Bush chooses New Hampshire judge for Supreme Court

By RICHARD CARELLI
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON (AP) – President Bush's nominee for the Supreme Court, David H. Souter, returned to the White House today for briefings on the confirmation process in the Senate, where he is certain to be grilled about his views on abortion and other divisive social issues.

White House Press Secretary Marlin Fitzwater said that the president would formally submit Souter's nomination on Wednesday, and that the nominee would then begin making the rounds of members of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Souter spent Monday night at the home of Sen. Warren Rudman, R-N.H., who actively promoted the 50-year-old federal appeals court judge from his home state.

Calling Souter "a remarkable judge of keen intellect and the highest ability," Bush said Monday that he and his advisers had deemed it "inappropriate" to ask Souter his views on specific issues.

That will be the task of the Senate Judiciary Committee, expected to hold hearings in September.

One liberal committee member, Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., pledged, "There will be a lot more known about him, I guarantee you that."

Souter, 50, spent a dozen years as a state judge before joining the Boston-based 1st U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on April 30.

If confirmed, he would become the court's 105th justice – its sixth bachelor. Never married, he lives alone on the family farm near Weare, N.H., where he moved from the Boston suburb of Melrose, Mass., when he was 11.

Souter has a reputation back home for brilliance and diligence. Outside New Hampshire, he's barely known.

The president moved quickly in announcing his intention to nominate Souter to replace Justice William J. Brennan, 84, who retired Friday because of ill health.

Bush on Monday praised Brennan, the court's longtime leading liberal, as "one of the greatest figures of our age." Brennan's departure gave Bush his first chance to name someone to the nation's highest court.

Appellate Judge David Souter, left, speaks to reporters in Washington Monday after President Bush, right, announced Souter's nomination to a seat on the Supreme Court.

If confirmed, Souter's vote may prove decisive for the future of legalized abortion, as four of the remaining eight justices appear ready to overturn the 1973 Roe vs. Wade decision that made abortion a constitutional right.

Abortion rights groups already have demanded that the Senate hearings focus on Souter's abortion views.

The increasingly conservative court also has been closely split on such issues as civil rights and criminal justice.

The reaction from key senators was restrained. Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., a Judiciary Committee member and early opponent of President Reagan's failed nomination of Robert Bork to the court, said he would wait to hear from Souter before making up his mind.

Kennedy said the Senate must determine "whether he possesses a strong commitment to the fundamental values of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights that are obviously at stake in this important nomination ...."

Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell, D-Maine, said Souter's experience as a judge and as New Hampshire's attorney general are pluses, but did not commit himself.

Sen. Strom Thurmond of South Carolina, the Judiciary Committee's ranking Republican, said he expected few if any fireworks, noting that Souter was confirmed unanimously for his 1st Circuit Court job.

But another committee member, Sen. Howard Metzenbaum, D-Ohio, said, "There is a difference between being confirmed for the appeals court and for the Supreme Court."

As a member of the New Hampshire Supreme Court for seven years, Souter established himself as a close-to-the-vest judicial conservative.

In one of the rare civil rights cases in which he participated, Souter joined the state court's ruling in 1987 that said homosexuals may be barred from becoming adoptive or foster parents. But the state court ruling also said that homosexuals may not be barred from running day care centers.

In a 1986 case, Souter joined the majority in ruling that doctors have a responsibility to test for birth defects and inform pregnant women of the option of abortion.

In a concurring opinion, Souter questioned the impact the decision would have on doctors who oppose abortion on moral grounds. He said such physicians should not have to choose "between rendering services that they morally condemn and leaving their profession in order to escape malpractice exposures."

Police officers kept busy with rash of assaults

By BEAR MILLS

A rash of assaults Monday night and early this morning resulted in four people being injured, two of them seriously.

James Floyd Williams, 27, of 401 Yeager #3, was transferred to Northwest Texas Hospital in Amarillo after being treated at Coronado Hospital for injuries sustained when he was apparently hit in the head with a baseball bat.

He was listed in satisfactory condition through press time this morning for his wounds, a nursing supervisor at Northwest Texas said.

Det. Donnie Brown said Williams was taken to Coronado Hospital by private vehicle and a suspect was identified in the attack.

Williams was reportedly assaulted at 501 Roberta at about 10:30 p.m. Monday and then was found lying there by a third party.

A resident of the home, Marion Sexton, reported the incident to police, according to police records.

Deputy Chief of Police Ken Hall described the case as "not making a lot of sense right now. They still haven't established a motive."

Darren Hathcoat, 25, of 510 Naida was arrested at his residence at 4:30 a.m. today, Brown said. After his arrest, police said, Hathcoat filed counter charges against Williams, also charging him with assault.

At 1:50 a.m. today patrol officers received a call reporting a domestic disturbance in progress at 409 Magnolia. When they arrived, they found 34-year-old Gayle Bromlow of the residence suffering from multiple cuts and what they described as "serious injuries."

An in-law of hers, 25-year-old Shane Bromlow of 452 Pitts, was also injured in the attack. He was reportedly thrown through a window of the residence during the assault.

A warrant has been issued for a third person in connection with the attacks, police said. The suspect had not been apprehended by press time, however.

No weapon was used in the attack on the two, police said. Shane Bromlow was treated and released at Coronado Hospital and Gayle Bromlow was listed in stable condition through this morning for a variety of serious contusions she suffered.

"The suspect allegedly started a fight with one of them and then they all got into it," Hall said of the circumstances surrounding the assaults.

Both Bromlows were taken to Coronado Hospital by Rural/Metro-AMT Paramedic Service ambulance for treatment.

While police were at the emergency room taking statements in that case, they were notified of yet another assault that had occurred and a stabbing victim seeking treatment at the facility.

Ricky Joe Pettit, 25, who listed his address as 307 E. Browning, reportedly told police he had been stabbed at the residence around 1:30 a.m. by a person known to him.

Hall listed the suspect in the case as a female and said Pettit was stabbed in the kitchen of the home.

The house at 307 E. Browning is reportedly where another man, 38-year-old Robert James Potter, was stabbed numerous times during an assault early Saturday morning. He is still in the intensive care unit at Coronado Hospital.

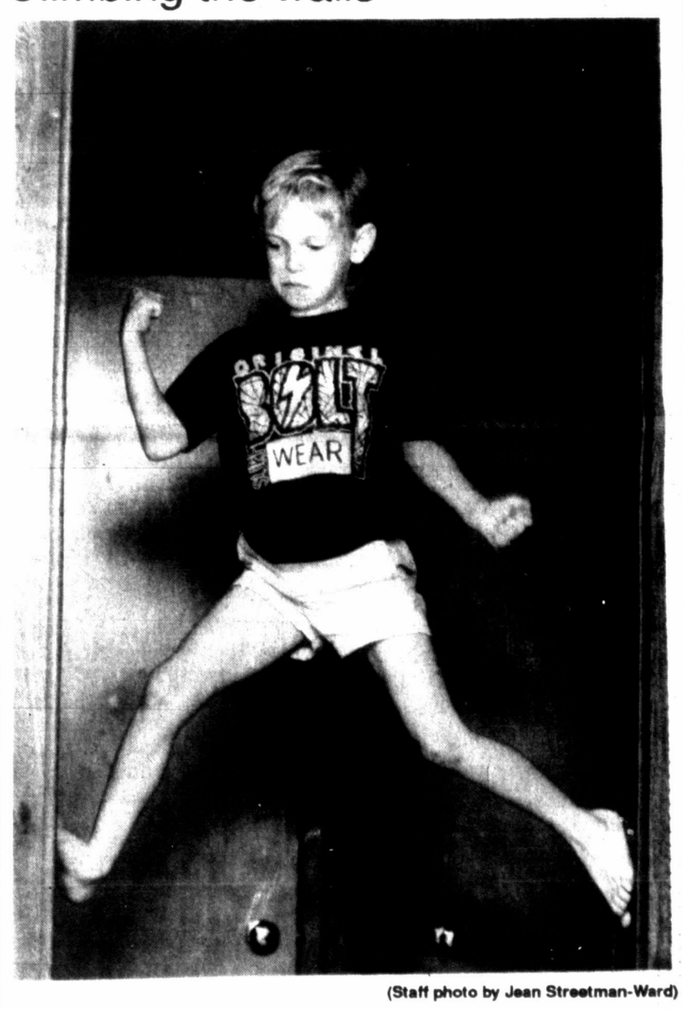

A warrant has been issued for a male suspect in that case, but he had still evaded capture through press time today.

Police said they could not say whether the two attacks were related.

Pettit was treated and released for his injuries.

Hall said police will continue to investigate the Pettit stabbing and present it to District Attorney Harold Comer for possible prosecution. No motive had been established in the stabbing, police said, adding that Pettit stated it was an unprovoked act of violence.

Arguments conclude in school finance reform case

AUSTIN (AP) – A state judge said today he doesn't know if he will rule that Texas' new school funding plan is constitutional, but he called the law a "very significant step" toward equity for poor schools.

State District Judge Scott McCown made his comments after closing arguments by attorneys in the case.

The trial on the plan began July 9, and McCown said he hopes to make a decision by October.

Poor school districts are challenging the school funding plan, which was passed in June. They say it doesn't make meaningful changes in the system declared unconstitutional last year by the Texas Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court told the state to even out funding available to rich and poor school districts.

"The rich districts will still be in the game to compete. The poor districts will not, and never have been," said Al Kauffman in closing arguments against the plan. He represents poor school districts.

State leaders defend the new plan, which would pump $528 million more state aid into schools in 1990-91. They say the plan would phase in an equitable finance system for 95 percent of students over several years.

The Supreme Court told lawmakers to bring poor districts up, not push down rich districts, said Assistant Attorney General Kevin O'Hanlon.

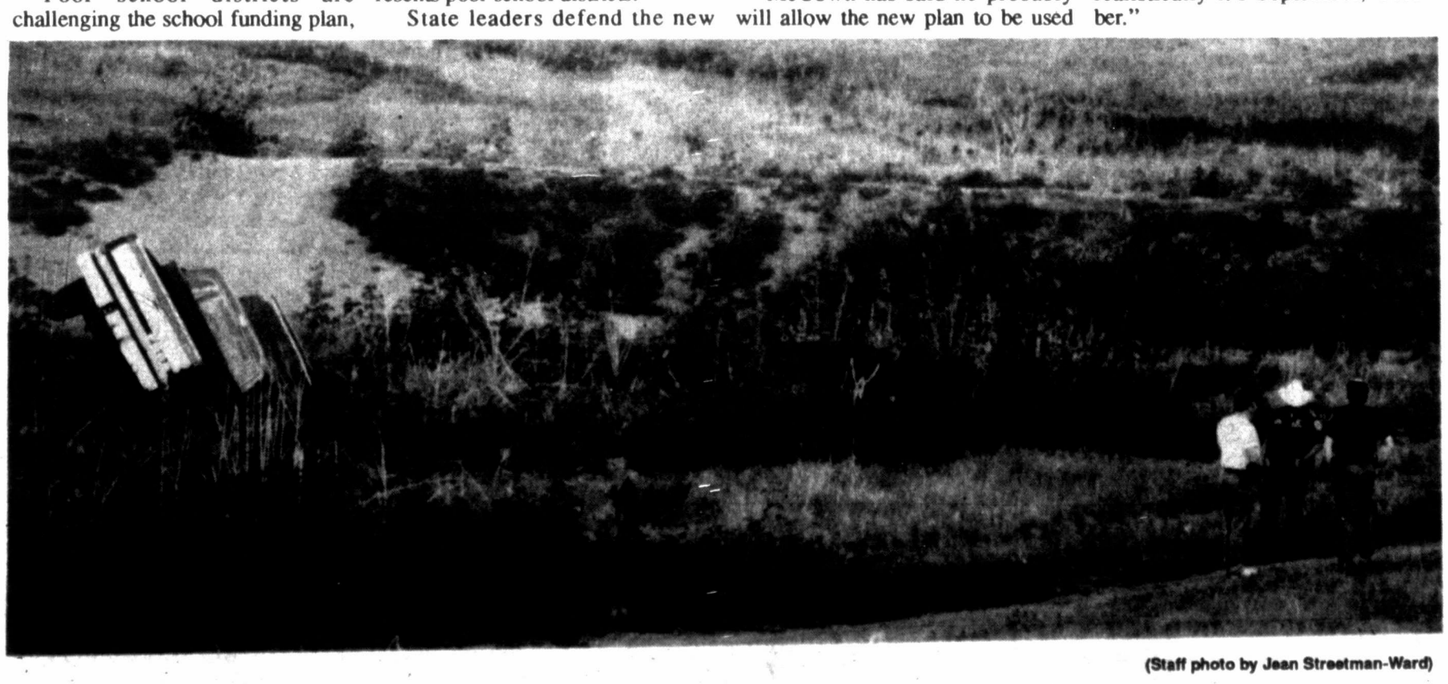

"That's what the system is designed to do," he said.

McCown has said he probably will allow the new plan to be used this school year even if he ultimately overrules it. He said halting the measure immediately could disrupt school budgets.

The school system relies on state aid, local property taxes and some federal money. School district budgets last year totaled $14.25 billion, the Texas Research League said.

McCown earlier said he hoped to decide on whether the school funding plan is constitutional by Sept. 1.

But on Monday, he said, "I think realistically it's September, October."

Stolen pickup discovered off Loop 171 this morning

Law enforcement officers were working this morning to process a vehicle, reported stolen from a Pampa residence and recovered early this morning.

The 1985 Ford pickup, owned by Chuck Morgan, 503 Magnolia, was discovered off Loop 171 by a passer-by about 6:30 a.m. today. It was off the road from Loop 171, about a mile east of Highway 70 North.

The pickup was reportedly stolen from Morgan's residence sometime between last night and the time it was discovered.

There are no suspects in the case at this time, said Deputy Chief Ken Hall of the Pampa Police Department.

"Initially we thought it was only a traffic accident, but found it was a stolen vehicle," Hall said. "One of our detectives went out and processed the vehicle."

Hall said it was unknown this morning if it had actually been wrecked or if it was left in the position it was found. "It was sitting in an unusual position. We don't know if it had been wrecked. We suspect it has been."

Although where the vehicle was found is outside the Pampa city limits, police did aid in the recovery.

"It was a case filed in our jurisdiction and recovered right outside our jurisdiction," Hall said.

The police department, Gray County Sheriff's Office and the Texas Department of Public Safety are involved in the investigation.

Area sales tax rebate checks show some up, others down

By BETH MILLER
Staff Writer

This month's sales tax rebate checks to cities and counties in Texas totaled $84 million, according to figures from State Comptroller Bob Bullock's office.

The checks include taxes collected on May sales and reported in June by businesses filing monthly returns.

In Gray County, McLean was the only city to show an increase over last year's payment at the same time. McLean received a check for $1,736.26 compared to last year's check of $1,533.95, a 13.19 percent increase. For the year to date, McLean is down 3.04 percent, having received a total of $11,465.48 this year.

The city of Pampa's $95,869.85 payment this month is down 1.02 percent from last year's payment of $96,860.74. On payments to date, Pampa is down 1.23 percent, having received $791,787.82 last year compared to the $782,023.55 received this year.

The city of Lefors is down 8.97 percent in this month's $641.79 payment compared to the $705.03 received last year. For year to date payments, Lefors is down 19.98 percent, having received $3,685.94 compared to $4,606.43 received last year.

In Carson County, total payments to date are up 1.88 percent. Although the city of Panhandle shows a slight increase – 0.39 percent – on payments this month, it is down 3.53 percent on payments to date. Panhandle received a $4,073.23 check this month compared to a $4,057.58 check received last year at the same time. For the year to date, Panhandle has received $34,233.26 compared to $35,487.42 received last year at this time.

Groom's figures this month show a 30.65 percent decrease. Groom received a payment of $1,634.47 this month compared to last year's payment of $2,356.78. For the year to date, Groom is down 6.11 percent, having received $15,246.10 last year at this time.

Skellytown is up 2.45 percent on this month's payment of $1,079.51 compared to last year's payment of $1,053.66. On payments to date, Skellytown shows an increase of 3.34 percent with $10,014.06 received so far this year as compared to $9,690.26 at the same time last year.

Although White Deer recorded a 24.58 percent decrease in its payment of $2,426.80 this month compared to the $3,217.68 payment last year, it is up 16.22 percent on payments to date. White Deer has

St. Vincent's receives program grant

St. Vincent's Catholic School was the recipient Monday of a grant that will enable the purchase of the IBM Writing to Read program.

The grant was made through the Thomas Gilcrease Foundation by Peter Denney, vice president of the Foundation.

Principal Jess Baker said he was excited about adding the laboratory to St. Vincent's school.

"In some tests it has shown that the children have a big advantage in learning to read earlier and express themselves at an earlier age," Baker said.

The program, he said, is designed for kindergartners and first-graders, although it can be expanded. He said that because of St. Vincent's size, it is planned to expand the program through the fifth grade.

Rebecca Lewis will be in charge of the program and will teach the computer classes at St. Vincent's this fall.

The program consists of four work stations, Baker explained. One station involves interplay with the computer, another uses a table with a tape recorder, earphone and book combination. A third station is a book center, and the fourth station is for the child to put down his own ideas in writing, either with the computer or by hand.

"We want to get into them the ideas of what it takes to read and write," Baker said.

The program uses positive reinforcement and teaches children to be responsible, the principal said.

Senate rejects sugar amendment to farm bill

WASHINGTON (AP) – The Senate rejected arguments today that a 2-cent reduction in the government's price support for sugar would save consumers money and help in the war on drugs.

Sen. Bill Bradley, D-N.J., tried to amend the 1990 farm bill's section on sugar with a plan to reduce the government's guaranteed producer price from 18 cents to 16 cents a pound. His proposal was defeated 54-44.

Bradley, and other opponents of the program say it works against U.S. efforts to encourage coca-producing countries to grow alternative crops because it blocks imports. Cocaine is produced from coca plants.

In order to maintain the sugar price, the government controls supply by putting strict quotas on the amount of sugar that can be sold in this country by foreign producers.

"The coca price is below the break-even point," said Bradley. "This is an opportunity for us to begin to wean some of these countries from coca production into other crops, particularly sugar."

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., said that because of drug interdiction efforts, coca prices are falling drastically.

"An important component is to guarantee that those people have some alternative means of earning a living," he said.

White Deer Rodeo set this week

WHITE DEER – The White Deer Rodeo is set this week for Thursday, Friday and Saturday with a dance nightly following the rodeo.

Rodeo performances begin at 8 p.m. each night, according to organizers.

On Thursday night, ticket holders will receive free barbecue. And the Amarillo Sky Divers are scheduled to make an appearance before Thursday night's rodeo, weather permitting.

Entries for the rodeo events will be taken until 6 p.m. today at Wheeler-Evans west elevator, and from 9 a.m. to noon on Wednesday. For more information, call 883-5651.

The rodeo dance each night will be held on an open air slab at the rodeo arena with the band Single Tree of Elk City, Okla., performing.

A rodeo parade will begin at 4 p.m. Saturday and will travel downtown in the city.

This year's rodeo is sponsored by the White Deer Riding Club and the White Deer Lions Club. The stock for the rodeo will be furnished by Allen McCloy of Morse.

House panel seeks expanded HUD probe

WASHINGTON (AP) – A congressional panel asked a special prosecutor today to broaden his probe of former Housing Secretary Samuel Pierce. The panel said it has evidence that Pierce steered money to clients of his former law firm and may have committed perjury.

In urging independent counsel Arlin Adams to expand his investigation, the House Government Operations housing subcommittee said its 14-month-long probe uncovered "widespread abuses, influence peddling, blatant favoritism, monumental waste and gross mismanagement" at HUD.

The subcommittee specifically asked Adams to widen his investigation into three areas of possible wrongdoing:

• Whether Pierce committed perjury during the only appearance before the subcommittee, on May 25, 1989, in which the former Cabinet officer gave detailed testimony. The congressional panel said many of Pierce's statements were contradicted by subsequent testimony. Pierce essentially maintained that he did not play a direct role in the awarding of housing projects.

• Whether Pierce conspired with others to steer HUD business to clients of Battle, Fowler, Jaffin and Kheel, the Wall Street law firm where Pierce formerly had been a partner. It also questions whether Pierce conspired with his former top aide, Lance Wilson, in connection with contract awards.

• Whether Pierce and other HUD officials "conspired to defraud" the government in the handling of the Department of Housing and Urban Development's coinsurance program, which provided backing for housing development projects during the Reagan administration from 1981-89.

The letter came as the eight-member panel neared an end to its investigation of the HUD scandal.

A subcommittee source, discussing the panel's role on grounds of anonymity, said no more hearings are scheduled. The aide said the subcommittee hopes to complete a final report, with recommendations for reforms at HUD, sometime in late August.

The letter said documents found in HUD files show that Pierce's former law firm frequently sought Pierce's assistance in HUD-related matters. It said they included having Pierce meet with a client to discuss a development grant application and helping securing lucrative housing subsidies.

ARCO plant workers cited safety problems to relatives

By EVAN RAMSTAD
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON (AP) – Two of the workers who died in a Channelview chemical plant explosion had problems turning down overtime hours and getting responses to safety suggestions, relatives say.

Both workers had told relatives they were worried about the ARCO plant's safety. A three-story tank at the plant blew up July 5, killing 17, including 11 contract laborers.

Sandy Davis, whose husband Greg was killed in the blast, tearfully told a House panel Monday that she could tell there'd been an explosion because one of the plant's tall exhaust pipes was burning. Several exhaust pipes regularly burn, but her husband had warned her the tall one won't unless something is wrong.

"I knew he was there. I knew he was dead," she said.

As a contract worker, Davis got less training, less pay and fewer benefits than ARCO's regular employees at Channelview, she said. He did not have the right to turn down overtime work, Mrs. Davis said.

Neither did regular ARCO workers, said Bernard Blackstock, father of victim Jack Blackstock.

"If they refused this overtime, they put a bad mark on your record," Blackstock said.

"People should not have to put their lives on the line in order to make a living," said Lynn Williams, president of the United Steelworkers of America, which represents 50,000 chemical workers.

The testimony angered members of the House employment and housing subcommittee, which oversees the Occupational Safety and Health Administration.

"There's not a chance in hell I'd work for a chemical plant unless I had a 1-year-old child and was out of work," said Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., referring to Davis, whose widow said he took the ARCO job after being unemployed for six months and becoming a new father.

OSHA chief Gerald Scannell said the agency has proposed new safety rules for the chemical industry. But the rules aren't being put into place fast enough, said two Houston congressmen, Democrat Mike Andrews and Republican Jack Fields.

"Waiting on studies is not necessary," Andrews said.

But Fields cautioned, "It is doubtful that the government, or any particular company, can ever completely guarantee that something isn't going to go wrong."

Rep. Tom Lantos, D-Calif., who chairs the panel, said 40 workers had been killed at chemical companies since the October explosion that killed 23 at a Phillips plastics plant in Pasadena, Texas.

"This simply is intolerable and unacceptable," Lantos said.

OSHA has cited Phillips for 575 "willful and serious" violations and fined the company $5.7 million. Phillips has appealed. The agency is still investigating the Channelview incident, Scannell said.

As in Pasadena, many of the victims at the Channelview plant were contract laborers. OSHA began a study of the use of contract laborers at chemical plants after the Phillips incident. The study, being written at Lamar University's John Gray Institute, is expected to be complete this fall.

ARCO uses such workers for "ongoing capital programs" at all its plants, said Harold Sorgenti, president of ARCO Chemical Co. He estimated ARCO saved $600,000 to $750,000 in salary and benefits annually by using the contract laborers at Channelview.

The contract workers were not covered by ARCO's life or health insurance. But the families of all 17 victims are receiving $250,000 with no strings attached, Sorgenti said.

John Blackstock contributed to an anonymous letter sent recently to plant managers seeking changes in the operation, his father said. The workers did not want to sign their names because they were afraid they'd be fired, he said.

Suggestions were received well by direct supervisors but were often rejected later in ARCO's management chain, Blackstock said his son told him.

Sorgenti said he was troubled the workers could not make suggestions openly.

"We've tried to have open communication," Sorgenti said, noting suggestion boxes, frequent safety meetings and incentive programs for new ideas.

Court monitor says state still not in compliance on MHMR

AUSTIN (AP) – Two years after the deadline, Texas still hasn't complied fully with key court-ordered reforms in the care of mentally retarded residents in state schools, a monitor of the situation says.

"There remain significant problems in compliance, and that means there remain significant problems in the quality of care that is being provided," said Linda O'Neall, a Florida sociologist.

Ms. O'Neall, who is the appointed federal court monitor of the reforms, and a team of experts reviewed conditions at Austin State School and state schools in San Antonio, Fort Worth and Denton, the Austin American-Statesman reported Tuesday.

Their report to U.S. District Judge Barefoot Sanders in Dallas evaluates medical, educational and behavioral programs, and the prevention of abuse and neglect.

"No school is in complete compliance with all provisions" of the court order, O'Neall said.

But an attorney for the state criticized the new report, saying the Texas Department of Mental Health and Mental Retardation is in substantial compliance with court orders.

Dona Hamilton, an assistant Texas attorney general, said the court monitor evaluated areas not covered by court orders.

The new report "doesn't reflect the services being provided at state schools," Hamilton said. "It doesn't reflect reality."

Jaylon Fincannon, deputy MHMR commissioner for mental retardation, said, "Some of the things she (O'Neall) believes we're not in compliance with, we believe we are."

There are 13 state schools for retarded people in Texas. The Austin, San Antonio, Denton and Fort Worth institutions are named in a 16-year-old federal lawsuit against the state.

Sanders, who oversees the case, had ordered the four schools to make key improvements by April 1988. His order came after his 1987 ruling that Texas was providing an unconstitutional level of care to state school residents.

The court monitor's report released Monday said the quality of care varied among the four state schools, and that some provided good care in certain areas while offering inadequate care in other areas.

At Austin State School, for example, O'Neall found that investigation of abuse and neglect has improved significantly, but the school has insufficient psychiatric services and fails to adequately use behavior programs instead of antipsychotic drugs.

All the schools were criticized for providing inadequate care to residents who are both mentally retarded and mentally ill. Some of these so-called dually diagnosed people have injured other state school residents, the report said.

At Fort Worth State School, a 10-year-old profoundly retarded girl with medical problems was found dead hours after a nurse tried three times to insert a nasal feeding tube but stopped because blood or mucous appeared. A doctor was not called, and the girl missed three feedings. She was found dead later.

Hamilton said the nurse who bungled the feeding tube resigned in lieu of being fired. But the nurse's actions did not cause the girl's death, Hamilton said.

At San Antonio State School, a resident with both mental retardation and mental illness was given conflicting diagnoses every few months when his doctor was changed.

The change in diagnosis was nothing more than two doctors having a professional disagreement, Hamilton said.

The state filed a plan of correction that accompanied O'Neall's report, but Hamilton said the plan is not an acknowledgement of noncompliance with court orders.

The lawyer representing the retarded plaintiffs in the long-running lawsuit criticized the state's plan, and asked the federal judge to punish the state for repeatedly breaking pledges to reform state schools.

"Another (state correction) plan is a waste of time," said David Ferleger of Philadelphia. "This state has to be punished. This state has to be publicly condemned for flouting a federal court order because plans don't work."

Iraq accuses Kuwait of conspiracy with U.S., masses troops on border in military threat

By SALAH NASRAWI
Associated Press Writer

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) – The Iraqi government accused Kuwait today of conspiring against it with the United States, and diplomats said the neighbors' tense confrontation has been aggravated by Iraq's massing of troops on Kuwait's border.

The border buildup began last week and coincided with a verbal assault on Kuwait by President Saddam Hussein and threats of military action.

He accused the small oil-rich state of stealing $2.4 billion worth of oil from wells on Iraqi territory and of seeking to wreck his country's economy by overproducing oil and thus pushing down prices.

Diplomats in Iraq and Persian Gulf states said that soon after the dispute erupted travelers saw battlefield missiles, armored personel carriers and tanks prominently displayed along the road from Iraq to Kuwait.

Kuwait put its own forces on alert for several days, but the diplomats, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the alert was canceled to defuse tension. They could not provide estimates for the number of Iraqi troops, but the Washington Post today quoted Western military attaches as saying two divisions of the Republican Guards Corps, or 30,000 men, were moved to the southern border.

That would dwarf the entire armed forces of Kuwait, which has 20,300 men.

Diplomats called the Iraqi move brinksmanship, and did not expect it to invade Kuwait. But the reports sent jitters through world financial markets.

The government newspaper Al-Joumhouriya accused Kuwait of coordinating its moves with the United States in order to "clear the way for foreign powers to intervene in the area."

The United States has at least seven warships in the gulf at any given moment, and the State Department announced at the beginning of the crisis that it backs Kuwait's territorial integrity.

The Washington Post also said that the U.S. Navy had canceled shore leaves for its forces in the Persian Gulf and that warships were being prepared to get under way. Persian Gulf sources would not immediately confirm the move.

President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt arrived in Baghdad today to try to mediate and said he would propose to Saddam that the foreign ministers of Iraq and Kuwait meet in Cairo to discuss the dispute.

The Iraqi newspaper accused Kuwait of ignoring Arab solidarity and the spirit of brotherhood by asking Iraq to repay the Kuwait financial assistance during the 1980-88 war with Iran.

"The Kuwaiti government should have written off all the debts at the moment Iraq asked it to do so," the paper said.

Kuwait lent Iraq an estimated $15 billion during the war out of a total $70 billion Iraq is believed to have borrowed.

The attempts to repay the debt and rebuild the economy is putting massive financial pressure on Iraq. These economic problems are the source of Saddam's attack on Kuwait, as he as long sought to insulate Iraqis from the repercussions of the war.

Cold War rhetoric daily fare in North Korea

By DAN BIERS
Associated Press Writer

TOKYO (AP) – This just in: U.S. army of imperialist aggression continues to support the traitor Roh Tae-woo and his puppet South Korean government of satanic hooligans.

Flashback to the Cold War?

No, just the world according to Communist North Korea's official news agency, where strident, near hysterical, name-calling of longtime enemies remains daily fare and helps keep tension high on the Korean Peninsula.

In the era of "glasnost" in the Soviet Union and a crumbling socialist world, reports from North Korea's Central News Agency seem an anachronism – final dispatches from the Cold War front.

Some examples of recent articles from the news agency, often quoting other North Korean media, monitored in Tokyo:

• The official Korean Roman Catholics Association was quoted as calling Seoul's arrest of South Koreans who traveled to the north a "human strangulation which can be committed only by satanic hooligans without an iota of human reason and national conscience."

• The United States, which fought with the south against the north 40 years ago, is the "midwife and wirepuller of the DLP (the governing party in Seoul)."

• GIs stationed in South Korea are "soldiers of the U.S. imperialist aggression army."

• President Roh Tae-woo of South Korea is usually referred to as a "traitor." He is forever up to something "sinister."

Among the names given his followers are "group of heinous stranglers of democracy" or simply "gangsters." They pass legislation "further fascistizing the South Korean socio-political life" or they try "with bloodshot eyes to obliterate" democratic forces in the south.

The North Korean media were a bit more gracious after Roh announced last week a proposal to open the border between the rival nations. He was called the "South Korean chief executive" in reports on his proposal, but a few days later he was a "traitor" again.

In comparison with the North Korean media, the few other remaining hard-line Communist nations tend to use language not quite so vitriolic.

Vietnam's media, for example, are using the once standard "U.S. imperialists" less frequently as Hanoi seeks to improve relations with Washington.

Neutral terms such as the "government in Washington" appear as frequently as "Yankee aggression" in the official Cuban news agency, Prensa Latina.

And in Communist China, state-run media forgo the use of nasty adjectives on reports about the rival Nationalist Chinese government on Taiwan.

Castro's island feeling pinch as Soviet Union slows its energy aid

By GEORGE GEDDA
Associated Press Writer

HAVANA (AP) – In some areas of Cuba, oxen are replacing gas-guzzling tractors. In Havana, office workers are being asked now and then to do without air-conditioning. Fuel at most state enterprises has been cut back 10 percent.

And this could be only the beginning.

Cubans are bracing for tough times, the result in part of last year's democratic upheaval in Eastern Europe and the prospect that Cuba may no longer be able to count on Soviet generosity to buttress its economy.

For years, Cuba has suffered from a U.S. trade and financial embargo.

But now, all over the island, Cubans are being warned at town meetings that additional belt tightening may be around the corner if bargain-rate Soviet oil supplies, averaging about 90 million barrels annually, are cut off and there is no money to tap alternate sources.

Soviet deliveries already have slowed, and President Fidel Castro alluded to the problem in a speech last month:

"Stubborn realities are there. We constantly have to think in terms of less and less fuel. We have to tell the truth."

An added concern is that Soviet officials have spoken publicly about the possibility of a phased reduction of overall Soviet economic assistance to Cuba, a windfall estimated by some at $4 billion to $5 billion a year.

U.S. sources have said there has been a marked decline in purchases of Cuban sugar by the Soviet Union at prices substantially higher than world market levels, a form of subsidy for the Cuban economy.

President Bush has been appealing to the Soviets to cut Castro off. The United States has expressed reluctance to provide direct aid to the troubled Soviet economy as long as Moscow sends billions of rubles to Cuba.

"Special period in peacetime" is the somewhat benign sounding name for the draconian measures Castro has in mind in the event Cuba has to go it alone.

To show that he means business, dress rehearsals are being held around the island to give Cubans a taste of what may lie ahead.

Oxen are being tried out on farms in western Cuba.

Under the most extreme austerity measures, thousands could be thrown out of work in Havana, partly because a suspension of most bus service would make it impossible for many to commute.

Under the worst case scenario, Castro has said that all housing construction would be halted immediately and the manufacture of adult clothing would be suspended.

Not all enterprises would be affected. Cuba's ambitious tourism program, slated to bring an almost five-fold increase in the number of foreign visitors to 1.5 million by 1995, would be spared.

Castro is discovering somewhat belatedly what his non-Communist predecessors here knew all along: As earners of foreign exchange, Cuba's biggest assets are its tropical climate and its miles of sandy beaches.

Some Cuban officials believe that a shift in trading partners from the former socialist bloc to Western industrialized nations will brighten Cuba's economic prospects over the long run.

Castro has complained bitterly about the low quality products sent by Eastern European countries to Cuba in exchange for prized Cuban exports such as sugar, citrus fruit and nickel.

Cuba may now be able to use these exports to buy high quality goods from the capitalist West, the officials said. But reshaping foreign trade relationships takes time, and for now, the future is extraordinarily bleak.

Sheriff investigating El Paso bail-bond companies

EL PASO (AP) – Law enforcement officials are investigating complaints that bail bond companies are making illegal profits by not returning customers' money when their bond is lowered.

The El Paso County Sheriff's Department has been investigating since spring when the department began receiving a number of complaints against local bail-bond companies, Mike Navarro, El Paso County Bail Bond Board administrator, told the El Paso Herald-Post.

"We never had any complaints up until this year. It was weird, because people suddenly began calling me," Navarro said.

About 20 bail-bond clients have complained to Navarro, and five people have complained to the Texas Attorney General's office in El Paso, the Herald-Post reported Monday.

The customers have said their money is not being returned and they are not being informed when their bond is lowered.

Bond is used to ensure that a suspect who has been released from jail will not flee to avoid prosecution.

But several bonding companies are making profits without notifying their clients, the Herald-Post reported, citing unidentified sources.

For example, a bail-bond business will post a $100,000 bond for a criminal suspect. The person will pay a portion of the bail – usually 10 percent, or $10,000. In return, the company deposits the remainder, $90,000, with the court.

After a suspect is released from jail, a bail-bond company lawyer files a motion to reduce the $100,000 bond.

By lowering a bond, a bonding company makes a profit. If, for example, bond is reduced to $10,000, the client's required portion to bail out is $1,000.

The problem is that some bail-bond companies do not tell their clients that their bonds were reduced, and the clients aren't given refunds to make up for the difference in the lower bond.

This newspaper is dedicated to furnishing information to our readers so that they can better promote and preserve their own freedom and encourage others to see its blessings. Only when man understands freedom and is free to control himself and all he possesses can he develop to his utmost capabilities.

We believe that freedom is a gift from God and not a political grant from government, and that men have the right to take moral action to preserve their life and property for themselves and others.

Freedom is neither license nor anarchy. It is control and sovereignty of oneself, no more, no less. It is, thus, consistent with the coveting commandment.

Government zapping the computer industry

A new bill should be snipped before it electrocutes the U.S. computer industry. Introduced by Sen. Don Riegle, it would give the Treasury Department vast powers to stop the production of computer software, laser printers, optical scanners, and other equipment that might be used in counterfeiting. Kenneth A. Wasch, executive director of the Software Publishers Association, warned that "many ... legal activities may now be made illegal ... even though they are in use everywhere."

Last week the Treasury Department testified before the Senate Banking Committee that new computers and laser printers have made counterfeiting easier. And William J. Ebert of the Secret Service testified that $13.8 million in fake money was passed last year in the U.S.; $75.2 million more was seized before being circulated. An additional $103 million was seized in foreign countries.

The way to fight counterfeiting is not to strap chains around a burgeoning industry. In one section of the computer industry – software, U.S. firms control 70 percent of the world market. It would be insane to give our competitors such a leg up with this legislation. Even if the government did sabotage our computer industry, foreign computer companies would still produce equipment that counterfeiters could use.

There are two better ways counterfeiting could be curtailed. First, the government should use the new technologies themselves to devise new ways to print money that would thwart counterfeiters. Treasury already is placing a mylar thread into bills, revealed only by indirect light. Bills could be redesigned, or different colors used.

A second way to guard against counterfeiting would be even better: privatize the production and distribution of money. This has been proposed by Nobel Prize economist Friedrich Hayek, whose economic ideas are jumping lightning-fast across Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. Private banks would issue their own currency, and you would be paid in whatever currency you would agree on with your employer.

This would introduce competition, forcing private banks to find ways to make money counterfeit-proof. Moreover, such banks would insure that their money's value was not eroded by inflation. As things are now, the Federal Reserve, which holds the government monopoly to print money, incompetently manages to stick us with 5 percent inflation a year, and even gave us double-digit inflation in the early 1980s.

The solution to the counterfeiting problem is not to enslave the computer industry, but to privatize the money industry.

Pro-life cause wins a round

Stephen Chapman

A year ago, in the wake of a Supreme Court decision that induced mass outrage in the pro-abortion movement, politicians who had previously voted to restrict abortion were saying, "Hey, folks, I was only kidding."

Candidates for office abandoned old positions quicker than Eastern European communists. Congress shifted perceptibly toward a more permissive attitude about abortion. Faced with the danger of a sharp reversal in public attitudes, the impulse among politicians was to retreat first and explain later.

But the predicted public reversal never came. The Supreme Court's Webster decision, which only modestly altered the legal status quo, had even less effect on popular opinion. And some of the members of Congress who ran for cover when storm clouds gathered have begun venturing outside again.

Groups favoring abortion on demand insist they represent the "pro-choice majority." In fact, Americans, who have always been somewhere between ambivalent and confused about abortion, are mostly in the muddled middle.

The latest Time/CNN poll found that 55 percent of those asked believe abortion should be banned in all circumstances or allowed only in such cases as rape, incest and danger to the mother's health. At the same time, 71 percent say the decision should be up to the pregnant woman and her doctor. You figure it out. And the results are essentially identical to those before the Webster verdict.

This sort of evidence isn't enough to make sunshine patriots into heroes, but it may reassure some wavering allies of the pro-life cause that they can vote against abortion without excessive risk. That's a good thing, because there are plenty of legislative battles to be fought.

The pro-life movement won an important one recently when the House refused to give family planning money to two organizations that promise abortion abroad, the International Planned Parenthood Federation (IPPF) and the United Nations Fund for Population Activities.

The circumstances should have helped the pro-choicers: The $1.5 million wouldn't have gone for abortions, and the aid was designed for Romania, where contraception was banned along with abortion under the Ceausescu dictatorship.

But most House members understood that the bill was more dangerous than it looked. It was the first round of a fight over two pro-life policies established by President Reagan, upheld by Congress and reaffirmed by President Bush.

The first was providing foreign aid for family planning only through organizations that don't provide or promote abortion – excluding Planned Parenthood. The second was refusing to underwrite the UN agency as long as it supports the coercive population control activities of the Chinese government, which include forced abortions, sterilizations and even infanticide.

Americans who oppose abortion have had to tolerate its legal availability. But thanks to the Hyde Amendment, which bars federal Medicaid funds for abortion, they at least haven't had to help finance it in their own country. The issue behind the Romania vote was whether they ought to be forced to finance it in other countries.

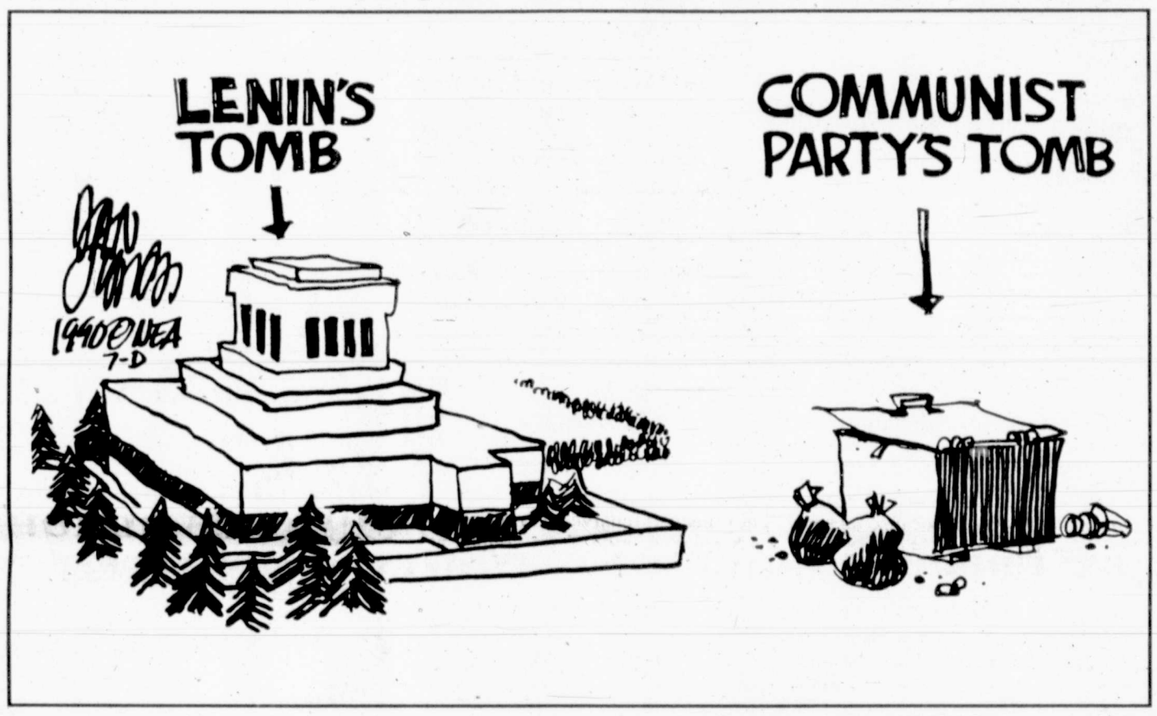

Bush, who threatened a veto of this bill, takes the position that financing groups which provide and promote abortion is only slightly better than financing abortion itself. To make sure it doesn't subsidize the destruction of unborn children, the United States channels its family planning aid through groups that agree not to engage in such activities.

Planned Parenthood has refused to accept any constraints on its endangerment of fetuses. It apparently thinks the people of the Third World, if they can't have abortion, shouldn't have contraception either.

UNFPA is worse still. It plays a substantial role in China's population control program, which the agency describes as "totally voluntary" – even though a Chinese woman's right to choose abortion doesn't always mean the right not to choose it. Try to imagine the House of Representatives considering funds for UNFPA if it were helping the South African government force abortions on black women.

Fortunately, the House refused to strike a blow for such policies. The National Right to Life Committee reports that 52 members who voted in favor of funding UNFPA last year voted against it this year, suggesting that abortion advocates are losing ground.

This is one skirmish in a war that could last for years or decades. But it's proof that the pro-life cause is more formidable than its enemies had hoped.

Today in history

By The Associated Press

Today is Tuesday, July 24, the 205th day of 1990. There are 160 days left in the year.

Today's Highlight in History:

On July 24, 1959, during a visit to the Soviet Union, Vice President Richard M. Nixon entered into an impromptu debate with Soviet leader Nikita Khrushchev on the merits of capitalism versus Communism. The confrontation became known as the "Kitchen Debate" because it took place in a model kitchen at a U.S. exhibition.

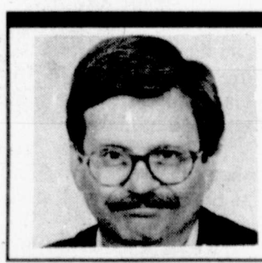

On this date:

In 1783, Latin American revolutionary Simon Bolivar was born in Caracas, Venezuela.

In 1847, Mormon leader Brigham Young and his followers arrived at Great Salt Lake City in Utah.

In 1862, the eighth president of the United States, Martin Van Buren, died in Kinderhook, N.Y.

Call it by some better name

Lewis Grizzard

Nelson Mandelamania has not subsided, even though freedom's hero now has left our shores and is somewhere else seeking money and support for his African National Congress' fight against apartheid in South Africa.

In Atlanta, where Mandela visited recently, I heard from a couple of sources that there might even be a movement afoot to name Interstate 285, the city's perimeter freeway, after Mandela.

If I were Nelson Mandela, I wouldn't want my name associated with anything which causes so much pain for so many people.

Interstate 285, designed by that famous road builder, Marquis de Sade, is a parking lot during peak traffic hours, which used to be from 7 to 9 in the morning and from 4 until 6 in the afternoon.

But Atlanta grew up and now it has rush weeks. At some point on I-285, at any hour, there's a traffic tie-up.

I was driving on I-285 once and up ahead of me a truck loaded with cantaloupes had jackknifed.

Cantaloupes, hundreds of them, were strewn all over both sides of the interstate.

The driver of the truck wasn't injured, but traffic stopped completely while motorists jumped out of their cars and loaded up with all the cantaloupes they could carry.

I happen to hate cantaloupe because my mother made me eat one every morning while I was growing up.

I used to say to myself, "If I ever get out of here, I'll never eat another cantaloupe.

I haven't. But I was stuck on I-285 for an hour one day while those who obviously didn't grow up over-cantalouped, went on a cantaloupe looting binge.

The problem with I-285 is the same problem with most interstates. They can't widen it fast enough to keep up with the increase of traffic that uses it.

Build four lanes, and suddenly you need six. Add two more, and you need eight. Interstate 285 should be named Circle of Hell.

Or if we really want to name I-285 for a person, it should be named for former Braves pitcher, Pascual Perez, last seen with the New York Yankees.

Remember the story? The Braves were actually in a peanut race several years ago, but they were also in a horrible slump.

Pascual was supposed to pitch one night, but he didn't show up until the game was almost over.

The native of the Dominican Republic drove his car onto I-285 and headed for Atlanta stadium.

But he could never figure out where to get off, so he drove around and around the city for hours.

His teammates got so cracked up about Pascual's circle route, they loosened up and went on to win the pennant despite themselves.

The same is also supposed to have happened to a Michigan couple, the Winowskis, who were on their way to Florida.

They couldn't find any way to get off I-285 either, and stayed on it for three days.

They were found exhausted, and suffering from extreme cases of vertigo in their car, which they finally parked in an I-285 emergency lane.

"The poor devils were hallucinating and thought they were in Disney World," said an officer at the scene. "They kept asking us if we knew where they could find Goofy and buy a pair of sandals."

I'd say let's keep I-285 nameless. If we really want to name something after Nelson Mandela, perhaps the better choice would be the Georgia Tech football stadium where he spoke.

After all, he put 50,000 people in there, about twice what Tech averages for home football games.

Mandela Stadium - home of the Yellow Jackets. It's got a ring to it.

Will voters begin 'thinking anew'?

By SARAH OVERSTREET

I imagine Peggy Noonan thought the catchy phrase she wrote for George Bush during the last presidential campaign, "Read my lips," was awfully cute. I thought it sounded more like the kind of thing 8th-graders say to each other before a put down:

"Why can't I go to the mall with you guys? I won't do anything dumb this time, I promise."

"Read my lips, Dweeb. No geeks allowed."

"But Mr. Bush given the monumental deficit and the specter of automatic Gramm-Rudman cuts kicking in, can you really promise you won't ask for any new taxes?"

"Read my lips. I said no new taxes."

No matter which way the president decides to attack the deficit, he's finally acknowledged that he is willing to renege on his election campaign pledge of "no new taxes." He calls this "thinking anew."

He may call it "thinking anew", his critics may call it reneging and imagine Michael Dukakis might call it finally telling the truth after a couple years of lying. I call it making a statement he had no business making. It is just plain irresponsible to promise voters, in a nation burdened with a staggering debt that threatens the economic well-being of all, that under no circumstance will he call for new taxes.

Now that doesn't mean that George Bush is a bad man, at least no more so than Dukakis, the guy who took credit for the "Massachusetts Miracle" that turned out to be an economic fluke that had nothing to do with his savvy leadership.

But "thinking anew" is common practice for politicians and bureaucrats. I think the question now is how much longer are we voters going to put up with it?

Among the voters who were fed the "no new taxes" line are union workers who made wage and benefit concessions to management. They did so with the understanding that jobs would be saved and retirement programs protected. When jobs weren't saved and retirement benefits programs were pillaged, managers said they had made those promises in good faith, but things just didn't go as they'd expected.

Also among those voters are people who trusted the promises of savings and-loan officers. As it turned out, they used customers' money with about as much care as a dog uses a chicken carcass. The rest of us will be picking up the tab for the fiscal carnage till we're dead.

There are people who lost their jobs because their companies could no longer compete in the open market place. How could they when their products are competing against goods made in foreign countries by poor people working in sweatshop conditions for a fraction of the cost, or else against goods that are produced here in the United States by industries that exploit illegal aliens?

There are people who spent big chunks of their laboring lives working for companies that promised benefits after the magical 10-or 20-year plateaus, only to be "let go" shortly before becoming eligible.

There are people to whom the 1986 tax "reform" meant that even more of their inadequate earnings would be chipped away while wealthier taxpayers gained.

I wonder what they all must be thinking now, as the president tells them he's reconsidered his promise; that he's "thought anew."

I hope they're thinking of becoming politically active.

Texas universities vie for piece of super collider action

WAXAHACHIE (AP) – Colleges and universities throughout Texas are positioning themselves for roles in the important scientific projects that result from construction of the super collider project in Ellis County, about 35 miles south of Dallas.

A diverse group of physicists, chemists, engineers, geologists, archaeologists and other scientists at colleges and universities throughout the state have jumped on the super collider bandwagon.

"It's a tremendously big pie, and it can stand being cut into many pieces," said Wendell Nedderman, president of the University of Texas at Arlington.

"You could put this machine on an island in the South Pacific, without an intellectual infrastructure, and it would wither and not survive," said Ed Bingler, executive director of the Texas National Research Laboratory Commission.

Universities have provided academic expertise, financial support and, in some cases, office space for the budding project. As part of the state's proposal to land the super collider, universities with research capabilities said they'd commit resources to collider-related fields.

The state's higher education officials say they are banking on the collider to help their faculty recruitment efforts. Some teachers already have been lured by its attractions.

For example, the SSC attracted Dennis Judd, one of the few African-American high energy physicists in the country, to Prairie View A&M University near Houston. He is leading a collaborative effort of 14 universities for a center at Prairie View that would do research on particle detectors, devices that identify the atomic particles on their route through the collider.

Judd's proposal has paired seven historically black colleges and universities with seven larger research institutions. The aim is to use this relationship to encourage more minorities to enter the field of high energy physics. It is one of 12 proposals involving 50 or 60 universities under review by the Texas National Research Laboratory Commission.

Vigdor Teplitz is a former physics department chairman at Virginia Polytechnic Institute who had served in several capacities at the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency in Washington since 1978.

Teplitz said he contacted SMU because of the opportunity it offered to build a university physics department near the collider. SMU's department had been depleted because of several faculty retirements and resignations.

"I saw a unique opportunity to restructure it in some way to take maximum advantage of the SSC," he said.

Texas-Arlington, the closest of the collider region's state universities, plans to gather a group of high energy physicists and enlarge its science building.

The University of North Texas has been developing expertise in materials science, a field that will be crucial in the building phase of the collider. The school also plans to boost its physics department.

The University of Texas at Dallas has been cultivating strengths in space technology through its Center for Space Science. Four UTD professors are working with researchers from the University of California at Los Angeles to develop measuring devices for the collider.

Since November, Southern Methodist University researchers have tromped foot by foot over thousands of acres of Ellis County, surveying the land to determine whether there are historical or cultural artifacts that need to be preserved before the collider is built.

Far from the realm of high energy physics, the Dallas County Community College District, in conjunction with Navarro College in Corsicana, is taking a practical approach to the collider.

Both have received a grant from the Texas Higher Education Coordinating Board for an economic impact survey to determine the needs for technicians.

"Our primary focus will be on what jobs are going to be available for people with less than a baccalaureate degree," said Patti McGlohen, assistant district director for career and continuing education at the community college district. "Our purpose is to develop programs that will train technicians."

Outside the Dallas-Fort Worth area, the state's largest universities have had a crucial role in the collider. Beyond the contributions of their physicists, the University of Texas at Austin and Texas A&M have provided talent ranging from tunnel experts to landscape architects.

A&M, Texas, Rice University and the University of Houston are member institutions in the Houston Advanced Research Center, a non-profit research corporation that has been involved in collider-related research since 1984.

Hightower blasts GATT proposals as bad for farmers and consumers

AUSTIN (AP) – Texas Agriculture Commissioner Jim Hightower says proposals pending in international trade talks are a bad deal for family farmers and consumers.

If proposals at the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade – GATT – talks are adopted, Hightower said, "U.S. farmers can pretty much kiss their 'back 40' goodbye.

"Millions of family farmers will go bankrupt. Our borders will be opened up to a flood of low-priced food and fiber imports, and the right of Congress and the individual state governments to set adequate pesticide residue and food-safety standards will be eliminated," he said Monday.

Hightower estimated that the treaty could cost Texas agriculture producers $1 billion in annual income.

He estimated that Texas cotton farmers would be hardest-hit, losing $323 million.

Other lost-income estimates include $49 million to wool producers, $59 million to rice growers, $129 million to wheat farmers and $296 million to feed grain producers, he said.

Agriculture is the most contentious of the 15 sectors covered by the GATT negotiations, talks involving negotiators from 105 countries.

The talks were launched in Uruguay in 1986 and are scheduled to end in December with accords to reduce barriers to trade and expand rules into new areas worth an estimated $1 trillion.

Several farm and consumer-oriented groups joined Hightower at a news conference to object to GATT proposals. They said the plan being supported by U.S. negotiators would threaten several key farm programs, including:

- Import quotas on beef, textiles, dairy products, peanuts, cotton and sugar.
- Price-floor and supply management programs, including the marketing loan that is instrumental in the cotton and rice programs in Texas.
- Deficiency payments which partially compensate farmers for artificially low market prices.
- Farmers Home Administration Loans.
- State and federal marketing assistance programs.
- Some publicly funded agricultural research and extension programs.

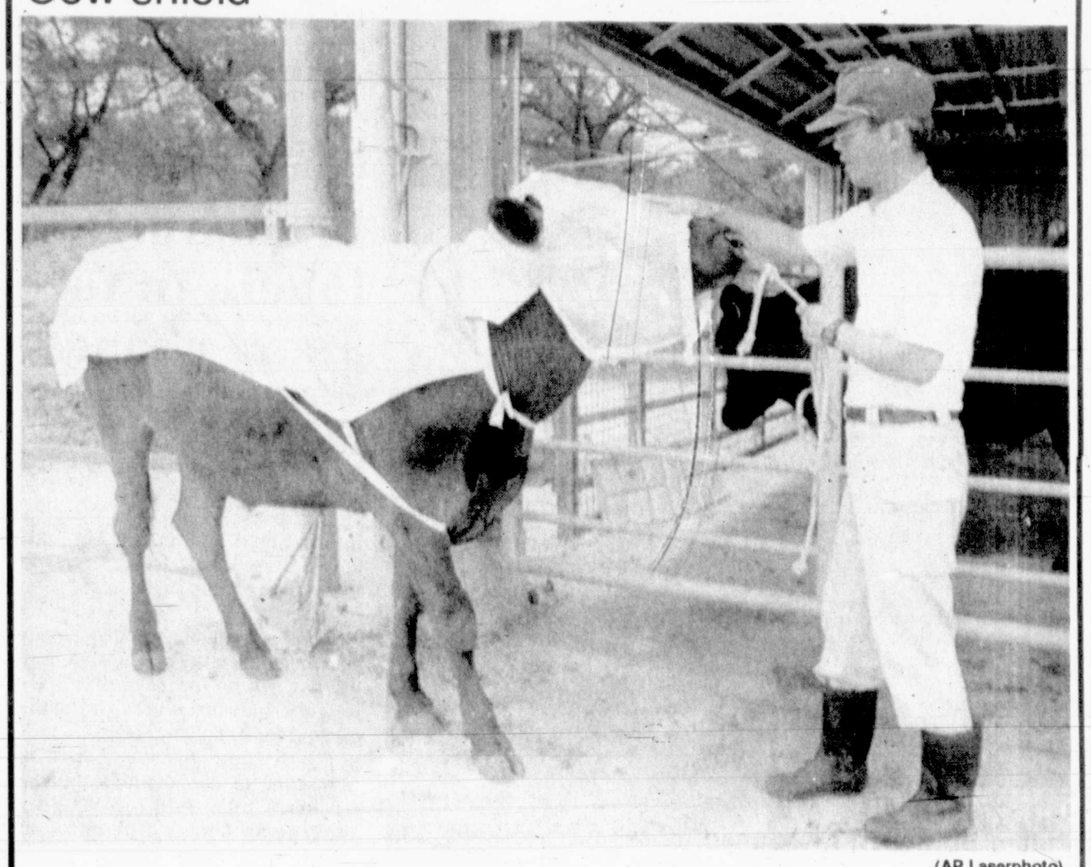

"I'm one of those farmers who's just barely hanging on right now. I guarantee you, this would spell the end of my operation," said Robert Green, president of the Texas Grain Sorghum Association.

Joe Rankin, president of the Texas Farmers Union, said the GATT deal could have widespread impact and that extensive public hearings should be held before Congress votes on any agreement. "Certainly, farmers out there don't realize what's going to happen," Rankin said.

Hightower also said the treaty could turn over to an appointed panel of international scientists the regulation of allowable pesticide residue on foods.

GATT should stand for "guarantee of a toxic tomato," said Tom Smith, Texas director of the consumer group Public Citizen.

Cow shield

Shigeki Entsu, director of Livestock Ecology Institute in Nishi-Nasuno, Japan, shows a cow wearing an aluminum-coated shield against the summer sun at the institute's farm north of Tokyo. The shield, Entsu says, enables cattle to stay outdoor more time eating grass and then they can produce more milk. The scientist said the jacket also can protect cattle from harmful insects and diseases.

UT shelves English class after faculty dissents

AUSTIN (AP) – A new, required freshman English course focusing on racial, sexual and ethnic diversity was shelved at the University of Texas after faculty members argued it would teach politics, not writing and composition.

A faculty committee revamped English 306, a course all UT students must pass. The changes would have required students to read civil rights legal cases on such topics and compose essays on them.

"We need to address concerns and misunderstandings about the course ... and I believe that additional time for planning and consultation will ensure the best course possible," said Standish Meacham, dean of the College of Liberal Arts, who made the decision to postpone the changes.

"I will continue to support strongly ... the concept of English 306 as a writing and rhetoric course ... centered on the themes of diversity and difference," Meacham said. "And I have the assurance of the administration that they support this concept as well."

When UT students protested on campus this spring, they demanded a required course on cultural diversity. The seven-member English committee began working on such a course.

But the efforts began dividing the committee and others on campus. The textbook originally proposed for the class, Racism and Sexism, was thrown out because its subject range was not broad enough.

Two committee members resigned, saying others were working in secret; and 56 faculty members signed an advertisement in the school newspaper, The Daily Texan, opposing changes in the course.

James Duban, an associate professor in English, was one of the committee members who resigned.

"I applaud the decision to maintain a version of (the class) that continues to focus centrally on writing," Duban said. "Such a decision will best serve the interest of all undergraduates."

Joseph Kruppa, chairman of the English department, said he is "deeply disappointed" the revised course was dropped.

"It is the result of misinformation and misrepresentation on the part of a few people," he said.

The traditional purpose of the class is to teach students to write clear, concise prose. Students usually are assigned to read classical and modern literature and write compositions.

"Students at this and at other universities have problems composing well-organized, cogent essays," Duban said. "Freshmen English ought rigorously to prepare students to write graceful, persuasive prose. They need intensive instruction in such areas as style, form, argument and organization."

The professors who signed the ad in The Daily Texan said they feared the course would make writing secondary to social issues.

Those who support the changes said they would make the class more in tune with society and would challenge students to think.

"Until now, E306 has been the required course that no one paid attention to," said Elizabeth Fernea, an English professor who sits on the committee that adopted the changes. "I find it interesting that it suddenly becomes a political football."

Toni Luckett, president of the student body, said the class should be changed.

"I think it was a good start to bring in diversity to the curriculum. It's very obvious that the University of Texas is not at all diverse. The class didn't pose a threat to the university at all. It's not about political indoctrination," she said.

"They act as if things we've been learning each and every day are not political. Who chooses the canon anyway, is my question?"

Officials announce homeowner program

AUSTIN (AP) – Realistic prices, a warranty, and low 8.35 percent interest rate are being offered low- and moderate-income Texas families who might not ever before had enough money to buy their dream home.

A program for "forgotten Texas families" was announced Monday by state and federal officials, who said approximately $140 million in Texas Housing Agency bonds would be used to finance the sale of repossessed houses.

The program combines the resources of the Housing Agency, Resolution Trust Corp. and Federal National Mortgage Association, or Fannie Mae, which purchased more than $93 million of the $140 million in bonds.

The funds are expected to provide financing – at an average $40,000 per home – to purchase 3,000 to 3,500 homes acquired by the RTC in closing savings and loan associations.

"There's never been a real estate sale of this magnitude in the state of Texas on residential property," said Kenneth DeJarnett, chairman of the housing board.

"Nothing good happens to a vacant house, especially if it's owned by the federal government," DeJarnett told a news conference.

The first list of 2,022 properties, which was released on Monday, range in value from a $4,000 dwelling in Houston to a $100,000 structure in New Braunfels.

Low- and moderate-income Texans will have 90 days to purchase the homes. After that period, the properties will revert to the open market.

Families with an annual income as low as $15,000 can qualify for loans over 30 years at an interest rate of 8.35 percent, or about two points below the current home mortgage rate. Maximum allowable income, as set by the federal government, varies from city to city and depends upon family size.

With average financing of $40,000 per home, the interest rate could save a homeowner more than $22,000 over 30 years.

In addition to financing, a warranty program paid for by the RTC is being offered to protect consumers against major structural defects and faulty mechanical systems and appliances.

"RTC has the most affordable housing by sales prices, and our goal is to create the most affordable financing available," DeJarnett said.

Attorneys confident conspiracy charges on Aldrete to be dropped

By JOHN RICE
Associated Press Writer

MEXICO CITY (AP) – Attorneys for a woman accused of being the high priestess to a mass-murdering cult along the Texas-Mexico border say they are confident she will also be cleared of an additional criminal association charge.

Last week, a Mexico City superior court judge dismissed for insufficient evidence charges of homicide, concealment, criminal association and resisting arrest resulting from a May 6, 1989, shootout with police.

Adolfo de Jesus Constanzo, the alleged leader of the murder-cult, and a bodyguard were killed during the incident.

"We hope and we have confidence that she will be absolved," said Americo Delgado de la Pena, one of four attorneys for Sara Maria Aldrete Villareal, 25, a former honor student at Texas Southmost College in Brownsville.

The additional criminal association charge which Ms. Aldrete faces in Mexico City carries a sentence of up to eight years imprisonment.

Delgado dismissed police allegations that Aldrete was a witch and a priestess to the group, and insisted she "was a friend, nothing more" of Constanzo.

"We are ready to demonstrate that she knew absolutely nothing" about the crimes at the Santa Helena ranch near Matamoros, Delgado told a news conference here Monday.

Delgado pointed out that it was Aldrete who tipped off police to Constanzo's whereabouts in Mexico City by passing a note through a window to a passerby.

Prosecutors cited this in recommending last week's dismissal of charges in Mexico City, but said they intend to pursue the remaining charge against her.

Law enforcement officers said the group smuggled drugs, and killed and mutilated the bodies of its victims in the belief the rituals would bring members immunity from police.

Delgado said that Aldrete has denied involvement in witchcraft and maintains she is a Roman Catholic. "If she had not been present at the moment police found Mr. Constanzo, nothing would have happened" to her, he said.

Aldrete still faces homicide and related charges before a federal court in Matamoros in one of 15 killings blamed on the Constanzo group, and could be sentenced to 40 years in prison.

Return of dictatorial figures threatens Haiti government

By SUSANA HAYWARD
Associated Press Writer

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti (AP) – The return from exile of two key figures in past dictatorial regimes is threatening the survival of Haiti's caretaker government, fueling doubts about whether credible elections can be held.

Lawlessness plagues this impoverished Caribbean nation of 6 million people. Violence is on the rise, with unpunished political killings heightening the sense of fear and distrust.

Political leaders say they are under constant death threats and never sleep at home, fearing assassination.

"You drive with your hand on your gun, you avoid taking the same roads, you sleep at friends' homes, never your own house," said Jean-Claude Roy, leader of the Haitian Constitutional Union, a center-left party.

"We will not go into elections with this type of terror in the streets," said presidential candidate Louis Dejois Jr.

General elections are tentatively planned for Nov. 4.

Critics say President Ertha Pascal-Trouillot is weak, breaks promises, can't control the army and doesn't consult with the 18-member Council of State with which she is supposed to govern jointly.

Many political leaders blame her 4-month-old government for creating an atmosphere that allowed the return of Roger Lafontant, reputed head of the Tonton Macoutes, the brutal militia that enforced the 29-year Duvalier dictatorship.

"Lafontant was the chief of everybody here. It is like the return of Himmler, the head of the Gestapo," said Serge Voltaire, a member of the Council of State. "Everybody is afraid of him, and she's not doing anything."

The Duvalier family dictatorship, which began in 1957 when Francois Duvalier gained the presidency, ended in 1986 when his son Jean-Claude "Baby Doc" Duvalier fled the country after months of civil disorder.

Also back from exile is retired army Maj. Gen. Williams Regala, who went to the United States following the March ouster of Lt. Gen. Prosper Avril, one of a succession of military men who ruled after Jean-Claude Duvalier Doc fled.

As minister of interior and defense, Regala was responsible for security during the thwarted November 1987 attempt at elections. Balloting was canceled after 34 voters were shot and hacked to death by thugs linked to the army.

Lafontant, who is in hiding, has hired three lawyers to aid his effort to remain in Haiti. He said last week before going into hiding that he intends to become president.

The pressure has been building for Mrs. Pascal-Trouillot to arrest Lafontant, but the army isn't carrying out her orders.

"The problem is not Madame Trouillot. The problem is the army," said Social Affairs Minister Claudette Werleigh. "I don't know if she has power or even if the general himself has power."

The general is Armed Forces chief Herard Abraham, who commands a corrupt and often violent force of 6,000.

"It's not clear to the army that this (democracy) is in their best interest and because of this they are ambivalent," said Marc Bazin, former World Bank economist and presidential candidate. "But they are not interested in returning to the past."

When Mrs. Pascal-Trouillot was appointed provisional president on March 13, expectations ran high, perhaps too high, that the rampant lawlessness and corruption that was the stamp of Duvalierism might be stemmed.

"How can you expect a transitional government to be expedient in bringing justice?" said Bazin. "You need a government that has legitimacy, nationally and internationally. This will only happen with elections."

It is a sentiment shared by the United States, which has tied renewal of $70 million in aid, cut after the Election Day massacre, to the holding of legitimate elections.

William Burnett, 13, watches as rescue workers use a long chisel to free him after he had become trapped in an old core sample hole in a creekbed in this small community northwest of San Antonio. He had been searching for lizards with a friend when he stepped into a hole, lodging his leg. Emergency personnel and construction workers from a nearby company worked nearly seven hours to free the boy.

Water Commission begins quest to cap abandoned wells

HELOTES (AP) – A teen-ager's slip into an uncapped abandoned water well has triggered a search by the Texas Water Commission for other such wells around the state.

William Burnett, 13, fell into an abandoned well about 3 p.m. Sunday as he walked with friends in Helotes Creek, near the town of Helotes, a Bexar County town of 1,800 people just northwest of San Antonio.

Rocks fell into the hole, and he was pinned for 81/2 hours as rescuers worked to free him. He finally was extricated about 11:30 p.m.

The abandoned well casing was filled Monday, Helotes fire officials said.

Bill Colbert, spokesman for the Texas Water Commission, said such old water wells – many dating from the turn of the century – abound in South and West Texas.

Colbert said officials are trying to find other old wells. He warned that knowingly leaving an abandoned water well uncapped could bring fines up to $2,500.

Guy Burnett, the boy's father, said he was proud of his son.

"He remained pretty calm, and basically he was sort of guiding us about where to do the excavation, where to do the digging," said Burnett, 41.

Burnett, said his son saw an orthopedist Monday morning and that the doctor said the boy could be up and walking within a few days.

"I think (William's leg) is going to be all right. It's swollen and bruised, but they X-rayed it, and ... they think he's going to be doing pretty well," he said.

After rescuers were unable to free the boy with pickaxes Sunday, they used a compression jackhammer to chip away at the rock surrounding the hole.

To keep water away from the boy during the rescue effort, workers used earth-moving equipment to build a 4-foot-tall dam, and then pumped water out of the area around the boy.

Originally, authorities said they feared that severe storms forecast for the area would put the boy in danger, but the rain remained at bay. The creek bed is dry much of the year.

Water Commission officials say the creek had changed course and covered the old well.

"He was pretty stalwart through the whole thing," said Helotes Fire Capt. Kurt Johnson. "I think the pain got to him toward the end, when they were trying to move his leg. But he didn't scream too much."

William told rescuers, "I'm OK, I'm fine," as they worked to free his leg.

"He was just waiting until we got him out. I think stoic is a pretty good word for it," Burnett said.

Inspectors say streamlined meat inspection dangerous

DALLAS (AP) – Some federal meat inspectors have complained that new, streamlined inspection guidelines now in place at two West Texas meat plants make it more likely that substandard meat will go out.

In interviews with WFAA-TV, Dallas, two inspectors who spoke on condition of anonymity said the new guidelines call for less trimming and more carcass washing to remove contamination. But the procedure at Excel meat plants in Plainview and Friona is more likely to increase the contamination, the inspectors said.

USDA officials counter that the wash contains bacteria-killing acid.

Excel officials deny any suggestion that contaminated or otherwise substandard meat is leaving their plants.

In a statement drafted in response to the criticism, company officials said in addition to any inspection system used "the company has maintained and met its own internal standards of consistent high quality for all beef carcasses and beef products leaving its plants."

French fries lovers in for an oil change

CHICAGO (AP) – After a little prodding from a well-heeled health crusader, the nation's top four hamburger chains agree: french fry lovers need an oil change.

McDonald's Corp. and Wendy's International announced Monday they are switching to cholesterol-free, all-vegetable oil to cook their fries.

Hardee's made the change two years ago and Burger King said last week it will no longer use beef tallow, the industry's previous standard oil for french fry vats.

"Everything that's deep fried is now done in 100 percent cholesterol-free oil," said McDonald's spokesman Chuck Rubner. The company started cooking its chicken items, pies and fish in vegetable oil four years ago, he said.

McDonald's has been a target of newspaper and TV ads placed by anti-cholesterol crusader Phil Sokolof, who accused the world's largest restaurant chain of poisoning Americans with fatty foods.

Sokolof said a recent Advertising Age-Gallup Organization poll indicated a significant number of people responded to his ads by shying away from fast-food outlets.

"Consumers have the power to move mountains, and that's what they did," he said in a telephone interview after the McDonald's announcement. "We obviously speeded up the process."

"That's really ridiculous," countered McDonald's spokeswoman Terri Capatosto. "We've been in the nutrition business a lot longer than Mr. Sokolof has been in the ad business."

Rubner said McDonald's has been experimenting with using vegetable oil for eight years and that test marketing in 500 restaurants began in October.

"Clearly, the challenge that we were looking at was to maintain the same taste – the worldwide favorite – while at the same time improving the nutritional value," said Rubner.

Sokolof, a 66-year-old millionaire from Omaha, Neb., blames a high-cholesterol diet for a near-fatal heart attack 22 years ago.

In April, Sokolof placed ads headlined "The Poisoning of America!" in several major U.S. newspapers. The ads criticized McDonald's and other restaurants for cooking foods in beef tallow rather than using "heart-healthy oils."

McDonald's warned newspapers against printing Sokolof's ads, contending they were inaccurate.

On July 3, Sokolof placed ads aimed specifically at McDonald's.

McDonald's new french fry oil, expected to be in use nationwide by the end of the year, is a combination of corn and cottonseed oil.

The company said the new cooking oil will be cholesterol-free and result in a 45 percent reduction in saturated fat content. For a regular-size order of fries, Rubner said, saturated fat will go from 5.05 grams to 2.7 grams.

Wendy's vice president Charlie Rath said the company's change drops the cholesterol in a 3.2-ounce french fry serving from 15 milligrams to a trace and reduces saturated fat by 20 percent, from 15 grams to 12 grams.

Vegetable oils don't contain cholesterol, but certain kinds of vegetable oils contain saturated fats, which the body converts to cholesterol. Thus, eating "cholesterol-free" food doesn't necessarily protect a person from cholesterol.

Doctors advocate food cooked in polyunsaturated fat or monounsaturated fat, found in corn, sunflower and other oils. Vegetable oils to avoid are palm and coconut.

Panhandle Bird Watch

by Jan Elston

American Goldfinch

Have you been seeing any "Wild Canaries" lately? That is one of the nicknames for the American Goldfinch. There have been a few Goldfinches reportedly seen in our area; so be on the lookout for them. The summer Goldfinch is easily identified, because it is the only small bright yellow bird with black wings and tail, and a black cap. About 4 1/2 inches long, it is about an inch smaller than a House Sparrow.

Because their coloration, their habits, and their ranges change so much during the year, they are interesting to know about. This time of year it is not unusual to see a solitary Goldfinch in a tree, on the ground, or drinking at your birdbath. You may also see flocks of 50 to 100, usually feeding on the ground.

In late December or early January, you may see them in their more somber winter plumage of olive brown, pale yellow underneath, with black wings and tail, but no black on their foreheads. We were almost late to church, one Sunday morning, when we looked out our kitchen window and saw our first ever Goldfinch, drinking at our low birdbath, then eating sunflower seeds I had poured out onto a board near the birdbath. It was such a dramatic change from our usual crop of House Finches and English Sparrows, that we watched it until the very last minute before we had to leave for church.

That winter we hurriedly put up a 35" thistle feeder, and before long there were Goldfinches at all 10 ports, with others hanging onto the chain, some waiting in a nearby tree, and still more on the ground where some of the seed had fallen out of the feeder. Although they have never been here in such profusion as that first year, we have never had a winter without Goldfinches.

They are among the easiest winter birds to attract to your yard, if you will put up a feeder containing Thistle seed. (The Thistle seed you buy at the Feed Store or order from a bird supply catalog is not the seed of the Texas Prickly Poppy, which grows in profusion in central and south Texas, but is an imported Nigerian Thistle, which has been treated so that it won't germinate in your flower bed or yard.) Since seedeaters require more water, be sure to keep water available near your feeders.

Goldfinches migrate in compact flocks, with an erratic, "roller coaster" flight. According to Peterson's BIRDS OF TEXAS, they winter throughout Texas, and breed locally in the northeast corner of the state.

During the winter they remain in social flocks; and we have observed that they are at our feeders early in the morning, but they leave about 4:00 o'clock in the afternoon, which leads us to believe they must be wintering Palo Duro Canyon. (The lower elevation of Palo Duro Canyon, with its cedar trees which offer protected roosting sites is a favorite wintering spot for many species of birds.)

About March you will notice that some of the adult males are beginning to moult, with splotches of bright yellow appearing in their drab olive plumage. For a couple of weeks they look really shaggy, then they become more and more handsome, until finally, they are resplendent in their bright yellow with black wings and tail, although they usually haven't acquired their black caps before they leave.

During this moulting season, there will usually be many goldfinches at your feeders, then one day they're gone, leaving just as abruptly as they came—truly a case of "here today, gone tomorrow."

Since their main food is seeds, nesting does not begin until midsummer or late summer, when weed seeds are available. They also wait for the early thistles or milkweed pods to furnish plenty of fluff for nest lining, then the pairs of Goldfinches withdraw from flocks and begin the serious business of family raising. Because they nest so late, only a single brood is raised each season.

Goldfinches are generally found feeding on the ground or on weeds or sunflowers. They love weedy places, dandelion seed heads, thistles and goldenrod. If you stop your car beside the road, be sure to look at the nearby weeds to see if there may be a small bright yellow bird cling to the slender swaying stems, while dining on the seedpods.

Is anyone seeing any hummingbirds? I'm sure there must be some at Lefors and Miami; but only one has been reported here in Pampa, and that one was seen this past week. Please send your reports to me — Jan Elston,% THE PAMPA NEWS, P.O. Drawer 2198, Pampa, TX 79066-2198.

Cancer Center offers lifestyles seminars

The Harrington Cancer Center is offering a series of Lifestyles Seminars on July 26, August 2, and August 9 from 1:15 p.m. to 2:30 p.m. in the Harrington Cancer Center Amphitheatre at 1500 Wallace Blvd. in Amarillo.

The seminars are designed to help cancer patients and their partners learn how to talk with each other and their health care providers about the changes in their intimate relationships after a diagnosis of cancer or cancer treatment and how to deal with these changes.

Gerald Rogers, a Certified Sex Counselor will conduct the seminars. He will be assisted by members of trained members of the HCC Sexual Health Team.

There is no charge for these seminars, and the program is supported by a grant from the Meadows Foundation. For more information call (806) 359-HOPE, ext. 238 or 1-(806) -274-HOPE.

The Thursday seminars begin on July 26 with understanding the general effects of cancer and cancer treatment on your sexual health.

The August 2 seminar will address "getting specific" about typical sexual problems and solutions, and the August 9 meeting will concern more about getting specific and learning how to talk about it (with your partner and your health care providers).

NLP unlocking doors to better communication

By ELLIOTT MINOR
Associated Press Writer

SAVANNAH, Ga. (AP) — The skills that made Don Juan the world's most successful lover are helping people gain the trust of others and communicate more effectively, whether in the courtroom, the office or the bedroom.

Neurolinguistic Programming (NLP), says Janice Gantt, a licensed instructor, is a set of skills that helps people establish rapport and influence others by unlocking the door to unconscious information that influences human behavior.

Developed in the late 1970s by computer programmer Richard Bandler and linguist John Grinder, NLP can help lawyers interview witnesses and pick friendly jurors, sales people to market more merchandise and married people to communicate with inattentive spouses.

"NLP will teach you how to establish rapport," says Gantt, who teaches NLP at the Coastal Georgia Center. "By watching eye movements, by watching body posture, by listening to the predicates people use, you will understand how they experience the world and then you can match their world. You also want to listen to their voice qualities. Are they speaking fast or slow, high pitched or low?"

The founders based the NLP system on extensive studies of people who were good at helping others make changes in their lives. The people they studied had one thing in common: all were good at establishing rapport with others.

"Once you gain rapport at the conscious and unconscious level, people begin to believe you understand their problem," says Gantt, a Savannah businesswoman.

She says Don Juan became an unwitting practitioner of NLP when he asked his lady friends to tell him about their first love experiences.

"As they did that he would look into their eyes, mirror their body posture and gently touch them, thereby establishing an anchor," she says. "He established deep rapport with the conscious and unconscious."

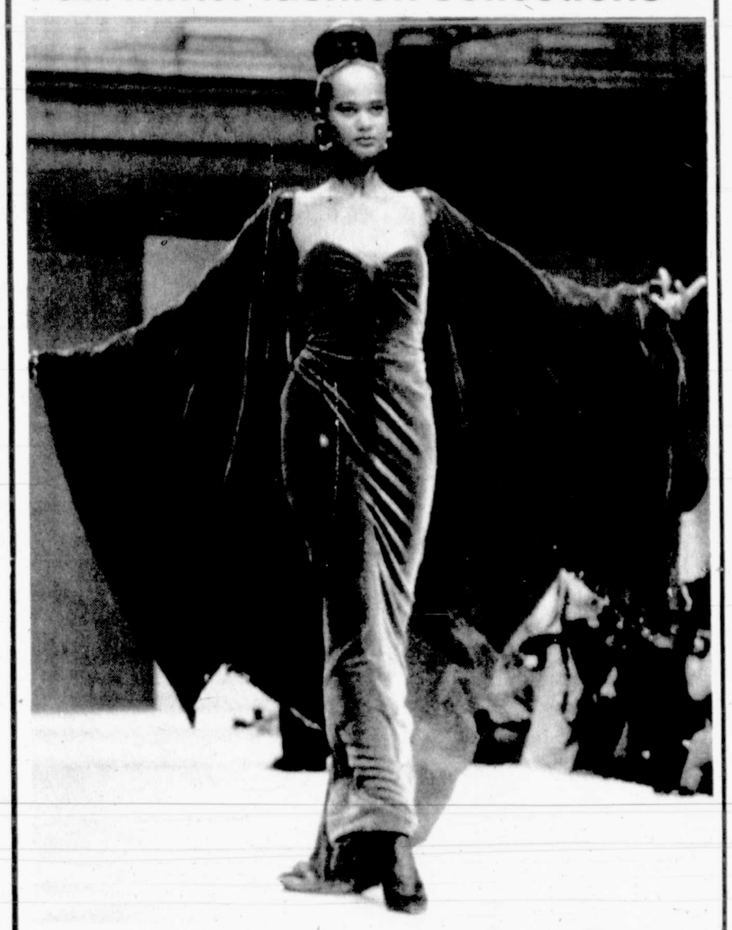

The Coastal Georgia Center, operated jointly by Armstrong State College and Savannah State College, offers nearly 80 non-credit courses ranging from cake decorating to elementary Russian.

Gantt, who teaches NLP classes for sales people and attorneys, says the key is in unlocking the door to unconscious programming that triggers anger, fear, sadness and other emotions.

"We make our decisions based on emotions, and that is the unconscious," she says. "We validate those decisions with logic, which is the conscious.

"If I know more about you than you do about yourself, I can control you. The bottom line is to learn as much as you can about yourself so that you are in control of your emotions, and you don't give that control to the people around you."

Foreign doctors are urged to heal their poor diction

Dear Abby
Abigail Van Buren

DEAR ABBY: Re the letter about foreign doctors who speak with heavy accents and are difficult to understand: You made a plea for patience because of the "rough road" they must have traveled to get from there to here.

Abby, all doctors travel a rough road to become physicians, but if foreigners want to practice here, they should learn the language well enough to be understood.

Several years ago, I was rushed to the emergency room with a miscarriage. The foreign-born physician asked, "Are you still breathing?" I wondered why he would ask when it was obvious that I was wide awake and talking to him! Then I realized that what he actually asked was, "Are you still bleeding?"

Doctors must be able to communicate clearly with their patients; therefore, I agree with "Bewildered Patient" — it wouldn't hurt those foreign doctors to take a few diction classes.

ANONYMOUS
IN ROYAL OAK, MICH.

DEAR ANONYMOUS: Many have written since I published the letter about doctors with heavy accents, and most of them stress this point: For fear of appearing ignorant, patients may not ask for clarification or written instructions. So the patients of physicians who have heavy foreign accents are sometimes at a disadvantage. Until a doctor can be certain he is plainly understood, perhaps it should be standard practice to have a nurse present who can, if necessary, elaborate on or clarify diagnoses and instructions. An ounce of prevention ... Read on:

DEAR ABBY: I read with interest the letter concerning foreign-born physicians who are practicing here. We can certainly be compassionate and generous, but there is no reason why they cannot improve their diction so they can communicate with their patients. There are speech and language pathologists who offer private and group classes to help foreign-born speakers reduce their accents, thereby improving their communication skills. Many foreign-born professionals are concerned because they have excellent command of the English language as well as the technical and academic skills of their professions, but their accents make it difficult to be understood.

Abby, please advise your readers concerning the availability of such services. I am enclosing some information you may find helpful.

DEAR LYNDA: Helpful? You have provided me with an excellent bit of information to pass on to my readers.

Interested persons may call the American Speech-Language-Hearing Association Hotline for referrals around the country. The toll-free number is (800) 638-8255, or look in your Yellow Pages under "Speech and Language Pathologists."

Workshop for caregivers of young children

PLAINVIEW - A special six-hour workshop for teachers and caregivers of very young children will be presented July 28 by Wayland Baptist University's Lifelong Learning Center.

The workshop will feature the husband-wife team of Rhonnie and Alfred Tomkins. Classes are scheduled from 8 a.m. to 3 p.m. in the Learning Resource Room of Moody Science Building on Wayland campus.

The program will include presentation of ideas for approximately 30 "Fabulous Folder Games" involving eye/hand skills, math, language arts, two person games and tasks for the very young through second grade.

The Tompkins will also discuss "Understanding Attenion Deficit Disorder and Hyper-Activity," answering many of the most frequently asked questions about hyperactive/ADD children.

The final session of the day, "The Magical World of Music," will show the important role of music, singing, games and rhythm in curriculum planning.

Enrollment is limited to 50 participants on a first-come, first-served basis. The program is recognized by the Texas Department of Human Resources to meet required training hours. For further information contact Amelia Cline, director of Lifelong Learning, at 296-5521, ext. 548.

Death Row inmate's mother works to abolish death penalty

FORT WORTH (AP) – The mother of death row inmate Larry Keith Robison said the waiting is painful even though no execution date has been set for her son.

"The clock is ticking," Lois Robison of Burleson told the Fort Worth Star-Telegram.

"You wait for years, and you know that at any moment they may announce that 30 days from today – at two minutes after midnight – they are going to kill him.

"Knowing that at a certain date and at a certain hour they are going to put him on a table and inject him – it's pretty horrifying," Mrs. Robison, 56, said.

"There's just something about deliberately killing that chills you – especially when it's your son."

Her son was sentenced to death in a 1982 Lake Worth killing spree that left five people dead.

Mrs. Robison has the support of other people in the same plight. In 1983, she and her husband Kenneth founded the support group HOPE, or Help Our Prisoners Exist, which opposes capital punishment.

They had planned a candlelight vigil Tuesday night outside the Kennedy Memorial in Dallas for the final hours of life of another death row inmate, Edward Ellis, who was scheduled to die early Wednesday. But the execution was postponed by state officials.

Ellis was convicted of the 1983 murder of a 74-year-old Houston woman found handcuffed and slain in her bathtub.

Since the U.S. Supreme Court reinstated capital punishment in 1976, 135 prisoners have been put to death nationwide. Texas leads the nation in executions with 37. Four have been put to death in the state this year.

In about half the Texas executions over the 14 years, Lois and Ken Robison have been acquainted with the men or their families, she said.

"What people don't realize is that these prisoners are human beings. Some of them are very talented," she said. "A lot of them are mentally ill. Most of them have drug problems. Some of them were neglected and abused when they were little. Some of them are just plain innocent.

"At least they are alive," she added. "They do find a purpose for living ... Many want to make amends. You can imprison the body, not the spirit."

Mrs. Robison said psychiatric therapy and hospitalization would have prevented the stabbing and shooting deaths of five people near Lake Worth on Aug. 10, 1982.

Her son, now 32, was accused of killing Ricky Lee Bryant, who was found decapitated and sexually mutilated. Robison was also charged with slaying Bryant's next-door neighbors: Georgia Reed, 34; her son Scott Reed, 11; and his grandmother Earline Baker, 55.

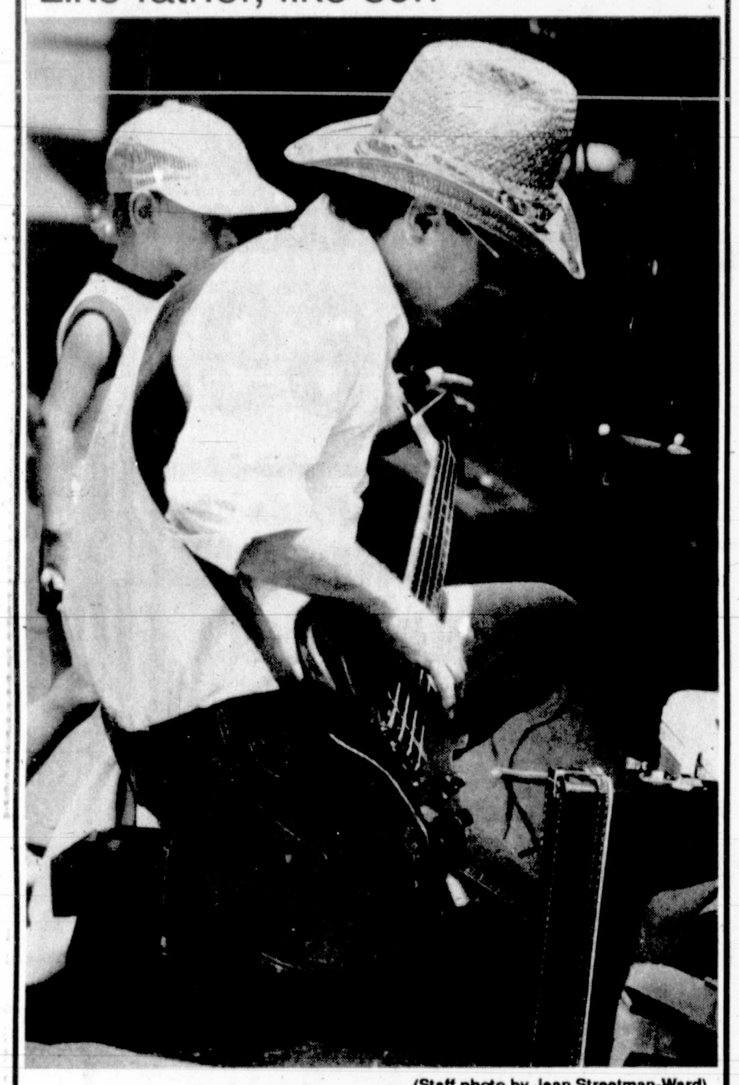

In 1983 and at a retrial in 1987, Larry Robison was sentenced to death in the murder of Bruce Gardner, 33, a friend of the Reeds.

Mrs. Robison said she doesn't expect her emotions to overshadow the pain suffered by crime victims.

"It's a tragedy on both sides," she said. "We have sympathy and compassion for the victims' families. They have a right to feel angry. I don't want to lessen their anguish. It's got to be worse than ours.

"We, too, work with victims groups to prevent crime," she said. "We want these horrible things to stop."

Oryx reports loss, but touts horizontal future

By JOHN A. BOLT
AP Business Writer

DALLAS (AP) – Although Oryx Energy Co. reported a second-quarter loss of $3 million, the company's president said its innovative new drilling techniques are not to blame.

James E. McCormick said the April-June loss was due to lower crude oil prices and higher interest costs to finance international expansion.

Oryx, a pioneer in horizontal oil drilling in South Texas, said its studies have shown the wells will produce even longer than had previously been believed.

"The outlook for this program is much brighter that when we began," McCormick said. "The Austin Chalk horizontal play is larger and longer lived that we had thought; we're busy looking for ways to extend it."

The Dallas-based company has led a resurgence in drilling in an area southwest of San Antonio known as the Pearsall Field, using horizontal drilling instead of traditional vertical techniques. The field is part of a geologic formation known as the Austin Chalk.

Although more expensive than vertical drilling, horizontal drilling links together hard-to-find vertical oil deposits, increasing the possibility of success.

While horizontal wells have produced some spectacular initial flow rates, some experts have questioned how long the rates can be maintained, suggesting early excitement is misplaced.

Oryx spokesman Tom Sullivan said the company's studies indicate the life of the wells to be from seven to 30 years.

Oryx said it had added 28 million barrels of oil to its reserves this year from the Austin Chalk, in addition to 14 million recorded last year.

The company said it also is reducing from 85 to 75 the number of wells it plans to drill in the chalk because it can now reach longer stretches sideways, allowing more efficient draining of reservoirs, McCormick said.

The wells initially averaged a sideways reach of less than 1,000 feet, but the company now averages about 3,000 feet with some traveling horizontally almost a mile underground. The costs of the wells have dropped from $2.7 million to $1.2 million each.

So far, Oryx has drilled 46 horizontal wells, each of them finding oil, Sullivan said, although a few have not produced at high enough levels to be economical.

Oryx's second quarter loss of $3 million, or 3 cents per share, compares to a profit of $17 million, or 16 cents a share, in the comparable 1989 period. Revenues increased from $304 million to $378 million.

The average worldwide price of crude fell from $16.89 per 42-gallon barrel to $15.83 per barrel, the company said. Interest and debt expense rose from $27 million to $50 million to pay for Oryx's $1.1 billion purchase last year of North Sea and other reserves from British Petroleum Co. PLC.

For the first half of 1990, net income was $37 million, or 35 cents per share, compared to $119 million, or $1.12 per share, last year. Revenue grew from $610 million to $847 million.

Last year's results benefited from an $85 million gain from a change in accounting principles.

Still no antidote for 'Blue Monday' on Wall Street

By CHET CURRIER
AP Business Writer

NEW YORK (AP) – Wall Street may have mended many of its ways since the excessive 1980s, but it still hasn't found an antidote for the "Blue Monday" syndrome.

The tendency for volatile selloffs to occur right after weekends repeated itself Monday when the Dow Jones industrial average, fresh from a series of runs at record highs above 3,000 points, took its worst plunge in six months.

The average, an index of stocks in 30 of the country's best-known industrial corporations, dropped more than 100 points in the first 90 minutes of trading, then fluctuated through much of the day in heavy trading. At the close, it was down 56.44 points, or 1.9 percent, at 2,904.70.

The selloff wiped out a big chunk of the early-summer gains posted by some of the nation's most prominent blue-chip stocks, and analysts placed much of the blame on a rash of disappointing corporate earnings.

Other catalysts for the fall, they said, ranged from revived fears of higher interest rates to continued anxiety over the federal deficit.

Although worrisome, analysts said the drop did not seem to presage a crisis on the magnitude of the crash of October 1987 or mini-crash of October 1989.

Companies as diverse as American Telephone & Telegraph, Dow Chemical and U.S. Shoe posted earnings below expectations for the quarter ended June 30. Late last week, Texas Instruments and a slew of computer and technology companies also announced disappointing profits.

Investors initially treated the profit reports as individual cases, dumping shares of the companies involved while leaving other stocks unscathed. The Dow kept making new highs, benefiting from enthusiasm for a few of its component issues.

But on Monday morning, investors' urge to sell broadened, causing what analyst Michael Metz at Oppenheimer & Co. called "a mini-panic."

Newton Zinder at Shearson Lehman Hutton Inc. said "people who concentrated on the Dow Jones industrial average at 3,000 got a misleading picture. There had been an underlying erosion over the last few weeks, with a lot of stocks falling into black holes after their earnings were released."

In mid-July, the Federal Reserve took a step toward easier credit when Chairman Alan Greenspan declared his intention to keep the financial system supplied with ample money while the banking industry retrenched and regrouped.

But after an initial burst of enthusiasm over that news, both the bond and stock markets turned wary.

On Monday, many observers saw evidence of continued worries over what jolts the economy still might suffer in the unwinding of the debt boom of the '80s.

"A rising tide of debt, even if unsound, immoral or fattening, is bullish," observes James Grant in the current issue of his newsletter Grant's Interest Rate Observer. "Having borrowed money, people spend it."

Now, he argues, "a shrinkage of debt is bearish. Denied new credit, people don't buy things."

NASA managers worried about Hubble mirror maker's plans early on

By PAUL RECER
AP Science Writer

WASHINGTON (AP) – The flawed mirrors that have crippled the $1.5 billion Hubble Space Telescope were a worry for NASA officials even as the agency was selecting a contractor for the telescope optics, according to a 1977 report.

The report, released by NASA on Monday after a request by The Associated Press, said officials selected Perkin-Elmer Corp. of Danbury, Conn., to make the Hubble optical assembly, even though the company planned to use an unproven computer-driven system in the critical mirror polishing.

Engineers for the National Aeronautics and Space Administration now believe that a flaw manufactured into one of the mirrors by Perkin-Elmer blurred the vision of the Hubble telescope, reducing its effectiveness by at least 50 percent. The error is now under investigation.

The report, signed on Aug. 26, 1977 by then-NASA Administrator Robert A. Frosch, said the bid by Perkin-Elmer, now Hughes Danbury Optical Systems Inc., was preferred over a bid by Eastman Kodak Co. for several reasons, including cost.

Officials evaluating the two contract bids rated Perkin-Elmer as "very good" and Kodak as "good."

"Our only concern about the Perkin-Elmer approach centers around their plan to utilize an as-yet unverified computer-controlled mirror polishing technique," the report said.

It noted, however, that the concern was "alleviated" because the selection board knew that Perkin-Elmer had "other proven and reliable techniques" that could be used "in the event that their computer technique is not perfected and verified in time for use on the OTA (optical telescope assembly) program.

"Based upon this information, we believe Perkin-Elmer has the ability to successfully polish the primary mirror," the report added.

The report was cosigned by A.M. Lovelace, deputy NASA administrator, and John E. Naugle, NASA associate administrator.

One weakness in the Perkin-Elmer proposal, the report said, was the firm's "unsubstantiated accuracy of focus sensor test equipment."

This equipment is among the items impounded by a NASA committee that is investigating the manufacture of the Hubble mirrors. That panel, led by Lew Allen, director of the Jet Propulsion Laboratory, is to meet at the manufacturer's offices in Danbury on Wednesday.

Perkin-Elmer sold its optical division to Hughes Aircraft Co. and the company is now known as Hughes Danbury Optical Systems Inc. Officials at Hughes Danbury either declined to be interviewed about the NASA report or could not be reached by telephone.

In their 1977 report, the NASA officials said "the single most significant technical discriminator" that tilted the selection to Perkin-Elmer was the approach used by the Connecticut company in making a fine guidance sensor, the device that is used to aim the telescope. It said the Perkin-Elmer approach was a "cost effective" design.

The officials also noted that they were "quite surprised at the large difference in cost favoring Perkin-Elmer" in the bids. They said the Kodak proposal on the fine guidance system was three times more costly than that of Perkin-Elmer.

Perkin-Elmer was given the Hubble contract at about $62 million, but overruns drove the actual cost up to $451 million by the time the telescope was launched from a space shuttle on April 25.

NASA officials concluded in the report that Perkin-Elmer "clearly won the competition" based on "mission suitability" and because the Connecticut firm would be "the lowest cost producer."

More quake victims found, death toll surpasses 1,600

By OLIVER TEVES
Associated Press Writer

MANILA, Philippines (AP) – Earthquake search teams reported finding more bodies today in remote mountain communities devastated by last week's temblor, and the death toll surpassed 1,600.

A quake measuring 6 on the Richter scale struck the central island of Negros early today but there were no reports of damage or casualties.

On Luzon island, President Corazon Aquino inspected damage in her home province, Tarlac, where numerous churches, schools and highways were damaged by the July 16 quake, which measured 7.7.

On Monday, she asked Congress to approve $500 million to rebuild damaged areas. Many congressmen also want to stop paying the $26 billion national debt to free funds for reconstruction.

Figures from the Office of Civil Defense and the Red Cross showed at least 1,621 people were killed in the quake. More than 3,000 were seriously injured and about 1,000 were listed as missing.

Defense Secretary Fidel Ramos, chairman of the National Disaster Coordinating Council, said nearly 90,000 people had been left homeless.

Rescuers continued digging through the rubble of buildings in the resort of Baguio, where more than 370 people died, and in remote areas of mountainous northern Luzon island.

In Baguio, 130 miles north of Manila, three bodies were recovered from the wreckage of the Hyatt Hotel. The luxury hotel collapsed during the quake.

Aftershocks continued in the quake-ravaged north.

Seismologists said the tremor on Negros was actually an aftershock of a June 14 quake that killed seven people on the central island of Panay.

The Philippines sits astride 10 major faults or tremor tracks and is among the most earthquake-prone countries on earth.

Mrs. Aquino on Monday rejected proposals to divert foreign debt payments to finance recovery, but supporters said they would press ahead with their proposal.

Fraud cause of only a small fraction of savings and loan losses, analyst says

By DAVE SKIDMORE
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON (AP) – Just as the Bush administration and Congress are gearing up to fight savings and loan crooks, a new study indicates that fraud caused only a small percentage of thrift losses.

Bert Ely, a financial institutions analyst in Alexandria, Va., maintains that fraud cost $5 billion, or only 3 percent of what he figures is the bailout's $147 billion total cost.

Most of the losses come from falling real estate values and from excessive interest rates paid by ailing institutions to attract depositors, he figures. Bad bailout deals made in 1988 and losses on junk bonds also contributed.

Fraud, nevertheless, has become the focus of political debate on S&Ls. Attorney General Dick Thornburgh, making his first congressional appearance on the subject, and top-banking regulators were scheduled to testify on the subject today before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

In other thrift news:

•The Treasury Department said Monday that the busiest month ever for the S&L cleanup helped swell the budget deficit to $11.2 billion in June, a month when corporate tax payments normally produce a surplus.

•An attorney representing a GOP lobbyist involved in a much-criticized S&L bailout asked the Senate Ethics Committee to investigate whether the staff of Sen. Howard M. Metzenbaum, D-Ohio, struck a "sordid deal" to share investigative information with The New York Times.

The Judiciary Committee's hearing came two weeks after the Senate overwhelmingly adopted a crime bill including get-tough provisions aimed at bank and thrift fraud.

The bill provides $162.5 million in each of the next three years to increase the number of prosecutors and FBI agents pursuing S&L cases. It also increased the maximum prison sentence for bank fraud from 20 years to 30 years and provides a special life sentence to S&L kingpins. They are defined as those who act in concert with three others to steal $5 million or more.

Similar legislation is moving through the House.

On the witness list today in addition to Thornburgh were L. William Seidman, chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp.; Timothy Ryan, director of the Office of Thrift Supervision, and John E. Robson, deputy secretary of the Treasury.

The $11.2 billion June federal budget shortfall, compared with a $7.8 billion surplus in June 1989, brought red ink for the first nine months of fiscal 1990 to $163.1 billion, more than half again as much as the $105.4 billion deficit at this time last year.

If the deficit continues to accumulate at this pace, it could top the record deficit of $221.1 billion set in 1986. Analysts attribute the ballooning budget gap to S&L bailout spending and to sluggish economic growth, which is producing lower-than-expected tax revenues.

Bailout spending by the government's Resolution Trust Corp. totaled $15.8 billion in June – a third of its total spending through June of $45 billion. Eighty-three of the RTC's 207 bailouts and closings came in June.

Attorney Stanley M. Brand, representing lobbyist Robert J. Thompson, a former aide to then-Vice President Bush, asked for a probe of "what can only be described as a sordid deal to provide the Senate's investigative information to a single newspaper in return for favorable coverage on the eve of the Senate's hearing."

Metzenbaum chairs the Judiciary subcommittee on antitrust, monopolies and business rights, which is looking into Thompson's involvement in negotiating the bailout of 15 thrift institutions now combined under the name of Bluebonnet Savings Bank of Dallas.

The Times' story on questions surrounding the bailout appeared July 8, the day before Metzenbaum held a hearing on the subject.

Howell Raines, the Times' Washington bureau chief, said, "As a matter of policy we don't discuss sources or the editorial process." He said the story was "meticulously researched from a number of sources" and "was industriously and honorably reported."

Nancy Coffey, a spokeswoman for Metzenbaum, said the senator considered Brand's complaint too ridiculous to comment on.

"Since when is it against the law for a senator to talk to one reporter?" she asked, adding that "no prearrangements" were attached to Metzenbaum's comments.

Meanwhile, the Times reported in today's editions that Thompson invested $100,000 with a federal regulator, Paul G. Heafy, who also was involved in Thompson's negotiations to buy an insolvent bank in Oklahoma.

The newspaper reported that the investment, which was to buy distressed loans from federal regulators, did not violate conflict of interest laws, but Senate investigators wanted to look into the financing of the deal.

Heafy is chief liquidator for the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. in Oklahoma City. The Times said he and Thompson refused the Times' requests for interviews.

Official: defense budget cuts won't help Texas' bases

EL PASO (AP) – Reducing defense spending likely will mean closing some Texas bases and reducing the operations of others, a Defense Department official said.

Colin McMillan, assistant defense secretary for production and logistics, offered little hope that Texas military installations would be spared as the Defense Department trims its budget to adjust to lessening Cold War tensions.

"America is sitting on a great victory, an incredible victory," said McMillan, a former New Mexico legislator.

"Perestroika and glasnost came because we were strong – the Stealth bomber, Star Wars, the technology that the Soviets couldn't match and it became clear to the Soviet leadership that they needed to change," McMillan told about 50 publishers and editors gathered for the Texas Daily Newspaper Association convention.

McMillan was supposed to address the group on a topic titled, "Closing Military Installations," but chose to extend the topic to the savings the Defense Department has found outside of base closures.

McMillan said the Defense Department has consolidated many operations to save $39 billion over five years, including using just one agency to run military commissaries, using one payroll system, closing some maintenance facilities and buying fewer spare parts.

"Even after we've done all these things, that's not going to be the 10 percent reduction that President Bush said he wants over the next five years," McMillan said.

Several Texas military bases have been proposed for closure or modification as the nation tries to reduce spending.

Bergstrom Air Force Base in Austin may close and city officials say that would translate into billions of dollars in lost jobs and income.

Defense officials also are considering dismantling the famed 2nd Armored Division at Fort Hood in Killeen, another move that community officials say could devastate the local economy.

Luce says scrap state's school funding plan

EL PASO (AP) – The school funding plan proposed by the Texas Legislature should be discarded and replaced with changes in education that include allowing parents to chose their children's schools, a former gubernatorial candidate said.

Dallas attorney Tom Luce, who lost a bid for the Republican nomination in the March primaries, said the $528 million funding plan approved by the Legislature last month will do little to improve education in Texas.

Luce helped Dallas billionaire Ross Perot lobby the 1986-87 Legislature to pass HB72, the education reform bill that established no-pass, no-play.

"I think we've got to scrap the school finance system. I say we need to do that no matter what ... Forget equalization, the system doesn't work," Luce told publishers and editors gathered Monday for the Texas Daily Newspaper Association convention.

Instead Luce proposed several administrative changes to fix Texas' education system.

Luce said he would like to see the Texas Education Agency dismantled and principals given more authority, including the power to hire and fire faculty and staff.

"We've got to get to the point where we have (principals as) academic leaders but to do that we've got to get to the point where they have the power and authority to do their job," Luce said. "Today they can't hire a secretary that works in their building, let alone a teacher."

Luce also said the state will not prosper economically unless changes are made.

"If we don't change what we're doing, you can't raise enough taxes to support the more than 50 percent of our population that is not gaining skills that can compete in our economy," he said.

Texas lawmakers passed a $528 million funding plan in June to equalize funding between rich and poor school districts. But many property-poor school districts that successfully sued to have the former funding plan ruled unconstitutional, complain that the new plan also falls short.

"I'm not preaching against money," Luce said. "I'm saying money is not the only answer."

Toddler undergoes rare liver, small intestine transplants

By JEFFREY BAIR
Associated Press Writer

PITTSBURGH (AP) – A 3-year-old Texas girl received a transplanted liver and small intestine today in a rare operation that lasted nearly 14 hours.

Tracey Kay Gonzales of Corpus Christi was in critical condition and breathing with the help of a respirator in the intensive care unit at Children's Hospital following the surgery, which began at 5:25 p.m. Monday and ended at 7:10 a.m. today, said hospital spokeswoman Sue Cardillo.

"Everybody seems to feel it went fairly well," Ms. Cardillo said. "It will be at least a week before doctors are able to form any type of prognosis, if then."

Ms. Cardillo said the next three days will be especially critical, and doctors will watch closely to see if the organs are functioning properly and free of infection.

Tracey needed the double transplant because of a condition called short gut syndrome, Ms. Cardillo said. Her liver was damaged by a high-protein liquid she was fed intravenously since birth, she said.

"A child with short gut syndrome has no way to absorb nutrition. There isn't enough intestine there to do any good," Ms. Cardillo said.

The girl's large intestine, or colon, functions normally.

Transplants of the small intestine, which links the stomach and colon, have a poor success rate. Since 1983, three adults and three children have died within a year of their surgeries at Children's and Pittsburgh's Presbyterian-University Hospital.

There is only one reported survivor of a small intestine transplant, a man who underwent the operation in April at Presbyterian-University Hospital.

The donor of Tracey's new organs was not identified.

Tracey's mother, Pam, was in Pittsburgh for her daughter's operation. Tracey, who was born two months premature, has been a patient at Children's since April 22 and her condition had worsened since her admission, Ms. Cardillo said.

The Travelers Co. of Hartford, Conn., told Children's Hospital earlier this month it wouldn't pay for Tracey's transplants and asserted they are experimental procedures, a spokeswoman for the insurer said.

"We have been a partner in her treatment all her life" and paid more than $1 million for Tracey's treatment, Travelers spokeswoman Rosanne Hennessy told the Corpus Christi Caller-Times. "Unfortunately, the transplant surgery is highly experimental and has not been proven to be safe and effective."

The operation will cost $200,000. Children's Hospital will devise a payment plan for the Gonzales family while encouraging them to continue a drive that has raised $20,000 in Corpus Christi, Ms. Cardillo said.

Ms. Cardillo said Children's Hospital has performed three transplant operations involving small intestines, but all recipients died within a year of their surgeries.

"There is low to little success on this type of operation. There is still a lot of research that needs to be done to improve the success rate," she said.

Three-year-old Tabatha Foster of Madisonville, Ky., died 192 days after a 1987 transplant of parts of her stomach and colon and her pancreas, liver and small intestine.

Three-year-old Rolandrea "Rolly" Dodge of Fruitland, N.M., died three months after her November 1988 transplant of part of her colon and her stomach, pancreas, liver and small intestine. An unidentified six-year-old girl died hours after a transplanted small intestine replaced an organ damaged in a 1983 swimming-pool accident.

Earlier this year, Dr. John Fung of Presbyterian-University Hospital in Pittsburgh announced what he called the world's first successful small intestine transplant on a man who was shot in the abdomen.

The man, who wasn't identified, was able to digest food after the transplant but still was recovering, Fung told the University of Pittsburgh's board of trustees in June. Fung didn't provide other details about the operation.

An estimated 2,000 children are born in the United States with short gut syndrome every year.

Ryanmania strikes as Rangers' fireballer sets sights on No. 300

By ARNIE STAPLETON
Associated Press Writer

DALLAS — When Nolan Ryan signed with the Texas Rangers as a free agent in December 1988, three numbers swirled in his head.

Five thousand. Six and 300.

"Those are the only numbers that really mean something to me," Ryan said.

Ryan, the all-time strikeout leader, struck out Rickey Henderson for No. 5,000 last summer and has added 202 since. His sixth no-hitter, against Oakland last month, came after several close calls since his record fifth in 1981.

On Wednesday night, Ryan goes for his 300th victory against the New York Yankees.

Ryan declined to discuss going for No. 300 until last Friday night, when he beat Detroit 5-3 for No. 299.

"Now I can start thinking about it," he said. "I don't think about no-hitters until the ninth or so, I didn't think about 5,000 until I was close and I didn't think about 300 until I had 299."

Just about everyone else has been thinking about it all season. And now, Ryanmania has struck again. Even Ryan is caught up in it, agreeing to a news conference today to accommodate the hundreds of interview requests.

Unlike some 300-win pitchers, Ryan is on a hot streak as he approaches the coveted number. Despite nagging back problems, Ryan is 5-0 with an 2.63 ERA in his last six starts.

"I feel good," Ryan said. "My back won't keep me from starting Wednesday, but it's just one of those things that'll need five weeks of rest to completely heal."

Wednesday night's game was sold out on July 20, the earliest sell-out in Rangers history, said Tanja Burgdorf in the team's public relations office.

One fan in the Dallas suburb of Plano bought six tickets to take his family to the game, but got an unexpected collectible when his wife chose not to go.

The $8.50 unused ticket would be worth at least $50 if Ryan wins, said Jim Milholland of Dick's Dugout sports collectibles shop in Dallas.

"But I think they're crazy for not going to the game if they have a ticket," he said.

Some examples of Ryanmania:

— Local newspapers are running daily updates on Ryan remaining calm as the pressure mounts, and radio stations are giving fans up-to-the-minute reports on Ryan's ailing back.

"Sunday, it was a combination of light throwing with a full workout. After some weightlifting, Ryan rode an exercise bicycle for about 35 minutes, did interval running, stretched his stiff back and did abdominal exercises," proclaimed The Dallas Morning News in Monday's editions.

— The razor company for which Ryan does TV commercials is poised for the Texas pitcher's 300th career victory. Since Ryan is 43, BIC said when Ryan wins No. 300, all 43-year-old men in the United States will be offered a free trial pack of BIC Metal Shavers.

BIC said if everyone responds, it would give away 1.4 million razors.

— Ryan memorabilia was a hot item at the 11th National Sports Collectors convention in Arlington earlier this month. Rangers manager Bobby Valentine even doled out hundreds of dollars for a Ryan rookie card.

And a special Score card of Ryan, of which only 600 were printed to commemorate the convention, sold for $2,000 recently.

A mint 1968 Topps rookie card of Ryan recently sold for $3,900 at a Florida auction.

— Five hundred people entered a Fort Worth Star-Telegram contest titled "Ryan Expressions," in which they wrote in 25 words or less just how special Ryan was to their lives.

The winner, James Fleschener, of Arlington, wrote: "Nolan brings back memories of days gone by. Playing ball during the endless summer days with childhood friends. Nolan is my personalized fountain of youth."

"To my young son," wrote R.E. Springer of Fort Worth, "Nolan Ryan is John Wayne in cleats. To an aging yuppie, he is an inspiration not to relinquish one's goals."

"A hero worthy of our dreams," wrote Jane Jackson of Arlington.

Denise Stiver of Arlington wrote: "All ages will say, 'There goes Nolan Ryan. The best there ever was.'"

Americans dominate track & field at Goodwill Games

By PETE HERRERA
AP Sports Writer

SEATTLE — On a day marked by slow times and close finishes, America's deepening pool of track talent upheld its tradition and fortified for the future.

The second day of track and field competition at the Goodwill Games belonged to American stars like sprinter Leroy Burrell, hurdler Roger Kingdom and heptathlete Jackie Joyner Kersee.

The U.S. won a total of 14 medals Monday — five gold, five silver and four bronze — including a sweep in the 100, where the 21-year-old Burrell handed two-time Olympic champion and world record holder Carl Lewis his first defeat this season.

Kingdom, the Olympic gold medalist at Los Angeles and Seoul, led another U.S. sweep in the 110-meter hurdles, and edged closer to the form that made him the top track and field athlete in the world last year by edging fellow American Tony Dees in a race so close a photo decided the gold medal.

"It should have been called a dead heat," Dees said. "I don't consider it a loss."

And Joyner-Kersee re-established her dominance in the heptathlon with a runaway win over Soviet Larisa Nikitina. Joyner-Kersee won five of the seven events over two days in scoring 6,783 points, well short of her world record mark of 7,291 points set in the 1988 Olympics. It was the best in the world this year.

It was Joyner-Kersee's 12th straight heptathlon victory, her last defeat coming in 1984.

"It's still there," she said of her dominating skill at one of the sport's toughest events.

Kingdom also did not come close to his world record of 12.92 seconds in the 110-meter high hurdles. He hit the finish in 13.47, .01 seconds ahead of Dees.

Lewis, who generally comes up big in big competition, as attested by his six Olympic gold medals, couldn't match Burrell in the 100.

Burrell, the fastest sprinter in the world the past two years, used a strong midrace surge in winning in 10.05. Lewis, the only sprinter to win two Olympic golds in the 100 and the world record-holder at 9.92, finished second in 10.08.

The U.S. men's basketball team, which meets the Soviets tonight in a rematch — sort of — of the 1988 Olympic semifinal won by the USSR, beat Puerto Rico in its opener 100-94. The Soviets took Italy 88-85.

Starting center Alonzo Mourning, of Georgetown, was ejected along with Puerto Rico's Jose Ortiz for fighting in the first half. Then Billy Owens and Kenny Anderson took charge. Owens had 34 points, Anderson finished with 21, nine in the last 2:54.

The United States set an American record in the women's 400-meter medley relay at 4:06.95 and beat the East German women in a relay for the first time since the 1978 world championships.

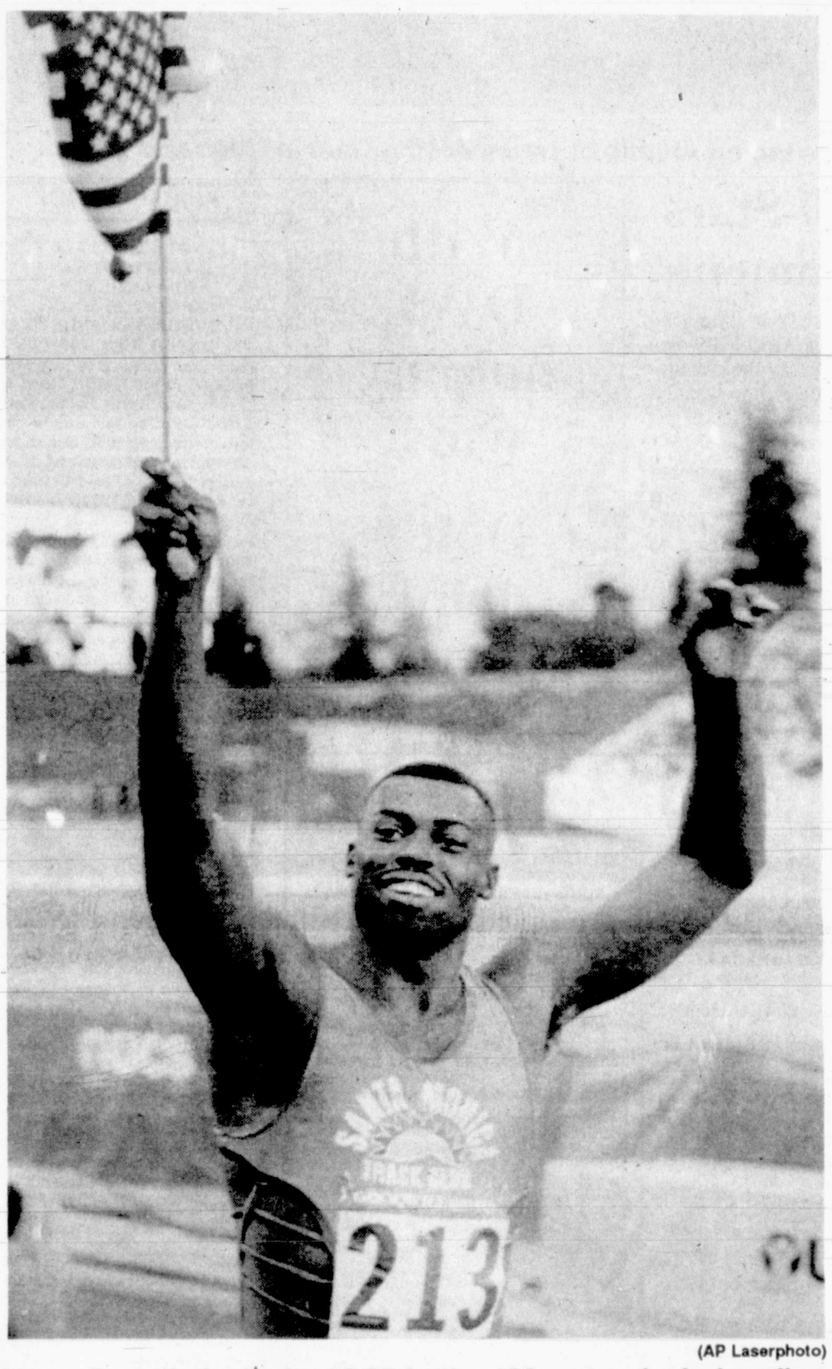

Janet Evans easily won her third gold of the games, in the 1,500-meter freestyle with the second-fastest time ever, 15:54.23. Summer Sanders, who upset Evans in the 400-meter individual medley Saturday, took her second gold of the games, winning the 200 individual medley in 2:14.06.

Cuba's Ana Quirot completed a sweep of the women's 400 and 800 meters, taking the 800 Monday in 1:57.42.

Yelena Yelesina, 20, won the women's high jump at 6-71/2, the best in the world this year.

U.S. champion Joe Falcon won a slow men's 1,500 meters in 3:39.77 for his first victory in a major international championship.

PattiSue Plumer, the American 5,000-meter champion, won a tactical women's 3,000-meter race in 8:51.59, more than 10 seconds off her best this year.

Leroy Burrell clocked a 10.05 in the 100-meter dash, handing world record holder Carl Lewis his first loss this season.

Pardee spares Oilers with cooler workouts

By MICHAEL A. LUTZ
AP Sports Writer

SAN MARCOS — Houston Oiler veterans will have to work on their timing when they report to training camp.

Rookies and a few veterans learned about Coach Jack Pardee's early-bird workout schedule Monday and the veterans will begin two-a-day workouts on Wednesday.

Unlike previous Oiler training camps that provided steamy mid-morning and mid-afternoon workouts, Pardee has gone to 7 a.m. and 5 p.m. starting times for his two-a-days.

"It's humid out there but the heat wasn't high so they can concentrate on getting better," Pardee said. "You just want to get great practices. It's not an endurance contest on how to survive."

The Oilers were on the field at 6:35 a.m. Monday, beating the sun, which rose at 6:43 a.m. when the temperature was a cool 74 degrees.

"I generally rise up early but I never came to the football field when it was dark before," veteran defensive tackle Doug Smith said.

Players generally accepted the 5 a.m. air horn blaring in their dormitory as the latest inconvenience of training camp life.

"Thank God, I don't have to get taped, I can stay in another 45-50 minutes," quarterback Chuck Hartlieb said. "But it doesn't bother me. Any later and it would really be hot."

The cooler workout times didn't prevent first round draft choice Lamar Lathon from heating up.

He arrived at camp with his head shaved and entertained fans with the first fight of training camp.

Actually, he said it was planned.

"I usually do that, I just pick out somebody and go at it," Lathon said. "You have to be aggressive to play this game and that just helps me get ready to play."

Lathon, expected to battle for a starting outside linebacker position, got into a shoving match with offensive linemen Dan Rosado and Curt Digiacomo.

Lathon said he would continue the practice even after Oiler veterans report to camp.

"They put their pants on the same as me," Lathon said. "We'll come together as a team but this is just my way of getting ready," Lathon said.

But Lathon had kind words for veteran linebacker Robert Lyles, who now starts ahead of Lathon at strongside linebacker.

"I respect him and I don't expect to come in here and just say the job is mine," Lathon said. "I expect to earn the job. I know Mr. Lyles isn't going to give it up without a fight."

Oiler veterans are due in camp Wednesday and will have three days to prepare for Saturday's scrimmage with the Dallas Cowboys in San Antonio's Alamo Stadium.

Pardee is installing a full-time run-and-shoot offense and a 4-3 defense, the same alignments he used last season at the University of Houston.

Second year quarterback Hartlieb and former University of Houston quarterback David Dacus and San Jose State rookie Mike Perez were the only quarterbacks present for the first workout.

Starter Warren Moon won't work out until Wednesday. Backup Cody Carlson and 12th round pick Reggie Slack of Auburn are contract holdouts.

"This is a first for me, I'm grateful and trying to make the most of it," said Hartlieb, who didn't get into a game as a rookie.

"Being the first guy up here and having to take charge of the offense is something I've waited a year for."

Rangers reach .500 mark with 3-2 win over Yankees

ARLINGTON (AP) — While the Texas Rangers were reaching the elusive .500 mark Monday, the New York Yankees' power outage continued.

Rangers ace Kevin Brown (12-7) pitched a four-hitter for his American League-leading sixth complete game as Texas won 3-2. Not even solo homers by Steve Sax and Kevin Maas could turn the fortunes of the Yanks, who are hitting .247 and have scored only 343 runs — both league lows.

When the Yankees had Brown on the ropes in the first, with a run in and two runners on, Maas struck out and Roberto Kelly hit a shallow ground ball. New York had only four baserunners the rest of the game.

Once again, manager Stump Merrill confronted the question of whether his team, which lost when Andy Hawkins threw a no-hitter, will hit this season.

"You don't like to think that way," Merrill said. "We're not getting any production out of the bottom of the lineup. (Jesse) Barfield (12 home runs, 40 RBI) is hurt, and that takes a nice bat out of our lineup. It's not like we've got five Rod Carews on the bench.

"We had Brown on the verge of coming out in the first. A couple of knocks there, and one of their best pitchers is out of the game. But ifs and buts will make you an old man in a hurry.

"You're not gonna beat anybody with four hits.

Yankee starter Chuck Cary (4-6) conceded that he feels the pressure. He hasn't had a victory in his last six starts. Monday, Cary got out of jams in the second and third and was tied with Brown, 1-1, until Ruben Sierra hit a two-run single in the fifth.

Though Steve Sax led off the game with a home run, Cary said, "I wasn't thinking 'I've got runs to work with,' not at all. If you go out and try to give up just three runs, a lot of times you win, but a lot more times you lose. If you go out and try to pitch a shutout ... it gets hard to pitch that way.

"I was working hard not to give up any runs."

Does Cary have the feeling his team will start to hit?

"Yeah, there is a feeling that we're going to start hitting," Cary replied.

A strong feeling?

"A feeling," Cary said.

The pressure of pitching with few runs showed as Cary botched a play that tied the score in the second. With Sierra on third, Texas catcher John Russell hit a high chopper. Cary jumped and appeared to have the ball and a play at the plate, but the ball went off his glove, and Sierra scored.

Broyles greets PCC course like an old friend

By L.D. STRATE
Sports Writer

Defending Tri-State Senior champion Jake Broyles of Lamesa and the Pampa Country Club course are hitting it off just fine again.

Broyles shot a one-over-par 72 in a practice round Monday in preparation for the 56th annual tournament, which tees off Wednesday for a three-day run.

"I've done pretty good when I've played this summer, but I haven't played that much. I had a pretty good score Monday, but you never know how things are going to go when the tournament starts," Broyles said.

Broyles, who has won three Tri-State titles (1989, '86, '83), said the PCC course is in excellent shape compared to the ones he played on this summer.

"The greens are in excellent condition. The course has lost some grass in the fairways, but not nearly as much as some of the courses I've played on. Overall, it's in fine shape," Broyles said.

Tri-State Seniors Golf

Broyles toured the course in 219 (6-over par) last season, holding off challenges by Elmer Wilson, Jim Kirk and Harold DeLong, each falling one shot short.

Kirk, of Ardmore, Okla., had to drop out of the tournament due to his wife's illness. He won the tournament in 1988 and was runnerup last year.

Wednesday's and Thursday's rounds consist of both match and stroke play. Friday's round is stroke play in all flights.

Following is a list of the tournament's medalists, dating back to 1935, the first year the event was held.

Stubbs' homer can't save Houston from 3-1 loss

By ED SHEARER
AP Sports Writer

ATLANTA — John Smoltz would rather face a Houston Astros lineup minus Franklin Stubbs.

"He's just a good fastball hitter," Smoltz said Monday night after having excellent success against the Astros — except for Stubbs.

Smoltz pitched a five-hitter and Mark Lemke had a two-run single as the Braves trimmed the Astros 3-1.

Stubbs kept Smoltz from pitching a shutout, hitting the Atlanta right-hander's first pitch of the seventh inning into the right-field seats, his 13th of the year.

Stubbs had six hits in 10 career at bats off Smoltz before the Braves' pitcher ended the game by fanning Stubbs.

"If you could take him out of the lineup, I'd be happy," Smoltz said. "He's an inside fastball hitting machine, and that's exactly what he hit, an inside fastball. I'm just glad there was nobody on base."

Smoltz squared his record at 7-7, winning for the fourth time in his last five decisions. His only loss in that stretch was his previous start against Philadelphia, when he carried a shutout into the eighth inning of what turned into a 4-3 loss.

"The last game I didn't think I was going to lose," Smoltz said. "This game I was deep in the count all night and I didn't know if I would win."

He might not have had it not been for a break.

Mike Scott (7-10) had worked out of jams in the first four innings and was working on what would have been his second consecutive shutout when the Braves struck for three runs in the sixth inning.

With one out, third base umpire Fred Brocklander ruled that left fielder Javier Ortiz trapped a fly ball by Andres Thomas. Television replays clearly showed Ortiz caught it.

Girls' Junior League All-Stars win area softball tournament

The Pampa Junior League Softball All-Stars won the Area 12 and Under Tournament this season with a 4-1 record.

Pampa advanced to the District Championship Playoffs, losing to Dumas 17-10. Dumas had to rally to win after Pampa took an early lead.

Losing pitcher was Lorrie Fulton, who finished all-star play with a 2-1 record.

Dumas advanced to the championship playoffs by winning the Memphis Area Tournament.

In the Area Tournament, Pampa bounced back from the loser's bracket to defeat Fritch, 17-13, in the finals with the lead changing three times. Pampa earlier downed Fritch, 12-11, to set up the championship game. Lorrie Fulton was 2-0 and Amanda Kludt was 2-1 in the Area Tournament.

Pampa opened the tournament with a 10-9 loss to Fritch, but bounced back to defeat High Plains West, 22-2, and Borger, 16-8, to reach the finals.

"Pitching and outstanding hitting were the strong suits of the team, with virtually every player making a strong showing at the plate during the tournament," said coach Fran Kludt.

With DWI, nobody wins.

Warning on tanker pileups: 'We're asking for trouble'

EDITOR'S NOTE – After $30 million of repairs, the Exxon Valdez is due back at sea in August with a new crew, new steel in its shredded hull, new ports of call in the Middle East and a new name – Exxon Mediterranean. But no such industrywide makeover has occurred to limit oil spills and their damage.

By ROBERT DVORCHAK
AP National Writer

NEW YORK (AP) – It seemed like a maritime version of Murphy's law.

The wayward Exxon Valdez plowed into Bligh Reef. Then three shipwrecks oiled three waterways within 12 hours last June.

The American Trader ran over its anchor and gashed itself. The BT Nautilus was one of three spills in three months in the New York City area. The Mega Borg caught fire in the Gulf of Mexico. And on and on and on.

But these accidents, all within 15 months of each other, are more than just a run of bad luck. There are systemwide flaws in the way tankers are built, operated and monitored, according to records and interviews with industry experts.

On an average of five days out of seven last year, a tanker ran aground, hit another ship or a dock, broke apart, sprung a leak, exploded or had some other kind of mishap, according to Coast Guard records.

A Coast Guard report on tanker safety cited "formidable problems" in regulating tankers. Among them are fatigued tanker crews, shipowners who give more priority to schedules than safety and inspectors who are overworked and burned out.

The Center for Marine Conservation has called for a presidential task force to assess tanker safety because no agency is doing a top-to-bottom review. It also criticized cutbacks in the Coast Guard as "false economizing."

And despite the Exxon Valdez wreck that caused the nation's worst oil spill on March 24, 1989, the industry remains ill-prepared to handle a major spill. A glacial-paced Congress still hasn't passed a tanker safety package.

The result is bleak news for a nation whose huge appetite for oil means more tankers, many of them aging, will be pulling into its ports. On any given day, about 50 tankers carrying 450 million gallons of oil sail into U.S. harbors, each one a potential environmental disaster.

"We are asking for trouble," said Clifton Curtis, president of the Oceanic Society.

Not just environmentalists are uneasy.

"This industry is in a bad way," said Arthur MacKenzie, head of the Tanker Advisory Group and a former Exxon Corp. shipping executive. "We have to make drastic changes in the way we build, operate and license in this business.

"Who's studying the whole picture? Nobody."

In sheer numbers, the Coast Guard investigated 265 oil spills from tankers last year. Most were minor, but six were more than 10,000 gallons, including the 11 million gallons disgorged by the Exxon Valdez.

Add last year's 639 tank barge incidents, and the average is 17 spills a week.

A private study by Golob's Oil Pollution Bulletin in Cambridge, Mass., counted 78 spills of 10,000 gallons or more in the past 12 years, an average of nearly seven a year.

Total spillage was 41 million gallons. At the same time, 243 billion gallons, or 99.98 percent of the oil shipped, got to shore safely.

The oil industry says that record hardly supports the image of an oceanic demolition derby. But six major spills have occurred already this year. And the public, as much as it demands the oil, won't tolerate the sliming of beaches and shorelines.

"What was an acceptable level of performance 10 years ago is not acceptable today," said Sean Connaughton of the American Petroleum Institute. "There's an almost zero tolerance for oil spills. The sensitivity is so much greater now."

Environmentalists say the breakdowns are not isolated incidents but examples of common problems, the way Three Mile Island was in the nuclear power industry and the Challenger explosion was in the space industry.

"Clearly, this is an issue that has reached and will exceed crisis proportions. The potential for an increasing number and more severe accidents is very high," said Roger McManus, president of the Center for Marine Conservation.

Turning things around is trickier than steering a supertanker in a tight channel. There is no one solution because there is no one problem.

Each branch of Congress passed its own version of an oil tanker safety bill last fall. But a 100-member conference named to reconcile the differences had met just once before the Mega Borg exploded June 9 and leaked 3.9 million gallons of oil.

On July 12, the committee reached a compromise that would require new tankers be built with puncture-resistant double hulls while existing tankers be fitted with a second hull or phased out of service over the next 20 years.

In addition, the bill would create a $1 billion oil spill response fund, make it easier for the Coast Guard to take over cleanup efforts, set liability levels for spills and toughen licensing requirements for tanker crew members.

A final vote is pending.

'Household managers' make living a bit easier

DENVER (AP) – Move over Alfred, Mr. French and Lurch. Take a hike Jeeves. A new breed of butler is standing at the door, ready to take the sting out of daily life.

But, please. Sweep the word butler under the rug. Now it's "household manager," thank you very much.

From a Victorian mansion where there's nary a speck of dust, the Starkey Institute for Household Management began cranking out the next generation of helpers in January. They're a far cry from the crusty, pursed-lipped Englishman good at answering the front door and serving tea.

Mary Starkey, the institute's president and founder, says her graduates are trained to perform myriad tasks in today's complicated world, from balancing the family checkbook to knowing when the water heater needs maintenance.

"This business is not about cleaning someone's home. It's about helping to run their daily lives," she says.

The institute was conceived on the basis of studies that American households, especially those with two incomes, require specialized management, Starkey says.

Her students, about 50 so far, agree. And they don't have much in common with stereotypical butlers popularized by television's Mr. French of "Family Affair," Lurch of "The Addams Family," Alfred of "Batman," or Jeeves from the Bertie Wooster books by P.G. Wodehouse.

Ginny Spencer was a successful real estate agent who dabbled in catering. She heard about the institute from Sandy Wischmeyer, a caterer and the school's director of curriculum.

Spencer liked the idea so much that at 53, she decided to change careers.

"The program is just wonderful," Spencer says. "There's a definite need for this kind of industry. I feel lucky to be in on the ground floor."

Tuition for the eight-week program is $4,000, which covers 300 hours of education. The price may seem a bit steep to some, but Starkey has a decisive defense.

"Where else would you train household managers but in their workplace? And where else can you go to school for two months and come out qualified for a job that pays $18,000 a year? It's a perfect setup," Starkey says.

Students cover seven general areas during the eight-week program – organization, cleaning and maintenance of the household; fine dining; entertaining; clothing and travel; art; security and finance; and, perhaps most important of all, finding themselves jobs.
