EUROPE MUST REALIZE ITS PRESENT PERIL

A thoughtful man, who surveyed the state of Europe today, almost might be pardoned if he began to believe that the end of all things was at hand.

It is a long time since the sky has been as dark as it is today, and it is hard to see how it could be very much darker. Remembering what the last war did to civilization, it is not easy to contemplate the approach of a new one without the most profound misgivings.

And yet—although this is the most hackneyed remark in the world—it is just possible that things are not quite as bad as they seem; possible, that is, that what we are looking at now is not the eve of general dissolution, but that very dark hour which, according to tradition, comes just before the dawn.

For if there is left in mankind any sanity at all, the present troubles in Europe ought to be convincing evidence that the policies of the post-war era have been disastrously impractical.

The frenzied tangle of repression, competitive armament, blind nationalism, disregard of economic law and exaltation of strong-armed dictatorship is giving all the world a complete demonstration of its ruinous futility.

It is enough to show the blindest, in other words, that the nations of the world cannot go much farther along the road they have been following without tumbling, all together, into the pit.

And there ought to be enough common sense in European capitals to pave the way for some sort of new deal.

Today's situation is not like that of 1914. In that day the world not yet had had its frightful demonstration of the catastrophe which war brings to victor and vanquished alike; nor was the imminence of war a matter of general knowledge, except among a relatively small group of statesmen.

Now every one, down to the most ignorant peasant, knows that war is near, knows that if it comes it will mean complete disaster for everyone involved.

Is one being a blind optimist in supposing that this general awareness may create a pressure on the rulers of Europe that will lead to the adoption of more sane policies?

In 1914 the world did not realize its own peril. Today it cannot help realizing it.

And the disorder, the bloodshed, the menaces which recent weeks have brought may, just possibly, bring the statesmen of Europe to their senses.

EVEN A NATION AT WAR MUST NOT GO TOO FAR

The execution by the Germans in 1915 of Nurse Edith Cavell was entirely justified by all rules of war.

So says Capt. Alfred Duff Cooper, financial secretary to the British war office, and holder of a distinguished war record, in a recent speech to British army officers.

Miss Cavell, Captain Cooper points out, was a courageous woman who engaged in activities specifically forbidden by the German authorities in Belgium, helping upward of 100 persons to escape from the occupied territory, knowing full well what the penalty would be if she were caught.

When the Germans put her in front of a firing squad, on that October morning in 1915, they did no more than they clearly were entitled to do by rules of "civilized" warfare.

But Captain Cooper hastens to point out that that, after all, is only half of the story.

"Any politician," he adds, "could have told them that the execution was going to arm 100,000 men against Germany."

Anyone interested in digging back into those dreary and tragic war days can see that it was precisely that error which, in the last analysis, did more than anything else to defeat the German war machine; the error of failing to assess the imponderables in deciding on their martial policies.

The Town Quack
(Reserves the right to "quack" about everything without taking a stand on anything.)

I heard that Timberline and Jay Floyd had gone to Houston to take a horse. Can you imagine that? I didn't know they had a horse.

I got hold of a letter yesterday from Hank O. Hemp, who mails publicity about the International Petroleum exposition at Tulsa to be held May 12 to 19. He hasn't written much lately on account of a car got in his way as he was going after a paper and pencil and he got his left arm busted. Hank O. Hemp said: "That wouldn't make no difference with most folks, but I rite with my left arm and my rite arm not being the rite arm to rite with even tho it was left and my left arm being the rite arm to rite with I couldn't rite."

He said they have prorated passes and ended his letter, "Yours till they prorated proration." He added that the only voluntary curtailment he ever heard of was after they'd pumped the well dry.

Harry Sam and wife, prominent colored folks of this city, have a baby boy who was born on February 22 of this year and they didn't name him George. Washington. He is starting out in life under the name Arthur Lee. However, Washington and Lee both are good names and the boy ought to do well with the same birthday as George Washington.

I see by Ripley where a man made himself a set of false teeth out of a steak bone. Must have knocked his teeth out on the bone and decided to use the tougher of the material.

M. S. Nicholson, who owns a copy of Anthony Adverse, has a long list of applicants who want to borrow the book. He has worked out certain rules governing the loan. In the first place the book was loaned to Hankins three months ago, so Nicholson won't get it back until about June 1. Nick requires that the next person who reads the 1224 page book must furnish the truck for transportation both ways. He assumes no liability for bodily injury which may be inflicted upon the borrower or the borrower's family who may let the book fall on them. Likewise he will pay for no damage to borrower's property. He has a schedule of rates for loaning the book, either by the month or the year. Slower readers are advised that a saving can be effected if the yearly rate is used. In the event they finish in less than a year, a short rate cancellation schedule will be used in refunding money, similar to that used by fire insurance policies. Rental of the book is a side line and is operated separately from Nick's wholesale oil business.

Lubitsch Puts Four Leading Stars in Film

Three of Hollywood's most important romantic stars, Frederic March, Gary Cooper and Miriam Hopkins together with Edward Everett Horton, than whom there is no funnier play than the roles in Paramount's film adaptation of Noel Coward's sensational stage success, "Design for Living," opening at the Ritz theatre today for a three day run.

The picture was directed by Ernest Lubitsch from the screen play written by Ben Hecht, author of many Broadway stage hits including "Front Page."

"Design of Living" concerns itself with the romantic entanglements of three sprightly, light hearted artists. The triangular romance has its inception in a Parisian spring, and winds its hilarious path through London and New York before it reaches its bombshell conclusion.

When Gilda met Tom and George on the train that afternoon, she just never thought of love, especially love at first sight. She is too fond of Tom to tell him she loves George, and she also loves George too much to tell him of "Tom."

Both boys, boon companions for years, return her love, but they can't let a woman break up their friendship.

So the three of them settle down together in a Paris attic, and their search for happiness begins. The boys become famous and Gilda finds herself entangled in two romances. To save the boys' friendship, she leaves, and goes to the states to marry her former employer. The boys arrive on the scene when they are needed most and bring the picture to an exciting and an amusing ending.

CHAPTER XI
Orskidok walked with an air of authority; had he not been left in charge of the family by Mala? Brief authority had aged him. About Mala, too, who trudged beside the sled, was something of a grown-up air. As the dog-team came over the top of a rolling hill it stopped; first the lead dog, and then his fellows, raised their heads and sniffed. Orskidok gazed in the direction from which the wind came and saw a figure in the snow, prostrate. Hastening forward, followed by Mala and the sled, he knelt down by the man whose head was beside that of a white Arctic wolf and turned him over.

"Mala!" he cried, joyously, and motioned to Mala to hurry. The boy in turn knelt by his father. The partly eaten tongue of the wolf told them what had happened. Mala's eyes slowly opened as Orskidok raised his head in his arms, exclaiming:
"Mala! One is Orskidok! Another is Puala!"

A weak grin spread over Mala's gray and haggard face. "Orskidok... Puala..." he murmured hoarsely.

Awaiting no explanation, the youth and the boy lifted Mala's emaciated figure upon the sled and started off at a run.
Despite the snow on the ground, which was melting, but could still be used for sledging, Mala's family had left the igloo and were living in their skin tent. When little Upik ran into the tent and said eagerly that a sledge was approaching fast, Iva and Inapajak ran out just as Orskidok brought the dogs to a halt. Their eyes went straight to the figure of a man on the sled, and they stood transfixed as they recognized the face of Mala. Waves of emotion swept over Iva's face as she knelt by the sled, exclaiming:
"Mala! Mala!" She rubbed her nose gently against his and Mala raised his left hand and softly touched her cheek, repeating her name. At sight of his torn skins, the haggard look on his face and the injured and swollen hand, Iva broke into sobs. Mala tried to laugh her back into joyousness.

Inapajak's face fell as she looked away from the greeting between Mala and Iva and little Upik toward Orskidok who was almost a grown man and had awakened her admiration. Then, as though realizing her duty, she smiled prettily at Mala and knelt down to rub noses with him. Mala treated her as a child, as he did Puala and Upik; his glances were all for Iva, for Iva had become the supreme object of his affection. She was his mate.

Orskidok lifted Mala from the sled and helped him toward the tent. Mala stopped by the meat rack and saw that it was empty. He looked at Orskidok, his wives and little Upik; their faces were thin and drawn; their bodies haggard. Hunger had stalked among them.

"One has been kept away too long," said Mala, simply.

fixed an arrow to his bow.

"One's bow is ready."

"Save your arrow," replied Mala, stopping him from shooting the arrow at the white men. "It trembles better in a caribou."

"But it seems they bring unhappiness."

"It would only bring you trouble. You do not understand."

As Orskidok lowered his bow, Iva went and nestled against Mala.

"Mala's family goes with him."

"No." He turned to his step-son. "One asks only for this spear."

"It is not Mala's spear?" asked the puzzled youth.

"Nothing is mine. One's hand cannot draw a bow. One gives it all to Orskidok."

"One gives all?" said Iva, falteringly, a choke in her voice.

"Yes. One gives one's family, too. Orskidok has shown himself worthy." He rubbed noses with his two sons, then placed a hand on Orskidok's shoulder. "One leaves with peace in his heart."

"Mala's strength will hunt with me," responded Orskidok, humbly. Tears sprang into Iva's eyes as Mala drew her close against him with loving tenderness. She sobbed on his breast, but he raised her face and rubbed noses with her.

"Always one shall remember the warmth of your breast. Make men of my sons. Be a good mother to them." As though not trusting himself for further speech, he turned quickly and stalked away from them.

"Mala! Mala!" cried Iva. He did not even look. She cried his name again and again, wildly, and then darted after him. When she had approached so close that he could hear her running, he turned, crying:

"Go back!"

Instead, she ran forward and threw herself upon his breast.

"One must return," said Mala, severely. But Iva, staring at him while sobs racked her body, shook her head, clinging the closer to him in desperate affection. With anguished face, Mala freed himself from her arms and started forward.

Iva looked after him, tears streaming down her face, then, with the expression of a wounded dog trailing its master, she began to follow him at a walk, keeping an even distance behind him.

She kept following him out upon the ice. The large, spreading, whirling ice floes, cracking and roaring together beyond them, did not deter her. She kept even pace with his footsteps.

The dogs threw themselves down in utter exhaustion as Hunt commanded them to halt in front of Mala's tent. He went to the fly of the tent and looked in. Orskidok, Inapajak, Puala and Upik sat silently in the tent, their heads lowered in mute despair. They did not look up as Hunt appeared before them.

"Is it possible that Mala is here?" Hunt asked after a moment.

"The children stared at him in hostile silence. No one replied to his question. He stepped into the tent, but a cry from Mala: "Hey, here we are!" caused him to turn back without further word.

"Fresh tracks," said Mala, and looked about, to the landward and then out to sea. "There he is—headed for the ice!"

"Let's go," said Hunt, weary and sore at heart over the job that confronted him. He called to the dogs and they started out towards the figures walking out towards the crashing, roaring ice floes.

Mala, followed by Iva, kept even pace out to the sea. Ice jams and hummocks were beginning to rise about them. Mala began hopping with difficulty from floe to floe, Iva silently following. He turned at last and waved to her to go back. A woman could not make that difficult crossing of the ice pack. Iva did not reply, but kept on following him, her breath coming in heart-broken sobs. Every now and then she murmured his name, weakly, not expecting to make him hear. It was the cry of her soul after her mate who was leaving her behind.

Mala had his eyes directed straight forward, out to the roaring floes and the rolling, turning icebergs beyond them. He did not see a white head raised from behind a hummock of ice as a polar bear pricked up its ears at the scent of human flesh. As Mala approached the hummock, ice floes whirling and milling behind him, the bear stalked out and charged.

At Iva's shriek, Mala saw the oncoming bear and awkwardly raised his spear in his left hand, but before he could let it go the bear leaped upon him, crashing him down upon the ice floe, sending the spear flying out of his hand several yards away upon the ice.

Loan Applications Being Received by Association Here

Applications for production loans to farmers and stockmen in nine counties are now being received by Bruce Frazier, secretary-treasurer of the Midland Production Credit Association. According to Frazier, all loans will be made on a business basis according to the security furnished by the applicant.

"The loans that will be made in this county and the other eight counties served by the Midland Association must be good loans and loans that are collectible if the association is to continue as a permanent service to farmers in this and other communities, as intended," Frazier said.

"Fortunately, not all farmers in this county need credit," he continued, "but for those who do the association stands as a business organization—not as a charity organization. Loans may be obtained for periods of 3 to 12 months by any eligible deserving farmer or stockman who needs credit and has security, but if a farmer or stockman is eligible for credit, it must be extended on a business basis."

Each applicant has to state in his application what property he is offering to secure the loan. Frazier said security for these loans will consist of first liens on crops, livestock or other personal property on which a lien, or chattel mortgage, may be taken to secure the loan adequately. The lien may be taken on property already in the possession of the borrower, or to be purchased with the money borrowed. It is not intended that production loans shall be secured principally by mortgages on real estate. Where this type of security is taken it will be regarded only as additional collateral.

Frazier said that the charges on production loans would be as low as possible in keeping with business credit. A small fee is charged to inspect the property offered as security by the applicant, but usually no charge will be made for inspection if the loan is not granted.

The minimum amount that can be loaned to any one eligible borrower is $50. The interest rate is 3 per cent above the discount rate of the federal intermediate credit bank of Houston, and charged only for the actual number of months the loan is outstanding. The present discount rate of the federal intermediate credit bank is 2 per cent, which would make the interest rate to the farmer-borrower 6 per cent per annum.

Loans may be obtained for general agricultural purposes, including the costs of growing, cultivating, or marketing crops; and for the production of livestock, and dairy and poultry products.

Most of the loans will run from 3 to 12 months, and are to be due and payable at the time when the crops and livestock financed are sold.

Each farmer or stockman borrowing for the first time automatically becomes a member of the association, since each is required to own voting stock in the association equal to $5 for every $100 or fraction thereof he borrows. The stock may be purchased with a part of the loan proceeds. It is the only voting stock in the association, and may be purchased only by borrowers, each having only one vote regardless of the amount borrowed.

A farmer or stockman who becomes a member of an association does not have to "stand good for" the loans of the association, or the debts of other borrowers. The stock

McMurry Indians Win Championship

ABILENE.—The head dress of the McMurry Indians this morning is made of championship feathers. Monday night the old champions died, and a new set ascended the basketball throne in the Texas conference. While the Simmons Cowboys, holders of the title for five years, were being eliminated in a great game in the Howard Payne gym at Brownwood, the McMurry cagers were earning the right to succeed them in a still greater game with A. C. C. at Bennett gymnasium.

In a wild comeback, topped off by two overtime periods, the Redskins drove home the last nail in their bid for the 1934 flag. They came from nowhere, beat down a fourteen point lead in the last six minutes of regular playing time, and by the same three points that have given McMurry each of the four athletic victories it has ever scored over the Wildcats, won the game. The score was 37 to 54, figures telling the tale of the most thrilling Christian-Indian game yet staged before the largest crowd yet gathered at Bennett gym. Despite the coldest weather of the winter, thirteen hundred twenty-two people entered the building on tickets, paying $303.55 for the privilege of witnessing the struggle.

Champ Frogs End Season in Victory

FORT WORTH.—The championship Texas Christian university Horned Frogs closed their 1934 Southwest conference cage season here Monday night by scoring an easy 42 to 25 victory over the Rice Owls. It was the tenth victory of the season for Coach Francis Schmidt's team and the 18th straight for a Frog team on its own floor.

The new conference champions ran away from the Owls in the first half when Coach Jimmy Kitts' visitors counted but one field goal. The score at the rest period was 25 to 8. Johnson having earned the Owls' lone goal from the field just before the gun sounded. Although the feathered flock played better ball during the second 20 minutes, the Schmidtmen easily held their own to coast to victory.

It was the final game for six members of the purple. Capt. Wallace Myers, Ernest L. Walker, Cy Perkins and Robert Chappell were making their last appearance. Both coaches used every man on their squads during the final minutes.

Floor Debate on Redistricting Co.

AUSTIN. (U.P.)—During the last two special sessions of the legislature there has been an effort to take Duval county from the 14th congressional district and place it in the 15th. It has been grouped with the counties comprising the 14th when the state was redistricted at the regular session.

Senator Archie Parr of Benavides has sponsored the change. The 15th district is represented by Congressman Milton West of Brownsburg.

carries no double liability.

The Midland Production Credit Association, which is authorized to make loans in this county, is one of 50 which have been established in this state. Most of the capital of the association is provided by the Production Credit corporation of Houston, which is supervising the work of associations in Texas.

Garner of Uvalde, until he became vice-president of the United States. Representative Homer L. Leonard of McAllen, opposed the change. He was elected over the democratic nominee by the Good Government league partisans.

"Tell this committee your real reason for wanting to shunt Duval county back into the 15th district," said Leonard to Parr at a committee hearing on the bill.

"You tell them," Parr retorted. "Do not force me to tell the real reason," shouted Leonard.

"Tell them; tell them," Parr urged.

"You will have a race of your own, the hardest one you ever have had, will you not, next year?" Leonard asked.

"Yes, I'll have a race, but I consider it always will be an easy one," Parr replied.

Leonard never did explain how altering the congressional districts would help Parr in his race for senatorial district. Leonard said he would not be affected by the proposed change.
