Policewomen on Tryout in Paris

By United Press

PARIS, April 29.—The capital's two new policewomen, Berthe Roland and Simone Monvert, both of whom are under 30, are patroling their beats.

Dressed in tailored suits of navy blue with felt hats to match, they present a neat and efficient picture as they stroll along. They are occupied chiefly with the children, young girls and women of the city. Children playing "hookey" from school try to keep out of their way, for Berthe and Simone are truant officers.

It is their duty to see that there are no infractions of the child labor laws in shops and stores. They watch over the female element of the city in public squares and gardens, near schools, subway stations and unemployment bureaus. Although they are concerned chiefly with women and children, they are subject to the same rules and regulations as their masculine colleagues.

If, after three months, the experience of having women on the police force is successful, other young women who now are doing social service work will be transferred to increase the ranks of the feminine part of the city police force.

The Governor usually follows the pardon board's recommendation. He said, however, he would withhold a final decision until he completes a careful study of the board's reports and records of the case.

Hamilton and Palmer were convicted of slaying Major Crowson, Eastham prison farm guard, in an escape early in 1934.

Homeless Army On Move Again

By United Press

DALLAS, April 29.—America's vast army of migratory, homeless boys is again on the move, according to O. A. Stewart, supervisor at the Texas Transient Bureau.

Each day since spring's sunshiny days have given promise of warm summer months which will follow soon, the number of boys has increased. Now there is an average of about 40 boys reporting at the bureau daily, Stewart said.

The boys have developed a peculiar outlook on life, according to Stewart. Their movements have become pointless, the wander from bureau to bureau and register each night with the same lack of embarrassment that a citizen would feel in registering at a hotel.

"Seldom do the boys stay in one locality more than two or three days," Stewart said. "Their one aim is apparently to reach the next town, and then the next and the next in a never ending circuit."

Most of the boys never have graduated from grammar schools and few have attended high schools. They talk not about jobs and settling down, but about the transient bureau in the city ahead.

Does it have good food? Clean beds? Do they provide shoes or other clothing?

The boys normally band together in groups ranging in size from five to 15 under one leader, Stewart said. They hop trains together and rely upon their leader to do what little thinking they may be called upon to perform.

CHANGES OCCUR AS WORLD MOVES ON

THE fact that an international equal-rights-for-women conference is being held in the former harem of the sultans of Turkey is the sort of thing that leads to wisecracks.

Women from 42 countries have convened at the Yildiz Palace in Istanbul. Istanbul used to be Constantinople and the Yildiz Palace used to be the seraglio in which the sultan's girl friends were kept under lock and key; to locate a feminist conference there, of all places on earth, is about equal to convening a disarmament conference in one of the Krupp factories.

But for that very reason the incident deserves something more in the way of attention than a casual joke or two.

It symbolizes one way, at least, in which the world has managed to make some very definite progress during the last quarter century. It is probably true that modern civilization has declined somewhat since the pre-war decade; but in this one instance it has made a decided advance.

Suppose, for example, that we go back to 1906 or 1907. Nothing could have seemed less likely, then, than that the fight for feminine equality would sweep clear into the sultan's harem at any time in the near future. Even in England and America, the feminist was a person distrusted and ridiculed by ordinary folk, and her fight had barely begun.

Only the most light-headed of optimists would have predicted a victory in Turkey inside of one generation.

But the world does move, and it sometimes has a way of moving a great deal faster than anyone dares to predict. The fact is symbolized by this convention in Turkey's one-time harem and in it there is a spoonful or two of hope for a discouraged world.

BEGIN HERE TODAY

MILLICENT GRAVES, secretary to GEORGE DRIMGOLD, finds her employer in his office dead. JARVIS HAPP, a stranger, offers to help her. He sends her to a beauty shop where she is transformed into a brunet, then takes her home, introducing her as his secretary. She meets Happ's son, NORMAN; his stepson, ROBERT CAISE; MRS. HAPP, DICK GENTRY, Happ's partner; and VERA DUCHENE, Mrs. Happ's maid.

In Happ's home Millicent sees the mysterious woman in black ermine whom she believes has some connection with Drimgold's death.

The chauffeur is found dead. Later Happ is kidnaped.

Millicent and Norman learn the car driven by the woman in ermine belongs to PHYLLIS FAULconer. They go to her apartment and while they are there someone tries to enter. Norman follows to find out who it is. Millicent discovers the suitcase containing Happ's business accounts, takes it and goes to the hotel where she stopped before.

Normen comes. There is a scene between them in which he takes her in his arms.

NOW GO ON WITH THE STORY

CHAPTER XXXVIII

Norman said, "Millicent, I love you. That's why it meant so much to me when I found you were safe after knowing you had been in such danger. I didn't want to tell you now because I was afraid you'd think I was just like Bob Caise. I know the way he must have tried to force himself upon you. But it's different with me. Won't you understand? Can't you understand?"

She tried to find words, but words would not come. It seemed as though every bit of her was singing some beautiful harmony of soul-stirring music which both aroused and quieted her at the same time.

He misconstrued her silence. "Oh, please, dearest, one," he said, "please don't misunderstand me! I can't bear the thought of living without you. Please don't be prejudiced against me because I was swept off my feet. Give me a chance to show you that I really do love you. After we have all of these troubles behind us—after we are living as we want to, without fear of what may be just around the corner. Then, sometime when you have learned to know me better, I'll ask you to marry me. Until then, please hold your mind open. Please don't become prejudiced . . ."

And then she found her voice and heard herself saying, "Silly, can't you see I love you, too?"

His arms closed about her. Their lips clung together for a rapturous moment.

This time it was Norman who terminated the caress. Slowly he released her, looking at her with eyes in which there was no longer hunger, but only a deep tenderness.

"Dearest," he said, "we owe it to you to get this thing straightened out and, by Heaven, we're going to straighten it out! We're going to find the person who killed Drimgold and we're going to find Harry Felding's murderer. Just let me sit over here where I can watch you while you work on those books. Then we'll go find Gentry and when we find him I'll confront him with the facts and figures."

She brushed her lips lightly against his cheek, caught his hand, held it in both of hers for a moment. Then, with a low, throaty laugh, she pushed him over toward the big overstuffed chair and said, "Sit there, Norman. I'm so happy I'm afraid I can't add a column of figures. But I'll try, because it has to be done. We're fighting against minutes. Sergeant Mahoney is looking for me and it won't be long until he finds me. When he does we have to have this thing solved."

Without a word Norman sat down, took a cigaret from his case, and lit it. Millicent noticed that his hand trembled as he held the match.

"Go ahead," he said, "I'll wait. I can wait, now that I know how you feel. Only work as fast as you can, so that I can get out and do my share toward cleaning this thing up."

She found paper in the drawer of the writing desk. She pulled the books from the suitcase, spread them on the floor and started checking.

She made no attempt at an orderly audit of the books. Instead she looked for certain tell-tale evidences of discrepencies — things which she had learned during the time she had acted as assistant to a public accountant.

Less than two hours had passed when she looked up at Norman Happ who had kept perfectly quiet, watching her.

"There's a fund of more than $200,000 that has simply disappeared," she told him. "It's been juggled around through one or two accounts and then completely dropped. I can tell you this about Richard Gentry—he's an indifferent bookkeeper, but he's an embezzler. His books would never stand up to an audit. They wouldn't even balance. His accounts show discrepancies right on their faces."

"Okay," he said, 'let's go. How about that shorthand notebook — the one in which you took Drimgold's confession?"

She laughed nervously and said, "I have it here."

"Let me see it."

She handed it to him. He opened the book and looked at the series of pothooks.

"It might as well be in Egyptian," he told her, "as far as I'm concerned."

Suddenly his eyes narrowed and he said, "Look here, Millicent. Suppose we could discover what that crime was Drimgold was going to confess. Don't you think you could have it appear his confession had gone farther than it really did? No one could check up on you."

"Someone who used my system of shorthand could," she told him.

"We'll take a chance on that. Let's see if we can't find out something about what he was going to confess because it's linked with this whole business in some way. Come on. Let's go see this chap who runs the liquor store and see if he can't give us an additional clew. With that in our hands we will be sitting pretty."

"How about this suitcase?" she asked.

"That," he said, "can be left with the clerk at the desk. Tell him it contains valuables and he'll put it in a safe place. Come on, let's go."

He unlocked the door, held it open for her, and together they descended to the lobby. Happ handed the suitcase across the counter to the clerk and said, "That has some valuable documents in it. Give me a receipt and keep it in a safe place. The suitcase is the property of Miss Millicent Jones, who is registered with you."

The clerk eyed him with cynical appraisal, but what he saw in Norman Happ's eyes made him lower his own and nod with unaccustomed civility.

"Very well, sir," he said, making out a receipt.

Norman folded the receipt, handed it to Millicent and said, "You'd better keep this with that note Bob Caise wrote and then you'll have all the evidence together."

They caught a taxicab, went to the liquor store, and Norman Happ said, "Come on in, Millicent. He won't help us unless you ask him. He's strong for you."

Together they entered the liquor stor. The proprietor's eyes lighted up as he saw Millicent. "Find the people you were looking for?" he asked.

"I think we have," Millicent told him, "but we want to make certain. Will you help us?"

"What do you want me to do?"

"Go to 3829 Barrone avenue. Go to Miss Phyllis Faulconer's apartment. Tell her that you're selling life insurance or soliciting for a laundry route, or something of that sort. Get a good look at the woman and see if she's the woman in the black ermine coat."

"I'll have to get someone to watch the store," he said dubiously.

Millicent gave him her best smile. "That's all right," she said. "Go ahead and get someone. We'll pay the bill."

"There's a man next door who comes in sometimes, but he wants $2 an evening, and he won't . . ."

"That's all right," Norman said. "You call him in. Here's the $2 and here's another $3 for the taxicab fare and expense money."

The man took the $5 bill Norman handed him, grinned and said, "I'll get going. I'll send this man in to keep the store. Do you folks want to wait in here until I get back?"

"Is there a back room somewhere?" Norman Happ asked.

"Sure. Come right in here and sit down."

He led the way to a back room which contained two chairs, a cot, a stove, some cases of bottled goods, and shelves littered with an array of liquors. There was a glass panel in front of some of the bottles so that it was possible

NATURE'S WATER FOUNTAIN

DRY as the season may be, an unusual tree growing in Madagascar and Borneo always is prepared to refresh thirsty travelers. It is called the Traveler's Palm for this reason.

From the trunk extend fanlike leaves, each with a sheath at its base where water is stored. By piercing a leaf at its base, therefore, passers-by may drink from nature's own water fountain. The leaves also are used extensively in building native huts.

Madagascar in 1903 and North Borneo in 1909, portrayed this unique tree on their stamps.

attending. More than 50 persons attended the meeting called at 9 o'clock this morning by County Agent James A. Jackson.

Visitor Talks

E. C. Martin, special representative of the Extension Department of A. & M. College, was present for the meeting and discussed 4-H club work in the county. Mr. Martin pointed out the benefits of 4-H club work and the ways in which farmers and business men can assist in carrying out the program to the best advantage. An extensive effort is being made to rebuild membership in the boy's 4-H Clubs of the state. "We are perfectly satisfied with the quality of work by the existing clubs but we want to organize more clubs. More than 20,000 boys took part in this work last year and we want to build this membership past this peak," Mr. Martin said.

Mr. Martin's visit here was the last in a series of such meetings in Districts 1 and 2.

Following a short address by the College Station representative, those attending this morning's meeting went into a thorough discussion of the entire AAA farm program int his county. Unanimous approval of the present plan was expressed by those attending.

To Hold Meetings

All farmers and interested parties were urged to attend the meetings called for the various communities in the county. The community gatherings are to be climaxed by a meeting of community agricultural committeemen in Memphis Saturday afternoon.

The first of the community meetings is to be held at Brice Wednesday afternoon at 1:30 o'clock. Other meetings Wednesday will be held at Leslie at 2:15 o'clock, Plaska at 3:15, Eli at 4 o'clock and Lakeview at 7:30 p. m.

Thursday meetings will be held at Newlin at 10 a. m., Memphis at 11 o'clock, Estelline at 1:30 p. m. and Baylor at 3 p. m. Final meetings are to be held Friday at Parnell at 10 o'clock, Weatherly at 11 and Turkey at 2 o'clock.

County Agent Jackson and those attending the meeting today urged attendance by all farmers in each community.

RED RIVER TILT IS POSTPONED YESTERDAY

Sand Halts Owls' Invasion of Wellington Diamond

Causing the first postponment of the season, yesterday's sandstorm blew out the Memphis Owl's bid against Wellington's favored outfit in the Western Division of the Red River Valley League.

The tilt was called off by the home club when the sand, apparently worse at Wellington than here, covered the sun and shut off visibility, making baseball playing extremely unpleasant if not impossible.

The game will be made up in a doubleheader when the Wellington nine comes here on June 2 for its first league appearance on the local diamond.

With little hope of defeating the favorites yesterday, the Owls now have a fine opportunity to at least split the series and time to prepare for a close, hard pair of tilts rather than a run-off by the leaders.

The Owls were not forced to visit Wellington at all. The game was called off before the squad ever left Memphis.
