NEW BLIZZARD SWEEPS DOWN UPON NATION

(Copyright 1936 by United Press) CHICAGO, Feb. 12 — (U.P.) — Blizzards howled across the Dakotas, Minnesota, and Iowa today and the stricken middle west prepared for another desperate stand against starvation and cold. Drifts piled rapidly across freshly cleared highways and railroad rights of way in Iowa. Fear was felt that fuel shortages already forcing many families to burn furniture, may become worse. Farmers and rural residents raced ahead of the storm for fresh supplies and prepared for an extended siege. Many of Iowa's 500 mines reopened only yesterday, may be forced to close in the face of the new storm. Wood supplies were exhausted in many sections. Railroads rushed available supplies of food and fuel to isolated communities to stave off the latest emergency. Two women and two babies died in a blazing farm house near Jackson, Minn.

COLD WAVE DUE TO STRIKE TEXAS

While it was not likely to be as severe as the blizzards of the last three weeks that sent thermometers down to the zero mark in some sections, the United States weather bureau predicted below freezing in some northern sections of the state.

Two-Page Edition Of New York Herald Is Treasured

By CECIL EDWARDS Across 71 years of war and peace, of preservation of the Union and the building of a greater nation, today came the story of the event which shocked the entire world and threatened a time to disrupt again the entire North American continent, the assassination of Abraham Lincoln. While all over the nation today the birth date of the Great American is being celebrated, the tragic story of his death was recalled by the old account. At 8:10 o'clock on Saturday morning, April 15, 1865, the New York Herald published an extra edition telling of the assassination. One of the papers is now in the possession of the William V. Hoyt family, 805 West Thirteenth street. The paper was found among some old books and has been in the family for more than 40 years. It is well preserved and it has faded very little.

Accounts of Slaying

The paper contains only two pages, and half of the front page is taken up with stories of the assassination. At the top of the sheet is a drawing of the president. The leading story is on the left side of the sheet, and the headlines do not extend across the page. They are only one column wide, but they contain ten short headlines, one above the other. All the stories of the paper contain at least eight headlines. Heavy black lines separate the stories.

Phillips posted $4,000 bond today and examining trial was set for tomorrow morning. Included in survivors of Laird is J. M. Laird, a brother of Cleburne.

NEW YORK, Feb. 12 — (U.P.) — Samuel Leibowitz, famous criminal lawyer, today announced he would visit Bruno Hauptmann in the death house and demand "the whole truth" of his connection with the Lindbergh kidnapping as a condition for accepting Hauptmann's case. The lawyer, who has a record of 112 acquittals in 116 murder cases, issued a statement indicating the terms on which he would head the Hauptmann defense following a conference with Mrs. Anna Hauptmann.

COURT HEARD; CONSTITUTION THEN CHANGED

Editor's Note: In view of the present wide discussion of the federal constitution and the similarity of the constitution today with that which Abraham Lincoln faced, the Daily News and NEA Service today present the following article by the dean of American historians and political economists.

By CHARLES A. BEARD

As the fifth decade of the nineteenth century drew to a close, Abraham Lincoln sprang into fame on a constitutional issue. In 1856 the Republican party launched a national campaign on the proposition that slavery should be prohibited by congress in the territories of the United States. To this proposition Lincoln gave his approval.

But the very next year the supreme court of the United States, in the Dred Scott case, declared that congress had no power to prohibit slavery in the territories. This was a staggering blow to the Republican party. By a single stroke the court had blotted out the principal plank in its platform, had destroyed its chief reason for existence. The party was seeking to capture the federal government and proclaim freedom throughout the territories. The court had said in effect: Under the constitution this action cannot be taken by federal authorities.

Why not amend the constitution and give congress the power which republicans proposed to exercise? That sounded well in theory, but it was impossible in practice. No amendment can be made without approval of three-fourths of the states. Given the number of slave states in 1857, an amendment against slavery in the territories was out of the question. For republicans who respected the supreme court and the constitution that was a challenge. It was a "hot one."

Lincoln Meets Challenge

Abraham Lincoln dared to pick it up and declare his principles and program. He said that he would obey the decision of the supreme court in the Dred Scott case. That was an obligation resting on every citizen. But he added that the supreme court had often reversed itself and that he and his supporters would seek to have it reverse the interpretation made in the Dred Scott case.

"Will he appeal to a mob?" cried Stephen A. Douglas. To questions of this kind Lincoln replied simply, in substance: We think the Dred Scott decision wrong and we shall appeal to the people of the United States.

In time, new judges could be appointed by the president and the senate, and a majority obtained for a different view of the constitution. Since an amendment was not then possible, a change in the membership of the court was the only way out for the republicans.

Appeals to Voters

"Tampering with the judiciary," screamed horrified democrats, but Lincoln and the republicans demanded another interpretation of the constitution by a supreme court differently constituted. On this point Lincoln was as firm as steel, and in strong words he appealed to the voters for support. "Familiarize yourselves with the chains of bondage," he said, "and you prepare your limbs to wear them. Accustomed to trample on the rights of others, you have lost the genius of your own independence and become the fit subjects of a tyrant."

He was stricken with apoplexy soon after arriving at his office and died immediately afterward. He had been in ill health for several months and recently suffered slight heart attacks. He entered a hospital six weeks ago but returned home two weeks ago and was believed to have recovered. He was preparing to return to his business duties when the attack occurred. With him when he died was his wife, Mrs. Hallie Hawk, whom he married in 1929, and Gene Howe, son of the veteran Atchison, Kan., editor, and his associate in newspaper ventures for many years. Hawk was born in 1881 in Bakersville, Ohio, but his family moved to a farm near Atchison several years later and Hawk spent his boyhood in Kansas.

Already interested financially in the Howe publication, Hawk came to Amarillo in 1926 to assume general management of the Globe with Gene Howe, editor. When the Globe and News were merged in 1926 Hawk also assumed general management of the new firm and held that position until his death. Funeral arrangements were incomplete. Lincoln Was Human

By BRUCE CATTON

One of the most foolish things we do is to set our great men of bygone days high on pedestals, assuming that because they were great and their times heroic they knew nothing of the mistakes, misunderstandings, and discouragements which are common today.

In no case have we done that quiet as consistently as with Abraham Lincoln; and because we have done it, it is hard for us to realize exactly what the man had to face and how he had to steel himself to finish the job that history gave him.

We forget, for instance, that there were times in which the worst things that modern political opponents have said about such present-day figures as Hoover and Roosevelt sounded mild by comparison with the things that were being said about Lincoln.

We forget that he tried to steer a middle course between the defeatists on one hand and the arch-radicals on the other, and got liberally damned by both sides as a result.

We forget that in addition to being a statesman he was also a politician, with a politician's obligation to his party, and that some of the moves which politics compelled him to make—his retention of Ben Butler in the army, for instance, his appointment of Burnside over McClelland's head, his initial appointment of Simon Cameron to the war department—were bad ones which pained his most loyal believers.

We forget that he could no more foresee the future than any other man, and that he knew long hours of agonizing doubt and indecision. When Lee and Jackson marched into Maryland in the summer of 1862, for instance, Lincoln might well have believed that he was on the verge of becoming the discredited leader of a government which led to the break-up of the Union.

When he signed the Emancipation Proclamation, after those great soldiers of the south had been checked at Antietam, he took a step which, for all he knew, might mean his defeat at the next election—and which, incidentally, was directly counter to the constitution he was fighting to uphold. And in the summer of 1864 Lincoln had resigned himself to defeat.

All this is worth recalling, as his birthday celebration arrives once more. Thinking of him as a giant, as a superman, we overlook the fact that he was a human being like all other presidents, subject to the same doubts, mistakes, and criticism that they all experienced.

And when we think of him in that way we miss the very thing that made him great—the fact that somewhere, in the depths of his own prairie-bred heart, he could find the resources, the strength, the courage to carry on along the line he had chosen, to rise superior to himself and the troubles which assailed him, and bring the nation through in shape to finish the great task which destiny had laid down for it.

The Driver's License Law

Beginning Friday of this week, motorists of Eastland county and the rest of the state may go to the court house and receive their driver's licenses.

About all that is required is to go to the county tax collector's office, call for an application blank, and answer the questions on it. The application must specify the driver's name, sex, age, residence, and physical description, including height, weight, and color of hair and eyes. He must also tell whether he has held a driving license in any other state, whether such a license was revoked, and if so, why.

All this means that beginning Friday and becoming more effective during the six weeks of grace given the Texas drivers there should be a lessening of motor accidents. The first time a driver is convicted of a traffic violation a third of his license is torn off. The second conviction brings the tearing off of another third, and the third conviction takes away the license and driving privileges.

There has been too much killing and maiming of innocent drivers and pedestrians by drunken drivers and other forms of driving maniacs recently. If a man had only to think of himself when he is driving, there might not be so much harm in his sitting behind a wheel in a drunken condition and staring death in the face. But the safety of others, whether in the car or on the streets and highways, is far more important.

The Texas driving license law is intended to eliminate such menaces to the safety of the highway. It is so worded that almost any driver can get a license but only the responsible one can keep it.

If the license law is enforced, and it is the duty of every peace officer to see that it is enforced—it will be the greatest single safety measure ever adopted in the matter of traffic regulation.

CHAPTER XXV

"THOSE papers," Woodford faltered. "If—if I tell you about Nesbitt will you see that I get them back?"

"Yes," Kemp answered. "And if you don't I'll see they go to the prosecuting attorney."

Woodford sat down weakly in the hall chair. Perspiration lay damply in the folds of his face. "It wasn't that I wanted to shield a murder. But I tried to keep it quiet on account of—of Nesbitt's parents, and—and certain business connections he had."

"I don't care about that," said Kemp quickly. "I want to hear what you know about his death."

Woodford raised his eyes to meet the grim, determined face of Kemp. "It was—Mrs. Joseph," he said at last. "She was insanely in love with him, and she knew he planned to marry Clara Lee."

"Where is she now? Do you know?"

Woodford nodded. "She's at the Brookfield under the name of Leah Sorenson."

Kemp waited to hear no more. Slipping one arm around Julia's waist, he hurried her from the apartment and down to his car at the curb.

"When were you in Woodford's office?" she asked, as Kemp shoved the car into gear.

"I wasn't. It was pure bluff—but it worked. I've always suspected Woodford of those cases I mentioned, and of a lot more, too."

"Why?"

"Because ordinary fees wouldn't account for the fabulous sums he's always spent." He brought the car to a careening stop before a drug store. "I'll be right back," he told Julia, and ran inside the store. Through the wide doors she saw him go into the telephone booth and guessed that he was sending the police to Mrs. Joseph's apartment.

"I thought it wouldn't hurt to have the police in on this," he told Julia, resuming his place behind the wheel. "We'll go ahead—there isn't a moment to lose. Woodford may have already telephoned her that we're coming. If we don't find her—and Woodford gets to his office and discovers I was bluffing—we're lost."

KEMP'S car literally hurtled through the traffic, ignoring stop lights and missing disaster by inches in almost every block. Julia held to the seat with both hands, too frightened to say anything. She was relieved when she saw a few blocks up the avenue the tall lighted sign which marked the Brookfield. Whether or not Peter saw it, his foot did not release its pressure on the accelerator. They were almost abreast of the place before he jammed on the brakes.

"Peter!"

With Julia's involuntary scream the car skidded in a vicious half-circle, came to a sickening stop against another car parked in front of the Brookfield.

"Are you hurt, Julia?" She shook her head vaguely. "I just scared, I think."

"Come on then!" He was already ready out of the car, oblivious of the quickly gathering crowd and the shout of the doorman in front of the Brookfield. Into the lobby they both ran, and Peter had nearly reached the desk when he cried out to the startled clerk.

"What's the number of Leah Sorenson's room?" There was the slightest hint of hesitation on the clerk's face, and Peter added, "I'm from police headquarters. What is it?"

"It's—676."

Sensing excitement, the elevator boy was ready and eager, lifting them to the fifth floor at top speed, then pointing to a door almost directly in front of the elevator's entrance.

Kemp knocked loudly. There was no answer—and he tried the door. It swung open easily to his touch, revealing a room which looked as if it had been visited by a hurricane.

Julia's heart sank as she heard Peter say, "We're too late!"

From the street below came the whine of a police car signal. "Come on," Peter said. "You can give them a description of her and they can try the railroad stations and the airport—but I'm afraid we're sunk, Julia."

"But Woodford can tell the police what he told us."

"He can—but he won't. You can bet he went to his office right away to see just what I'd found out. By now he knows I've found out nothing at all about him."

WHEN Julia had described Mrs. Joseph to the skeptical police, she and Peter pushed their way through the crowd and escaped into a taxicab. They sat wearily back against the cushions, both silent until the driver turned in exasperation and asked, "Where to?"

Kemp looked at Julia. "I guess there's no place to go but home, is there?" He gave the address of Julia's apartment to the driver. Then he said quietly, half to himself, "I wish it were home."

"What do you mean, Peter?"

"I mean I'd like to be able to think of where you live as—home."

She smiled ruefully. "That apartment seems less like home than anything I can think of."

"I'll get you out of this . . . some way," said Kemp suddenly. "And when I do—I want you to stay out of it. I mean . . ."

He stopped, helpless.

"I know what you mean. I think Amy said it once."

Peter looked at her oddly. "What was it she said?"

"She said, 'Julia's voice was dreamy, she said some day I'd fall for a little cottage—and love.'"

"That's what I mean!" He looked at her suddenly, his eyes unbelieving. "Julia, after—after all the times I've tried to convince you of it, have you convinced yourself of it now?"

"I—I don't know, Peter. I'm so . . . confused now. Everything's in a whirl and all I know is that I want quiet and—and somebody who wants to look out for me, always."

Whatever Kemp might have said was interrupted by the taxi driver's sound. "Here we are, sir."

But they did not go up to Julia's apartment for the clerk interrupted them with an urgent message from Amy. "Miss Sanders has telephoned several times," the clerk said. "She wants you to come to the shop and she said to bring Mr. Kemp with you. It seemed to be urgent."

"It's after 6," Julia told Peter in surprise. "What can Julia be doing at the shop—and what does she want with us?"

"Let's find out," Kemp answered. "Quick! That cab is still outside."

When they reached the darkened shop they found Amy standing behind the front door, her face pale with fright.

"I've been trying to reach you for hours!"

"What's wrong, Amy?"

"I—I don't know whether I've been a fool or—not. But it's too late now." She looked at Kemp. "I've got a woman locked in one of the fitting rooms!"

Both were speechless at this confession, and Amy went nervously on. "She came in just before the shop closed and I told Miss LaMont I'd stay and wait on her. She—she was nervous and in an awful hurry. She wanted a complete new outfit, and she was going to give the clothes she had on to me."

"But who is she, Amy?" asked Kemp.

"I—oh, you're going to think I'm crazy, and I'm afraid I've got myself in an awful mess."

"Amy, will you stop babbling and tell us!"

"I think she's Mrs. Joseph—the widow who was on the yacht with you, Julia. Anyway, she dropped her card case and they were all Mrs. Joseph's cards. But she said her name was Duffield, and she was in an awful hurry, and I had a hunch that—"

"And what a hunch, Amy! Kemp embraced her so hard that he left Amy breathless. "Where's the phone?"

"It was at luncheon the next day that Julia said, 'You kissed Amy last night, Peter.'"

"She deserved it," Peter laughed. "If you could call it a break."

"I could," said Julia. Peter said he would remember that. And when they had driven out into the country he did remember it, too. "I'm going to ask you again, Julia. Will you marry me?"

"What about the dark eld I saw you with in the White Club?"

Peter grinned. "She was the daughter of a client. Will you marry me, Julia?" He drew her closer. "I'm opening my own office, and we won't have much money, but that cottage will be pretty small. And—"

"You don't still want to sing, do you?"

"Only in that small cottage. Peter. That is, if you promise not to interest yourself in your clients' daughters!"

Asking Election To County Bench

W. S. Adamson of Ranger, candidate for the office of county judge of Eastland county.

W. S. ADAMSON SEEKS JOB AS COUNTY JUDGE

RANGER, Feb. 12.—(Special)—Judge W. S. Adamson, prominent Ranger attorney, has announced his candidacy for the position of county judge of Eastland county subject to the action of the Democratic primary of July 25.

Judge Adamson is well qualified, both by training and experience, to hold the position he is seeking. For the past 20 years he has been actively engaged as an attorney and for four years he was county judge of Seury county.

For the past three years Judge Adamson has been a city commissioner of the City of Ranger, and during his regime many constructive measures have been brought forward and enacted, saving the taxpayers of the city many thousands of dollars, and at the same time putting the city in the best financial condition it has enjoyed since the boom days.

In announcing his candidacy Judge Adamson stated that he was in favor of a conservative and economical administration of the county's affairs and was in favor of a reduction in taxes.

He will wage an active campaign later, at which time he hopes to contact every voter in the county. He has not, as yet arranged his speaking itinerary, but will arrange it so that it will carry him to every portion of the county.

the columns, which are approximately half an inch wider than the columns of the modern newspaper.

At the left side of the paper is a beginning of the details of the assassination. The accounts taken from the front page or about the columns and include dispatches sent by Edwin M. Stanton, secretary of war, to the Herald and Press dispatches. In them are details of the assassination, the hours of the night of the assassination and the facts known of them. The dispatches follow one another and the page is one sent by Stanton, the war department, on Saturday morning. It read:

Official Dispatch
Major Dix, New York:
Abraham Lincoln died this morning at twenty-two minutes past 7 o'clock.

Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War.

Following is part of the story taken from the paper:
The theatre was densely crowded and all seemed delighted with the scene before them. During the act, a sharp report of a shot was heard, which merely attracted attention, but suggested something serious, until a man rushed to the front of the president's box, waving a long dagger in his hand, and exclaiming "Sic Semper Tyrannis!" and immediately leaped from the box, which was the second tier, to the stage below and ran across to the opposite side, making his escape, amid the bewilderment of the audience, in the rear of the theatre, and running a horse, fled.

The screams of Mrs. Lincoln disclosed the fact to the audience that the president had been shot, when all present rose to their feet, rushing towards the stage, and exclaiming "Hang him! Hang him!"

Wild Excitement
The excitement was of the wildest possible description, and of course there was an abrupt termination of the theatrical performance.

There was a rush toward the president's box, when cries were heard: "Stand back and give him room!" "Has any one stimulants?" On a hasty examination it was found that the president had been shot through the head, above the left of the temple bone, and that the bullet was coming out.

He was removed to a private house, and the general of the army was ordered to attend to his condition. On an examination of the private box blood was discovered on the back of the cushioned rocking chair, which the president had been sitting on, and on the partition and on the floor. A common single barreled seal pistol was found on the carpet.

The shock of the community was terrible. At midnight, the Cabinet a few friends, was at his bedside. The surgeons exhausted every effort of medical skill, but life was gone. The parting of the family with the president is too full of description.

Others Wounded
This paper also contained accounts of the assassin's attempt to kill Frederick and Clarence Seward, a messenger of the war department, and two male nurses, disabling them all.

One of the dispatches said that J. Lee Booth had a helper in the conspiracy and that authorities were who the other was but that they had been captured thus.

An article is taken from the editorial found on the second page of the paper: "An unlooked for and terrible calamity has befallen the nation. Great Lincoln last night, received a wound at the hands of an assassin."

of the first cunning tyrant who rises among you.
"And let me tell you that all these things are prepared for you by the teachings of history, if the elections shall promise that the next Dred Scott decision and all future decisions, will be quietly acquiesced in by the people."
Without condemning the supreme court decision expressly, the republican platform of 1860 declared the doctrine laid down in the opinion to be contrary to the constitution, "revolutionary in its tendency, and subversive of the peace and harmony of the country." On this platform, Abraham Lincoln was elected president of the United States.
Peril to People's Rule
In his first inaugural, President Lincoln paid his respects to the supreme court. Its rulings in particular cases were to be obeyed so far as those cases ran.
But he continued, "if the policy of the government upon vital questions affecting the whole people is to be irrevocably fixed by decisions of the supreme court the instant they are made, in ordinary litigation between parties in personal actions, the people will have ceased to be their own rulers, having to that extent practically resigned their government into the hands of that eminent tribunal."
What President Lincoln and the republican party would have done about this constitutional issue if war had not come, nobody knows or can ever know. What they did demand the war is a matter of record.
In 1862 they pushed through congress and enacted into law a bill prohibiting slavery "in the present territories of the United States and in any that shall hereafter be acquired."
Law Is Overridden
The constitution was unchanged. The Dred Scott decision stood. Chief Justice Taney still lived.
It was written in the law books that congress had no power to prohibit slavery in the territories. Yet congress and the president prohibited slavery in the territories.
Not content with this defiance of the past, Lincoln decided to strike a mortal blow at slavery in the states. Under the constitution only, each state acting alone, "within its own sphere," could vote slavery up or down. Neither the president nor congress, nor both combined, could touch "the peculiar institution" in any state.
But war created "an emergency." President Lincoln was commander-in-chief of the armed forces of the Union. And under the sanction of the war power, Lincoln, by mere proclamation, emancipated slaves in the states and districts then in arms against the authority of the United States.
For this fateful stroke of state there was no express warrant in the constitution. Yet Lincoln made a broad interpretation to justify his action.
Amendment Is Ratified
At best this was a "war measure." Could the proclamation of emancipation be enforced on the return of peace? On this constitutional point there were grave doubts. Besides, slavery was still in effect in the states and districts not in arms against the Union.

To finish the work thus started, Lincoln took the final step. He sponsored and congress passed an amendment to the constitution abolishing slavery throughout the United States.
By skillful maneuvering, Lincoln and republican managers were able to win the approval of three-fourths of the states. The amendment was ratified. The constitution drawn by the fathers was changed to meet the spirit and circumstances of the new time.
Thus a great public policy, both moral and economic in nature, was written down in the constitution of the United States. The leader who had dared to take up that policy when it was "dangerous," who dramatized it, who gave his life for it, was lifted into immortality, for all ages, for all climes, for all humanity.
Those who imagine that the constitution is a mere theme for hair-splitting by "great constitutional lawyers" may well ponder and remember the life and labor of Lincoln, the Emancipator.

TREACHEROUS

Reports from health authorities advise that "colds" are widespread and especially severe this year and urge citizens to arm themselves against this insidious illness. Health-wrecking sickness is all too prevalent during this bad-weather season and it is vitally important to take special precautions against the attack of the common cold germ which has become America's Public Health Enemy Number One. Beware the dangers of the treacherous weeks ahead. For your health's sake keep your entire house comfortably warm!

Uneven and inadequate indoor temperatures are a constant danger to health during the treacherous winter months. Sudden changes of temperature, such as those experienced in passing from a warm room to a cold one, appear to be harmful to the tissues of the nose and throat which are the starting places of health-wrecking respiratory diseases. Quick chilling of the body lowers resistance and invites attacks from cold germs.

According to government statistics, diseases of our breathing apparatus are responsible for more deaths than any other single cause. While respiratory diseases often start seriously, they are closely related to "colds" and in many instances are directly traceable to catching cold. There is good reason, therefore, why physicians advise extra care in protecting health during the threatening winter months.

An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure when your family's health is concerned and you can reduce the possibility of "colds" during the treacherous weather ahead by the simple precaution of proper ventilation and adequate heat in every room of the house. Try it for your health's sake!

... Community Natural Gas Co.

Don't gamble with America's Public Health Enemy Number One, the common cold germ. Fifty per cent of all disabling diseases start with a "common cold." If you do catch a "cold" consult your family doctor before it has an opportunity to undermine your health.
