Don't hesitate.
Don't turn your back
Or vacillate.
Don't dry your hands
On petticoat,
On handkerchief,
Or redingote.
I'm here to use;
I'm made for drying.
Just hanging here
Gets very tiring.

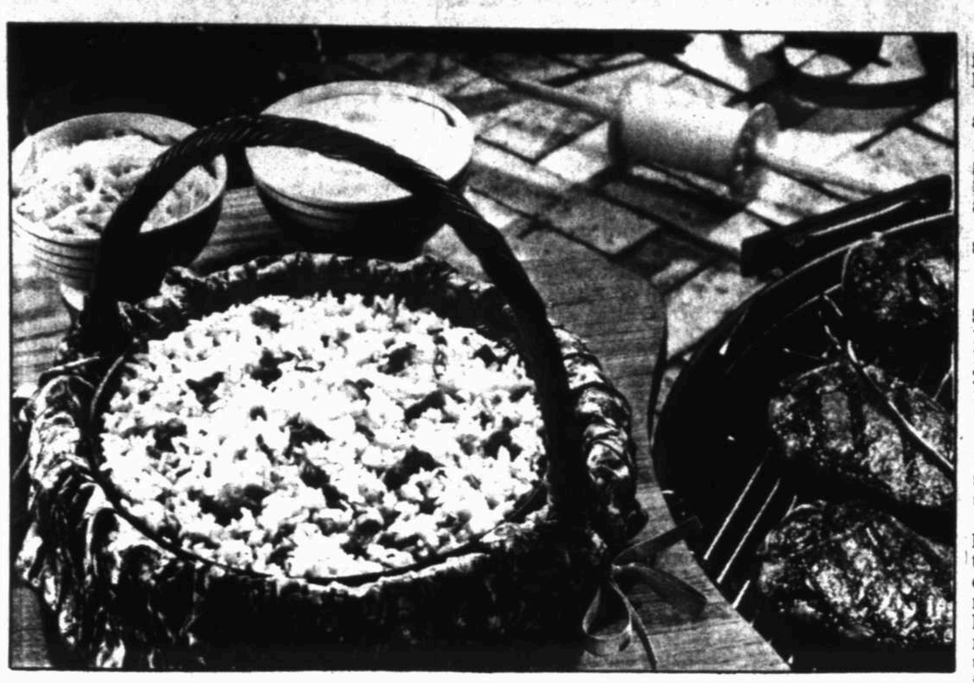
Rice dish called 'better than baked potato'



This "Better Than Baked Potato" rice dish is an unusual barbecue accompaniment.

Add sparkle to an outdoor barbecue with this innovative rice dish, It's Better Than Baked Potato.

Preparation will be effortless and the results are flavorful.

Crisp bacon bits, fresh garlic and thinly sliced green onion are combined with the buttery rice in this contemporary version of the foil-wrapped and roasted classic baked potato.

For the finishing touch, set out bowls of tangy sour cream and shredded cheddar cheese.

IT'S BETTER THAN BAKED POTATO

5 slices bacon, diced
1 cup rice
1 clove garlic
2½ cups water
1 teaspoon salt
⅓ cup thinly sliced green onions with tops or chopped chives
⅛ teaspoon white pepper sour cream
shredded cheddar cheese

Cook bacon in medium saucepan until crisp. Remove and set aside. Pour off all but about 1 tablespoon drippings. Add rice and garlic. Cook over low heat until rice is slightly browned, 5 to 7 minutes. Add water and salt. Bring to a boil. Reduce heat. Cover tightly and simmer 20 minutes. Remove from heat. Let stand covered until all water is absorbed, about 5 minutes. Stir in chives, pepper and reserved bacon. Top with sour cream and cheese. Makes 6 servings.

Indonesian curry distinctive

People who thrive in sizzling climates frequently base their cuisines on equally sizzling seasoning, taking advantage of a unique trick by Mother Nature.

The tropical culinary theme is Capsicum, the formal name for the hot peppers. Capsicum actually helps cool the body and in addition, perks up the appetite, two important considerations in hot climate.

The Indonesians, who suffer the steamiest weather on the planet, have produced a cuisine filled with zesty seasonings, some of it perfect fare for an American kitchen in the summer months.

Gulai Kambing is a specialty of the Kalimantan, the largest island in the Indonesian archipelago, a group of islands that stretches for several thousand miles along the equator and is home to more than 130 million people.

Gulai means main ingredient and in this case it is the Kambing — the lamb.

GULAI KAMBING

1½ tablespoons peanut or vegetable oil
2 pounds boneless, lamb, fat trimmed and cut in 1-inch cubes
2 tablespoons finely chopped onion
2 cloves garlic, minced
1½ teaspoons Tabasco pepper sauce
1 teaspoon salt
1 teaspoon ground coriander
½ teaspoon grated lemon peel
½ teaspoon ground cinnamon
¼ teaspoon ground cumin
¼ teaspoon ground ginger
¼ teaspoon ground nutmeg
⅛ teaspoon ground cloves
⅛ teaspoon turmeric
1 cup beef broth
½ cup canned cream of coconut

In a large skillet, heat oil; brown meat on all sides over high heat. Reduce heat to medium. Add onion, garlic, tabasco sauce, salt, coriander, lemon peel, cinnamon, cumin, ginger, nutmeg, cloves and turmeric; cook until onion is tender.

Stir in beef broth and cream of coconut; simmer 1 hour, or until meat is tender. Stir occasionally. Serve over cooked rice, if desired. Makes 6 servings.

FCC to begin licensing new system

Will 'meteor madness' shower over Alaska?

WASHINGTON (AP) — It might sound like science fiction, but the Federal Communications Commission has agreed to start licensing a unique communication system that bounces radio signals off meteor trails.

The agency's decision, released last Friday, sets aside radio frequencies in Alaska that will be available to both the state government and commercial companies interested in operating so-called Meteor Burst Communication Systems.

"The commission agrees that meteor burst communication has a public service potential and that frequencies should be allocated for its use," the agency said in a six-page decision.

A meteor burst system uses a computerized switching system and special transmitters to bounce radio signals off the charged, or ionized, particles that are left in the wake of a passing meteor.

According to the FCC, meteor trails are produced continually in Earth's atmosphere at heights of 50 miles to 75 miles, and radio signals can be bounced off such a trail and received at distances up to 1,250 miles. While the ionized trails last no more than a few seconds, "communication is possible because billions of meteors are constantly entering the Earth's atmosphere.

"The ability to communicate by reflecting radio waves off of ionized meteor trails was recognized around 1951," the FCC said in its order, but it was not until the 1970s that advances in solid-state electronics and computer technologies made such systems more reliable and affordable.

The attraction of a meteor burst system lies in its ability to tie together a large network of remote transmitters that require little maintenance and power and which can be located in dangerous or inaccessible areas.

The FCC says there are a number of meteor burst systems operated by the federal government, including an Agriculture Department system in the West that collects and transmits information on snow depths and ice floes in remote locations.

For now, the licensing has been restricted to Alaska which has expressed interest in using the technology to acquire aviation weather data from scores of isolated sites, and the technology has also attracted the attention of mineral exploration companies as well as scientists and firms interested in avalanche prediction.

"Meteor burst communications can provide an alternative mode of operation to conventional skywave propagation, microwave or satellite systems," the FCC said. "Further, ability to transmit from remote or hazardous locations without the need for a human operator will contribute to improving individual safety."

The commission said its only concern in setting aside frequencies for the new systems involved their potential to cause interference to television reception. While no such interference has been reported in the past through the operation of experimental systems, the FCC said it would issue interested parties "developmental licenses" instead of fixed-term permits. That will allow it to respond quickly should any interference materialize, the agency said.

According to the FCC, a Meteor Burst Communication System typically consists of a base station and up to 1,000 remote transmitters. The base station transmits a coded digital signal until it "hits" a meteor trail and is received at a remote antenna. That is a signal to the remote antenna to transmit any information it has collected in high-speed bursts back to the base station as long as the meteor trail is available.

Texas A&M home of nautical archaeology institute

By The Los Angeles Times-Washington Post News Service

COLLEGE STATION — When the Turkish government issued the sole foreign archaeological permit for excavation of ancient shipwrecks along its coast, it was awarded to an American college institute 110 miles from the nearest body of saltwater.

When Caribbean government officials wondered how to recover a ship that might have been lost on Columbus' voyage to the New World, and the Royal Ontario Museum wanted to raise two War of 1812 gunboats, their requests for help went to the same Texas institution.

The Institute for Nautical Archaeology, headquartered at Texas A&M University, has achieved a global reputation as a leading excavator of sunken ships and their often-priceless cargoes.

Since it was established in 1973, the institute has assisted in the recovery of more than two dozen shipwrecks and related projects on four continents, and is at the forefront of the relatively young academic subgenre of underwater archaeology.

At a university known for its zealous quest of "bests" and "largests," the nautical institute has become a conspicuous trophy.

THE FACT that it is located at a landlocked college is "not as unusual as it sounds," said Jeff Alford, Texas A&M's associate director for public information. "We already had a very fine oceanography program that was recognized as one of the best. It was logical that we would want to go the next step, and George Bass was just the one to do it."

Dr. George F. Bass, 50, a congenial, bespectacled professor of anthropology and sociology, founded the program in Cyprus as an independent research institute and moved it to Texas A&M in 1976.

Giving the institute a home cost A&M very little. The university furnishes several old military barracks as office and laboratory space and pays part of the salaries of Bass and three other institute researchers who teach classes. This year the support amounted to $100,000.

Private donations, research grants and project sponsors pay all the expenses of excavating shipwrecks and cataloguing the recovered cargo. Approximately 30 students, hailing from the United States and several foreign countries, are enrolled in the master's degree-level program in nautical archaeology.

There are few academic counterparts to the program. Only a handful of universities offer courses in the emerging science, among them the University of Haifa in Israel and St. Andrews University in Scotland. Bass said the only other American university program he knows of is a new one at East Carolina University in Greenville, N.C.

TEXAS A&M'S chief rivals in the recovery of sunken ships are private salvage companies and treasure hunters, Bass says.

He said he and his colleagues share the romance of discovering the resting places of long-lost ships and admiring the gleam of an ancient pendant, a coin or an intricately-crafted sword hilt.

But they differ greatly in their techniques and motives. Bass said the institute employs the exhaustive plotting and mapping procedures developed in land archaeology.

Its interest is in deriving the maximum scientific, historical and cultural information about the vessels and the cultures that produced them. The countries that sponsor the projects keep all the artifacts found, and pay the excavation expenses.

Treasure hunters and salvage companies, Bass said, generally have little interest in the wreck site itself and may not be gentle — sometimes using explosives — in extracting valuables. Their interest lies in the value of the cargo and they frequently demand a portion of the treasure recovered.

Bass said the institute's projects sometimes span a decade, and some may never be complete. After uncovering the sediment over a wreck, he said, institute workers detail each strata, noting the location of every piece of wood and encrusted metal found. Each item is catalogued, drawings are made and intricate models constructed. Items recovered from a shipwreck are returned to the institute's laboratory in College Station to be cleaned and chemically treated with preservatives before they are turned over to the project sponsor, generally for educational display.

'Greater Tuna' cat's meow

Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — "Greater Tuna," the play about life in a small town in Texas which is amusing members of Congress and other bigwigs at the Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts, is coming to Austin for two weeks in late October, the authors announced Friday.

Joe Sears, Jaston Williams and Ed Howard, the authors, decided that the play, which was born during a skit at a party in Austin, ought to come back home for a celebration of their success in New York and in Washington. They hope to be rejuvenated before they go on to Hollywood where they will present the play for Los Angeles audiences and prepare the show for television.

After Washington, the show will go to Houston for a run of six or eight weeks.

As Williams put it, "This an American dream — two years ago, we were unemployed and today to be here in the Kennedy Center with these notables in the audience, laughing at every line — it is a great thrill."

One odd happening: The skit that started the play at that party in Austin is no longer in the show. Howard, who writes but does not act and who is now busy preparing the show for television, said, "After we did the show in New York, we decided to freeze the script and when we did, we left that part out."

Now the play is being published by Samuel French. The authors expect royalties to come in as the play is shown by small theaters and high school drama clubs throughout the country.

The cast, consisting of Sears and Williams, was thrilled the other night to have Lynda Byrd Johnson Robb, President Lyndon B. Johnson's daughter, and her famous husband, Governor Charles Robb of Virginia, attend the play and come backstage to visit with them.

Also, the exclusive Wednesday Group of House Republicans was an appreciative audience one night.

After the show, Republicans who included Vice President George Bush's friend, Rep. Barber Conable, N. Y., stayed for an elaborate buffet supper as guests of the Kennedey Center's board of directors.

He spoke on membership and attendance.

During his year as district governor, Jimerson's district placed second in membership gain among the more than 600 districts. He has maintained 30 years of perfect attendance and has sponsored 278 new members.

He has been the recipient of the Monarch Key, for sponsoring 150 new members, and the International Key, for sponsoring 200 members.

Do we tune in to 'morphogenetic fields?'

WASHINGTON (AP) — Do children have an easier time than their parents did learning to ride a bicycle, master a foreign language, drive a car, play a piano or score on a video game?

Rupert Sheldrake, a lanky English biologist with curly hair and quiet manner, thinks so. And he thinks he knows why.

His "morphic resonance" theory about how all living creatures assume their forms, develop and learn is stirring a whirlwind of controversy in the scientific world.

Sheldrake presented his startling new theory at the Capitol recently before a luncheon audience of congressmen who meet occasionally to consider what the future holds. After hearing Sheldrake's provocative explanation, Rep. Albert Gore Jr., D-Tenn., observed:

"An awful lot of people think he's crazy. But a lot of other people think that if his ideas are even partly correct, the implications are just as profound as the discoveries of Einstein, Darwin and Copernicus."

The Tarrytown Conference Center, a think tank in Tarrytown, N.Y., is offering a $10,000 prize for the best experiment to prove or disprove Sheldrake's theory, and a Dutch foundation has put up $5,000 as a second prize. The contest ends New Year's Eve 1985.

Lila Gatlin, a theoretical biologist at Stanford University, plans a series of learning experiments with human volunteers this fall to test Sheldrake's hypothesis.

Simply put, Sheldrake suggests that embryos, from humans down to the simplest animals and plants, are able to develop into fully formed organisms because they somehow "tune in" to a field created by past members of the same species.

These "morphogenetic fields," he says, exert a crucial influence on the biochemical activity of DNA, the genetic building blocks of life found in the nucleus of every cell.

These fields also serve as "a kind of collective memory of the species," Sheldrake says. When a certain behavior is repeated often enough, the "morphogenetic field" that it creates sets off a "morphic resonance" — instantaneously through time and space — among other members of the same species.

He likens this field to a television signal, and each cell's DNA to the transistors and circuitry inside a TV set.

"DNA is very important in heredity in giving the right components, and these can affect the tuning. But it does not convey or carry most of the hereditary information. Most of that is coming through the morphogenetic field," Sheldrake told the congressmen.

In other words, thanks to this "morphogenetic field," it might be getting easier nowadays to dance or program a computer because people already have figured it out — and done it many times before.

The phenomenon was observed as early as the 1920s, when researchers discovered that after slow-learning rats were trained to run through a water maze at a Harvard University laboratory, test rats mastered the same task much faster during separate, later experiments in Scotland and Australia.

The same theory, Sheldrake says, might explain why small children learn foreign languages so quickly, without textbooks, or why fingernails know to grow back the way they do. In both instances, he suggests, they are assisted by a kind of pool of memory or previous learning transmitted by "morphic resonance."

Sheldrake says his theory is so revolutionary that it can be tested simply and cheaply by anybody, outside the strictures of orthodox scientific research.

In a sample test of his own, Sheldrake commissioned a Japanese poet to give him a real Japanese nursery rhyme, a poem he had written and a nonsensical rhyme, and all three were published in a Los Angeles bulletin. Sheldrake says preliminary results indicated that readers found the traditional verse — known to generations of Japanese — was easiest to memorize and the gibberish was hardest.

When Sheldrake, a well-regarded, Cambridge-educated plant physiologist, first set forth his theory in a book published two years ago in England, the respected scientific journal Nature denounced it as "the best candidate for burning there has been for many years."

But some scientists, and many laymen, were more positive. Nobel Prize-winning physicist Brian Josephson, for instance, said he believes "a new kind of understanding of nature is now emerging."

Sheldrake received a mixed reception earlier this month on Capitol Hill.

Teen-ager petrified after stealing rock

PHOENIX, Ariz. (AP) — Beware the curse of the pilfered rock, says Angie Davis, a teen-ager who filched a stone from the Petrified Forest.

"I honestly thought it wouldn't hurt to take just one tiny little rock," Miss Davis of Huntersville, N.C., wrote the National Park Service.

She explained that within hours after taking it on June 24 from the park east of Holbrook, she regretted her crime.

"Ever since we left the Petrified Forest, our Winnebago has had four flat tires," said Miss Davis. "In San Francisco, we hit a truck and busted out two windows, one just above my head."

She and 29 others on a youth tour also were delayed by a storm that knocked out power when they were at a laundromat.

"Now when anything bad happens, everyone says: 'It's Angie's rock.'

Dictionary dates first usage of words

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP) — The word musical comedy was in written use in 1765. Newsman dates back to 1596, clone to 1903 and refrigerator to 1803. The word president actually comes from the 14th century and grit from before the 12th century.

This is some of the information unearthed by editors of "Webster's Ninth New Collegiate Dictionary," which shows the date when, as far as could be determined, a word was first used in print or writing.

"The English vocabulary has grown in many ways over the centuries. Words enter it from different countries, from different cultures, from science and even from slang," says Dr. Frederick C. Mish, editor of the just-published volume. "Many words go back hundreds of years, some well over a thousand. It's a fascinating study."

A word such as earthling, with the sound of contemporary science fiction, actually goes back to 1593, according to the new dictionary. Electricity is not modern, either. The word dates to 1646. Vaporize dates to 1634, and even American was used as far back as 1578.

Many words, though, are relatively new. The nuclear family was first recorded in 1947. Anchorperson dates from 1973, and one of the newest words in this edition, palimony, from 1979. Watergate, as a general name for a scandal usually involving abuse of office and a cover-up, dates to 1973.

There are some surprises, too. Gunslinger, which sounds like a word from the Old West, actually appeared in print in 1951, though it may have been used a bit earlier in movies, according to Mish. The word television itself goes back to 1907. Pay-as-you-go, popularized here in the 1920s, through the 1940s, dates to around 1840. And gangster was first recorded in 1896.

Where were the dates found? Historical dictionaries containing dated examples of use were of prime importance. But older general dictionaries, particularly all editions of the Merriam-Webster unabridged dictionaries and their supplements, also proved extremely useful, Mish said.

"It was surprising how often a dictionary entry rather than an actual use in running text turned out to be the earliest use of a word that we could find," Mish said. The company's own files on language, stretching back nearly 100 years and containing some 13 million examples of words used in context, were also an invaluable source.

Each word to be researched was put on a slip containing 33 different sources to be checked. The earliest use appearing in one of these basic references then furnished the control date against which to check still other sources.

Bolivar: Dr. Jekyll or Mr. Hyde?

By K. MICHAEL FRASER
Associated Press Writer

Simon Bolivar, the soldier-statesman who freed much of South America from Spain, was a hero to generations of patriots, but as Latin America prepares for the 200th anniversary of his birth, scholars say he left a mixed legacy.

They disagree sharply whether he foreshadowed democracy or dictatorship. And Latin America has yet to achieve the unity he sought.

Along with Argentina's Jose de San Martin, Bolivar built the foundation of South American independence and helped end slavery. But he also advocated strong government and dealt ruthlessly with enemies.

He spoke of liberty and social justice. But he demonstrated little faith in the masses' ability to govern themselves.

He forcefully called for regional unity. But he kept at arm's length his then young northern neighbor, the United States.

For ideological reasons or for lack of documentation, scholars have trouble agreeing on basic historical facts about Bolivar and his legacy, a dispute that parallels the discord among Latin nations.

OF SIX countries in the territory Bolivar liberated from Spain, four of them — Venezuela, Colombia, Panama and Ecuador — glorify the man.

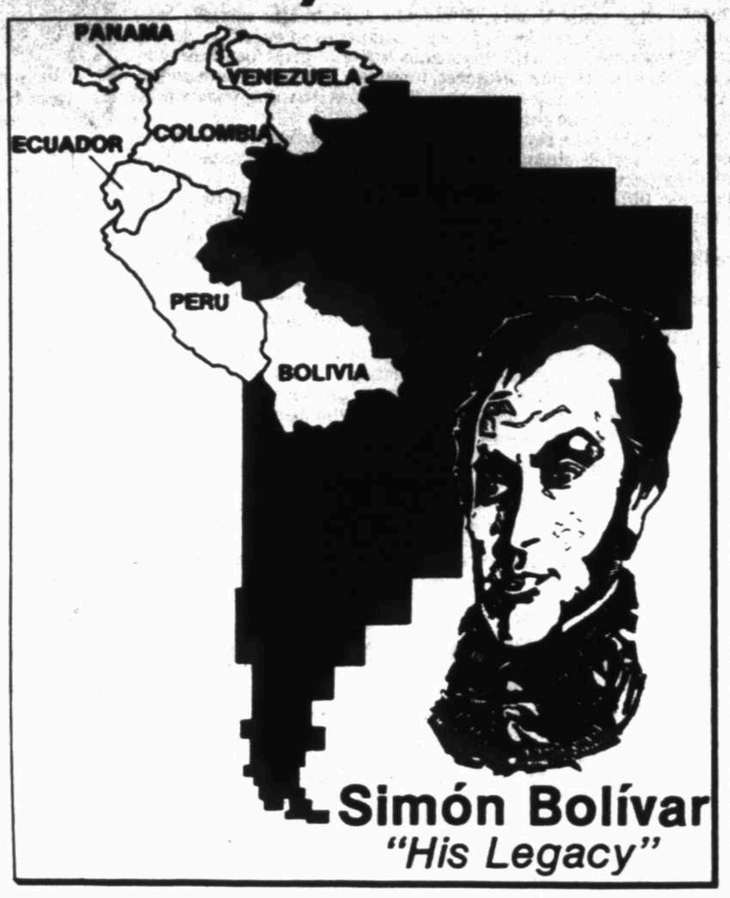
But Peruvian scholar Luis Alberto Sanchez says Bolivar is considered "something of an enemy of Peru" because he carved Bolivia out of it.

And in Bolivia, the coordinator of the Bolivar bicentennial says Bolivar's reputation is tarnished there for the opposite reason. "Bolivia was born against Bolivar's will. He wanted Peru and Bolivia to become one nation," according to Guilermo Cespedes.

In interviews with The Associated Press, scholars concurred, however, that Bolivar was a patriot and unifier to whom a continent owes an incalculable debt.

"Bolivar was a statesman and a general with the soul of a poet. But more than that he was a political visionary and analyst who is still relevant to Latin America," said Robert P. Matthews, a U.S. historian specializing in Latin America.

To mark his 200th anniversary, the presidents of the six liberated countries, as well as King Juan Carlos of Spain, are to gather in Caracas, capital of Bolivar's Venezuelan homeland, for July 24 celebrations. U.N. Secretary General Javier Perez de Cuellar and representatives from the rest of Latin America are expected to attend.



BOLIVAR WAS born July 24, 1783, the son of a landed aristocrat. At that time, Spain's control reached from California to the southern tip of South America.

Orphaned at 8 and educated in Europe and Venezuela, young Bolivar was deeply affected by the American and French revolutions and became an admirer of French philosopher Jean Jacques Rousseau, who argued that government should serve the common good.

In 1810, Bolivar joined an incipient Venezuelan independence movement. He fought intermittently until the decisive Battle of Boyaca, Colombia, in 1819. Two years later, he secured a hold over Venezuela. By mid-1825, he had defeated the Spanish in Peru and Bolivia.

Within 16 years, Bolivar was leader of almost a third of South America. Venezuela, Panama, Colombia and Ecuador were then one country — Gran Colombia. He dreamed of a confederation of independent Latin American states that could fend off foreign intervention and be the equal of the world's great nations. The United States was to be excluded. Bolivar feared it would dominate his fledgling nations, and he claimed the United States had ignored South America during its struggle for independence.

"WHAT HE advocated was the unity of Spanish America with Brazil and the Caribbean," said Venezuelan historian Jose Salcedo-Bastardo. "Only after that could a fruitful understanding with the other America be thought of."

Eventually, however, he also tried to bring Latin America into a wider group, organizing the Panama Conference to include the United States and Great Britain.

But even his modest dream of a Latin America confederation failed. By 1828, regional wars started erupting, and the people he had struggled to unite turned against him. In 1830, he was driven from power in Venezuela. He died that year in self-imposed exile in Colombia.

Despite failure to achieve unity, Bolivar's hope for regional integration remained. One part of his legacy today is the Andean Pact, formed in 1969, comprising Venezuela, Colombia, Ecuador, Peru and Bolivia.

Others are the Latin American Association for Integration and the Organization of American States.

But Bolivar's ideals and deeds did not always jibe. "The Liberator" of these newly independent countries sometimes became their first dictator, assuming the title at times in the war with Spain.

"Most wise men concede that men are born with equal rights to share the benefits of society," Bolivar wrote. But he established strong central governments in the name of meeting emergencies.

"Events," he argued, "have proved that institutions which are wholly representative are not suited to our character customs, and present knowledge."

British to probe South Africans

LONDON (AP) — Home Secretary Leon Brittan told a delegation from the Anti-Apartheid Movement that the British government will fully investigate charges of misconduct by South Africans living in Britain, his spokesman said.

In a number of recent court cases, witnesses have charged that South African agents operating out of the South African Embassy in London were behind break-ins at London offices of the movement, which opposes South Africa's official policy of racial segregation. Thieves apparently were after lists of members.

Republican congressmen express 'outrage'

Copley News Service

WASHINGTON — Eleven Republican congressmen expressed "outrage" recently that the State Department has allowed repeated visits to the United States by the spokesman for a guerrilla group that took credit for the murder of Navy Lt. Cdr. Albert Schaufelberger in El Salvador.

The group, Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill., said the guerrilla spokesman, Ruben Zamora, has been allowed to appear on national television, meet with public officials and "walk the halls of Congress" after admitting that his group was responsible for the death of Schaufelberger, who had been part of the U.S. Embassy staff in El Salvador.

"We think that this greatly cheapens the lives of the American advisers who are down there" in El Salvador, Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., told a news conference.

Hyde called it "disgraceful to have someone up here representing forces who are killing Americans down there and is proud of it."

Hunter, Hyde and eight other GOP congressmen signed a letter to President Reagan originated by Rep. Thomas Harnett, R-S.C., that urged the president to have Zamora's American visa revoked.

Schaufelberger, who was shot to death in his car while waiting for a friend, was a member of the Navy's elite SEAL commando group.

Harnett said he talked to Schaufelberger's parents, who live in his district, about Zamora.

"It's pretty hard to explain to the father of an American citizen who was killed why the proclaimed representative of the killers was free to walk the halls of Congress," he said.

Zamora is the North American spokesman for the Democratic Revolutionary Front (FDR), which is the political wing of the Farabundo Marti Liberation Front, the coalition of leftist guerrilla groups attempting to overthow the U.S.-backed government in El Salvador.

Chinese ready to marry 'plane ticket'

PEKING (AP) — Many marriageable young Chinese yearning to go abroad have a name for an eligible foreigner. It is "jipiao" — literally: plane ticket. Translation: passport and a way out.

When the mating game involves a foreign party the risks are great and the stakes are high.

Of course, Chinese and foreigners fall genuinely in love. But that is not always the case.

Take these examples:

A young man pulled alongside a European woman riding her bicycle and introduced himself as an engineering student. After chatting and peddling a bare two minutes he asked if she is married. "No," she replied, taken aback.

"Well, why don't you marry me?" he asked.

A male Danish student was invited by a Chinese friend for a game of tennis. The friend showed up with a young woman who watched demurely from the sidelines.

The Chinese man introduced her as his younger sister and handed the student $5, saying, "she is a good girl, well brought up and I am sure you'll have a good time. Why don't you take her out to dinner and get to know her better? It would be great to have you as a brother-in-law."

China tells its people that life is not greener on the Western side of the hill, and that marriages between Chinese and foreigners frequently are disastrous.

But China has a large population of poorly educated, unskilled and rather apathetic young people who don't see themselves as the workaholic vanguard of modern China. Still, they would like a comfortable life and some greener grass.

Many of China's hunters of foreign spouses are urban people who were victims of the 1966-76 Cultural Revolution, during which education came to a standstill. Banished to the countryside, they missed opportunities for wedlock by refusing to marry uncultured rural people.

Many want a new start abroad. Lacking the money or connections to get there, some consider marriage with a foreigner to be their last chance, although foreigners are traditionally regarded as undesirable outsiders.

Roving rioters turn peace rallies in Germany into urban warfare

FRANKFURT, West Germany (AP) — Hundreds of roving rioters bound by what prosecutors describe as a "lust for violence" and contempt for authority are turning West Germany's peace demonstrations into urban warfare.

They are mostly left-leaning, and many advocate anarchy, but their ranks include neo-Nazis and punk rockers as well as what police dub "weekend terrorists."

Alerted by word of mouth, posters, fliers and ads in the underground press, the rioters go by train and car pool to big demonstrations, piling out at their destination determined to battle police.

Their weapons include tear gas, firebombs, axes, clubs and even cobblestones torn from the streets.

Black motorcycle helmets with face shields or masks, jeans and leather jackets are the standard gear. Most rioters are 19 to 25 years old, but some are as young as 16 and a few are over 50.

Now, the rioters are openly mustering forces to disrupt peace rallies this autumn against the arrival of new NATO nuclear missiles in West Germany.

"It's going to get a lot worse," promised "Zorro," a 24-year-old West Berliner who described himself as a "professional revolutionary."

Federal Prosecutor Kurt Rebmann has warned of stiff penalties for demonstrators who break the law. He said he is "concerned about the readiness for violence by anarchists" this fall.

Police in Wuppertal recently detained 104 people at a meeting where "hard-core militants" were allegedly mapping out violent strategy for autumn.

The government, meanwhile, is debating tougher laws to deal with the threat, including the banning of masks at demonstrations.

Authorities so far have been unable to pinpoint any central coordination of the rioters, although they have identified a nucleus of about 500 operating out of Frankfurt and 200 to 400 from Berlin. They say these groups can mobilize 2,000 sympathizers on short notice.

The Interior Ministry counted 5,313 demonstrations in West Germany last year, with 229 erupting in violence. There are no statistics on total damage, but one weekend of rioting in West Berlin's squatter district last month caused 46 million marks' ($14 million) damage.

Typical of the riots was the one in Krefeld last month when Vice President George Bush came to salute German-American friendship. About 300 youths attacked his motorcade, shattered windows and damaged parked cars. Bush was not hurt.

"If Bush had just two minutes of fear, then it was a success," declared Tommy, a 34-year-old admitted rioter from Berlin who asked not to be identified further.

Added Zorro: "Krefeld was actually quite harmless. We didn't burn anything there."

Posters signed by "autonomous, anti-imperialist groups" were plastered as far away as West Berlin, urging protesters to gather at the Krefeld train station that morning prepared "to fight."

The red-and-black posters carried the slogan, "Power for No One."

In June 1962, police raided squatter houses in West Berlin on the morning of President Reagan's visit.

There, according to Berlin Prosecutor Hans-Lucas Wedhorn, they found explosives, leaflets, Molotov cocktail "recipes" and a list of 40 targets — businesses, consulates and foundations with clear American or British ties.

"No one was there, though," Wedhorn said, adding that the occupants "were all on their way" to what turned out to be a major anti-American riot.

Wedhorn said the agitators "perceive violence as not only a legitimate but a necessary means to destroy the state in its present form."

"Their standpoint is that everyone should do what they want."

Frankfurt police spokesman Hans Neitzel said dialogue with the rioters "is completely out of the question. They are full of fantasy. They don't know what a paradise they live in."

Ganschow said the hard core of troublemakers is made up of people "from various groups, with no political or ideological line, who seize every opportunity to riot."

Zorro also claimed there were no riot leaders.

"After all, what we want is self-rule," he said. "We don't want leaders."

Authorities say trouble routinely erupts toward the end of the peaceful demonstration.

"It's always the same people, over and over again," Wedhorn said.

Japanese farmers lobby against imports

TOKYO (AP) — Ten thousand Japanese farmers jammed Tokyo's austere Martial Arts Hall recently for their annual crusade against agricultural imports, especially from the United States, and for greater price supports from their government.

The farmers, often referred to as being among the world's least efficient but best organized, were not in a festive mood. The government is trying to hold the line on rice subsidies because of its own financial situation, while the United States has escalated its demands that Japan lift 22 residual farm import restrictions.

"We must carry out every possible act of resistance in a thorough drive to block liberalization and expansion of agricultural imports," said Shizuma Iwamochi, president of the Central Union of Agricultural Cooperatives.

The same day, and almost within shouting distance of the farmers, President Yoshiro Inoyama of the powerful Federation of Economic Organizations repeated his group's position that farm imports must be liberalized — preferably before President Reagan visits Japan in November.

The two voices represent the split between Japan's manufacturing industry, which worries about foreign protectionism against its exports, and a farm industry seeking greater protectionism, subsidies and price supports.

To keep 4.6 million farm households going, Japan's 118 million people pay some of the world's highest food prices — double the world average for beef and dairy products, triple for rice and almost four times the world average for wheat.

Ground beef costs $3.40 a pound, butter around $2.65, milk about 85 cents a quart and rice about $1 a pound.

Although farming produces only 2.5 percent of Japan's gross domestic product, the government this year will spend $8.3 billion, 13.6 percent of all government subsidies, on farm supports. An additional $2.5 billion supports rice and wheat prices.

Only 15 percent of the land in these mountainous islands is arable, and farmers till an average of 2.7 acres, in contrast to 445 acres in the United States and 64 acres in France.

The full-time farmer has become rare in Japan. The Agriculture, Forestry and Fisheries Ministry says only 8.4 percent work exclusively as farmers, while 70 percent earn most of their income from non-farm jobs.

A common pattern is the "shell farm" where sons or daughters hold jobs in nearby towns while the older generation works the fields. The ministry says a quarter of Japan's farmers are 65 or older, a further drag on productivity.

While Japan must import almost all its feed grains, peas and soybeans, thousands of bags of rice lie rotting in storehouses. Rice demand has fallen steadily with Westernization of the national diet, but rice farmers, wedded to tradition and reluctant to give up their subsidized price, have resisted crop transfer programs.

China, Vietnam relationship 'rifle to rifle'

FRIENDSHIP PASS, China (AP) — The massive gate tower with "Friendship Pass" in large Chinese characters bears dozens of bullet scars that underscore the change from the time China and Vietnam were comrades as "close as lips and teeth."

The only passage comes in occasional exchanges of prisoners of hostile activity by the two Communist neighbors.

The relationship is "rifle to rifle and cannon to cannon," said Zhang Guoliang, deputy director of Guangxi Province's Foreign Affairs Office.

He said China has reserved "the right to initiate another counterattack in self-defense" if Vietnam continues what he called "military provocations and sabotage."

The first counterattack was in 1979, when Chinese troops staged a four-week invasion of Vietnam. Some went through Friendship Pass then, local officials said, and some of their supplies took that route. Earlier Chinese reports listed casualties for that fight as 50,000 Vietnamese and 20,000 Chinese. These could not be independently confirmed.

In more than two decades when China helped Communist-led Vietnamese forces first fight French and then U.S. troops as well as forces of the former South Vietnamese government, huge amounts of Chinese supplies poured south through the pass and on an adjacent rail line, the officials said.

But after the North Vietnamese and Viet Cong won their war in 1975, they began to view China as stingy and domineering, and the Chinese began viewing Vietnam as a local bully and a southern outpost of their great northern rival, the Soviet Union.

Zhang accused the Vietnamese of provocations ranging from shelling to sending over water buffalo laden with propaganda leaflets. They had tried border area land grabs using such tricks as stealthily setting up false graveyards as "evidence" of previous ownership, he said.

Vietnam's motive, Zhang claimed, was to please the Soviet Union so it would aid Vietnamese efforts in Laos and Cambodia and bring them into an Indochina federation.

"If they don't do that, Soviet aid might not be secured," he said.

Chinese leaders have said that up until 1978, China provided Vietnam with $20 billion worth of aid. In recent years, the Chinese have cut back all foreign aid to concentrate on their own modernization, and have declared that Vietnam should be spending its money on economic recovery rather than war in Cambodia.

Major guest houses in Pingxiang, near the Friendship Pass, and Nanning, about 125 miles to the north, formerly catered to visiting Vietnamese officials and traders. Chinese officials say the late Vietnamese leader Ho Chi Minh stayed in both.

The 1,000-room Pingxiang hostel, where 45 foreign reporters stayed on a recent visit to the border area, appears to be now mostly unused. The Pingxiang railroad station, one gateway to Vietnam, still bears the Vietnamese name "Ga Bang Thong."

In fact, Zhang said, even while aid was continuing, relations began to deteriorate in 1974, and "I also am puzzled as to why in view of the selfless aid we gave."

At first, he said, there were stone-throwing incidents, and shooting started a year or so later.

Since 1978, Zhang added, the Vietnamese have driven more than 217,000 refugees into Guangxi. He said 1,097 came last year — about 200 across Guangxi's 400-mile border with Vietnam and the rest by boat.

Counting refugees who came into China's Yunnan Province, China ended up with more than 263,000 refugees from Indochina, or more than one-quarter of the total, Western analysts estimate. They say about 85 percent of those who came to China were ethnic Chinese from Vietnam.

Vietnamese shelling and shooting in the first five months of this year killed nine Chinese and wounded 33 in Guangxi, whose border with Vietnam is about half the total Chinese-Vietnamese border, Zhang said.

The deputy mayor of Pingxiang, Wei Zhaoguang, said the last crossing at Friendship Pass was on Aug. 25, 1978, and the last train crossing from Pingxiang the following Dec. 22.

Rich history found in Kruger Park

MALALANE, South Africa (AP) — The rock caves and crannies that shelter game poachers in Kruger National Park are yielding a rich story of vanished peoples who lived on the same sites as long as 250,000 years ago.

Ranger Mike English was searching for poachers six years ago when he came across a rock painting of graceful, red, animal and human figures painted long ago by bushmen. This Stone Age people survives in dwindling numbers only in the Kalahari Desert, 1,000 miles to the northwest.

As English made his discoveries, archaeologists from the University of Pretoria were deep into a separate project, the first comprehensive survey of early human life in the 250-mile-long park on South Africa's eastern border — known worldwide for its animals, rather than its human history.

The game rangers versed in bush life, and the scientists grounded in theory, have joined in a fruitful partnership.

Teaming up with English and other rangers, the scientists have found artifacts showing a continuous population of the region — first by an early Stone Age people, then by the bushmen, and then by an Iron Age people beginning about 300 A.D. Tribal people have used the sites in recent centuries.

English figured that poachers would hide in caves and rock overhangs on the granite hills that sprout from the bushveld plains, overlooking the paths of zebra, giraffe, and white rhino.

He found his first bushman painting in a remote southwestern corner of Kruger. Eight such sites had been discovered previously in the park.

English was captivated, and began a thorough search on foot — an effort that was rewarded by discovery of more than 100 bushman art sites.

The cave art is mysterious and enchanting. English has identified 17 species of animals depicted in the red tones of the wall paintings. Graceful running figures are common.

The paintings have not yet been dated accurately. The artifacts are still being tested, and could be between a few hundred and more than 1,500 years old.

At some settlement sites among the 300 discovered during the 10-year park survey ending this year, archaeologist Andre Meyer and his field workers have found Early Stone Age cutting tools dating back 250,000 years. Archaeological test excavations near the rock art sites have uncovered Middle Stone-Age implements dated between 40,000 and 100,000 years ago.

Bushman artifacts are mixed in, including crescent-shaped crystals that apparently were mounted on sticks for cutting meat.

Meyer said the next phase of research — excavation of about a dozen sites — should test his theory that the Iron Age people came from Kenya and Malawi in eastern Africa about 200-300 A.D., and pushed the bushmen to the west, where their paintings are more common and thought to be more recent.

Meyer said the team wants to determine who lived in the region over the centuries, and to reconstruct their society.

The excavations could take another couple of decades, he said.

Many of the sites have been located by rangers. Road workers, encouraged to be aware of signs of the past, have found artifacts that led to excavation projects.

Much additional research focuses on animal bones at the sites. English said that will help the parks board to understand the flora and fauna of the past, to learn what has changed and to plan conservation.

Archaeologists excavate pottery shards and other artifacts from an Iron-Age settlement site in South Africa's Kruger National Park. A 10-year survey of the park has revealed a history of continuous human settlement in the park, better known for its wildlife, for as long as 250,000 years.

"It's an absolutely incomparable research area," said Professor Hannes Eloff, head of the archaeology team. Kruger was established in 1898 on South Africa's border with Mozambique, and before then was sparsely populated.

The park, about the size of Massachusetts, has about 500,000 visitors a year. But tourists are not allowed out of their cars, except at a few lodges. The rock art and settlement sites are often deep in the bush, far from public roads and undisturbed.

English has been instrumental in a project to allow the public to see the rock art as well as to enjoy a closer look at the bushveld. In August, the Bushman Camp opens in the center of a region containing about 50 rock art sites.

It is the fourth wilderness hiking camp created in the park since 1978. The other three are booked a year ahead, a mark of a growing public desire to live in, rather than just drive through, the African bush.

Allergy to peanuts rare; but could be deadly

Dear Dr. Solomon: In one of your columns you answered some guy who was making fun of an allergy to peanuts. I don't think that any medical problem is funny, but can peanuts actually cause a serious reaction? — Frank, New York City

Dear Frank: An allergic reaction to peanuts can be manifested in a variety of symptoms and may even result in death. It can obviously be a very serious problem and does not appear to be outgrown. Fortunately, however, serious reactions to the consumption of peanuts appear to be quite rare.

Dear Dr. Solomon: I've heard a lot of talk about what kinds of diet can affect cancer in women. But what about prostate cancer in men? Does diet have anything to do with it? — Herman, Clearwater Beach, Fla.

Dear Herman: Before responding directly to your question, I want to emphasize that many of the studies that appear to link diet with the development of cancer are preliminary in nature. The results of these studies may indicate directions for future research, but they usually do not serve as a basis for making hard and fast decisions about dietary patterns.

The findings in one study conducted at the Roswell Park Memorial Institute in Buffalo, New York, suggest that men are more likely to develop cancer of the prostate if they consume foods high in vitamin A and fat. However, I do not tell my own patients that reducing the amount of vitamin A and fat in their diets will help them avoid the disease.

Dear Dr. Solomon: I am very diet conscious and I have cut down on my use of meat in order to lower my intake of fat. But now I find that I'm using a lot more dairy products and cereals, and I believe that these kinds of foods have a lot of salt in them. Is this true? If it is, why can't manufacturers simply cut down on the amount they use? — Linda, Newport, R.I.

Dear Linda: It is estimated that about 10 percent of the dietary intake of sodium for adults comes from dairy products and about 29 percent comes from grain and cereal products. Some of the sodium in dairy products occurs naturally; however, sodium is also used in such items as processed cheeses and cheese foods. Salt also acts as a preservative in butter. Efforts have been made to find substitutes for sodium but the substances tried have not been successful. Either they did not serve the purpose for which they were used or they produced an unsatisfactory flavor in the product.

Reducing the amount of sodium in any food would be meaningless if the product became unacceptable to the consumer. For example, there have been attempts to reduce the sodium content of bread, but conumers rejected the product because it had a bitter or a metallic taste. Additional research in developing an acceptable salt substitute is continuing.

For Cassie, The Bronx, N.Y.: A child's sensitivity to a certain food often lessens with the passage of time, but this is not always the case. Some food sensitivities may last a lifetime and this is best handled by trying to avoid the offending food. In cases where this cannot be done I test the patient for food allergy and/or hypersensitivity, and then treat the patient with the appropriate food antigen.

Drugs could do more harm than good

By The Associated Press

The prescription your doctor scribbles could hurt instead of helping if you don't ask a few questions before swallowing your pills.

The Food and Drug Administration warns that drug interactions and side effects can cause serious health problems and may interfere with the way the medicine is supposed to work.

Drugs can react with other drugs, with foods and with beverages. In some cases, the reaction may decrease the effect of the medicine which is being prescribed. An antacid, for example, will cause a blood-thinning or anticoagulant drug to be absorbed too slowly.

Other reactions can increase the effect of the drugs involved. The impact of tranquilizers, for example, may be greater if you are also taking antihistamines.

Lawyers at convention worry about their public image

NEW YORK (AP) — Rosita Stanley, a retired maintenance worker from Macon, Ga., isn't going to be the most popular person at this year's American Bar Association convention.

"It's a myth that lawyers are concerned with justice for all," she says. "They just go to law school to get rich."

Mrs. Stanley will be a rare non-lawyer among the more than 8,000 attorneys at the week-long convention opening Thursday in Atlanta. She is scheduled to represent the National Clients Council, a Washington-based nonprofit group working to expand free legal services for low-income clients, at a panel discussion Sunday on "The American Client Versus the American Lawyer."

At a time when even leaders of the profession are debating whether there are too many lawyers, Mrs. Stanley sums up the public's misgivings. "I really don't think lawyers are very sensitive people," she says. "They try to find loopholes and try to trip people up on procedures."

That's not so much different than what Thomas Jefferson said: "It is the trade of lawyers to question everything, yield nothing and to talk by the hour."

"We are regarded as more canny than candid, more as servants of our prince, as mouthpieces or hired guns, than as servants of our consciences," former White House counsel Lloyd Cutler says.

Lawyers are concerned that Americans feel that too many lawyers are dishonest, incompetent, greedy or all of the above.

A recent ABA Journal survey said lawyers think the most important issue facing the legal profession is its public image.

"There's clearly a lack of perception about what lawyers do, but it's not always the public's fault," says John Curtin Jr., the Boston lawyer who will be moderating the panel discussion on clients versus lawyers.

He says lawyers must do a better job telling the public about how they have a duty to pursue their clients' interests aggressively, about how they donate more of their time to no-fee "pro bono" cases than any other profession and about how lawyers are not necessarily to blame for lawsuits.

"Clients push their lawyers to resolve issues on the battlefield," he says.

To that end, more and more law firms are using advertising and public relations consultants, according to ABA surveys.

But if lawyers have a tarnished image, a lack of perception by the public is only part of the reason. The 270,000-member ABA, for instance, says that last year 1,878 lawyers were disciplined — disbarred, suspended, fined, reprimaned, put on probation or allowed to resign without formal action.

Inmates may help conduct experiment on AIDS

Hearst Feature Service

LOS ANGELES — Blood tests to screen for AIDS or hepatitis-B may be given to inmates of the California Rehabilitation Center as part of a proposed research project by UCLA and the California Narcotic Authority.

The tests would enable physicians to identify inmates at highest risk of catching either of the infectious diseases, both believed to be sexually transmitted, said Joe Borrielli, the CRC's health services administrator.

UCLA researchers, accompanied by Borrielli and Dr. Gene Prout, chief of health care service for the state Department of Corrections, last month toured the CRC facility in Norco to determine if it would be suitable for the project. No decision has been made yet by UCLA, which would pay for the expensive laboratory tests.

The tests would be part of a statewide effort to head off an AIDS epidemic – and the hysteria surrounding the disease – among inmates through a two-part approach: education and preventive medicine.

The first part began yesterday when the narcotic authority began distributing instructional pamphlets to CRC inmates regarding the dangers of AIDS, acquired immune deficiency syndrome, and hepatitis-B.

The pamphlet provides information on reducing the risks of contagion, such as avoiding homosexual contacts, sharing needles, toothbrushes or drinking cups.

Both AIDS and hepatitis-B are prevalent among gay men and intravenous drug users. Prisons, specifically CRC, could become a breeding ground for either disease, as Arthur Kassel, acting chairman of the CNA wrote in an introduction to the pamphlet:

"Of primary importance is the development of a means of prevention in an institutional setting such as the California Rehabilitation Center, which houses 3,100 narcotic addicts....Some of the individuals are involved in homosexual activities and others engage in intravenous drug use during their confinement."

Man's death means closure of foster home

DALLAS (AP) — A 62-year-old woman who opened her small westside home to more than 400 mentally handicapped youngsters says she will continue to care for "her" children despite her husband's death.

Bertie Jackson nurtures and teaches eight mentally handicapped children — the maximum number she is licensed to keep in her three-bedroom home by the state Department of Human Resources. She and her husband Charles have been sheltering children for 37 years.

But her husband died from a heart attack last week.

"I haven't been left alone," she told the Dallas Times Herald. "I have been left with the majesty of God's work."

Fighting back tears, she said the daughter she adopted as an infant, Sharon, now 24, will help.

"But it won't be Mommy and Daddy with their babies any more," she said.

Mrs. Jackson's youngsters include Curtis, who has had so many seizures he must wear a helmet to protect his head when he falls. There is 16-year-old Jody, who was so abused by her parents that her mind was ruined. She sits in a wheelchair because she cannot move her body. There is also Raymond, who is autistic and probably has no idea where he is.

"All right, now are you ready?" Mrs. Jackson asks the eight expectant children gathered around the dinner table.

There is no straight answer, only a groan, a moan, an attempt to speak.

Mrs. Jackson asks for the one thing that makes her happy before the children begin eating: the semblance of a prayer.

The children finally learned the words, though it took the Jacksons time to teach them.

"Jesus wept," say the children in unison.

"It was a just a beautiful environment there," said Anna Ray Griffith, a DHR caseworker. "The retarded children there were thoroughly loved, without any expectation of them to do normal things."

Another major foster home cares for the mentally handicapped in Dallas, with a large annual budget, five employees and even a board of directors.

But the Jacksons obtained what grants they could and relied on their own resources.

The couple was married in 1941. They began working at Hope Cottage, where they adopted two children. And they became foster parents, with some of the children staying a week, others six or seven years.

Mrs. Jackson keeps a picture of her husband on the coffee table and says she spends a lot of time curled up on a sofa.

"I can't help myself," she cried. "I'd like to help myself, but I can't. I've got to get up and move. I've got to tell my husband that I've given him my best I have, that I'm gonna walk through this room and miss him."

Symphony's home to hear rock sounds

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Roll over Beethoven. The Boston Symphony's summer home at Tanglewood was bouncing to the beat of blaring tape decks and guitars as fans lined up for rock concert tickets.

"We've got about 200 out there now strumming guitars and listening to tapes and the box office doesn't open until 10," said music festival employee Paul Fitzgerald early Monday morning. "They are having a great time."

Young people turned out as early as 6 a.m. for the start of ticket sales for a series of Labor Day weekend concerts featuring Willie Nelson and rock artists Bette Midler and Neil Young.

"It's a madhouse. We've never had anything like this," said ticket seller Fred Bredice from the box office. Nearly all of the 5,000 reserved seats for each concert, ranging in price from $12.50 to $35, were sold out by noon.

Artist does phone book covers

FORT WORTH (AP) — Artist Norman Baxter says he was intrigued when a telephone company representative asked him to draw a Yellow Pages cover illustration that wasn't boring.

Baxter created a drawing that featured little men landing a spaceship atop a skyscraper, a herd of Longhorn cattle stampeding through a busy downtown intersection and a genie beating downtown traffic on his magic carpet.

The 64-year-old Houston artist said he has received "quite a bit" of mail from people wanting to know the same thing: How many creatures does he "plant" in each drawing?

"But I just couldn't have that answer," he said. "You couldn't count all of them. It takes me about a month to do each cover. One day I can put about 50 or 60 of them in; the next day, half that many."

Baxter's art has also graced telephone books in San Antonio, Dallas, Kansas City, Mo., St. Louis and Oklahoma City. The self-described "frustrated artist" has been doing projects for Southwestern Bell Telephone Co. since 1978.

"The name of the game is to make all of these figures blend in with the rest of the drawing," Baxter told the Fort Worth Star-Telegram, "A lot of people just glance at pictures and say, 'Oh, yeah, that's nice.'

"Other people notice the figures," he said. "I draw about three or four that are easy to find, and I make them hunt for the rest. I don't make it easy for them."

Baxter said the telephone company assigns him the subject of the cover — such as the city's skyline — but he can interpret the material as he chooses, with the exception of depicting nudity.

"Sometimes, I forget what I've drawn," Baxter said. "So I duplicate a figure in the same cover."

He said he wanted to be an artist since he was a boy in rural Iowa, where he discovered he could easily copy comic strip characters.

Rich history found in Kruger Park

MALALANE, South Africa (AP) — The rock caves and crannies that shelter game poachers in Kruger National Park are yielding a rich story of vanished peoples who lived on the same sites as long as 250,000 years ago.

Ranger Mike English was searching for poachers six years ago when he came across a rock painting of graceful, red, animal and human figures painted long ago by bushmen. This Stone Age people survives in dwindling numbers only in the Kalahari Desert, 1,000 miles to the northwest.

As English made his discoveries, archaeologists from the University of Pretoria were deep into a separate project, the first comprehensive survey of early human life in the 250-mile-long park on South Africa's eastern border — known worldwide for its animals, rather than its human history.

The game rangers versed in bush life, and the scientists grounded in theory, have joined in a fruitful partnership.

Teaming up with English and other rangers, the scientists have found artifacts showing a continuous population of the region — first by an early Stone Age people, then by the bushmen, and then by an Iron Age people beginning about 300 A.D. Tribal people have used the sites in recent centuries.

English figured that poachers would hide in caves and rock overhangs on the granite hills that sprout from the bushveld plains, overlooking the paths of zebra, giraffe, and white rhino.

He found his first bushman painting in a remote southwestern corner of Kruger. Eight such sites had been discovered previously in the park.

English was captivated, and began a thorough search on foot — an effort that was rewarded by discovery of more than 100 bushman art sites.

The cave art is mysterious and enchanting. English has identified 17 species of animals depicted in the red tones of the wall paintings. Graceful running figures are common.

The paintings have not yet been dated accurately. The artifacts are still being tested, and could be between a few hundred and more than 1,500 years old.

At some settlement sites among the 300 discovered during the 10-year park survey ending this year, archaeologist Andre Meyer and his field workers have found Early Stone Age cutting tools dating back 250,000 years. Archaeological test excavations near the rock art sites have uncovered Middle Stone-Age implements dated between 40,000 and 100,000 years ago.

Bushman artifacts are mixed in, including crescent-shaped crystals that apparently were mounted on sticks for cutting meat.

Meyer said the next phase of research — excavation of about a dozen sites — should test his theory that the Iron Age people came from Kenya and Malawi in eastern Africa about 200-300 A.D., and pushed the bushmen to the west, where their paintings are more common and thought to be more recent.

Meyer said the team wants to determine who lived in the region over the centuries, and to reconstruct their society.

The excavations could take another couple of decades, he said.

Many of the sites have been located by rangers. Road workers, encouraged to be aware of signs of the past, have found artifacts that led to excavation projects.

Much additional research focuses on animal bones at the sites. English said that will help the parks board to understand the flora and fauna of the past, to learn what has changed and to plan conservation.

AP Laserphoto

Archaeologists excavate pottery shards and other artifacts from an Iron-Age settlement site in South Africa's Kruger National Park. A 10-year survey of the park has revealed a history of continuous human settlement in the park, better known for its wildlife, for as long as 250,000 years.

"It's an absolutely incomparable research area," said Professor Hannes Eloff, head of the archaeology team. Kruger was established in 1898 on South Africa's border with Mozambique, and before then was sparsely populated.

The park, about the size of Massachusetts, has about 500,000 visitors a year. But tourists are not allowed out of their cars, except at a few lodges. The rock art and settlement sites are often deep in the bush, far from public roads and undisturbed.

English has been instrumental in a project to allow the public to see the rock art as well as to enjoy a closer look at the bushveld. In August, the Bushman Camp opens in the center of a region containing about 50 rock art sites.

It is the fourth wilderness hiking camp created in the park since 1978. The other three are booked a year ahead, a mark of a growing public desire to live in, rather than just drive through, the African bush.

DR. NEIL SOLOMON

Allergy to peanuts rare; but could be deadly

Dear Dr. Solomon: In one of your columns you answered some guy who was making fun of an allergy to peanuts. I don't think that any medical problem is funny, but can peanuts actually cause a serious reaction? — Frank, New York City

Dear Frank: An allergic reaction to peanuts can be manifested in a variety of symptoms and may even result in death. It can obviously be a very serious problem and does not appear to be outgrown. Fortunately, however, serious reactions to the consumption of peanuts appear to be quite rare.

Dear Dr. Solomon: I've heard a lot of talk about what kinds of diet can affect cancer in women. But what about prostate cancer in men? Does diet have anything to do with it? — Herman, Clearwater Beach, Fla.

Dear Herman: Before responding directly to your question, I want to emphasize that many of the studies that appear to link diet with the development of cancer are preliminary in nature. The results of these studies may indicate directions for future research, but they usually do not serve as a basis for making hard and fast decisions about dietary patterns.

The findings in one study conducted at the Roswell Park Memorial Institute in Buffalo, New York, suggest that men are more likely to develop cancer of the prostate if they consume foods high in vitamin A and fat. However, I do not tell my own patients that reducing the amount of vitamin A and fat in their diets will help them avoid the disease.

Dear Dr. Solomon: I am very diet conscious and I have cut down on my use of meat in order to lower my intake of fat. But now I find that I'm using a lot more dairy products and cereals, and I believe that these kinds of foods have a lot of salt in them. Is this true? If it is, why can't manufacturers simply cut down on the amount they use? — Linda, Newport, R.I.

Dear Linda: It is estimated that about 10 percent of the dietary intake of sodium for adults comes from dairy products and about 29 percent comes from grain and cereal products. Some of the sodium in dairy products occurs naturally; however, sodium is also used in such items as processed cheeses and cheese foods. Salt also acts as a preservative in butter. Efforts have been made to find substitutes for sodium but the substances tried have not been successful. Either they did not serve the purpose for which they were used or they produced an unsatisfactory flavor in the product.

Reducing the amount of sodium in any food would be meaningless if the product became unacceptable to the consumer. For example, there have been attempts to reduce the sodium content of bread, but conumers rejected the product because it had a bitter or a metallic taste. Additional research in developing an acceptable salt substitute is continuing.

For Cassie, The Bronx, N.Y.: A child's sensitivity to a certain food often lessens with the passage of time, but this is not always the case. Some food sensitivities may last a lifetime and this is best handled by trying to avoid the offending food. In cases where this cannot be done I test the patient for food allergy and/or hypersensitivity, and then treat the patient with the appropriate food antigen.

Drugs could do more harm than good

By The Associated Press

The prescription your doctor scribbles could hurt instead of helping if you don't ask a few questions before swallowing your pills.

The Food and Drug Administration warns that drug interactions and side effects can cause serious health problems and may interfere with the way the medicine is supposed to work.

Drugs can react with other drugs, with foods and with beverages. In some cases, the reaction may decrease the effect of the medicine which is being prescribed. An antacid, for example, will cause a blood-thinning or anticoagulant drug to be absorbed too slowly.

Other reactions can increase the effect of the drugs involved. The impact of tranquilizers, for example, may be greater if you are also taking antihistamines.

Lawyers at convention worry about their public image

NEW YORK (AP) — Rosita Stanley, a retired maintenance worker from Macon, Ga., isn't going to be the most popular person at this year's American Bar Association convention.

"It's a myth that lawyers are concerned with justice for all," she says. "They just go to law school to get rich."

Mrs. Stanley will be a rare non-lawyer among the more than 8,000 attorneys at the week-long convention opening Thursday in Atlanta. She is scheduled to represent the National Clients Council, a Washington-based nonprofit group working to expand free legal services for low-income clients, at a panel discussion Sunday on "The American Client Versus the American Lawyer."

At a time when even leaders of the profession are debating whether there are too many lawyers, Mrs. Stanley sums up the public's misgivings. "I really don't think lawyers are very sensitive people," she says. "They try to find loopholes and try to trip people up on procedures."

That's not so much different than what Thomas Jefferson said: "It is the trade of lawyers to question everything, yield nothing and to talk by the hour."

"We are regarded as more canny than candid, more as servants of our prince, as mouthpieces or hired guns, than as servants of our consciences," former White House counsel Lloyd Cutler says.

Lawyers are concerned that Americans feel that too many lawyers are dishonest, incompetent, greedy or all of the above.

A recent ABA Journal survey said lawyers think the most important issue facing the legal profession is its public image.

"There's clearly a lack of perception about what lawyers do, but it's not always the public's fault," says John Curtin Jr., the Boston lawyer who will be moderating the panel discussion on clients versus lawyers.

He says lawyers must do a better job telling the public about how they have a duty to pursue their clients' interests aggressively, about how they donate more of their time to no-fee "pro bono" cases than any other profession and about how lawyers are not necessarily to blame for lawsuits.

"Clients push their lawyers to resolve issues on the battlefield," he says.

To that end, more and more law firms are using advertising and public relations consultants, according to ABA surveys.

But if lawyers have a tarnished image, a lack of perception by the public is only part of the reason. The 270,000-member ABA, for instance, says that last year 1,878 lawyers were disciplined — disbarred, suspended, fined, reprimaned, put on probation or allowed to resign without formal action.

Inmates may help conduct experiment on AIDS

Hearst Feature Service

LOS ANGELES — Blood tests to screen for AIDS or hepatitis-B may be given to inmates of the California Rehabilitation Center as part of a proposed research project by UCLA and the California Narcotic Authority.

The tests would enable physicians to identify inmates at highest risk of catching either of the infectious diseases, both believed to be sexually transmitted, said Joe Borrielli, the CRC's health services administrator.

UCLA researchers, accompanied by Borrielli and Dr. Gene Prout, chief of health care service for the state Department of Corrections, last month toured the CRC facility in Norco to determine if it would be suitable for the project. No decision has been made yet by UCLA, which would pay for the expensive laboratory tests.

The tests would be part of a statewide effort to head off an AIDS epidemic – and the hysteria surrounding the disease – among inmates through a two-part approach: education and preventive medicine.

The first part began yesterday when the narcotic authority began distributing instructional pamphlets to CRC inmates regarding the dangers of AIDS, acquired immune deficiency syndrome, and hepatitis-B.

The pamphlet provides information on reducing the risks of contagion, such as avoiding homosexual contacts, sharing needles, toothbrushes or drinking cups.

Both AIDS and hepatitis-B are prevalent among gay men and intravenous drug users. Prisons, specifically CRC, could become a breeding ground for either disease, as Arthur Kassel, acting chairman of the CNA wrote in an introduction to the pamphlet:

"Of primary importance is the development of a means of prevention in an institutional setting such as the California Rehabilitation Center, which houses 3,100 narcotic addicts....Some of the individuals are involved in homosexual activities and others engage in intravenous drug use during their confinement."

Man's death means closure of foster home

DALLAS (AP) — A 62-year-old woman who opened her small westside home to more than 400 mentally handicapped youngsters says she will continue to care for "her" children despite her husband's death.

Bertie Jackson nurtures and teaches eight mentally handicapped children — the maximum number she is licensed to keep in her three-bedroom home by the state Department of Human Resources. She and her husband Charles have been sheltering children for 37 years.

But her husband died from a heart attack last week.

"I haven't been left alone," she told the Dallas Times Herald. "I have been left with the majesty of God's work."

Fighting back tears, she said the daughter she adopted as an infant, Sharon, now 24, will help.

"But it won't be Mommy and Daddy with their babies any more," she said.

Mrs. Jackson's youngsters include Curtis, who has had so many seizures he must wear a helmet to protect his head when he falls. There is 16-year-old Jody, who was so abused by her parents that her mind was ruined. She sits in a wheelchair because she cannot move her body. There is also Raymond, who is autistic and probably has no idea where he is.

"All right, now are you ready?" Mrs. Jackson asks the eight expectant children gathered around the dinner table.

There is no straight answer, only a groan, a moan, an attempt to speak.

Mrs. Jackson asks for the one thing that makes her happy before the children begin eating: the semblance of a prayer.

The children finally learned the words, though it took the Jacksons time to teach them.

"Jesus wept," say the children in unison.

"It was a just a beautiful environment there," said Anna Ray Griffith, a DHR caseworker. "The retarded children there were thoroughly loved, without any expectation of them to do normal things."

Another major foster home cares for the mentally handicapped in Dallas, with a large annual budget, five employees and even a board of directors.

But the Jacksons obtained what grants they could and relied on their own resources.

The couple was married in 1941. They began working at Hope Cottage, where they adopted two children. And they became foster parents, with some of the children staying a week, others six or seven years.

Mrs. Jackson keeps a picture of her husband on the coffee table and says she spends a lot of time curled up on a sofa.

"I can't help myself," she cried. "I'd like to help myself, but I can't. I've got to get up and move. I've got to tell my husband that I've given him my best I have, that I'm gonna walk through this room and miss him."

AP Laserphoto

Bertie Jackson hugs Willie Smith, one of eight foster children living in her Dallas home. Mrs. Jackson and her husband had opened their small home to more than 400 children. Last week her husband died and with his death came an end to Mrs. Jackson's caring for the mentally retarded.

Symphony's home to hear rock sounds

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Roll over Beethoven. The Boston Symphony's summer home at Tanglewood was bouncing to the beat of blaring tape decks and guitars as fans lined up for rock concert tickets.

"We've got about 200 out there now strumming guitars and listening to tapes and the box office doesn't open until 10," said music festival employee Paul Fitzgerald early Monday morning. "They are having a great time."

Young people turned out as early as 6 a.m. for the start of ticket sales for a series of Labor Day weekend concerts featuring Willie Nelson and rock artists Bette Midler and Neil Young.

"It's a madhouse. We've never had anything like this," said ticket seller Fred Bredice from the box office. Nearly all of the 5,000 reserved seats for each concert, ranging in price from $12.50 to $35, were sold out by noon.

"Sometimes, I forget what I've drawn," Baxter said. "So I duplicate a figure in the same cover."

He said he wanted to be an artist since he was a boy in rural Iowa, where he discovered he could easily copy comic strip characters.

Illinois got tough; Prisons became overcrowded

SPRINGFIELD, Ill. (AP) — A frequent television commercial last fall showed Gov. James R. Thompson standing near state troopers while they practiced marksmanship on a firing range.

With weapons recoiling in the background, Thompson looked into the camera and struck a serious, hands-on-hips stance to talk about crime. In his campaign for a second term, he took credit for putting a lot of criminals behind bars.

"And as long as I'm governor, that's where they're going to stay," said the former federal prosecutor.

But at the time, state Corrections Director Michael Lane — a Thompson appointee — was moving as many as 100 inmates a week out of prison before their sentences were fully served.

That "early-release" program helped avert a prison overcrowding problem, but now the program has been restricted by the Illinois Supreme Court.

THE JUSTICES, acting on a suit filed by local prosecutors, ruled two weeks ago that corrections officials may lop off no more than 90 days from a prisoner's sentence for good behavior. Lane had been granting two or more 90-day chunks of "meritorious service" time to some inmates to relieve overcrowding.

The decision was a setback for the state, already lagging in the race to build enough cells for swelling numbers of convicts.

The 14,000-bed system is at capacity. Lane predicted last week it will be 2,300 beds short by Jan. 1 if no emergency action is taken. By mid-1986, he said, the system should have room for 22,800 inmates — 4,500 too few.

The crunch prompted officials to adopt a "reservations" policy under which newly sentenced inmates cannot be accepted from county jails until room is available. Thompson and legislative leaders are weighing the possibility of a special General Assembly session to deal with the immediate bed shortage.

Local state's attorneys oppose the principal recommendation of a task force — a revised version of Lane's early-release program. They maintain, as they did in their lawsuit, that such releases undermine judges' sentencing authority and pose a danger to the public.

"Violent offenders are coming into our system and we can't let them out the back door," Cook County State's Attorney Richard M. Daley said.

STATE OFFICIALS and prison experts cite many reasons for the crowding crisis, which is not unique to Illinois.

One problem was a sharp increase in reported crime nationwide in the last decade. In Illinois, the crime rate rose 33.5 percent from 1972 to 1979.

But experts say the response by politicians and the criminal justice system to the increase also had a great effect on prison population, which mushroomed in Illinois from about 6,000 in 1973 to its present level.

More money and effort was poured into crime fighting, so arrests went up 24.4 percent from 1972 to 1979, convictions soared 252.3 percent and imprisonment of felons rose 141 percent.

In addition, growing sentiment for a "get-tough" approach to crime led the General Assembly to lengthen minimum prison terms for many crimes and make sentences mandatory — taking away much of the discretion formerly given judges.

AirMed is intensive care ward in the sky

Flying ambulance whisks patients anywhere in western hemisphere

Medical coordinator Dusty Sullivan, above, checks supplies aboard a Fairchild Merlin twin-engine prop jet that has been converted into a flying intensive care ward for the Phoenix, Ariz.-based Air Medical Transport. Executive Vice President Bob Ramsey, right, closes the hatch on a Air Med jet. The eight-month-old company has flown more than 150 emergency flights.

LAT Photos

By The Los Angeles Times-Washington Post News Service

PHOENIX, Ariz. — For two weeks recently, 4-year-old Orlando Espinosa IV lay close to death in a pediatric intensive care ward of a hospital here.

When his condition worsened, doctors decided that the youngster would have to be flown immediately to St. Louis Children's Hospital, where experimental treatment had been done on his rare medical problem, a type of epilepsy characterized by continuous seizures.

A call went out to Air Medical Transport, a Phoenix-based air carrier exclusively for medical flights. Within an hour Orlando was airborne in AirMed's flying intensive care ward with his parents, a nurse and a paramedic.

Soon after arrival, Orlando went into surgery and was scheduled to return home within a few days.

Orlando and scores of others have benefited from the flying ambulances operated by AirMed, as the eight-month-old company is known. Headquartered at Phoenix's Sky Harbor International Airport, it operates a fleet of six planes.

The company is one of several such operations throughout the country, including Air Medic in North Hollywood, Calif., and Schaefer's Air Service in Van Nuys, Calif.

AirMed's flagship is a new, $2.5-million, 19-passenger Fairchild Merlin IV-C twin-engine prop jet.

AirMed converted the plane at a cost of $250,000 and is ready around the clock to transport patients anywhere in the Western Hemisphere.

The company has also converted two twin-engine, nine-passenger Chieftains and three single-engine, seven-passenger Cessnas into flying ambulances.

The prop jet is equipped with vital-sign monitors, defibrillator, EKG machine, respirator, burn packs, medical oxygen and other equipment. Surgery can be performed during the flight.

During Orlando's 4-hour, 20-minute flight, his vital signs were constantly monitored. From time to time during the flight, the nurse communicated with doctors at the St. Louis hospital.

In its first seven months of operation, AirMed flew 150 emergency flights throughout the United States, to several Canadian cities, Mexico and the Bahamas, says Executive Vice President Bob Ramsey, 38, one of the company's four owners.

Six full-time and 10 part-time pilots make the flights. On call and available for emergency flights are 15 doctors, 33 nurses and 27 paramedics.

The cost to fly a patient coast to coast is about $8,000, which covers accompanying family members. On short hops within Arizona, AirMed flying ambulances are competitive with the prices of ground ambulances, Ramsey says.

It is the doctor, the highest medical authority involved in each case, who must ultimately decide that a trip by flying ambulance is vital for the patient's well-being.

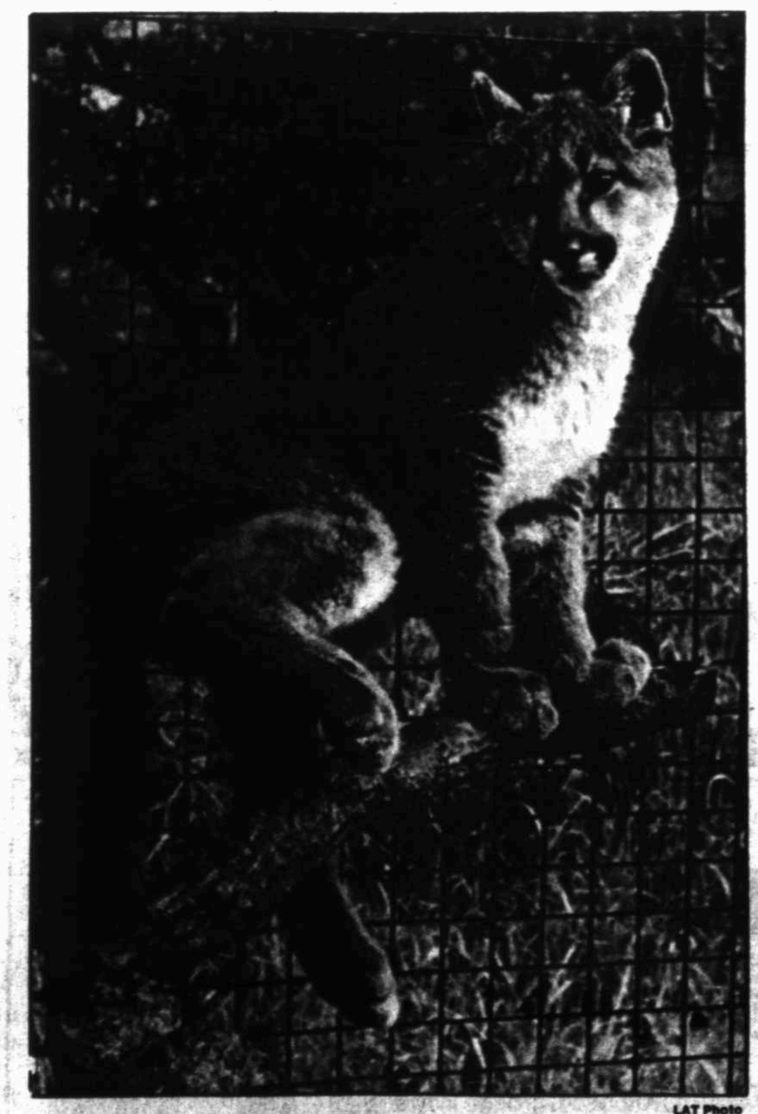
Many flights are made to transport accident victims to burn and trauma centers. Other patients already in a hospital are flown to specialized medical centers, as was little Orlando.

For example, a man with a life-threatening heart problem was flown by AirMed to Stanford University Medical Center, the only hospital able to care for his condition.

Telephone operators are on duty around the clock at AirMed's headquarters to take emergency calls and summon flight crews. Calls come in on AirMed's toll-free line from doctors with patients needing emergency flights from cities and towns throughout America. The flying ambulances are airborne within 45 minutes of the call.

Within Arizona the smaller flying ambulances are frequently used on relatively short hops to remote towns and villages and Indian reservations.

Ill, injured animals find refuge at wildlife rescue center



LAT Photo

This mountain lion, found near Redding, Calif., now lives at the George Whittell Wildlife Rescue Center at Monterey, Calif. Someone had tried to tame the lioness, making her unfit to live in the wilderness.

By The Los Angeles Times-Washington Post News Service

MONTEREY, Calif. — Ill or injured birds and animals that might otherwise perish in the wilderness areas of this vast county now have a sanctuary at the George Whittell Wildlife Rescue Center.

Operated by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals on a 200-acre facility, the center covers a 3,500-square-mile area of Monterey County that includes Los Padres National Forest and extends southward from inland Hollister to Cambria on the coast.

Three miles from the Pacific Ocean is the Santa Lucia range, where peaks rise from 3,000 to 5,000 feet. Mountain cliffs, often 1,000 feet high, drop perpendicularly to an onrushing surf, forming one of the most spectacular coastlines of California. This is Big Sur country with landmarks like the Great Tidepool at Pacific Grove, the white sandy beach at Carmel and the Point Lobos State Reserve with its cypress groves and protected sea otters gamboling offshore.

The terrain's brush-covered ravines, forests and rocky coast are also the habitat of one of the most widely diversified wildlife populations found in California. Often the birds and animals are in trouble. A baby beaked whale is discovered sick and floundering in Monterey Bay, and the animal society officers in wet suits swim out to the rescue. Other teams trained in cliff rappelling will descend a rocky bluff to save a deer trapped on a ledge. A fawn is brought to the center with a broken leg. The limb is set and a splint applied. By the time the fawn is a yearling, it will be running free in the woodlands. A murre — a bird that looks and walks like a penguin — recuperates from an illness beside the center's marine pool.

Pat Quinn, director of the Wildlife Rehabilitation Center, said "We'll be getting 400 wildlife casualties a month, which include foxes, bobcats, raccoons, squirrels and a wide variety of birds. The emphasis turns from injured animals to infant animals. We literally turn our center into a giant nursery."

The center, which opened last year, was initially funded with a $100,000 grant by the George Whittell Foundation of San Francisco. Members of Monterey County's Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals made up the difference to build the $400,000 facility, which includes custom-built cages, aviaries and a large veterinary hospital. There is a trained staff aided by unpaid volunteers.

Last year the clinic treated more than 2,000 wild animals, 326 mammals of 31 different species and 1,600 wild birds of 115 species. Birds included owls, hawks, mallard ducks, valley quail, cormorants, brown pelicans, sea gulls and surf scooters. Among animal patients were opossums, weasels, muskrats and rabbits. Although other organizations rescue specific animals, the center is unique because of the diversity of birds and wildlife with which it deals.

A 45-pound California mountain lion brought to the center by the California Department of Fish and Game is currently in residence. It was found near Redding, Calif.

"Here is an example of how people can ruin a wild animal's chance for survival in the wilderness," Quinn explained. "She was about 3 months old when we received her. She's 6 months now. It was obvious that the lion had been imprinted. That means someone tried to tame her. Mountain lions are wary of humans. They are seldom seen. Once they lose their fear of man, they are vulnerable. This one has lost that fear. Our purpose is to rehabilitate wildlife so that it may return to its natural environment. This lion can never return to the wilderness. Fortunately, we've found a good home for her in a zoo."

Barney, a barn owl, is another illustration of how someone's good intentions went wrong in attempting to make a nocturnal hunter into a household pet. He was fed a diet of raw hamburger and developed rickets because of the improper ratio of calcium and phosphates.

LAT Photo

The spotted owl was picked up with a broken wing and will remain at the George Whittell Wildlife Rescue Center until the wing is healed. It will then be returned to the wilderness to fend for itself.

City's 'Street of Ships' may sail out of decline

NEW YORK (AP) — Once South Street was alive with the bustle of stevedores, sea captains and merchants plying their trade in the shadow of tall-masted sailing ships that called at ports around the world.

But when steam supplanted sails, the "Street of Ships" went into a long decline.

Now, in the age of shopping malls, the South Street Seaport is being revived in a splash of restaurants, shops, cafes, a museum and a fish market featuring restored buildings and new construction in a $327 million project which opens to the public on Thursday.

The renaissance began in 1966 when, with a developer threatening to destroy a 12-building row of historic commercial buildings, a group of New Yorkers formed the South Street Seaport Museum, where they displayed 19th century sailing ships to recall the bustling port.

The museum also sought to restore buildings such as Schermerhorn Row, a commercial block constructed between 1810 and 1812 by shipowner and merchant Peter Schermerhorn to lease to other merchants.

"It's a special place and it does special things to people," said Lori Kranz, project manager for Rouse Co. of Columbia, Md., which is developing the area and has also done similar revitalization projects at Faneuil Hall Marketplace in Boston and Harborplace in Baltimore.

"We don't have in mind to recreate authentic replicas," says Ellen Fletcher, executive director of the South Street Seaport Museum. "We want people to make a connection, to start with the present and introduce the past."

Schermerhorn Row initially housed the counting rooms for the merchants who sold rope, wood, food and sails for the ships from Europe and Asia that crowded the port.

Sailors read posted notices on its walls, ate in restaurants like Sloppy Louie's and Sweets which still exist today. They stayed in the Fulton Ferry Hotel, which occupied the upper floors of the block.

Barrels and boxes containing spices, herbs, teas, threads and other goods were stacked outside.

Artifacts of that era turned up when builders were checking the old foundations to determine if they were sound, said Hal Reiner, project manager for the Urban Development Corp.

Workmen stumbled across shoes, clay pipes, coins and buttons, he said, and in one cellar found the well-preserved remains of a ship estimated to be 220 years old.

The ship, like the other artifacts, had been used as landfill, and was re-entombed while formal archaeological excavation continues.

The restored Schermerhorn Row will look as it did in the late 1860s, said Robert Motzkin, a project manager. Wooden gutters found tucked away in attics were copied in steel. Matching bricks had to be handmade because they are smaller than modern ones. Fresh mortar was mixed according to an old recipe.

Still to come is a pavilion of glass and steel with promenades scheduled to open next summer. It will offer views of the Brooklyn Bridge, the ships of the seaport museum and the river.

The 100-year-old bridge replaced the Fulton Ferry between the seaport and Brooklyn and may have been the beginning of South Street's long decline.

At the same time, the modern steamers of the late-19th century required the deeper waters of the Hudson River for a harbor and there were few sailing ships to dock here.

By the 1950s, all that was left of the once-vital district was the pungent aroma of fish from the Fulton Fish Market.

Cranston's advisers map new strategy for candidate

Hearst Feature Service

Sen. Alan Cranston's advisers have mapped a new strategy in his bid for the 1984 Democratic presidential nomination based on new figures from The Federal Election Commission which put their man a distant third in campaign funding.

During a weekend retreat in West Virginia, Cranston's campaign staff learned that the campaign would expand its base on two fronts, said John Russonello, campaign public relations director.

First, instead of focusing on straw polls, which Cranston has won and which have given him name recognition and "credibility," the emphasis now will be on winning as many delegates as possible in the 30 state primaries and caucuses held between now and next March 30, Russonello said.

Second, to raise more money, the campaign will concentrate on getting small contributions from "grass roots" sources, rather than going after donors apt to give the maximum of $1,000, he said.

The third-term senator, who represents the liberal wing of the Democratic Party, said he hopes to oust former Vice President Walter Mondale from the race by next April and become the "progressive alternative to (Ohio Sen. John) Glenn."

Cranston's campaign apparently has conceded big-money support to front-runners Mondale and Glenn, and will use direct-mail campaigns, live television appearances and benefit rock concerts to expand his campaign war chest another $5.5 million by the end of the year.

"The so-called fat-cat money is not coming in at a sufficient pace to bankroll the whole campaign," said Russonello yesterday. "There are a lot of candidates and there's a finite amount of that kind of money, and the field will have to get narrower before we get much of it."

Cranston's emphasis on direct negotiations with Soviet leaders to achieve a nuclear freeze is translating into a broad-based, if not particularly wealthy, political constituency, he said.

An anti-nuclear direct-mail letter has been earning $11,000 a day in small-donation checks, said Russonello.

So far, Cranston has raised about $1.1 million, excluding loans, FEC figures show. That compares to $5.6 million raised by Mondale and $2.6 million raised by Glenn. Sen. Gary Hart of Colorado is fourth with $846,000, excluding loans.

Elephant who killed man will be allowed to live

Hearst Feature Service

LOS ANGELES — Misty, the 22-year-old elephant that stomped Lion Country Safari's chief zoologist to death Sunday will be allowed to live out her life in a zoo.

Ralph Helfer, owner of the elephant and head of Gentle Jungle, a Burbank-based company that leased the animal to Lion Country for the amusement park's elephant sideshow, said this morning, "We're looking right now for a place for her, a zoo that will give her a good home."

Dismissing as "totally untrue" statements by animal trainer Howard Johnson, who is boarding Misty at his Perris ranch while Helfer hunts a home for his "prized" elephant, Helfer said Johnson "doesn't know the elephant."

Johnson told reporters that Misty was "known for hurting people" and that she "shouldn't have been at Lion Country Safari."

The Perris animal trainer said that Misty was shipped to the U.S. from Thailand in 1975. But Helfer said, "He's giving out information he's not privvy to...I raised my (19-year-old) daughter with Misty and I can tell you she's a good elephant. She's been a prized, prized animal all these years."

Lion Country Safari spokesman Harry Shuster said he was pleased to learn that Misty would not be executed and that she would likely be placed with a zoo.

"It would add further tragedy and sadness to a tragic, sad situation if they got rid of Misty," Shuster said this morning.
