GAO says tax hikes, cuts in services likely

WASHINGTON (AP) — Rejecting both the Bush and Dukakis plans as unworkable, the General Accounting Office said Saturday that tax increases and cuts in defense and Social Security must be considered to slash a federal budget deficit that threatens the nation's economic future.

"Additional revenues are probably an unavoidable part of any realistic strategy for reducing the deficit," the congressional watchdog agency said in reports to President-elect George Bush and leaders of the House and Senate.

Comptroller General Charles A. Bowsher, director of the GAO, said a workable solution can be developed only through close cooperation between Congress and the new president, with Bush personally involved in the negotiations.

The GAO, which uses hundreds of experts in every field to oversee the federal bureaucracy on behalf of Congress, made no recommendations on which taxes should be raised or which programs should be cut.

However, the report cited estimates that $30 billion could be raised annually with slight increases in personal income tax rates, and that a 5 percent national sales tax on most commodities except food, housing and medical care would yield $67 billion a year.

"All participants must consider all parts of the budget to be negotiable, including defense, entitlements (such as Social Security and Medicare) and revenues," the agency said.

"The budget problem must be solved for the new administration to have any flexibility to pursue its own policy agenda, for the economy to regain its vigor and for the American people to enjoy a long-term standard of living comparable to the rest of the developed world," Bowsher wrote.

Cheer Fund for needy re-established

From Staff Reports

The Midland Cheer Fund, a citywide project designed to provide food to Midland's less fortunate citizens, is being launched today by the Midland Reporter-Telegram.

Over the past several years, the program has collected donations to be used toward the purchase of food during the Christmas holidays for a large number of Midland residents. The first year of the program, 1984, Midland Cheer collected $7,846 and food deliveries were made to 108 Midland households.

Even in last year's difficult Midland economy, contributions of more than $6,000 were received by the newspaper, and the program continued to assure holiday food to less fortunate residents.

Announcing the kickoff of this year's campaign, Reporter-Telegram publisher Charles Spence said, "The Midland Cheer Fund is one of many programs in the holidays to make sure that the city's less fortunate neighbors enjoy the holiday season. The money donated is another indication of the brotherhood and generosity of Midlanders."

Spence also contributed $500 in the name of the Reporter-Telegram to this year's fund to get the campaign under way.

Holidays hard for the hungry

By JANE MARLER DEES

Max Munoz resembles a number of the men who dine at a local soup kitchen on the south side of town. Whiskers outline his mostly toothless smile and blanket his 70-year-old face, which is brightened by twinkling eyes. To combat the icy temperatures that ushered in the the cold season last Wednesday, he wears an old maroon warm-up jacket and a cap.

Thanksgiving and Christmas are especially hard for those without the money to buy groceries, explains Dolly Neff, executive director of the Permian Basin Food Bank, one of many local organizations that help the needy. "Agencies are trying to put together nice dinners. Any money a family has is usually being stretched to buy a kiddo's toy," she says.

Says Munoz: "We have money to buy food. We just buy the more essentials. We don't come here everyday." His wife smiles as he offers the explanation.

Munoz has been unable to work for the past 15 years, he says. Stricken with a bad back, arthritis and diabetes, he and his wife live from Social Security check to Social Security check.

"We pay $300 a month rent. We try to maintain an old car to get around. Otherwise, we stay at home. That old car takes a pretty good part of our income," Munoz says.

Maria and Mariaino Rendon operate the Blessings for Obedience Soup Kitchen on South Terrell Street, where an average of 70 people like Munoz sometimes take in a hot lunch.

A vow the married couple made when they opened the soup kitchen about six months ago was that no questions would be asked of those who wanted to eat there, she says.

"They are needy and they are homeless. All we ask is that they sign in," explains, Maria, 45. "We put our hands on that tablet and we pray over those names." They ask the Lord to bless the diners' homes or to help them get a job. "We say, 'We don't know, Lord, but you do.' "

Diners at the kitchen, which is open seven days a week, are served hearty meals of soup, chicken, vegetables, hot rolls and other assorted items donated by local restaurateurs or the food bank.

Guests at the soup kitchen are waited on as if they were in a restaurant. Volunteers set the table prior to 11:30 a.m. when the doors open and people began walking in.

Seated at brown Formica tables for six, the diners kept to themselves letting their eyes wander around to their associates doing much the same.

By a window, two young Hispanic girls in T-shirts sat at a table with "J.R.," a "regular" at the kitchen who brings Maria things like salt and pepper he finds while digging through trash cans. "Of course... we don't use it," Maria whispers taking the pan containing the spices he's brought.

For soup kitchen's operators, unemployment cause for praise

By JANE MARLER DEES
Staff Writer

On Thanksgiving Day, Mariano Rendon and his wife will praise the Lord the plumber lost his job three weeks ago.

Time spent fixing drains and disposals now can be applied to more substantive work — restoring wretched souls.

Mariano and his wife, Maria, operate the Blessings for Obedience Soup Kitchen in south Midland. They live next door to the land they donated on which the soup kitchen is built. Midland's charity home-refurbishing group, Christmas in April, renovated the soup kitchen building, an old Army barrack in a former life.

"They are not shy," Mariano said of the hungry who are fed every day — with food and a hearty dose of the message that "Jesus loves you" — from 11:30 a.m. to 1 p.m. "They even want to pray themselves. We notice they can't wait for the next day.

"Some of them...it's the only meal they get."

The patriarch of the household says the stomach sometimes is the way to get to a man's heart.

"We need to show them there is a God by first filling their stomach. Then, we fill them with the word," Mariano says. "They actually believe there's a God, but they won't receive it...but when they see that meal, they know."

Since Mariano's layoff, money is scarce in the Rendon household, Maria admits. Smiling, she continues that she's had to ask the Salvation Army to help with the family utility bills.

Though they don't receive any money for operating the soup kitchen, Mariano says "our heart is in this. I think the Lord led me to be here."

"A week before I got laid off I went to church and renewed my life to the Lord. On Monday, I went to work and he said, 'Mariano, I can't use you anymore.' "

The former plumber says the Lord told him in a dream three years ago to help the hungry, the needy and the poor.

Onassis

Christina Onassis, 37, dies while visiting in Argentina

BUENOS AIRES, Argentina (AP) — Christina Onassis, heir to the billion-dollar fortune of Greek shipping tycoon Aristotle Onassis, suffered an apparent heart attack Saturday and died, officials said. She was 37.

Miss Onassis, whose famous father, stormy romances and huge fortune made her an international celebrity, was stricken at a country club swimming pool about 25 miles northwest of Buenos Aires, a doctor said.

Miss Onassis, who was married four times and had a 3-year-old daughter, was the stepdaughter of Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis, widow of assassinated President John Kennedy who married Aristotle Onassis in 1968.

Dr. Hernan Bunge, a director of the Clinica del Sol Hospital in Buenos Aires, said Miss Onassis was stricken at the weekend home of close friends Marina and Alberto Dodero at the Tortuguitas Country Club.

Miss Onassis fell ill as she prepared to go swimming about 11 a.m. (9 a.m. EST) in a pool at the home. She was taken to a country club first-aid station station, then to the clinic, where she was pronounced dead at 3 p.m., he said.

The body was taken to a morgue for an autopsy and then to a Greek Orthodox church for a ceremony.

The findings of the autopsy were not immediately announced. A police officer at the morgue said a death certificate could not be issued until the cause of death was officially determined.

A woman who identified herself as Annabella Onassis, a cousin, told reporters at the church that Miss Onassis "died in the bathroom" of the Dodero home.

"She had been feeling fine," Annabella Onassis said. "In fact, she felt very well during a party yesterday at the club."

Asked if Miss Onassis' death could have involved suicide, the woman replied: "A happy person can never commit suicide and Christina was content and happy. She didn't have any (apparent) health problems."

A woman identifying herself as Mary Onassis, an aunt, said Miss Onassis' remains would be flown to Greece on Monday or Tuesday for burial on the family-owned island of Skorpios beside the graves of her father and brother, Alexander, who died in a 1975 plane crash.

OPEC ministers hold private talks

VIENNA, Austria (AP) — OPEC oil ministers tried in a second day of private talks Saturday to break a deadlock between Iran and Iraq over a new pact to bolster the falling price of crude oil.

Officials from Louisiana, Texas, and other energy-producing U.S. states made a pitch for the ministers to iron out their differences. The states have been hurt by falling oil prices laid to production increases by members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries.

"They've got to get Iraq back into the quota system. That's pretty obvious," said Kent Hance, Texas railroad commissioner. "If they don't, we're facing some real problems in the producing states in the United States."

Iraq is the only one of 13 OPEC members that has refused to join the 1986 production accord because it wants a quota equal to that of bitter enemy Iran.

Under the current quota system, Iran has a ceiling of 2.4 million barrels a day. It is larger than the proposed 1.5 million for Iraq because Iran has a larger domestic oil market.

The two countries agreed to a cease-fire in their 8-year-old war in August. They would now like more oil revenues to help rebuild their battered economies.

Subroto of Indonesia, who serves as secretary-general for OPEC, said Saturday that the ministers probably would have to check with their governments before an agreement could be reached.

"We can say that lots of progress has been made in trying to (work) out major problems that we are facing," he told reporters Saturday. He added, however, "We have to be realistic enough that very likely we need some consultations with our governments."

His remarks raised the possibility the ministers might have to return home for further instructions.

Subroto spoke after a 40-minute meeting of two committees of the oil group. Before the meeting, ministers from Iran and Iraq met separately with other ministers in an attempt to reach a compromise.

Subroto said the ministers would again meet in small groups Sunday and report to OPEC's regularly scheduled winter meeting on Monday. All 13 oil ministers will attend those talks.

The dispute between Iran and Iraq is the major stumbling block to a new arrangement that would set limits on how much oil each country can produce daily.

Analysts say OPEC members boosted production in an effort to improve their negotiating position at these meetings.

The current production accord sets total output at about 15 million barrels a day. Total OPEC production in October was estimated by the International Energy Agency at nearly 21.1 million barrels, the highest monthly level in more than five years.

With soaring production, prices have tumbled sharply below OPEC's benchmark of $18 a barrel.

Samuel B. Nunez Jr., president of the Louisiana State Senate, said Saturday that $15 a barrel represents a good benchmark. He called it a "price the industry can live with, consumers can live with, and a price that does justice to the producing states."

The U.S. officials, who said they were well-received by OPEC representatives, met with Kuwaiti Oil Minister Ali Khalifa Sabah and Subroto. The officials said they would also meet with oil ministers Rilwanu Lukman of Nigeria and Hisham Nazer of Saudi Arabia.

Hance said the U.S. delegation included 14 people from Louisiana, Arkansas, Texas, Oklahoma and Alaska.

Reagan nuclear plant plan decried by governor-elect

CONCORD, N.H. (AP) — Gov.-elect Judd Gregg on Saturday denounced a federal order that could speed licensing of the stalled Seabrook nuclear power plant and suggested that Gov. John Sununu helped get President Reagan to sign it.

Sununu, a staunch advocate of the plant who on Thursday was named President-elect George Bush's chief of staff, denied any involvement and said through a spokesman he didn't anticipate the order.

"The governor was totally taken by surprise by it," said spokesman Jerry Little.

The executive order, released by the White House on Friday, gives the Federal Emergency Management Agency broad new powers to carry out evacuation plans for nuclear power plants that have been unable to obtain commercial licenses because of state or local governmental opposition.

The $5.7 billion Seabrook reactor was completed more than two years ago but remains unlicensed mainly because Massachusetts refuses to cooperate in emergency planning for six communities within 10 miles of the plant.

Seabrook spokesman Ron Sher said Saturday the executive order may have come to late to help speed licensing for the plant. He noted that Seabrook has put together its own emergency response organization for Massachusetts and that FEMA gave the organization passing grades during an exercise in June.

"We're very far along in the licensing process," Sher said. "I'm not sure (the order) helps us very much. We may not need help."

Nevertheless, the order provoked an outcry from opponents of Seabrook and the similarly stalled Shoreham reactor in New York, which are the only two plants facing conditions that would be covered by the order.

Gregg, a four-term Republican congressman who replaces Sununu on Jan. 5, supports Seabrook if federal regulators determine that its evacuation plans are safe. But after a draft of the executive order surfaced in June, Gregg and the other three members of New Hampshire's congressional delegation met with Reagan to tell him they opposed it.

"The decision to sign the FEMA order reflects a change in policy which is totally inappropriate and a mistake," Gregg said Saturday through spokesman Brian Grip.

"It will, as I told the president last summer, create at the minimum a perception that the process for approving safety requirements for nuclear power plants has been fundamentally changed in midstream," Gregg said.

"This action, which I strongly disagree with, has obviously been influenced by new pressures in Washington," Gregg added. "The way in which this order was resurrected and floated through the back channels of the White House is totally inappropriate, especially in light of the concerns already expressed by the New Hampshire congressional delegation."

Gregg did not return a message Grip passed along seeking elaboration on his remarks.

Through spokesman Little, Sununu said any inference that he was involved in reviving the order "is absolutely incorrect."

"I haven't heard or spoken about that issue to anyone in the last two or three months, and I thought it wasn't going to come to pass because it was now being considered unnecessary as the Nuclear Regulatory Commission licensing process is moving along well" for Seabrook, Sununu said.

Sununu also referred to a recent NRC rule change, upheld by a federal court in September, that says utilities may submit their own emergency plans for reluctant governments. The rule change presumes reluctant government officials would follow the utility plans in a real emergency.

When the draft of the executive order surfaced, a Washington source told The Associated Press that Sununu was "up to his eyeballs in this thing." Sununu has denied originating the idea or lobbying heavily for it.

White House spokesman B.J. Cooper, when read Gregg's remarks Saturday, said the proposed order "has been under review for months. It had nothing to do with what you said."

Cooper said Sununu "had discussions with the (White House) staff several months ago" on the proposed order, but "I didn't say he lobbied heavily." Cooper also noted that some congressmen and senators also had spoken with White House staff members about the issue.

GAO

But the GAO said it saw no "quick or painless solutions" to the deficit, which stood at $150 billion in the budget year that ended Sept. 30. It specifically rejected four approaches that have been proposed:

—"We cannot 'grow' our way out of the problem," an approach favored by some in the Reagan administration and reiterated this week in a report by the conservative Heritage Foundation. "Public demand for government services — to solve problems ranging from drug abuse, AIDS, education and homelessness to drought and forest fires — grow as fast as revenues," said the GAO.

—"We cannot 'freeze' our way out of the problem." During his presidential campaign, Bush repeatedly rejected higher taxes and advocated a "flexible freeze" on spending. The GAO noted that the great bulk of the budget is in politically sensitive areas such as Social Security, farm price supports and defense, or in fixed interest costs.

—"We cannot reach out and effortlessly gather in some magic pool of uncollected revenues." Democratic presidential candidate Michael Dukakis proposed raising revenues by collecting the $86 billion or more in unpaid tax liabilities annually. The GAO said administrative costs would be high, and it would require several years to train new Internal Revenue Service agents for the job.

—"We cannot 'sequester' our way out of the problem through mechanistic, formula-based program cuts of the sort prescribed in the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings ... legislation." That law is aimed at balancing the budget, but the GAO noted that as much as 80 percent of the budget is exempt from the law's mandated cuts.

Although the deficit has dropped from the record levels reached earlier in the Reagan administration, the problem is actually worse — not better — than it appears, the GAO said.

For example, it said, the real deficit in the government's general fund is not $155 billion but $252 billion. A $97 billion surplus in Social Security funds makes the deficit look smaller.

Even worse, GAO stated, "there is an explosion of unfunded costs waiting to greet the new adminstration."

Among the biggest is the crisis in the nation's savings and loan industry, which the GAO estimates will cost $50 billion to fix, much of it financed by tax funds.

It also listed a cleanup and modernization of nuclear weapons plants costing $130 billion, and said the Defense Department's five-year plan calls for at least $200 billion more than is likely to be available.

Meanwhile, the Heritage Foundation issued its own recommendations for wiping out the deficit. It recommended holding the rate of spending growth to less than 4 percent a year and said the deficit would be eliminated in 1993.

An MMH spokeswoman said four others, including one 17-year-old juvenile and an Odessan were treated and released.

Midland Police Department charged Christy Lea Gammage, 18, of 4400 Holiday Road, with DWI and failure to yield while making a left turn.

Police said Gammage, who turned left from the eastbound lane of U.S. Highway 80, crossed the path Ms. Granado's car which was headed west on the highway.

According to reports, the impact pushed the Gammage car into a bar ditch of the westbound service road.

The Granado vehicle, according to police, was then stalled and without headlights in the west lane of the service road facing east when she was struck again by a third car.

Police said impact of the vehicle, driven Gary Glenn Mulloy, 26, of 2503 Camarie Ave., pushed the Granado car into a south bar ditch of the service road before coming to a stop.

STATE

Ruling means districts must pay for retesting

HOUSTON (AP) — A federal ruling that Texas school districts must pay physicians and psychologists for diagnostic evaluations of handicapped and learning disabled students is a ray of hope for families, a parents' advocate said.

The U.S. Department of Education-ordered policy change could cost Texas school districts millions of dollars and could affect 370,000 students with disabilities, said Pat Ahern, legal examiner for the Texas Education Agency.

"We are more likely to get good testing through our public schools if they know that faulty testing can and will be challenged by parents at their expense," said parent advocate Dorcas Pohl, whose complaint on behalf of a Houston-area family led to the ruling.

Ms. Ahern told the Houston Chronicle the testing normally costs $500 to $600 per student. If only 10 percent of the state's handicapped and learning disabled students seek independent evaluations because of the policy change, it would cost local school districts about $22 million, she said.

Houston-area school districts stand to lose the most money because the greatest number of complaints have come from this area, Ms. Ahern said. She declined to name districts that might be most involved in the disputes.

Before the ruling, TEA allowed school districts a chance to retest students in cases where the validity of tests administered by district personnel had been questioned.

But the Education of the Handicapped Act states that a parent has the right to an independent educational evaluation at public expense if the parent disagrees with an evaluation obtained by the public agency. This law was the basis of the Department of Education's ruling.

Ms. Ahern said parents may abuse the new policy by telling a school district to pay for a $500 assessment or risk a hearing that could cost $5,000 in attorney fees, Ms. Ahern said.

But Ms. Pohl said that in her experience as a mediator between parents and school districts, parents have not abused the independent evaluations.

"Only when it is blatant that a school district has misdiagnosed a child will a parent ask for an independent evaluation," she said.

Ms. Pohl filed the complaint after the Cleveland Independent School District refused to pay for testing of two students whose lack of educational progress led parents to believe school-administered testing was inaccurate or inappropriate.

Mary Andress, mother of one of the children, said that when her son was in the Cleveland schools he failed to make any progress under the educational plan outlined for him as a learning disabled child.

"He is 18 and has the motor skills of a 7-year-old, but the diagnostician said he didn't need special services anymore," Ms. Andress said. He never made any progress at all."

Ms. Andress said the district refused her request to pay for an independent evaluation. She later paid for testing that resulted in a profoundly different assessment of an educational plan for her son.

Tribes lay waste to incinerator plan

DALLAS (AP) — The Alabama and Coushatta Indians have scrapped their plans to build a toxic waste incinerator on or next to their reservation in East Texas after receiving intense pressure from opponents.

The incinerator was first proposed last year as a means to bolster the depressed economy of the reservation, about 15 miles east of Livingston near the Big Thicket, a rare woodland sanctuary known for its diversity of plant and animal species. The area's unemployment rate is about 35 percent.

"The Tribal Council discussed it, and they felt there was a fairly widespread negative response among tribal members," said Tribal Administrator Claude Sumner.

"It never came to the point of a vote. But the proposal isn't being pressed forward now, and I don't foresee that happening."

The planned facility, intended to destroy 75,000 tons of chemical wastes a year, would have cost about $50 million and created as many as 100 jobs.

However, the plan drew immediate opposition from environmentalists, who expressed concern that operation of the incinerator — and transportation of wastes to it — would threaten the Big Thicket.

The 4,600-acre reservation is on the northern end of the thicket.

Businessmen face criminal charges in pollution case

HOUSTON (AP) — A Houston-area chemical storage company and three of its officers face record penalties in what authorities said was the first criminal conviction in Texas for violation of the Clean Water Act.

The conviction of Baytank Houston Inc. and the executives on seven misdemeanor and two felony charges may also mark the largest violation ever under the environmental law, federal officials said.

Prosecutors and officials with the Environmental Protection Agency said the Friday criminal ruling should send a message to industries and waste disposal companies that deal in dangerous chemicals.

"This shows that citizens will not put up with companies destroying our environment," said Paul Rosenzweig, a special U.S. attorney from Washington, D.C.

Baytank and three company executives — Havar Nordberg, executive vice president, Roy Johnson, operations manager, and Donald Gore, an environmental specialist — will face jail terms and fines totaling up to $14 million when they are sentenced Jan. 9 by U.S. District Judge Lynn N. Hughes.

Previously, the federal government has prosecuted polluters by filing civil charges against companies and hoping for large judgments. Filing criminal charges that include the possibility of stiff jail sentences should prompt industries to be more careful about how they handle chemicals, Rosenzweig said.

The highest judgment to date against a company for violating the Clean Water Act was $2.3 million to a subsidiary of Browning-Ferris for a spill in Livingston, La., officials said.

Defense attorney Jay J. Madrid said his clients were prosecuted for the "equivalent of jaywalking," and may appeal the decision.

"We still feel that we're being prosecuted for technicalities, for not filing the proper papers with the government," Madrid said.

A jury deliberated seven hours over two days before convicting the defendants of breaking the law in the operation of Baytank's Seabrook facility. The panel also returned not guilty verdicts for two other alleged chemical spills.

EPA spokesman Roger Meacham said the verdict "shows that the federal government will not tolerate violations of environmental laws."

The defendants were found guilty of dumping hazardous chemical wastes between 1983 and 1987 into the Bayport Turning Basin that leads into Galveston Bay and the Gulf of Mexico. They were also found guilty of falsifying reports and certifying toxic wastes as non-hazardous.

The trial had started as the first of its kind against a corporation for dumping chemicals into coastal waters without proper permits.

But Hughes last week dropped 26 charges of ocean dumping against Baytank, its parent company Odfjell Westfall-Larsen (USA) Inc. of Norway, five officials and 14 sailors. The trial then became a question of whether Baytank operated correctly at mainland operations.

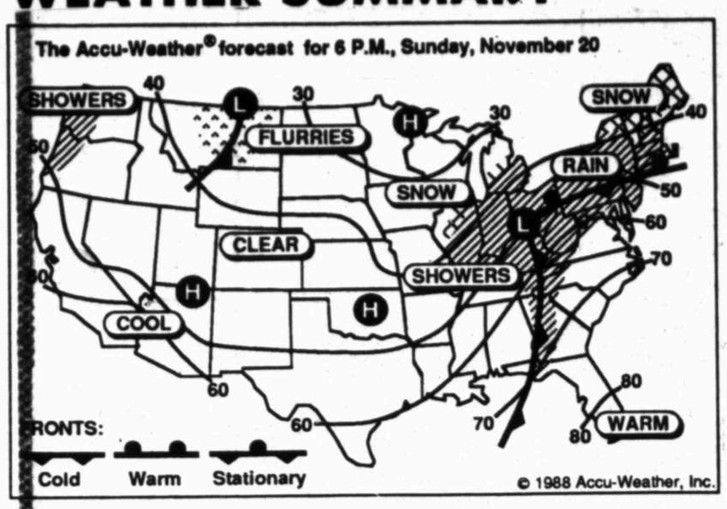
WEATHER SUMMARY



Cold weekend to continue

Temperatures are expected to remain cold through the weekend, with the high expected to near 60 by Monday afternoon, according to National Weather Service forecasters at Midland International Airport.

Sunday will be sunny with a high near 50, with winds expected from the north from 5 to 15 mph. Sunday night will be clear and cold, with the low expected in the upper 20s.

Monday will be sunny with a high near 60.

Today's record low was 23, set last year. Saturday's record high was 83, set in 1950.

STATE

The first major winter storm system of the season plowed across the Panhandle and northern South Plains on Saturday, dumping wet snow across much of the South Plains and causing hazardous driving conditions.

Fog hovered over central Texas, and violent storms uprooted trees and damaged at least one mobile home near the Louisiana border.

The National Weather Service blamed the wild weather on a strong upper low pressure system that moved in from the southern Rockies.

The National Weather Service issued a winter storm warning for the South Plains and Panhandle after snow began falling late Saturday morning. The warning was canceled at 7:15 p.m. after the storm system moved out of Texas and into southwestern Oklahoma.

A pilot sighted a tornado 12 miles southwest of Kilgore in eastern Smith County, but no damage was reported, the weather service said. In Upshur County, 10 miles south of Gilmer, a mobile home was damaged and trees were uprooted, the weather service said. No injuries were reported.

Moist, southerly winds prevailed across the rest of the state.

Speeds were mainly in the 5 mph to 15 mph range but gustier winds of 15 mph to 25 mph were observed across much of West Texas and in the lower Rio Grande valley. Temperatures at 5 a.m. ranged from the 30s and 40s in West Texas to the 70s across most of the south.

Readings in North Texas were mainly in the 50s and 60s.

Lubbock received 1.4 inches of snow on Saturday, the weather service said. Gusty winds and near-freezing temperatures were noted in Lubbock as the system moved through.

The field at Jones Stadium was covered by an inch of snow when the Texas Tech University-University of Houston football game kicked off, and blizzard-like conditions continued throughout much of the contest.

Dozens of accidents were reported during the late afternoon and early evening on a loop around Lubbock and on Interstate 27 north of Lubbock.

From 1 to 3 inches of snow was recorded at elsewhere around the South Plains during the day, with heavier amounts falling in communities to the north and northwest of Lubbock.

About 2 inches fell in Hereford and 3 inches in Tulia and Muleshoe.

The snowfall was not unusual for Lubbock at this time of the year, noted National Weather Service forecaster Bill Thurmond.

"It normally doesn't snow here until the end of the month, but it has snowed earlier than this," said weather service forecaster Bill Thurmond of Lubbock.

Temperatures during the afternoon, which were supposed to be in the lower 40s, hovered in the lower 30s most of the afternoon because of the heavy cloud cover, he said.

Temperatures reached a high of 45 degrees Saturday in Lubbock after an overnight low of 32.

Conditions will be slightly warmer across the South Plains on Sunday, according to NWS forecasters. Skies should be mostly sunny with high temperatures near 50 and winds from the north at 5 to 15 mph.

The slight warming trend will continue during the early part of the week, with fair to partly cloudy skies and afternoon temperatures in the mid-50s expected through Tuesday, the weather service said.

NATION

Heavy rain fell Saturday from Texas across the Mississippi River into the Ohio Valley, causing some flooding, and snow fell across the northern Plains and the southern Plains.

Flash flood watches were issued for parts of northeastern Texas, the Missouri Bootheel, western and central Kentucky, western Tennessee, and southwestern into northeastern Arkansas.

Central Arkansas got the heaviest rain, with up to 9 inches at Little Rock from Friday evening to Saturday afternoon, and 6 inches fell in parts of central and northeastern Arkansas.

The Saline River at Benton, Ark., just southwest of Little Rock, was 2 feet above flood stage during the morning, a rise of 16 feet in 24 hours. The river was expected to crest at 8 feet above flood stage.

Parts of western Tennessee got 3 to 4 inches of rain during the night and many small streams and drainage ditches were full or overflowing. Dyersburg got 2.5 inches.

Western Kentucky got 3 to 5 inches overnight with 2 to 3 inches over the central part of the state.

In southeastern Missouri, Caruthersville got 5.48 inches of rain overnight, and more than 2 inches fell from West Plains into Cape Girardeau.

Some of the hungry in Midland have lost a little bit of hope, explained Louis Peters, a volunteer lay minister at First Baptist Church in Midland. Peters leads a before-dinner prayer to the people who eat the 5:30 p.m. meal at the Salvation Army's kitchen.

But, "you know they really appreciate a good meal," Peters claimed.

One 40-year-old self-described "drifter" agrees.

"I thank God for this," says Don L. Green. "It's a miracle that we do have some place to go."

Green says he was permanently disabled late in 1986 when a gate at the Livestock Auction Barn in Midland smashed into his head. He's since been trying to qualify for Social Security disability benefits, but has yet to be approved.

Green, who's slept in cars for six and seven months at a time, said friends and family help him out financially.

"I don't have any source of income," he maintains, of one reason he eats at the Salvation Army three times a week.

He, like Peters, disagrees that the hungry are just "lazy" people who don't really want to work.

"Jobs aren't available for people," Green says.

Fay Jones, the Salvation Army's social worker, said most of the men who eat there are "street people who live in their cars or in vacant houses," Mrs. Jones said.

It is hard to determine the number of "hungry" people in Midland, experts agree. A study by the Harvard University School of Public Health estimated 20 million Americans are "hungry."

The Texas Employment Commission estimates 5.6 percent of the civilian labor force, or 2,800 people, is unemployed in Midland.

At the Texas Department of Human Services in Midland, nearly 2,000 county residents are receiving either food stamps or Aid to Families with Dependent Children financial assistance.

Nearly 6,000 children in the Midland public school system are receiving free or reduced price meals for which their parents must qualify according to federal income poverty guidelines.

In Midland, there are a vast array of agencies and church outreach programs available to help people who have no money to buy groceries. Those entities receive a portion of their food or money to buy it from donations, though a large part of the edibles may come from the Permian Basin Food Bank.

A cavernous cinder block-walled warehouse in Odessa serves as home to the food bank. Cardboard boxes upon boxes brimming with food, detergent or diapers stand as a mammouth affirmation of the hunger problem in West Texas. Inside industrial-sized refrigerators, meats, produce, milk and other perishables are kept cold.

Products perhaps aesthetically displeasing but edibly adequate are donated to the bank from sources local merchants and national food chains and manufacturers, or bought with federal emergency grant money.

Individuals also help. On Saturday, Midland Boy Scouts joined with their counterparts across the nation in collecting canned goods. Local collections will go to the food bank.

John Dee Johnson, council executive, said the estimated 1,500 Midland scouts hoped to gather enough cans and other non-perishables to stock the Permian Basin's needs for three to five months.

Canned goods are hard to come by in the food bank business. If the item is dented enough to preclude its sale, it likely doesn't pass the health department requirements on what can and can't be disseminated.

Pulling a hefty bag of sour cream and onion potato chips — bearing an expired freshness date — Ms. Neff stands in her food bank warehouse and admits some of her rations are not the most nutritious. "It's not the best," allowed the executive director.

"But when you're starving...," she said as her voice trailed. She quickly turned to walk to another area of the warehouse. "Facts are facts. We do the best we can."

Actually, the product list on any given day at the food bank may include such "luxuries" as McDonald's apple pies, Bluebell Ice Cream, Pampers diapers, Tide detergent, ice cream sandwich chocolate cookies minus the ice cream or Pace picante sauce.

In Midland last year, some 250,000 pounds of food — equivalent with as many or more meals — was disbursed among 22 agencies. All told, the food bank serves as the staff of life to over 100 agencies in the Permian Basin as far west as the El Paso County line and as far south as the Mexican border.

Leaning back in her office chair later in the day last week, Ms. Neff recanted the story an agency worker had told her about one of the hungry people to which they'd taken groceries.

"He found a person in his $100,000 house cooking a can of pork and beans in the fireplace because his utilities had been cut off."

The executive director disagrees with the common societal stereotype that the hungry people are "lazy."

"There is a misconception that the hungry are people who don't want to work. In fact, the people are just like you and I. They've lost their job, had their salaries cut or had medical problems," Ms. Neff said. "It is the average American going through a crisis right now."

Shortly thereafter the Rendons were spurred onward by a man they heard speak at a Midland Business and Fellowship Conference.

The man, Michael Ratliff, asked if there was a Spanish couple in the audience. He said he had a message for them from the Lord, Mariano remembers.

According to a transcript of a cassette recording taken at the luncheon, the message came across in somewhat garbled fashion. According to Ratliff, God said: "...there'll be an ongoing of your lives, in a certain respect, that you may host and be given to hospitality, to the people of God as they would come and as they would begin to receive of my hand, they receive of my hand in your home."

Believing they were following His plan, the Rendons did what any pragmatic Christian souls would do when believing God told them to help the hungry.

They opened a restaurant.

But Rendon's Restaurant, formerly located at Florida Avenue and Weatherford Street, was open only five months.

"People used to come to the back door," Mariano chuckles. "I think I was giving more food out the back" than he was selling in the front. "That's the reason we went broke," he says as the duet breaks out in laughter.

Obviously, something had been lost in the dream's translation between heaven and Earth.

Mystically, Ratliff's prophecy, which had continued, "...it will be a home church, much to the effect of ministry that others would say that 'the neighborhood has a new church'" came to a more tangible fruition later. In the mean time, however, a political demon reared its ugly head.

The Rendons were asked to leave the parish about a year ago as their dreams to build a soup kitchen were coming to a more earthlier reality.

"I got kicked out of the church. They thought I was going to divide it," Mariano said somberly. "There was so much trouble with the people accepting...they couldn't understand the prophecy of God."

But the Lord, the Rendons said, came through on the prophet's heavenly conduction that "eventually, even they will come to know the truth..." and that "I will supply all the money."

Six months ago, two Midland men, Doug Wight and Kelly Coleman appeared at the Rendons' and said, "We're here to help you," Maria remembers.

The now-out-of-work couple donated their last resource, the land, while Coleman and Wight handled the costs of getting the kitchen off the ground.

Today, the Rendons are probably the happiest unemployed couple in Midland. In their eyes, they're richer than any oil baron in town.

"The more we give, the more we get. We notice that every day," Maria exhaults.

In fact, Maria won't let her husband look for a new job because she says she can't run the soup kitchen without him.

Maria shuns the potential for depression that can come when a married couple finds themselves out of a paycheck.

"I'm taking that one day at a time. I have to. The Lord will supply...I know...I know."

Reagan spares 50-pound turkey

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Reagan has received his Thanksgiving turkey, a nearly 50-pound bird named "Woody," who gobbled away while the president petted him.

"What did you say?" Reagan asked the talkative Iowa tom Friday as several dozen guests looked on at the Rose Garden ceremony, which has become an annual event.

The president noted that, as usual, Woody would not "go on a platter" next week, but will be taken instead to a petting zoo, in nearby McLean, Va.

The bird was raised by Pete Hermanson, president of the National Turkey Federation, who operates Woodland Farms south of Story City, Iowa.

Crash of small plane in Arkansas kills six people from Southeast Texas

BATESVILLE, Ark. (AP) — A twin-engine plane carrying six people from Southeast Texas slammed into a mountain and caught fire as the pilot made a second attempt to land in dense fog and thunderstorms, authorities said Saturday.

Officials initially had said seven people died in the Friday night crash about 12 miles west of the Batesville airport, where visibility was near zero.

All of the dead were from the Orange, Texas, area, said John A. Baum, detective sergeant for the sheriff's office. The bodies were taken to the state Crime Laboratory in Little Rock for autopsies, he said.

Baum said all of the bodies were burned beyond recognition except one, possibly the pilot's.

The dead were identified by county officials as Marlin Thompson, 62, an attorney; his wife, Linda Thompson, no age available; the pilot, Michael Beaumont, no age or hometown available; Dewey Cox, 55, no hometown available; Robin Steele, age unavailable, law partner of Marlin Thompson, and Martha Beaumont. Her relationship to Michael Beaumont and her age and hometown were not immediately available.

Their blue-and-white Beechcraft had taken off from Orange, outside Beaumont, said Wayne Beckmann, duty officer at the Federal Aviation Administration's southwest regional office in Fort Worth.

"When we first went out there, the bodies were intermingled," Dale Rust, coordinator of the state Office of Emergency Services, said Saturday. "We thought there were seven."

The Beechcraft King Air turboprop was cleared to land at the time of the crash, which occurred about 6 p.m., and other planes had landed safely earlier in the evening, said Jimmy Watkins, chairman of the Batesville Airport Commission.

"From what we understand, they made two approaches and missed it," Watkins said.

"The weather was about as bad as you can get," said Roger Williams, a dispatcher for the Independence County Sheriff's Department. "The officers at the scene said it was raining and so foggy you couldn't see the ground."

The plane "had made one approach and missed the Batesville airport and they were attempting a second time," Williams said.

Investigators from the National Transportation Safety Board arrived Saturday to examine the smoldering wreckage, located in a densely wooded area about 3½ miles west of Locust Grove in the Brock Mountain community, near Arkansas State Highway 25. Debris was scattered more than 100 yards along the mountain.

Clint Thorpe, an NTSB investigator, said the crash site would be combed "to see what we've got, to see if there are any missing parts to the aircraft," to check weather conditions at the time of the crash and to interview any witnesses.

He also planned to review communications between the plane and controllers at Memphis International Airport.

While Michael Beaumont was talking to the Memphis tower, "the pilot did not report any mechanical problems or advise of weather-related or visibility difficulties during either landing attempt," Baum said.

Thorpe said he would be gathering evidence for about two or three days, and it could take up to a year to complete the investigation and issue a report.

The Thompsons owned the White Buck Ranch near Batesville, a 10,000-acre private hunting preserve in Independence and Izard counties stocked with exotic animals.

"They were some of the finest people I've ever known," said the ranch's manager, Steven Reeves. He said he still had a message on his answering machine from Mrs. Thompson reminding him not to miss his daughter's homecoming Friday night.

Saturday, Reeves removed his hat and watched silently as the bodies were loaded into a pickup truck. He later gazed at the wreckage without speaking.

In an interview published Nov. 8 in the Batesville Guard newspaper, Thompson, who practiced law in South Texas for 35 years, said he hoped to someday live on the ranch, which is stocked with fallow deer from Europe and Asia Minor, aoudad sheep from North Africa, and mouflon sheep, native to Corsica and Sardinia.

The ranch got its name from a pair of albino fawns he spotted on the property one day, Thompson told the newspaper.

"They're beautiful animals, and so rare," he said. "I'd like to preserve them for the kids to see, and when I say kids, I don't just mean mine, I mean all kids," he said.

He also noted the potential for making big bucks from the ranch, where he hoped to bunk up to a dozen hunters each day at rates of several hundred dollars each.

"This is a resource we've got up here that is highly underutilized, in my opinion, especially with hunting," he told the newspaper. "It's a big industry (in south Texas). They've made them into partial resort areas and, believe me, this area of Arkansas has it all over south Texas."

"Our understanding was that they were up here to hunt," Baum said, noting that two rifles were found in the debris.

Batesville is about 90 miles northeast of Little Rock.

Rice homecoming queen bowled over by compromise

HOUSTON (AP) — A male Rice University student who was elected Homecoming Queen after entering the contest as a joke has decided to give up his crown for a day and escort the runner-up to the Cotton Bowl.

Michael Grubbs was snubbed by university officials when he asked to be recognized during traditional halftime ceremonies at Rice's homecoming football game. But he compromised in his campaign to represent the school at Cotton Bowl festivities on New Year's Day.

Queen runner-up Nancy Jones will ride a float during the annual Dallas parade after Grubbs agreed with the Rice athletic department to serve as her escort.

"We're both really psyched," Grubbs said. "We're both ready to have a great time."

Under bowl rules, host school Arkansas will provide this year's Cotton Bowl queen, while the other Southwest conference schools will send princesses for the queen's court.

Grubbs' election had unsettled Cotton Bowl officials, whose bylaws specify that each princess should be a "popular co-ed."

The election has often been taken lightly by Rice students, who previously have elected a dog and a refrigerator as homecoming queens. School officials reacted to the earlier elections by drafting a policy which states that the homecoming queen is not necessarily the school's Cotton Bowl representative.

"It's all gotten blown out of proportion — I never expected this to happen," Grubbs said of the attention drawn to his election. "I'm having a good time, though. It's been a blast."

Ms. Jones, who will wear the school's crown on New Year's Day, added, "It's amusing, but it's kind of a trivial situation."

AIDS task force OKs condoms for prison inmates

AUSTIN (AP) — The state task force on AIDS Saturday agreed to have condoms made available for sale to Texas prison inmates, but stressed that the recommendation was not "condoning illegal activity in adult correctional settings."

The Legislative Task Force on AIDS also passed recommendations on health education curriculum concerning the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV), AIDS testing and supplying free hypodermic needles and bleach to help prevent the disease's spread among drug abusers who share needles.

Task force member Gene Harrington said the original recommendation to sell condoms to inmates was ineffective because it did not address the illegality of using condoms in a correctional facility.

"Every correctional institute is going to look at this and say, 'Under our rules, HIV transmission is impossible and so this does not affect us,'" Harrington said.

The Rev. Scott Allen, another task force member, said the board was not condoning sexual activity among inmates, and Harrington suggested rewording the recommendation to read: "While not condoning illegal activity in adult correctional settings, the appropriate adult agency should allow condoms be made available."

The recommendation passed without opposition.

In other action, the task force called on the Legislature to require schools to teach a comprehensive health education curriculum, including instruction on HIV prevention and AIDS.

The panel suggested making the Texas Education Agency responsible for gathering and disseminating education materials and also appointed the agency to help school districts develop HIV-related curricula.

Members agreed to prohibiting the release of positive AIDS tests until additional, confirmation tests or other corroborating materials were produced. The use of HIV self-testing kits also were prohibited.

The 19-member task force is scheduled to meet again Dec. 2-3 to discuss the remaining recommendations. Some controversial issues they will address include:

- Requiring the consent of a person before testing for his-her HIV status;
- Having the state pay for the cost of the expensive drug AZT for AIDS victims who cannot afford it and who do not qualify for Medicaid.

TSUS regents end ban on contraceptives' sale

SAN ANGELO (AP) — Regents have reversed a ban on the prescription and sale of contraceptives on four Texas university campuses.

The Texas State University System Board of Regents voted 6-1 Friday in favor of again allowing the sale, distribution and prescription of contraceptives on the campuses of Angelo State University, Sul Ross State University, Sam Houston State University and Southwest Texas State University.

Only former board chairman Ruben Escobedo opposed the new policy, which allows universities to make their own determination whether the sale and prescription of contraceptions should be allowed.

Before regents approved a ban six months ago, Sam Houston and Southwest Texas had sold or prescribed contraceptives through their clinics and pharmacies.

The Sul Ross clinic renewed birth control prescriptions, but did not sell contraceptives on campus.

Angelo State had not sold nor prescribed any contraceptives through its limited health clinic.

Escobedo said he favored university counseling programs over a wide range of issues, including contraceptives, sexually transmitted diseases and date rape, but disagreed that the university was the proper institution to provide contraceptive prescriptions or devices.

"The academic community has a sole academic mission: the distribution of knowledge," Escobedo said. "I believe students have the right to obtain prescriptions and devices, and I would even defend that right, but I don't feel they have a place on campus."

If universities prescribe or dispense contraceptives, campus health centers would be required to provide counseling on issues related to human sexuality.

In addition, the policy approved Friday requires universities that dispense contraceptives through a health center or pharmacy to offer the items at a discount to students.

STATE in brief

State may end up with just 50 S&Ls

HOUSTON (AP) — A member of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board predicts as few as 50 thrifts will remain after federal regulators finish their cleanup of Texas savings and loans, but a state official argues that number is too low.

Roger Martin, one of three members of the FHLB board, said Texas savings and loans are so troubled that nearly 80 percent of the state's 227 institutions could be merged or closed within two years because of their shaky financial condition.

The state had 281 thrifts, 37 of which were insolvent, when the bank board began exploring a comprehensive solution to the Texas savings and loan crisis.

A few months later, regulators announced their remedy, called the Southwest Plan. They said between 90 and 140 Texas thrifts were beyond recovery but that at least 140 would survive.

However, continuing erosion of the industry prompted Martin to revise his estimate. Of the 281 thrifts in Texas on June 30, only 50 to 70 will be left by June 1990, he predicted in a Friday speech to the Texas Mortgage Bankers Association convention.

James Pledger, the Texas savings and loan commissioner, questioned Martin's estimate that there may be only 50 survivors.

Pledger believes after the Bank Board concludes the mergers, at least 75 state-chartered savings and loans will remain, adding that after the Southwest Plan is in place, "There may be a desire to create more institutions."

Algae threatening Pecos

PECOS (AP) — State biologists are closely watching a strain of algae that again is threatening to kill large numbers of fish in the Pecos River.

Texas Water Commission biologist Terry James said a 20-mile stretch of the Pecos River, stretching north from Interstate 20, is contaminated with the algae, which is known as Pyrmnesium parvum algae.

The strain, which is unique to the Pecos River and has never been found anywhere else, is blamed for the deaths of an estimated 300,000 fish in late 1986 and the deaths of about 30,000 fish in November 1985.

The algae strain becomes deadly when it releases a chemical during its growth that paralyzes the gills of fish, suffocating them, officials said. The toxin released is similar to one that killed thousands of fish in the summer of 1985 along the Gulf Coast during the infamous "Red Tide." It also is similar to an algae discovered several years ago in Israel.

Samples taken Wednesday from the river turned up anywhere from 1,700 to 17,000 organism per milliliter.

State officials have planned four public hearings next month to discuss the algae situation. The hearings, all at 7 p.m., will be held Dec. 1 in Del Rio, Dec. 6 in Pecos, Dec. 8 in Iraan and Dec. 13 in Ozona.

Court must reinterpret law

ATLANTA (AP) — A federal appeals court has instructed the Florida Supreme Court to reinterpret a state statute in a suit against Delta Air Lines by the parents of a passenger killed in a 1985 crash at Dallas.

The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said in its ruling Friday that the lower court must better define the financial worth of the Scott Alan Ageloff in the case filed by his parents, Harold and Carol Ageloff.

Scott Ageloff died in the Aug. 2, 1985, crash of Delta Air Lines Flight 191 at Dallas-Fort Worth International Airport.

In their case against the airline, the Ageloffs did not claim damages for being deprived of contributions to them by their son, but for the money their son would have generated had he continued to live.

The Ageloff family owns a toy business, Harry's Kidsworld Inc., in which Scott Ageloff owned a 25 percent share.

Trucker pleads guilty

LOS ANGELES (AP) — A Texas trucker accused of ramming some 30 cars during a 40-mile rampage through rush-hour traffic pleaded guilty Friday to assault with a deadly weapon, his 18-wheel tractor-trailer rig.

Charley Tom Lee, 25, of Haltom City, is due back in court Dec. 13, when a psychological examination will be ordered.

Superior Court Judge Judith Chirlin accepted Lee's pleas of guilty to five counts of assault with a deadly weapon. Prosecutors said they would ask that Lee receive the maximum sentence of eight years in prison.

Landlady managed to hoodwink agencies

SACRAMENTO, Calif. (AP) — When honey-voiced Dorothea Montalvo Puente strolled away from a detective Nov. 11, it was only her latest escape from the clutches of an often bumbling officialdom that missed evidence of wrongdoing.

Puente fled to Los Angeles while police dug up seven bodies in the yard of her Victorian boardinghouse. Five days later, after a search in Nevada, California and Mexico, police arrested her and charged her with one count of murder.

Prosecutors believe the victims were elderly tenants killed for their Social Security money, and said they plan to file additional murder charges against Puente, who in a TV interview admitted cashing checks but denied killing anyone.

Puente, 59, was known to state, federal, local and even private social services officials long before police unearthed the bodies.

In fact, she served 2⅛ years in prison for drugging and robbing three elderly men she met in a bar, and is still on parole in a separate, 1980 case for forging a government check belonging to an elderly person.

A partial list of the authorities that had contact with Puente reads like a "Who's Who" of government bureaucracies: federal parole officials, police, welfare workers, the Social Security Administration, county mental health officials, health inspectors and social workers.

They all apparently missed evidence of wrongdoing at her boardinghouse.

For example:

■ Federal parole officials assigned to Puente because of her 1978 conviction for forging a U.S. Treasury check belonging to an elderly person monitored her once a month but never discovered she had violated two key provisions of her parole — handling Treasury checks and associating with the elderly and disabled. She remains on parole through 1990. Charlie Varnon, Justice Department chief probation officer in Sacramento, told the San Francisco Examiner that agents never saw evidence indicating she had been running a boardinghouse, but he acknowledged they never looked further than her upstairs apartment.

■ Accusations that Puente poisoned and robbed two elderly women led to an investigation that resulted in her conviction in 1982 on drug, forgery and theft charges in the case involving the men she met in a bar. She was sentenced to five years and was released in 1985. Despite her criminal record, however, county social workers had been referring elderly people to her boardinghouse. The county Health Department said Friday it is investigating whether social service and mental health workers should have been aware that Puentes' boarders were at risk.

■ Neighbors complained to health officials twice, in May and September, about a stench from the grounds of Puente's boardinghouse. Both times, authorities found nothing in the yard. The corpses had been in the ground as long as 10 months, forensic anthropologists said. Puente blamed the smell on a fish emulsion fertilizer. "She said it was the fertilizer," said neighbor Will McIntyre. Another neighbor recalled that "flies were always all over the place."

A Greyhound bus shows the scars of a Saturday morning accident in which it skidded off rain-slickened Interstate 65 north of Nashville, Tenn., and overturned. At least 10 passengers were injured, two critically.

10 injured when bus slides off Interstate 65

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP) — A Greyhound bus hit a tree and overturned Saturday after a car swerved in front of it on rain-slickened Interstate 65. At least 10 people were injured.

All 45 passengers were taken to hospitals, said George Gravley, Greyhound spokesman in Dallas. Ten were admitted, and two were listed in critical condition.

A pregnant woman was admitted for observation, but apparently wasn't injured. The bus driver, Ronald W. Lightsey, 44, of Louisville, Ky., was treated and released from Metropolitan Nashville General Hospital.

"The accident occurred at 6:50 a.m. in heavy rain, on a wet road. It happened in a construction area where three lanes merged into two," Gravley said.

"A car swerved in front of (the) bus and in order to avoid the car, the bus swerved off road, went into a culvert, hit a tree and rolled over onto its left side."

The bus originated in Cleveland, and planned stops in Nashville and Birmingham, Ala., before arriving in Tallahasse, Fla. Other passengers planned to change buses in Nashville on the way to New Orleans.

Environmental disasters displace millions, group says

WASHINGTON (AP) — There are more than 10 million refugees who have been forced to flee their homes because of environmental disasters or degraded lands and their number may soon exceed those displaced by war or rebellion, an environmental research group said Saturday.

"Because migration is a last resort — when conditions become so poor that life itself is in imminent danger — the rising number of environmental refugees should be seen as an important indicator of the extent and severity of worldwide environmental deterioration," said the Worldwatch Institute in a report.

Worldwatch's figures count people displaced as a result of long-term environmental changes such as the encroachment of deserts on pastureland in Africa as well as sudden disasters such as the recent flooding in Bangladesh.

It estimated that there are about 10 million refugees as a result of such environmental changes, compared to about 13 million who have been displaced by wars or rebellions.

Land degradation takes many forms and may involve erosion, waterlogging or excessive salt buildup from poor irrigation.

According to some estimates, as many as 20 million acres of agricultural land is destroyed each year by either a shortage of water, causing desertification, or too much water, causing land to become waterlogged.

Meanwhile, another report suggested that — while the effort will be expensive — much of this land in developing countries could be restored with the proper techniques and incentives.

"Rehabilitating and restoring degraded lands is at least as much a social, economic and political problem as an ecological one," said the report by the World Resources Institute. It cited as examples land rehabilitation programs in Egypt, India and China

The report gave no cost estimate for such rehabilitation, but noted that 10 forestry and watershed rehabilitation projects recommended by the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization would cost $1 billion.

Forensic anthropologist aids investigation

SACRAMENTO (CNS) — A former college professor whose specialty is forensic anthropology spent 3¼ days last week on a dig — at the Sacramento boarding house where a landlady is suspected of murdering seven of her tenants.

Dr. Rodger Heglar went to Sacramento last Saturday to direct excavation in Dorothea Montalvo Puente's L-shaped rose and vegetable garden.

Heglar called the task in the "beautiful little garden...physically stressful," adding that the bodies that were found "were typical" of buried remains.

"They weren't anything that we haven't dealt with before in other parts of the state," Heglar said.

Digging decomposed bodies out of the soil or studying skeletal remains is nothing new to the 62-year-old physical anthropologist who applies his skills in studying the past to contemporary needs — especially when it involves identifying homicide victims. He works with other forensic experts — dentists and pathologists — in identifying the bodies.

His specialty is relatively new, given recognition as a forensic science only 16 years ago, he said.

Probably the most notorious case he has worked on involved the late Leonard Lake and Charles Ng, suspected of murdering at least 12 people whose remains were found near a remote cabin 120 miles east of San Francisco.

"You keep a clinical attitude," Heglar said of his work. "You have to, particularly in something like an air crash. You don't ponder it too long. You don't try to personalize it — it would break your heart most of the time."

In Puente's garden, Heglar worked with an associate, three city heavy-equipment operators, a coroner's deputy, and police officials. During part of the week they worked under tents erected to keep the blustery wind and rain from disturbing the crime scene.

Heglar said the machine operators "did a lot of the heavy digging. The more delicate stuff, we did ourselves" using probes to poke through the soil. "When we had something, we took all the time to expose it properly.

"The thing is to get as much evidence as you can at the scene."

Studies on the seven bodies are incomplete and cause of the deaths remains under investigation.

Identification is expected to take weeks or even months because of the condition of the bodies and the toxicology tests that are under way, said Sacramento Chief Deputy Coroner Robert Bowers. Although authorities have the names of seven potential victims, "if we identify all these people in three or four months, I'll be tickled to death," he said.

Heglar finished working in the garden Tuesday and then went to the morgue to assist a pathologist in at least two of the autopsies. His work involved putting together a physical description.

Officials admit gap, but reject blame in deaths

NEW HAVEN, Conn. (AP) — City officials acknowledge there was a gap between concrete road barricades on a closed road where a car plunged into a river, killing all four occupants, but they don't know if anyone is to blame.

Officials said Friday they did not know who moved the 2-ton concrete barriers that would have prevented the car from going into the water, or when they were pushed apart.

The car was found by police divers in the Mill River Thursday, five days after four young friends from East Lyme disappeared during a night out in New Haven. Their disappearance prompted a nationwide search.

Divers searched the river bottom after a patrolman noticed the gap Wednesday, and public works crews closed the opening.

The four victims drowned, the state medical examiner's office said.

Police said a case of mostly empty beer cans was found in the car. But they said they did not know whether the results of blood-alcohol tests would be released because they hadn't determined who was driving.

Police also were checking reports that the four, all under the legal drinking age of 21, were served alcohol in several bars the night they disappeared.

Killed in the accident were three 19-year-olds, Laura Lagrotteria, who worked at a pizza parlor; Jill Sawyer, a student at the University of Rhode Island; Christy Stevens, a student at Mohegan Community College in Norwich; and Michael Gallo, 20, a student at Southern Connecticut State University in New Haven.

The accident occurred on a dark stretch of road that was closed last year because a 105-year-old pivoting bridge along it was beyond repair. The bridge was left in its open position, parallel to the river, so boats could pass by on either side.

Mayor Biagio DiLieto and other city officials told reporters at a news conference Friday an investigation had confirmed that the concrete road barriers at the open bridge had been moved, leaving a gap wide enough for a car to pass through.

One or more of the three 2-ton concrete blocks were out of place when the car drove into the river, city officials said.

Holiday tempers likely to soar at O'Hare

CHICAGO (AP) — Getting over the river and through the woods to the family Thanksgiving feast via O'Hare International Airport — always a challenge — may be even tougher this year because of new federal flight limits.

And things don't look much better for Christmas, say travel agents, airline and aviation officials.

"We're routinely advising our customers and clients of the, let's say, congestion problems at major airports, particularly O'Hare," said David Powell, American Express Travel Service vice president.

The new Federal Aviation Administration limits on the number of flights allowed to arrive at O'Hare in a given hour are likely to aggravate the problem at the nation's busiest airport.

Following a startling 150 percent increase in the number of errors by air traffic controllers at O'Hare this year, the FAA in October ordered the airport to cut the number of arrivals from 96 per hour to 80 per hour between peak-travel times of 4:45 p.m. and 9:15 p.m.

While the cutbacks, called a "flow control program," were designed to make skies safer, airlines acknowledge they also have increased tardiness in a system in which delays never were uncommon.

"We have seen a definite impact from the flow control program," said spokesman Tom Stack of American Airlines, the second-largest carrier at O'Hare.

"To give some example, in October of 1987 at O'Hare we were above 95 percent in our arrivals within 15 minutes. That dropped to about 75 percent in October of this year."

Airlines also no longer have a reserve of planes to help accommodate heavy holiday traffic, said United Airlines spokesman Joe Hopkins.

While the number of flights over the holiday won't be up much — about 2,300 total arrivals and departures per day — the number of people in the skies will be, as airlines see their planes filled to capacity.

Stack anticipates that sometime over the four-day Thanksgiving weekend, American will top its previous one-day record of more than 30,000 passengers flown out of O'Hare.

"Passengers ought to look forward to having some delays," both in the air and on the ground, he said, adding that Sunday may be worst of all. "People can choose a variety of days to begin vacation, but pretty much they wind up returning on that Sunday."

Assuming clear skies, the airlines said travelers should find the delays manageable, but if the weather declines to cooperate, everything is up for grabs.

"Sixty percent of your delays are related to weather," said FAA spokesman Mort Edelstein in Chicago.

The new FAA limitations were imposed after the number of controller errors reached 30, far exceeding the 12 reported at O'Hare in all of 1987. Four of the errors occurred during a period of a week, Edelstein said.

Even with the new limits, "there's no perfect flow control," Edelstein said. "Some hours we'll take 82 (arrivals per hour). We are liberal with the 80 an hour when it has to be."

Some feel the cutbacks don't go far enough.

"The airlines schedule so many fights at certain times in and out...that the airport can't handle them," said David Shuler, a controller at O'Hare and a representative of the National Air Traffic Control Association. "There's only so many taxiways the aircraft can be on."

Debra Fink and her daughter Kellie, of Detroit, Mich., wait in line at a ticket counter at O'Hare International Airport Friday. According to the Better Government Association, flight delays and runway mishaps at the Chicago field are related to the airport not getting its fair share of money, earmarked for improvements, from the Federal Airport and Airway Trust Fund.

"Passengers ought to look forward to having some delays. People can choose a variety of days to begin vacation, but pretty much they wind up returning on that Sunday."

Moderate quakes hit northern Utah

SALT LAKE CITY (AP) — Two moderate earthquakes rocked northern Utah from Salt Lake City to the Idaho border Saturday, causing minor damage in at least two cities, authorities said.

The larger quake had a magnitude of 5 on the Richter scale and occurred about 12:45 p.m. MST. It was followed 20 minutes later by a temblor of magnitude 4.6. Both were near the Utah-Idaho border about three miles west of Bear Lake, said seismologist Sue Nava of the University of Utah Seismograph Stations.

New Yorkers take a piece of the 'A' Train

NEW YORK (AP) — Throngs of people turned out Saturday for a chance to buy buckets of conductors' badges, a bus odometer, old signs and even an old subway car when the Transit Authority threw a garage sale.

"I guess a lot has to do with memories," said Alan Unger of Brooklyn, one of the lucky 2,000 who gained admission, for $5, to the Transit Authority auction and "tag sale" of subway memorabilia.

Unger, a medical investigator for the city's Health and Hospitals Corporation, shelled out $16 for two 6-foot-long signs and two subway photographs.

For $90, Chris McGovern, a Solomon Brothers employee and Manhattan resident, became the proud owner of an old roll sign, reading "Nassau Street."

"It seems like this is a good piece of nostalgia for the price," said McGovern.

The proceeds, $35,482.76, will go into the authority's general fund, with some of the money set aside for the transit museum, said transit spokesman Bob Prividi.

A couple of subway workers rolled their eyes with disbelief while buyers sifted through piles of rusty signs.

"Warning: Do Not Lean Over Edge of Platform," read one priced at $150.

The crowd snaked outside the subway museum, housed in a former subway station in Brooklyn, and about 1,000 of them never got in.

"The line went all the way around the block. I nearly fell over," said Jared Lebow, another transit spokesman.

"We're crazy," said JoAnne Martinez of Queens, who had been waiting for 40 minutes.

Her husband, Ray, a Police Department mechanic, hoped to buy some of the Transit Authority badges tagged at $3 to $5 apiece.

At the auction, Arthur Green, an entrepreneur from Woodstock, N.Y., paid $3,000 for the 1937 subway car. He'll move it by flatbed truck to Kingston, N.Y., where he plans to open a railroad exhibit.

A solid oak ticket chopper, circa 1920, sold for $1,650. In those days, passengers bought a ticket for a nickel, then a transit worker pulled a lever to cut it in half as they entered the subway.

A 4-foot-long, blue and white, oak-framed, circa 1920 sign that read "Interborough Rapid Transit Co." fetched $850. It used to hang in the office of Transit Authority President David Gunn.

A blue mosaic, bearing an "H" from the now-renovated Hoyt Street station in Brooklyn, went for $850, while a snappy, red-white-and-blue uniform from the defunct Transit Authority marching band brought $250.

OSHA to drop fines

HARTFORD, Conn. (AP) — Federal safety officials have agreed to forgive the record $5.1 million in fines they levied against five companies involved in building L'Ambiance Plaza, which collapsed and killed 28 people, according to a published report.

The Hartford Courant reported in Saturday's editions that representatives of the Occupational Safety and Health Administration agreed to drop the fines Friday after meeting all day with a mediation panel seeking to settle litigation stemming from the building's collapse.

Instead, the federal agency will accept $430,000, the cost of its investigation into the construction accident, The Courant reported.

The apartment building was under construction when it collapsed on April 23, 1987, killing 28 men and injuring 16.

After the collapse, OSHA levied the $5.1 million in fines, citing the project's contractors with willful violations of safety regulations.

Dukakis, Bentsen ask Kirk to stay on

PHOENIX, Ariz. (AP) — Michael Dukakis and Lloyd Bentsen have joined the chorus of Democratic Party leaders urging Paul G. Kirk Jr. to serve a second four-year term as party chairman, Kirk disclosed Saturday.

Paul Kirk

At a meeting with reporters, Kirk said the potential influence of former presidential contender Jesse Jackson on the selection of a new chairman "will play no role in my decision" whether to seek another term.

Kirk said he told Jackson in a telephone conversation Friday that he hadn't made up his mind. Jackson responded, "let's stay in touch because that will be important whatever you decide," Kirk said.

Kirk disclosed his conversations with Dukakis and Bentsen, the party's defeated 1988 national ticket, during a meeting of the Association of State Democratic Chairs.

The state party leaders were eager to proclaim the party alive and well after its latest presidential election defeat less than two weeks ago to Republican George Bush.

But they also heard a warning from former Arizona Gov. Bruce Babbitt that they must stop treating campaigns for the White House like "an extension of a congressional campaign" and start offering a larger vision of the future.

"We assume that what elects a senator will elect a president, that what wins the statehouse will win the White House," said Babbitt, whose bid for the Democratic presidential nomination ended after the New Hampshire primary.

He said the Democrats' success in electing members of Congress and governors "makes it even harder to swallow that, once again, the biggest prize, the presidency, has eluded our grasp."

He said that voters regard the presidency as "about the larger issues of personal leadership and national destiny...To become a presidential party we must have a vision of what America can become and the credibility to be heard."

As an example, he cited a phrase often used by Dukakis.

"Good jobs for good wages may be a good slogan, but it is not a policy, much less a program," said Babbitt.

He said the Democrats must offer voters an economic message of "growth and renewal — not just equity and redistribution" and a foreign and defense policy that acknowledges that "in an imperfect world we must sometimes project and use force."

Kirk's term as party chairman expires in February and he had indicated he had no desire to serve another four years.

But many party leaders, apparently eager to avoid a potentially divisive battle for the post, have pleaded with him to stay on.

Asked if that included the two men on the national ticket, Kirk said, "Senator Bentsen did and Governor Dukakis asked me what I was thinking about, and I told him it was a serious and major decision, different from the course I had set out on...He said I hope you stay on."

Jackson was not among those urging Kirk to seek a another term.

The pressure on Kirk was perceived as a strategy for blocking Jackson from increasing his influence within the national party structure.

Kirk said that if he decides to seek another term it would only be "to try to do a better job" and not to "prevent any conflict or be an obstacle in any other person's way."

He said that if any of his backers were trying to block Jackson "they haven't mentioned it to me."

Ron Brown, a Washington lawyer who played a key role in the late stage of the Jackson presidential campaign, was the only potential candidate for party chairman who refused to commit himself to dropping out of the race if Kirk decides to run.

"I don't feel obligated to say I'm not going to take another breath until he decides what to do," said Brown, who emphasized that he and Kirk had worked closely together in the past.

If Kirk runs for another term, Brown said, "obviously it makes it more difficult, obviously it makes it less likely," that Brown would enter the race.

Reagan signs legislation to aid research in superconductivity

WASHINGTON (NYT) — Over objections of Energy Secretary John S. Herrington, President Reagan Saturday signed legislation establishing a program to speed research and development in superconductivity, a new field of science that could revolutionize energy, electronics and transportation industries.

The signing, which was announced without comment by the White House, was seen as strengthening the role of the federal government in a technology that could have many commercial applications.

Superconductivity is a phenomenon in which certain materials exhibit virtually no resistance to the flow of electric current. Scientists say superconductivity could lead to such advances as high-speed power lines and magnetically levitated trains

The legislation, which requires the director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy to establish a five-year plan for research and development in the field, was among 11 pieces of legislation the president signed Saturday.

The superconductivity bill was hotly contested within the administration.

Herrington had argued that a national plan would result in the government's "becoming entangled in the affairs of commercial enterprise and usurping industry."

Barrow residents now truly 'in the dark' for 65 days

BARROW, Alaska (AP) — People in this arctic town had a few minutes to catch a glimpse of the sun Saturday before it disappeared for 65 days, leaving Barrow in virtual darkness.

The sun rose at 1:04 p.m. and set 16 minutes later. It will appear again on Jan. 23, at 1:09 p.m.

Temperatures already have been well below zero in Barrow, and the absence of the sun won't make the community of 1,500 residents much colder. Feeble solar radiation during the arctic autumn is no match for the cooling effects of permafrost, ice and snow, said Chuck Evans, manager of the U.S. Weather Service station here.

People don't seem disturbed about the long periods of darkness, Evans said.

"We've had a lot of them come up and worry about it the first year," he said. "But so far it's not really affected anyone."

But he said the lack of light can restrict weather station operations. For one thing, it's hard to observe cloud movements when it is dark.

Darkness causes some people to suffer a malady known as Seasonal Affective Disorder, or SAD, with symptoms including lethargy, inability to concentrate, depression and increased appetite, said North Slope Borough Health Department spokeswoman Mary O'Connor.

In the Soviet Union, officials send children from dark areas to brighter regions for at least a week during the winter. Soviet children also are exposed to full-spectrum lighting for at least 10 minutes a day, she said.

People unable to escape the darkness can be helped by certain colors, O'Connor said.

"Yellow is more up, an energizing color," she said, but blue tends to have a tranquilizing effect.

While some people in Barrow use tips about colors and fill their homes with potted plants to help them deal with the darkness, others say the winter conditions are a way of life and require no adjustment.

"After seeing the sun set like that for 74 years, what more can I say?" said Maggie Gray, a Barrow elder. She goes about her daily rounds, whether it's light or dark outside.

Children and adults jockey for position behind the rear platform of the CSX Transportation Co.'s "Santa Fe Special" as Santa and his helpers toss out candy and assorted gifts Saturday as the train chugged its way through Kentucky to Tennessee.

'Santa Claus Special' rides the rails through Appalachian country

ST. PAUL, Va. (AP) — Appalachian children scrambled over rocks and oily railroad crossties Saturday to claim some of the 12 tons of gifts and candy tossed from a train during the 46th annual run of the "Santa Claus Special."

"Christmas begins this way for us every year, no doubt about it," said Lloyd D. Lewis, spokesman for CSX Transportation Co., which supplied the train.

As in past years, Santa Claus was seated on the rear platform, tossing gifts as the train slowly passed crowds of children along the route through the coalfields of parts of Kentucky and Virginia into Tennessee.

"I have people tell me they came as a child and now are bringing their grandchildren," said Frank Brogden, who has played Santa for the past four years. "It's a great tradition."

CSX Transportation and Kingsport, Tenn., business officials put a trailer-load of presents aboard the train before it pulled out of Kingsport on Friday afternoon to get into position for the run.

The four-car train left the Shelbiana train yard in eastern Kentucky shortly after sunrise, loaded down with donated candy and gifts, including 3,000 digital watches, 50,000 cassette tapes of children's stories, 5,000 toy cars, 10,000 comic books and 3,000 Frisbees.

The Santa train's route takes it from Shelbiana through 30 communities in eastern Kentucky and southwestern Virginia before arriving in Kingsport, Tenn., for a Christmas parade Saturday afternoon.

The train takes 7½ hours to pass through 110 miles of remote gorges and valleys, rumbling through 32 tunnels on a rail line normally used by the huge "unit trains" that bring coal down from the mountains.

"For 110 miles, there's not a stretch of this railroad where you're not looking at a kid," Lewis said.

Georgia Farrand of East Carters Valley, Va., brought her grandson to see the train when it stopped in St. Paul, Va. She said the train has become an important Christmas tradition for Appalachian youngsters.

"Children get a lot of joy out of it and they really look forward to it from year to year," she said.

Santa has been bringing the early Christmas presents to Appalachian children since 1943, when the line between Shelbiana and Kingsport was part of the Clinchfield Railroad, Lewis said.

One killed when bulldozer cuts gas line, causing blast

SMITHTOWN, N.Y. (AP) — A construction worker operating a bulldozer severed a gas main Saturday, causing an explosion that killed one person, injured 11 others and leveled a vacant store.

"The sky seemed to fall on us," said Ann Marie Riley, who was in a car two doors down from the building. "Debris and glass was falling like heavy rain."

The explosion in this Long Island town shattered windows and sent debris flying hundreds of feet, witnesses said.

A construction crew was working in the business district and a backhoe operator struck the main, said a Suffolk County police spokeswoman, Officer Susan Romann.

The driver, realizing what he had done, ran to a shop to call police, and while he was there the explosion rocked the area. He was injured by flying glass, police said.

The construction company had failed to call the Long Island Lighting Co. to find out the location of the gas line, said utility spokesman Jerry Mikorenda.

The dead man was identified as Anibal J. Leiria, 31.

Four crew members, including the backhoe operator, and seven bystanders were treated at hospitals for minor injuries, Ms. Romann said.

Janet Risener, owner of a gas station across the street from the vacant store, said she was doing paperwork when her windows blew out and she saw a big cloud of smoke.

"There was wood and concrete up in the air," she said, adding that nearby store and car windows also were shattered.

Guard crew saves lost jumbo jet

HONOLULU (AP) — A Hawaiian Airlines jumbo jet flew 368 miles off course on a flight from Los Angeles to Honolulu and an Air National Guard surveillance crew has been credited with saving the flight before it ran out of fuel.

A commendation memo to the Guard crew said it was highly likely the L-1011 TriStar could have bypassed the Hawaiian Islands on Nov. 7 and not had enough fuel to make landfall. But the crew spotted it in time on radar and gave warning.

Hawaii is the most isolated landmass on Earth.

The plane, heading west, was detected 368 miles north of Oahu Island, where Honolulu is located, five minutes after its scheduled arrival time at Honolulu International Airport, the National Guard said.

The surveillance crew determined that the plane was Hawaiian Flight 471 and notified the Diamond Head air traffic control center, which instructed the pilot to turn south, the National Guard said.

Other details of the flight, such as the number of passengers and the fuel level upon landing, were not available Saturday.

Victims of Jonestone mass suicide recalled

OAKLAND, Calif. (AP) — A simple gray headstone marks the graves of 409 people in a cemetery overlooking San Francisco Bay, representing nearly half of the 913 people who died in the Jonestown mass suicide a decade ago.

As they have every year, friends and relatives of the Jonestown victims gathered at the site Friday for a memorial service on the anniversary of the deaths at the Peoples Temple jungle compound in Guyana in South America.

"It's taken me a long time to get enough courage to come," said Kim Dutra, one of 40 people who attended the service. She carried a bouquet of red roses to the site where her mother, Beverly, is buried.

"You know, sometimes the best thing to do is just put it behind you."

Dutra's mother and 13-year-old brother were among the 912 followers of the Rev. Jim Jones who died along with him at Jonestown on Nov. 18, 1978. Most committed suicide by drinking a poison-laced beverage.

The mass suicide came hours after church loyalists killed a U.S. congressman, three journalists and a temple defector who had flown to the complex to investigate complaints of abuse and tyranny there.

Many of the dead were cremated or buried in family cemeteries. The 409 bodies buried at Evergreen Cemetery could not be individually identified because no fingerprints or other records were available in the United States.

Eddie Norwood recalled how his mother, who was not a Temple member, kept him hidden from his father and other family members who did belong to the cult. She feared Jones was psychotic and dangerous, and feared he would have the child kidnapped to join the church.

"I was hurt and I did not know then, but I know now," said Norwood, who was 8 years old when 27 members of his family died at Jonestown.

An unidentified woman places flowers beside a gravestone — under which some of her relatives are buried — during a memorial service at an Oakland, Calif., cemetery Friday afternoon commemorating the 10th anniversary of the Jonestown tragedy.

Friday, he joined his mother, Jynona Norwood, and other relatives at the cemetery.

One of their relatives, Fred Lewis, stood by the grave as the service began, clutching a banner that read: "10 Yr Jonestown Memorial. We Will Not Forget." Breaking into tears, Lewis told the gathering that he never had the emotional strength to talk at other memorial services.

"This is the first time it happened that I've been able to cope with the situation," he said later. "I feel good and I'm happy, I'm very happy to see so many people out here today."

Jynona Norwood, an evangelist who organizes the memorial each year, said Jones offered a utopian world that provided food, clothing, shelter and a form of religious solace to a wide spectrum of people: poor minorities from the ghetto, pimps, prostitutes as well as the average person on the street.

"The people at Jonestown were people who loved other people, they weren't crazy," she said.

But, Norwood said, a power-hungry Jones abused their trust and faith, demanding absolute loyalty through sadistic mind-control techniques. Peoples Temple turned out to be another cult, she said.

Under pressure from allegations of misconduct, Jones moved most of his Peoples Temple from San Francisco to Guyana, the only English-speaking country in South America, in 1977. The cult leader believed he would be safe from what he perceived as media and police persecution.

Yolanda Williams, a Peoples Temple member who left Guyana about four months before the deaths, said, "When I left it was with a measure of hope for them (those remaining) — that maybe we would have a prayer."

Today, she said, she still lives in fear that a Jones loyalist will hunt her down for speaking out against the Temple.

NATION IN BRIEF

Marcoses meet with FBI

HONOLULU (AP) — Ferdinand and Imelda Marcos met with the FBI again Saturday, and Mrs. Marcos said the American justice system was going to be the death of her husband.

"Enough is enough," Mrs. Marcos said in a statement released before the meeting, which was closed to reporters. "The Filipino people and the Marcoses have long been used and abused. You surely will not stop until you have killed President Marcos of the Philippines."

Marcos, the 71-year-old former president, and his wife waved through their car windows as they passed with lawyers and an entourage of about a dozen people and entered an underground garage.

The Marcoses were to submit fingerprints and voice samples, according to Marcos' Washington attorney Richard Hibey. They also were to sign forms authorizing U.S. investigators to search the records of several foreign banks where they are said to have assets.

Quota systems alleged

WASHINGTON (NYT) — The Department of Education has begun inquiries to determine whether Harvard and the University of California at Los Angeles have established illegal quotas to limit the number of Asian American students they admit.

A spokesman for the department, Mahlon G. Anderson, said the inquiries were routine and preliminary and did not necessarily indicate violations. The department conducts more than 250 such inquiries a year, he said.

Asked if there had been complaints against Harvard and UCLA, he said he could not comment on how the department selected institutions to be examined.

Officials at both Harvard and UCLA denied they have quota systems.

Disabled planes land safely

NEW ORLEANS — An Eastern Airline DC-9 with 113 people on board blew an engine and a Delta Air Lines flight with 80 on board blew a tire, but both landed safely at Louisiana airports, officials said.

Eastern Flight 682 took off from New Orleans International Airport about 4:30 p.m. Friday and returned a few minutes later, officials said.

The pilot told passengers the plane had lost an engine "but not to worry, he had shut it down and we're going back," said Liz Rome of Washington, D.C.

Jackie Pate, a Delta spokeswoman at the airline's headquarters in Atlanta, said Saturday that Flight 898 blew a tire shortly after takeoff Friday night from Dallas-Fort Worth International Airport.

Professor searches for skeletons in Manhattan park

NEW YORK (NYT) — It was a good day to look for skeletons in Greenwich Village's Washington Square Park.

The leaden sky and the tangy smell of the leaves lent just the right air of foreboding and decay, making it easy to imagine an 18th century lynch mob shouting for justice and flinging another thief or Tory into the anonymous graveyard that Prof. James S. Mellett believes may exist somewhere below the surface of the park.

Mellett, who teaches geology at New York University, was there Saturday with two graduate students and a ground-penetrating radar apparatus.

While the students took turns dragging the radar-sensing device across the lawn, Mellett monitored a graphic display printer set up in the open hatchback of his Plymouth Voyager.

This is Mellet's second attempt to peer down through the centuries into the subsoil layers of lower Manhattan to study the earth without digging it up.

Last year he was here searching for the bed of old Minetta Brook, which ran down through the center of the park until it was filled in the 19th century, when most of Manhattan's natural features were undergoing the same fate.

The technology that allows such studies was developed in the early 1970s and used on the moon to survey below the surface.

In Washington Square Park, which has been an open piece of ground in lower Manhattan for at least the age of the oldest trees there — 200 plus years — the radar revealed some old water conduits, and a fairly large unidentifiable object 10 feet below the ground that Mellet believes is probably some place where water or sewer pipes connect.

There was an area near the northwest corner of the park, about seven feet down, that the printout said was jumbled and disturbed, and thus might possibly be the graveyard that has been mentioned in park legend.

But Saturday the professor found no proof to support the old stories.

The effort did attract a number of observers, however.

One man, who was later told by a police officer to stop bothering people, suggested that the professor should search for the "perpetual holes" that he said are known to exist in Washington Square Park.

The holes connect directly to the center of the earth, the man explained, and if dog feces were thrown there, there would be no smell. The whereabouts of the holes are being concealed by a police coverup, the man said.

Scholars try to nail down 'family resemblance' in religious revival

By PETER STEINFELS
New York Times News Service

RELIGION

It has been almost a decade since the Rev. Jerry Falwell formed the Moral Majority and since Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini took power in Iran — two very different developments involving two different religions, often linked by the single label of fundamentalism.

Ever since, scholars have tried to understand what looked and still looks like a worldwide resurgence of religious fervor, and even to decide what to call it.

Two conferences last week, one in New York and one in Chicago, were devoted to examining the fact that something profound has happened in religion, something displaying what Martin E. Marty of the University of Chicago called "family resemblances" in groups as diverse as Shiite Muslims, militant Sikhs, Confucian revivalists, Latin American Pentecostals and Roman Catholic traditionalists.

Marty is directing a five-year study of fundamentalism for the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, which sponsored the Chicago meeting.

In his view, scholars need some conceptual tool for studying the resemblances among religious insurgencies, and "fundamentalism" is a handy one.

But participants at both conferences voiced reservations about the term.

Speakers at the New York meeting, sponsored by the Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion, said the word had often been a term of opprobrium, a label connoting fanaticism and closed-mindedness that is used by those styling themselves dispassionate and open-minded.

Professor Riffat Hassan of the University of Louisville argued that fundamentalism was a rubric borrowed from American Protestantism and that it only hampered the search for satisfactory explanations for recent developments in the Islamic world.

The term "fundamentalist" was coined by Curtis Lee Laws, a religious journal editor, in 1920.

A Northern Baptist opponent of theological liberals in his denomination, he took the term from a series of 12 small books defending theological conservatism that began appearing in 1910 under the title "The Fundamentals."

Many Christians have proudly identified themselves as fundamentalists, but the label was quickly adopted by outsiders and applied to almost any traditionalist believers.

Objections to it therefore came not only from those who resent the implication that adherence to principles like the literal interpretation of Scripture is fanatic or irrational, but also from conservative Christians who contend that many fundamentalist beliefs denature genuine orthodoxy.

At the Hebrew Union conference, Jaroslav Pelikan, a Yale University professor and author of a five-volume history of Christian doctrine, sharply contrasted the original claims of American fundamentalism with orthodox teachings of historic Christianity.

He concluded that "authentic Christian orthodoxy includes a principle of development of doctrine" that American fundamentalism has lacked.

The problem of employing the term "fundamentalist" is even more striking when it is applied to different religions and different cultures.

A participant in the Chicago conference used the example of the Malaysian Islamic movement known as "dakwah," which is categorized today as fundamentalist. If Malaysia had been the dominant cultural power, he wondered, would Americans now be analyzing televangelism in terms of Christian dakwah?

The underlying question is whether there really are enough "family resemblances" to justify a linking concept.

Such elements as messianism, a literal approach to a sacred text, a strict moral code and the justification of violence may link some fundamentalist movements but not others, and they may also characterize non-fundamentalist groups.

At the Hebrew Union conference, James Davison Hunter, a sociologist from the University of Virginia, proposed a general description of fundamentalism as a form of embattled orthodoxy that resists modernity, that seeks to reinstate a course of sacred history that modernity has derailed, that ties religious ideology to national identity, that wields a sacred text as authority for rejecting error, and that effectively organizes popular anger.

Marty, in a paper given last February, offered some similar characteristics.

"Fundamentalism is always reactive" to a perceived threat, he said, and it selects certain "fundamentals" from orthodox tradition that serve to set boundaries and exclude threatening elements. It is dualistic and absolutist in its world view, suspecting mediators, compromises and ambiguity, he said.

The five-year project that he directs is beginning an investigation that may reveal the distinctions between movements as much as the similarities.

Among the questions: What draws people to fundamentalist movements? Is there a fundamentalist temperament? Do fundamentalist movements feature a typical role for charismatic leaders or a common attitude toward women?

If fundamentalism is the framework with which students of the worldwide religious resurgence explore such questions, by the time they finish this concept may no more resemble the simple model taken from American Protestant polemics than a revival tent resembles the Grand Mosque in Mecca.

Symbolic issue splits Jewish community

NEW YORK (AP) — The change involves just a few words in the law and would affect a half-dozen people a year.

But indications that Israel is about to change its Law of Return to deny automatic citizenship to non-Orthodox converts have generated enormous controversy among American Jews, most of whom are Reform or Conservative.

At issue, they say, is whether these branches of Judaism are perceived as legitimate. At risk, they say, is the unified support of American Jewry that has sustained Israel through four wars and scores of crises.

American Jewish efforts on behalf of Israel "are going to be subordinated to the effort to get this changed. Israel is going to be the object of a crusade in which they're going to be the bad guys, not the good guys," said Rabbi Eric Yoffie, executive director of the Association of Reform Zionists of America.

Twenty-seven organizations — among them the American Jewish Congress, the American Jewish Committee, B'nai B'rith, Hadassah and all major Reform and Conservative governing bodies — issued a statement Nov. 12 warning of the "enormous damage, actual and symbolic" to Jews living outside of Israel.

The vast majority of Jews worldwide are non-Orthodox, even in Israel.

The Council of Jewish Federations, which will raise an estimated $850 million this year for Jewish needs around the world, said it would dispatch a delegation to Israel to lobby against the change.

"We are dealing with the perceived disenfranchisement of millions of American Jews who will feel they have been written out," said Shoshana S. Cardin, past president of the council.

Under Israeli law as it stands, all Jews — defined as the children of a Jewish woman, or converts — are automatically accepted as Israeli citizens.

For decades, ultra-Orthodox elements in Israel have sought to change the law so that only those who are converted "in accordance with Halacha" — the strict, Orthodox interpretation of Jewish law — are eligible.

Support for the Orthodox religious parties doubled in this year's parliamentary elections. Though that amounted to only 18 seats in the 120-seat Knesset, it gave the religious parties enough votes to give either the Labor or Likud blocs the majority needed to form the next government.

Last week it was reported that the religious parties had agreed to support Likud and had won numerous concessions, including a promise to seek a change in the Law of Return.

Unless Labor and Likud agree to form another unity government, American Jewish leaders fear, the change is inevitable. It has been reported that Likud would make a parliamentary vote in favor of the change mandatory for party members.

Azerbaijani receives death sentence

WORLD

MOSCOW (AP) — The Supreme Court has sentenced a man to death by firing squad for leading a mob that killed seven people in ethnic riots this year, a witness said Saturday.

Kuryun Naganpetyan, a Moscow-based Armenian activist and painter, said the verdict against Akhmed I. Akhmedov from the republic of Azerbaijan was handed down shortly after 6 p.m. Friday.

It was the first death penalty issued by Soviet courts in connection with the Feb. 28 riots in the Azerbaijan city of Sumgait.

Soviet officials say 32 people, including 26 Armenians, were killed in the unrest. Armenians have set the toll much higher.

In May, an Azerbaijani metalworker, Talekh Salekh Ogli Ismailov, was found guilty by a court in Azerbaijan of committing premeditated murder in Sumgait and given a 15-year prison sentence.

State-run media in Moscow did not immediately report the verdict in the Akhmedov trial, which was closed to Western journalists. Naganpetyan, who has attended the trial daily, reported the court's decision in a telephone interview with The Associated Press.

The riots in Sumgait were sparked by a campaign by Armenians, who are mostly Christian, to annex the predominantly Armenian region of Nagorno-Karabakh, which has been part of largely Moslem Azerbaijan since 1923.

More than 80 people have been charged with criminal offenses in the anti-Armenian unrest that broke out in Sumgait, an industrial city on the Caspian Sea about 20 miles north of Azerbaijan's capital, Baku.

Akhmedov and two co-defendants, Ilgam A. Ismailov and Yavar G. Dzhafarov, went on trial at the Supreme Court on murder and arson charges Oct. 18. Tass, the official news agency, said the three were charged with "organizing and taking a direct part in mass disorders accompanied by pogroms, acts of arson and murders."

Naganpetyan said Akhmedov was convicted of using a megaphone to shout to a mob "Kill the Armenians!" and of leading them as they stormed 17 apartments in Sumgait and killed seven people, burning some of them alive.

Armenian newspapers, whose reporters have been allowed into the trial, have said that — according to testimony — bands of Azerbaijanis in Sumgait hunted down and killed Armenians, and that one man was hurled alive into a bonfire.

One young girl was mutilated with a shovel and burned alive, according to accounts of the Supreme Court trial that have appeared in the Armenian press.

The guilty verdict and death sentence came as a shock to Akhmedov, Naganpetyan said.

"Visibly, he didn't expect to be found guilty. His face dissolved when he was told he would be shot, and he turned away," Naganpetyan said. "It was a great contrast to the first part of the day, when he behaved like a hero."

The Armenian activist said the Supreme Court did not announce when Akhmedov would be executed. He said the trial of Akhmedov's co-defendants, Ismailov and Dzhafarov, is continuing.

Other trials of suspects charged in the Sumgait riots have been held, but official media have not reported on them. Even Armenia's Communist Party chief, Suren Arutyunyan, has complained about the way the cases are being handled.

"We see how the obviously delayed investigation reopened old wounds, how people are shaken by the fact that the legal examination is being conducted in various cities of the country, and that no information is coming into the republic about who was punished, what the sentence was," Arutyunyan said in an Oct. 8 speech carried on Armenian television.

Under the Soviet criminal code, the death penalty can be applied for offenses ranging from murder to war crimes and large-scale economic crimes against the state, such as embezzlement of government property or taking bribes.

Nazi war criminal Feodor Federenko was executed on July 27, 1987.

'Errors of nation's past' on display in Moscow

MOSCOW (AP) — Muscovites lined up in a driving snow Saturday to view an exhibit of the injustices of the Stalin years, when millions of their compatriots vanished into the hell of prisons and labor camps and never returned.

"A Christian cannot be a good Christian without recognizing that he's a sinner," said one of the exhibit's organizers, historian Nikita G. Okhotin. "How can one be a Soviet without recognizing the errors made in his nation's past?"

In a Moscow light bulb factory, the "Week of Conscience" opened with a jarring reminder of abuses committed during the 1924-1953 rule of Josef Stalin, whose legacy of terror has been repudiated by Soviet President Mikhail S. Gorbachev.

The weeklong exhibit, which will include films, discussions and tributes to Stalin's victims, was sponsored by the weekly magazine Ogonyok, which has been in the vanguard of Gorbachev's campaign for "glasnost" or greater candor — including frankness about the dark past of Soviet history.

"The memorial will be the manifestation of the grief of the people for millions of their compatriots, unjustifiably repressed, and will mean their political rehabilitation," Ogonyok editor Vitaly Korotich told the Tass news agency before the exhibit opened in the hall, which belongs to the factory and was built for the employees.

The "Week of Conscience" is another blow to the reputation of Stalin, whose repressions and harsh central controls are now blamed by Gorbachev and his followers for many of the nation's political, social and economic ills.

In a side room at the cultural hall, a wooden board twice as high as a man bears pieces of paper with the names of thousands of Russians, Jews, Armenians and others arrested in 1937, at the height of what historians call Stalin's "Great Purge."

Each sheet carries the laconic notice "VMN," the Russian-language initials for "Highest Measure of Punishment," the euphemism then used to designate the death penalty.

Western historians estimate that 8 million to 10 million Soviets died in the 1936-38 Great Purge, when Stalin was ridding the Soviet Communist Party, government and society of both real and imagined opponents.

Many victims were posthumously rehabilitated by Nikita S. Khrushchev following Stalin's death in 1953, and others have had charges against them wiped from the judicial record. But the fate of countless others remains unknown.

Reseachers like Okhotin from the group "Memorial" spoke to more than 100 Soviets seeking news about family members or friends swallowed up by the vast network of prisons and labor camps that Alexander Solzhenitsyn dubbed "the Gulag archipelago."

Tatyana Vasileyevna of Moscow gave reseachers a portrait of her grandfather, Mikhail M. Gerasimov, a Moscow physicist who once was photographed as an honored worker alongside Stalin and his henchman Lavrenti Beria, but in 1937 was arrested and shot.

"Maybe his picture will help somebody else track down someone near and dear to them," Mrs. Vasileyevna said.

Some exhibits inspired pity and sorrow. Vasily P. Petrovsky, then-director of the light bulb factory, was arrested in 1938 and shot. A collage of photographs and documents told the sad story of his family.

"Our family, my sister and myself, experienced all the circles of hell for belonging to a family of 'enemies of the people,'" Petrovsky's daughter wrote. "But never did we have a desire to leave the motherland...After the victory (in World War II), we sang songs in praise of Stalin, the wise, the dear, and the beloved."

A wheelbarrow bearing a sign saying "for the memorial to the victims of Stalin's repression" was filled with five- and 10-ruble notes donated by visitors. Some wrote the names of family members killed in the purges on banknotes before tossing them in.

The ruling Politburo authorized the building of a monument in Moscow to Stalin's victims this year, and dozens of designs were on diplay.

One shows a hammer and sickle, the symbol of the Soviet state. But the hammer is smeared with blood, and the sickle broken.

One woman proposed construction of a "fountain of tears."

Stalin has his defenders among those who long for the order he epitomized, and arguments broke out when some visitors criticized the anti-Stalinist theme.

"How dare they criticize one man. We were all guilty of wrongdoing," exclaimed a Russian man in his 50s.

"That's rubbish!" shot back a bearded neighbor. "They want us to believe that. It lets those who were really guilty escape."

Swiss search for man in bombing

GENEVA (AP) — Authorities Saturday were searching for a man spotted near the scene of a bomb blast that damaged the Geneva office of the Soviet airline Aeroflot and injured five people, including two American tourists.

Four victims remained hospitalized with leg wounds and burns.

Democracy seems to have hurt Peru

By MIRKO LAUER
New York Times News Service

LIMA, Peru — After almost 1,000 days of looking good in the polls, Peru's president, Alan Garcia Perez, has seen his popularity rating crash from a peak of more than 80 percent in 1985 to about 20 percent since he imposed Draconian anti-inflationary measures in early September.

Now his possible resignation and the possibility of a coup are openly and frequently discussed.

Inching toward its ninth year, Peru's democracy has become one of the shakiest in Latin America, and it is suddenly fashionable to speculate whether it will make it to the July 1990 elections.

Peru's economic chaos, not the havoc created by eight years of warfare waged by the Maoist Shining Path guerrillas, is seen to be the main cause of uncertainty.

In recent weeks, polls show that the popularity of all leaders, including fierce opponents of the president, has been falling as Peruvians increase their preference for "ninguno" — none of the above.

Why is democracy losing ground in its most important territory, the minds of the people? Why has democracy not done more to save Peruvians?

The answer may lie partly in the fact that eight years of democracy have brought harder times than the previous 12 years of military rule.

In the 1970s Peru enjoyed better prices for its commodity exports and was able to borrow heavily abroad. It is not surprising that some Peruvians should associate political freedom with economic hardship.

Peru's right wing, which is trying to form a so-called Democratic Front coalition, sees democracy as potentially dangerous because, this thinking goes, it could get out of hand and bring a radical solution at the polls.

It is still playing by the democratic rules, but its more extreme members have made it clear that they might favor a coup if the left were to win in 1990.

On the other hand, the seven-party coalition known as the United Left believes that it can win power through the ballot box because its likely presidential candidate, a lawyer and former mayor of Lima, Alfonso Barrantes, has a 10-point lead in the polls over the right's possible nominees.

They are the former president, Fernando Belaunde Terry; a former mayor of Lima, Luis Bedoya Reyes, and the novelist Mario Vargas Llosa, whose presidential chances have seemed to decrease as Belaunde's have increased.

The recent forced resignation of a powerful pro-Garcia army officer, Gen. Victor Raul Silva Tuesta, also served to remind politicians of the continuing danger of a coup.

The armed forces deny such an intent. Yet the seeming indifference of many Peruvians in the face of coup rumors that recently swept Lima underlines their disappointment with democracy.

Despite the apparent mood of polarization, the population is not living its gloom in terms of parties or ideologies but rather as a function of coping with the perils of day-to-day life.

Members of the middle class fear impoverishment more than the guerrillas and the poor fear unemployment and inflation. Prices rose by 114 percent in September alone and another 40 percent in October.

In a recent poll, 52 percent of those questioned said they would leave Peru if they had the chance; an additional 10 percent had mixed feelings about remaining here.

Almost 120,000 people have emigrated in the past three years — more than half of them to the United States — effectively doubling the number of Peruvians now living abroad.

With Garcia's party in tatters, the scheduled election seems to be developing into a showdown between the United Left's socialism and the Democratic Front's version of the Chicago School's free-market economics.

Whatever the result, the outcome will be more demands on a democratic system that so far has given Peruvians little in return for its survival.

Writers take up politics in Latin America

By MONTE HAYES

LIMA, Peru (AP) — It came as no surprise to anyone in Latin America that a novelist, poet and essayist, Mario Vargas Llosa, would seek to become president of Peru.

For Vargas Llosa, frequently mentioned as a future winner of the Nobel Prize for Literature, is following a centuries-old tradition of an area where cultural figures, both classical and pop, have also played important political roles.

Peru's Vice President Luis Alberto Sanchez, himself a writer and educator as well as politician, says that in Latin America individuals who have distinguished themselves in literature and art can carry their prestige into politics because they live in "half finished" societies that value men of multiple talents.

"In societies that have not evolved greatly, there is little specialization," Sanchez, who is 88 and has written more than 100 books, said in an interview.

"The politician can be a writer, a priest, a military man, many things."

Vargas Llosa, who once described himself as a "specialist in fantasies, in dreams," stands in sharp contrast to the professional politicians and technocrats in many other parts of the world.

"This is definitely not my calling," the 52-year-old writer said recently. "If my country were not what it is, politics would probably be a very secondary concern in my life."

Instead, the author of such books as "The Green House" and "Conversation in a Cathedral" finds himself leading a center-right political movement that seeks to prevent the election in 1990 of Alfonso Barrantes, a declared Communist now favored to win the presidency.

"I am fundamentally a writer, but at the same time I am a person concerned about the reality of his country and, above all, its future," said Vargas Llosa.

PERU IS wracked by its worst economic crisis of the century, with the annual inflation rate surpassing 1,200 percent. It also is bloodied by a savage leftist insurgency that has claimed more than 12,000 lives.

Vargas Llosa has been traveling into Peru's remote areas, climbing down mine shafts high in the Andes and visiting isolated Indian villages in the Amazon forests to spread his message of the dangers that await Peru if the next presidential election is won by Communists.

"They would impoverish us even more than we are now and little by little, just as has occurred with other Marxist regimes, they would totally trample our political freedoms," he declared at a recent rally.

Elsewhere, Jose Luis Rodriguez, Latin America's most popular ballad singer, speaks seriously of running for president of Venezuela. Ruben Blades, one of the region's top singers and composers of salsa music, talks of one day seeking the presidency of Panama.

Although writers and artists participate actively in politics throughout the region, only a few have been successful in their bids for the presidency of a country.

Romulo Gallegos, Venezuela's greatest novelist, was elected president in 1947. Juan Bosch, regarded as the Dominican Republic's finest short story writer, was elected president of that Caribbean country in 1962.

Both men were overthrown after only months in office by their countries' armed forces, which viewed them as arrogant and soft on leftists.

"Gallegos had a lot of Communists around him and they began to flatter him — and that is a writer's great weakness, his vanity. We are all vain," said Sanchez, a founder of Peru's populist Aprista Party.

Bosch's ouster led to a 1965 popular rebellion that ended after U.S. troops invaded the Dominican Republic. At 79 Bosch is still active in politics. He received 18 percent of the vote in 1986, but polls indicate that if the elections were held today, he would win against conservative President Joaquin Balaguer, a lawyer and also a writer.

IN BRAZIL, where the national language is Portuguese, President Jose Sarney has written collections of poetry and short stories, some of which have been translated into English, Spanish, French and Russian.

Sarney has called his election to the prestigious Brazilian Academy of Letters "the greatest moment of pure happiness in my life."

The list of distinguished Latin American writers and artists who have sought public office or influenced public policy through their political activism is long.

Chile's most famed literary figure, the poet Pablo Neruda, winner of the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1971, was the Chilean Communist Party's candidate for president in 1970. But he withdrew to give his support to a coalition candidate, Salvador Allende, a Marxist who went on to win and was overthrown in a military coup three years later.

The region's best known writer, Colombia's Nobel Prize winner Gabriel Garcia Marquez, is a vigorous defender of Fidel Castro's Cuba.

In Mexico the late world-renowned muralists David Alfaro Siqueiros and Diego Rivera were leading members of the Mexican Communist Party.

Mexico's poet and essayist Octavio Paz and novelist Carlos Fuentes have both won the Miguel de Cervantes prize, the most important literary honor for Spanish-language writers, and are perennial candidates for the Nobel Prize. Both have served in the Mexican diplomatic service and have been outspoken in their political views.

Fuentes, currently a professor of literature at Harvard University, has been a strong critic of U.S. policy in Central America.

OCTAVIO PAZ, going against the current of leftist sympathy among Latin American intellectuals, says he has little use for Marxism. Mexico's leftist intellectuals say they have little use for Paz.

Although he never served in public office, Argentina's most distinguished writer, Jorge Luis Borges, was known not for what he did in the political arena but what he wrote and said about it. He frequently expressed his scorn for elected governments in Argentina and other Latin American nations.

"You Americans are worthy of democracy, but we are not," Borges said in an interview before his death last year. "In this country we always find some rascal to vote for."

Nicaragua's leading poet is the Rev. Ernesto Cardenal, a Roman Catholic priest who served for years as culture minister in the leftist Sandinista government. An immediately recognizable figure for his black beret, Cardenal has been criticized for using his international prestige to defend the regime.

But Vice President Sergio Ramirez of Nicaragua, who just published his third novel, is considered the most influential intellectual within the Sandinista government.

The Venezuelan writer Carlos Rangel has sharply criticized the role of intellectuals in Latin American public life in a controversial book, "From the Good Savage to the Good Revolutionary."

"The quality of work of these writers or their academic distinction is often mediocre," he wrote. "Many of them have achieved prominence because they were born into undemanding societies."

Rangel excepted from his criticism a handful of distinguished writers, among them Vargas Llosa.

Vargas Llosa has unleashed his own criticism of intellectuals in politics, whom he accuses of irresponsibly urging violent revolution in Peru.

"Many young men are killing and dying because of what they have been taught by intellectuals, many of whom today are at American universities, living off the imperialism they condemned," he said.

Foreign debt forces Mexico to make difficult choices

MEXICO CITY (AP) — If you had to sacrifice your children's education to pay for a loan, then you would begin to get an idea of the burden the foreign debt places on countries like Mexico, according to government economists here.

"This is the most urgent problem that President Carlos Salinas de Gortari will face," said a Salinas adviser, 14 days before the new president begins a six-year term.

Those close to Salinas privately say he will be very emphatic on his demand to improve debt servicing terms and possibly reduce the principal of Mexico's $102 billion debt. Salinas' goal, according to a working document prepared by advisers for his first months in office, "is to get Mexico to grow at an annual rate of five percent."

Hamstrung by the foreign debt payment demands, Mexico's rate of growth has been practically zero over the past six years, and the economy actually will shrink by one percent this year.

The first person to hear Salinas' arguments for debt restructuring will be President-elect George Bush, whom Salinas will meet Tuesday in Houston. It is an indication of Salinas' concern that he is bringing his top economic advisers to the 3-hour meeting.

Think tank backs economic growth

MEXICO CITY (AP) — The social well-being of the Mexican people will be a basic government goal when Carlos Salinas de Gortari takes office Dec. 1, a study by the ruling Institutional Revolutionary Party's think tank said.

"The sacrifice of the last few years cannot continue: stagnation and recession are not the future of Mexico," the study by the PRI's Institute of Political, Economic and Social Studies released Friday said.

In setting a return to economic growth as a priority, the report also urged the Salinas administration to renegotiate the country's $102 billion foreign debt.

Flag-waving Serbs rally for greater control over Yugoslavian province

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia (AP) — Hundreds of thousands of flag-waving Serbs rallied Saturday for greater control over the troubled province of Kosovo, while their opponents thronged the provincial capital in a rally of their own.

Helmeted riot police closed all roads leading into Kosovo's capital, Pristina, Saturday to keep ethnic Albanians from converging on the city. Protesters, who numbered at least 20,000, had mostly dispersed by midnight, said police officers speaking on condition of anonymity.

The police actions, later reported on Belgrade television, followed a warning on the state news agency Tanjug that "extraordinary measures could be taken" if the crowds in Pristina, 250 miles south of Belgrade, did not disperse.

It was the third straight day of street protests in Pristina triggered by the forced resignations of two ethnic Albanian Communist leaders.

However, Kosovo's acting party president told reporters later Saturday the Communist leadership had decided to use "exclusively political measures" to ease the tension and held out the possibility that the resignations would be reviewed.

"Should it be determined that mistakes were committed in carrying this out, they (the resignations) will be annulled," Party President Remzi Koljgeci told reporters.

The mostly young crowds had earlier ignored several warnings from local Communist party leaders to leave. Tanjug and Kosovo's Communist leadership said the situation worsened "from hour to hour."

Serbia's Communist Party leader, Slobodan Milosevic, claimed Saturday's rally in Belgrade was the largest in Yugoslavia's post World War II history. The crowd chanted in support.

Serbia's drive for change in Kosovo "is a process that nobody will be able to stop any longer by any force," Milosevic told the crowd.

"We enter this battle as we enter all battles — to win," he added, recalling Serbia's defeats of German armies in World War I and World War II.

Trouble erupted in Kosovo Thursday when two ethnic Albanian Communist leaders, Azem Vlasi and Kacusa Jasari, were forced to resign under pressure from Milosevic.

About 15,000 workers and students rallied in a Pristina sports hall and later joined a swelling crowd of tens of thousands outside the local Communist Party headquarters.

"We have given our word that we shall lay down our lives for Kosovo!" cried the fist-shaking, flag-waving masses, contradicting Milosevic's claims that the province's ethnic Albanian leaders had no popular support.

High-level officials from the national Communist Party were dispatched from Belgrade to the southern region bordering Albania.

But the crowds demanded a visit from Stipe Suvar, leader of the national Communist Party. He is widely perceived to oppose Milosevic's populist methods.

Tanjug reported local security officials held an emergency meeting attended by Vlasi.

Remzi Koljgeci, acting head of Kosovo's Communist Party, said the situation in Pristina was more complicated than on Friday, when an estimated 70,000 ethnic Albanians roamed the city for hours.

The simmering tension between the ethnic Albanian majority in Kosovo and the province's Serb and Montenegrin minorities erupted in violence in 1981, when nine people died in clashes between police and Albanians demanding more independence from Serbia.

Martial law was then briefly imposed in Kosovo, which is administratively part of Serbia, the largest of Yugoslavia's six republics.

The 1974 constitution granted broad autonomy to Kosovo, an ancient Serbian heartland where ethnic Albanians now form 90 percent of the population.

Milosevic wants the constitution changed to give Serbia more control over the province's security, educational and judicial systems.

He argues this would protect the Slav minority there from alleged harassment by the ethnic Albanians.

Saturday's rally in Belgrade, postponed three times out of apparent fear it would drive ethnic tension out of control, was billed as the high point of Milosevic's campaign.

Hailed by his supporters as a strong leader and heir to the late President Tito, Milosevic is feared by non-Serb Communist leaders who dislike his populist style and worry his drive for more control in Kosovo will increase the Serbian say in national affairs.

Organizers estimated 1.3 million people attended the rally on the banks of the Sava River. Milosevic asserted it was the biggest gathering since hundreds of thousands poured onto Belgrade streets to celebrate liberation from the Nazis in 1944.

U.S. delegate walks out of OAS panel session

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador (AP) — An Organization of American States committee approved a proposal to provide more diplomatic rights to Latin ambassadors of the Washington-based organization. The U.S. delegate abstained.

Richard T. McCormack walked out of an OAS committee session after clashing over the resolution Friday with Carlos Tunnerman, Nicaragua's ambassador to the OAS. Diplomats viewed the resolution as a product of Tunnerman's expulsion from the United States in July.

Tunnerman was Nicaragua's ambassador to the United States when he and seven other Nicaraguan diplomats were expelled from Washington in retaliation for Nicaragua's expulsion of U.S. Ambassador Richard Melton and seven U.S. diplomats.

Nicaragua at the time claimed Melton was working to destabilize the leftist government, a charge denied by Melton.

The resolution approved Friday calls for study of amendments to agreements between the OAS and the United States to provide more diplomatic rights for Latin American representatives to the 31-member OAS.

The full OAS General Assembly meets later to approve all committee resolutions.

South Korean rioters battle police, call for ex-president's execution

A radical student hurls a firebomb at riot police Saturday in a street action in Seoul, South Korea.

SEOUL, South Korea (AP) — Thousands of protesters calling for the arrest and execution of former President Chun Doo-hwan battled police Saturday with firebombs and rocks as they marched through Seoul.

Riot police fired tear gas and blocked streets to stop students, workers and dissidents from marching on City Hall to demand punishment of the former president for alleged corruption and human rights abuses.

"Execute Chun Doo-hwan! Overthrow (President) Roh Tae-woo!" columns of marchers shouted as they paraded through the city center after nightfall. "Return stolen wealth to the people!" they yelled.

Police armored vans fired volleys of choking tear gas into the ranks of the marchers to stop them from advancing on City Hall. Students hurled firebombs and rocks at police in clashes that swirled through the city center.

Yonhap, the South Korean news agency, estimated about 12,000 people took part in the protests. Hankook Ilbo, a leading Seoul newspaper, estimated the number of protesters at 20,000.

Smaller, peaceful protests involving at least 6,000 people were reported in the provincial cities of Chongju, Kwangju, Taegu, Chonju and Pusan.

Dissident groups had called for nationwide protests Saturday to demand Chun's arrest for alleged abuses under his authoritarian government. Protest leaders also called for the overthrow of President Roh, contending he is a front for continued military rule.

The Roh government is trying to defuse public anger against Chun, a former general, without being implicated in the furor. Roh, also a former general, was a close associate of Chun.

Violence erupted in Seoul when riot police blocked about 5,000 people from marching to Chun's home after they held a rally at Daehak-ro in central Seoul. Protesters tried to force their way through police blocking the road, and troopers responded with tear gas grenades.

WORLD IN BRIEF

Khomeini rejected Carter letter, Iranian radio says

NICOSIA, Cyprus (AP) — Iranian radio said Saturday that former President Jimmy Carter wrote to Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini offering to serve as a "neutral American channel" in efforts to free U.S. hostages in Lebanon and improve U.S.-Iranian ties.

Khomeini rejected the offer, Tehran Radio said.

Carter issued a statement in Atlanta confirming he wrote a letter to Khomeini but saying it was in response to an initiative from Iran.

According to the radio report, monitored in Nicosia, Khomeini issued a statement denying any connection between Iran and the hostages in Lebanon. "Just as I have said before, the relationship of Iran and the United States is like the relationship of the wolf and the lamb, and between these two there can never be reconciliation," the statement said.

The radio quoted Carter's letter as saying, "I hope that the American hostages in Lebanon can be released as soon as possible; this act would remove one of the main hurdles in the re-establishment of friendly relations between Iran and the U.S."

Conservatives lead in poll

TORONTO (AP) — The Progressive Conservative Party is back in the lead and could win the parliamentary majority needed for the free trade agreement with the United States to proceed, according to a Gallup Poll published Saturday.

The poll showed Prime Minister Brian Mulroney's Conservatives with 40 percent, the Liberal Party led by John Turner with 35 percent and the socialist New Democratic Party led by Ed Broadbent with 22 percent.

It said such an outcome in Monday's election could translate into 162 seats for the Conservatives in the newly expanded, 295-seat House of Commons, 14 more than needed for a majority.

The poll published by the Toronto Star said the Liberals would have 97 seats and the New Democrats 36.

Estonian proposal rejected

MOSCOW (AP) — A parliamentary committee Saturday found Estonia's bid for sovereignty at odds with the Soviet Constitution, but activists in another Baltic republic demanded their leaders approve similar autonomy.

In New Delhi, where he was on an official visit, Soviet President Mikhail S. Gorbachev said some Estonians were acting too emotionally but that the tense, formerly independent Baltic republics would settle down.

"What is happening in Estonia is perestroika," Gorbachev said.

A commission of the national Supreme Soviet ruled that an amendment to the Estonian Constitution ran counter to the supreme national law, according to the official Tass news agency.

The amendment, passed Wednesday, requires any new Soviet law be ratified by Estonia.

Effort to name school for Bush organized

By JANE MARLER DEES
Staff Writer

A Midland attorney is organizing a bi-partisan group to lobby the school district to name a new primary school after the city's most famous ex-resident.

Charles W. "Bro" Seltzer, also chairman of the Midland County Republican Party, said Friday he will ask Midland Independent School Trustees at the next board meeting to suspend a rule that could preclude officials from naming the facility after President-elect George Bush.

"I think it's a terribly appropriate thing for the community to do," Seltzer said, alluding to the fact Midland may never have another chance like this.

Seltzer said he thought the school should be named after Bush — who lived here for 10 years while starting a career in the oil business — for a number of reasons.

One of Bush's campaign platforms centered around his desire to be known as the "education" president, while Barbara Bush's chief crusade, she has said, will be ridding the country of illiteracy.

In addition, Bush was active while in Midland in child-oriented community endeavors centering such as his tenure as a little league baseball coach and as a founding director of Midland's YMCA, Seltzer continued.

School district communication coordinator Ted Miller said the board of trustees will appoint a committee at the next meeting, slated for Nov. 29, to study possible names for the new primary school to be built in northwest Midland.

School board policy states that education facilities must be named after someone deceased.

In the case of Santa Rita Elementary, the rule was not broken, Miller said, because Santa Rita #1, the legendary Texon gusher, is an inanimate object named after a saint.

From Staff Reports

A trio of lawmen, representing the Department of Public Safety, the Midland Police Department and the Midland County Sheriff's Department, were honored this week for their work by a non-profit Midland organization.

Ronnie B. Watson, an agent with the Midland DPS Criminal Intelligence Service (CIS), police Detective Sgt. B.G. Johnson, and Sheriff Gary Painter were honored at the 200 Club's annual Law Enforcement Appreciation Banquet held Thursday at the Holiday Inn Country Villa.

Watson, an Odessa High School graduate, was honored for his work on the David Dowler poisoning case, according to John Omohundro, director of security for Claydesta Corporation and director of the 200 Club.

Watson earned a bachelors degree in criminal justice from Sul Ross State University and entered the DPS academy in 1970. He served in the U.S. Army Military Police until his discharge in 1972 and was assigned to Highway Patrol until 1978. He worked in the License and Weight service until January 1984, when he was promoted to CIS in Midland.

Man shot in break-in free on bond

By FRANK TROMBLEY
Staff Writer

ODESSA — A 28-year-old man shot after allegedly breaking into the home of former City Planning Director Judy Miller was freed from the Ector County jail Friday after posting a $10,000 bond.

Lucio Orozco Armendariz, Route 6, Box 95, Odessa, was formally arraigned before Municipal Judge J.E. Weatherly Friday on a charge of burglary of a habitation after being released from Medical Center Hospital.

Armendariz was arrested Nov. 8 by U.S. Border Patrol officers and Presidio County Sheriff's deputies at the Marfa Border Patrol checkpoint on a warrant issued by Weatherly in connection with the Nov. 7 burglary of Ms. Miller's home. He was arraigned before a Presidio County peace justice who set bond on the burglary charge at $50,000.

Ms. Miller suffered a black eye and numerous bruises during a struggle with a burglar before subdued her, bound her hands and gagged her. She managed to free herself, grabbed a .38 caliber pistol and fire several shots at the man as he fled.

Armendariz was returned to Odessa after being arrested at the Marfa checkpoint and admitted to Medical Center Hospital for further treatment of gunshot wounds. Reports indicate he suffered wounds to the right shoulder, right hand and right hip.

According to police reports, this is the second time Ms. Miller has been the target of intruders in her home. Following a similar incident in August, she reportedly purchased the handgun she used to defend herself in the latest incident.

Armendariz was arrested as a result of an all points bulletin to area law enforcement agencies, doctor, hospitals and medical clinics to be on the lookout for a man who might seek treatment for gunshot wounds.

The burglary of Ms. Miller's home occurred slightly more than a week after she was fired as director of planning and inspection by City Manager Bill Brown. She is appealing her termination and has filed a complaint with the El Paso office of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission alleging sexual discrimination.

The Salvation Army's Dress a Live Doll Program has outfitted needy youngsters for the last 14 years. Individuals, as well as private businesses and church groups, are invited to participate in the program, which has clothed more than 4,500 children.

Dress-A-Live Doll program grew from little girls' story

By JULIE HILLRICHS
Staff Writer

They were little girls who had missed too much school. Between them, they shared one pair of shoes — and that's just what brought their teachers to the Salvation Army for assistance.

It's a story repeated often in the past 14 years, with minor variations, as the Salvation Army's Dress-A-Live Doll program provides the necessary helping hand.

Since the program began in 1974, Dress-A-Live Doll has helped clothe thousands of underprivileged Midland children in new dresses, coats, shoes and other attire each Christmas.

"This is one program in which every penny spent goes to benefit a needy individual," Norma Webb, project chairman, said. "Actually I think it's one of the better things I do."

Dress-A-Live Doll provides each child with a complete wardrobe, including shoes, socks, pajamas, underwear, shirts, sweaters, dresses and a coat, Ms. Webb said.

The names of the needy children are submitted to the Salvation Army by Midland school teachers. A caseworker from the Salvation Army then visits the family to verify the need and to obtain clothing sizes.

All children within the family, from birth to 12 years of age, are included in the program, Ms. Webb said.

A letter bearing the first name of the child and his or her clothing size is given to volunteer donors, who then purchase and gift wrap the ensemble.

"I know of three women who always participate. They pick one day out of the year to do the shopping and then they go to one of the houses and wrap all of the gifts," Ms. Webb.

Sponsorship of the live dolls is not limited to individuals. Churches, groups of friends, business associates and organizations also participate.

"What we are encouraging is that people go in with a friend, Sunday school class or coworker. I know of one family with three sons, who went out and clothed three little girls," Ms. Webb said.

The cost of dressing a live doll averages about $100, but donors can spend more or less if they choose. Participating merchants — offering discounts from 10 to 40 percent — have lessened the cost over the years to attract more donors.

Those participating merchants include Anthony's, Bealls, Dillards, Dunlaps, Sears Roebuck Co., J.C. Penney, Upstairs-Downstairs, Margaret's Maternity & Infants and Kids Kountry.

Sports medicine clinic opens in Midland

From Staff Reports

Both athletes and those suffering from other physical limitations are expected to benefit from a new sports medicine clinic that was dedicated before a small crowd Saturday.

The ribbon cutting ceremony was held at the Texas Institute of Sports Medicine at 2706 W. Cuthbert Ave. The facility will be directed by Dr. Jerry Cochran, who is associated with Physicans & Surgeons Hospital in Midland.

According to Dr. Cochran, the treatment of athletic injuries has changed a lot over the past six years.

Cochran said the institute will serve other community needs as well, including programs for asthmatics. "Even women with osteoporosis can find improvement with programs using judicial excercise."

The facility, which was in planning for more than a year, has two aerobic areas, an open weight room and third room designed for physical therapy programs.

Cochran, who sees a lot of out-of-state patients, says there's a great need for the clinic locally and the programs it has to offer.

Ron Boxmeyer, readjustment counselor at the Vet Center in Midland, stands in front of a listing of Americans who are missing-in-action in the Vietnam War. Boxmeyer and his staff not only work with Vietnam War-era veterans, but with veterans from earlier wars.

Center serves those still fighting war

By ED TODD
Staff Writer

For many veterans, the Vietnam War is still being waged. The turmoil is raging within them.

"The Vietnam War is not over yet," said Ron Boxmeyer, a Vietnam War veteran whose mission today is counseling veterans who are experiencing war-related problems. "It is still going on ... with the problems that the guys have. They are starting now to talk about it."

The problems the vets are dealing with range from nightmares about the war abroad and rejection at home to conflict within their marriages and with the Veterans Administration.

Boxmeyer and other counselors offer their services through Vet Center, a readjustment counseling service operated by the Veterans Administration for the 1964-1975 Vietnam War veterans. Boxmeyer, 45, was a U.S. Army officer-adviser to South Vietnamese soldiers from 1968 to 1969 — "just after the Tet Offensive when we started to lose the war."

Midland's Vet Center at 3404 W. Illinois Ave. is one of 194 similar nationwide centers where veterans who are willing to talk may discuss their problems — anger, rage, guilt, depression, disorders and vexations.

"The Vet Center continues to perpetuate the fact that the war has casualties" even today, Boxmeyer said.

The United States' Vietnam involvement, which dates back to the late 1940s, heightened in 1964, when the U.S. Congress passed the Tonkin Gulf Resolution. The measure allowed the President to take "necessary" military action to prevent "further aggression" by communist forces.

By the time America's direct military role in Vietnam ended in 1975, when South Vietnam surrendered to communist North Vietnam, the United States had sent 2.7 million troops. Nearly 58,000 Americans were killed and 365,000 were wounded. United States forces there rose from 60,000 in mid-1965 to more than 543,000 in 1969.

Upon their return in defeat, American warriors were not received with the welcome which their countrymen accorded the victorious World War I and World War II "heroes."

Many Americans who opposed their country's role in Vietnam criticized or ignored the returning veterans.

The United States had failed and lost a war.

Most veterans adjusted to civilian life. Others did not. Many suffered from divorce, drug abuse, and joblessness. Some fell into crimes. Others became post-war casualties by committing suicide.

Boxmeyer and his staff are on call to help the survivors in much of West Texas and New Mexico.

One survivors is a 39-year-old ex-Marine named Ed who served three tours of frontline duty in the late 1960s. After almost 20 years of nightmares followed by guilt, illness, and doubt, he finally sought counseling at the Vet Center.

"There's a lot of us that died," Ed reflected. "A lot of us die every day. You felt like if you survived it over there, you could really do something good when you came back to the States."

Then, he said sadly, "You realize that you should have stayed over there. It's something I've never gotten over. I feel like I should still be there."

The war was unresolved.

"WE DIDN'T win it," Ed said. "We just packed up and left."

VETERANS

Ed seemed grieved over his country's failure to appreciate its Vietnam War veterans.

"You come from just a hostile environment," Ed recalled of his flight home in 1969. "You are back in the United States. You don't have these bullets to dodge, land mines and booby traps — all this hostility around you," he said.

"It's like waking up from a bad dream that you can't ever wake up from," Ed said. "It's a nightmare I've lived since November of 1969 when I came home."

Recently, Ed noted, the United States' role in Vietnam is being acknowledged and treated sympathetically. Vietnam War is the subject of popular movies, such as "Platoon" and "Good Morning, Vietnam," and of books and documentaries.

"Now, it seems like it's everybody's big thing — to jump on the bandwagon, and say, 'I know a Vietnam vet.' It's great. It's getting better," said Ed.

For many ex-warriors, it never will get better.

"For a lot of these guys, it's too late," the ex-Marine said. "They got into drugs and got into booze as soon as they came back because of the rejection. They are already dead. They drank themselves to death or OD'ed on drugs. There has been massive amount of suicides over this Vietnam thing. It's terrible."

"That's 58,000 we lost in country (Vietnam)," Ed said. "We're still losing them everyday."

Ed said he trusts the counselors, including Boxmeyer, at the Vet Center. "Someone has been there (Vietnam). They can understand what you are going through," he said.

"Your wife won't listen. Your girl friend, mother, dad — they don't understand. They weren't there."

MANY VIETNAM vets were "labeled psychologically unsound," Ed said.

"They think you are crazy, and they think you have done all of these weird things. I know for a fact that my forefathers in World War I and World II committed some of the same 'war crimes' that we did in Vietnam. It was impossible not to. Yet, we were labeled the 'crazed people.' "

Ed said that some World War II "veterans suffer from the same problems I suffer from. They had just suppressed it even longer. It's just as bad for them."

Ed joined the Marine Corps at age 17 in 1966.

"I wasn't drafted," Ed said. "I joined, and it was with pride when I did it. I joined with every intention of going to Vietnam."

Ed volunteered for repeat tours to Vietnam. He doesn't know why.

"Any vet that was in heavy combat never expected to go home alive," he said. "Anybody that came back alive and was in heavy combat was damn lucky. You die a thousands times everyday."

Even now, he is visited by nightmares.

"You do so many things that you cannot resolve in your own mind whether they were right or wrong," Ed said.

But, as a warrior, he was following orders. "And you did. They train you from the day you go into the military" — to follow orders and to kill. "That's the whole point of war, anyway."

And when he returned from the war, Ed felt as if he had aged.

"You were 20 years in maturity beyond them," he said of men, such as college-age youths, who avoided the draft and who were critical of United States involvement in the war.

"Those kids were still out having sex in the back-seat of their cars, so to speak," Ed said. "You were above all that. It was a totally different atmosphere."

Ed's counselor's, Boxmeyer, said that the Vet Center offers the veteran confidentiality — "a safe place to talk about things. Some of them might not even be true." But he's not the judge of that, Boxmeyer acknowledged.

"We work with the whole families," he said. "If a veteran has post-traumatic stress, or war-neurosis, whatever you want to call it, or re-adjustment problems, the whole family is going to have problems, too."

Boxmeyer noted the warriors' return from the Vietnam War was "not the John Wayne image. Of course, John Wayne was never in a war," he said, though the actor starred in war movies.

"Vietnam grew out of the '60s," Boxmeyer said. "We got leery. We've got churches being questioned and government leaders being questioned. We've got Kennedy's assassination."

The young American warrior who fought in Vietnam was 17, 18 or 19 years old, Boxmeyer said.

"And he was still learning what to be when he grew up. And you put him in a war situation and you give him a gun, he had more power than the world with that gun. He could kill anybody he wanted. He was totally in control."

But if he survived the war and returned home, he often become a lost soul — a lost man.

"You take that kid with a gun that put him in charge, and you bring him back to San Francisco within 32 hours, and he's not even old enough to buy a glass of beer." And people no longer respect him. He's just another kid."

THE EX-WARRIOR is conflict.

"And he still has that idea that he's in charge and that he has power," Boxmeyer said. "It's hard for him to adjust."

Many adjusted smoothly.

"A lot of us, frankly, went out and got jobs and worked and never really thought about Vietnam," Boxmeyer said. "A lot of the other guys had drug and alcohol problems or were depressed."

Today, Boxmeyer noted, the shame that much of American citizenry had tried to place on the United States and warriors who fought in the Vietnam war seems to be fading.

The mood is changing.

"All of a sudden, Vietnam is everywhere you look," he said. "I think finally our country is beginning to deal with the issue that has been unresolved all of these years. The country did a lot of harm by ignoring the whole Vietnam issue; I wish it had been dealt with a long time ago."

City Council to consider issuing bonds

This week, Midland City Council will consider issuing $4.3 million in general obligation bonds to fund the purchase of Loraine Center.

The three story building — which will be used to house a centralized communications center and police department — was approved by voters Sept. 17 as part of a public safety bond package.

In connection with the sale, the council Tuesday also will discuss the selection of one of seven architects who are expected to make presentations Monday before the city's building committee.

City officials are convinced the $1.2 million asking price by the Prudential Insurance Co. is on the low end based on current real estate values. Also in connection with the purchase, the council is expected to pass a resolution appropriating remaining 1982 fire bond funds to the building project.

In other business, council is expected to:

- Consider a contract for reconstruction of a portion of Midland Drive.
- Execute and agreement between the city and the Midland Arts Assembly to use hotel/motel occupany tax revenues to promote the arts.
- Authorize a study with Reed & Associates to conduct a water quality study on the city's T-Bar Ranch property.
- Consider an ordinance that would authorize a change in water rates.
- Discuss a contract involving the city's cable television franchise.
- Authorize the establishment of a landscaping project at Midland International Airport.

Poor training blamed for school deaths

DALLAS (AP) — A court-ordered review of the deaths of 16 Denton State School residents found ignorance of proper medical and management procedures contributed to poor care for them, but blames no one for the deaths.

The review released Friday is the latest legal wrangle in a lawsuit filed in 1974 over the care provided the mentally retarded in state schools. U.S. District Judge Barefoot Sanders found the state guilty of contempt and violating parents' constitutional rights after an eight-day trial last year about conditions at a Fort Worth state school.

But a day before Sanders passed sentence, the state signed an agreement to improve conditions at the Fort Worth school.

Dr. Renee Wachtel of the University of Maryland School of Medicine, who conducted the review of the Denton school, recommended better monitoring of patients, more training of medical professionals and more-complete investigations of future deaths, The Dallas Morning News reported.

"I feel all of the problems that I found are not due to willfull provision for care but rather stem from lack of knowledge," Ms. Wachtel concluded in her report.

But David Fergler, a Philadelphia attorney representing parents of mentally retarded children who sued the state said, "I read the 24 points as 24 contributing factors to people dying.

"It's just outrageous. If Denton State School were a community medical hospital, it would be closed down overnight," he told the Dallas Times Herald.

Dr. Jerry Vincent, superintendent at Denton, said in a statement that the number of deaths at Denton last year was only one greater than the national average for such facilities of similar size and the population at Denton was at high risk for life-threatening disases.

Vincent's satement also said that Ms. Wachtel's recommendations were already being implemented under an agreement signed last year.

The deaths investigated by Ms. Wachtel included a 38-year-old woman who died last November after swallowing dozens of cigarette butts.

The investigation of medical care in Denton was ordered by Sanders in August after the number of deaths in that facility increased after the agreement to improve conditions was signed.

The order that Sanders issued Friday does not command any immedaite action but "looks to (newly hired specialist) Dr. (David) Levy and TDMHMR to study and implement the recommendations in the review."

"That's what were going to do," said Jaylon Fincannon, deputy commissioner for the Texas Department of Mental Health and Mental Retardation.

Ms. Wachtel found 24 problem areas and made 13 recommendations including:

- Improper and insufficient use of antibiotics
- The discharge of patients from the hopital while they were "still in respiratory distress (and) ... needing oxygen."
- Improper feeding. When patients are unable to eat normally because of illness, "there is little consideration for alternative methods of providing calories and protein and inadequate attention to danger signals of weight loss."
- The fact that only two of the doctors on staff are trained in cardiopulmonary resuscitation.
- "Inadequate investigation into incidents that lead to death."

Persons interested in dressing a live doll should call the Salvation Army office at 683-3614 before Dec. 5. Anonymity for all parties is assured, Ms. Webb said.

All clothing should be gift wrapped in several boxes, tagged with the child's identity number and placed in a large plastic bag. The gifts must be delivered to the Salvation Army office, 300 S. Baird St., by Dec. 19.

Since the Midland program began, more than 4,500 needy children have been clothed. The need this year is greater than it has ever been because of the economic conditions of the community, Ms. Webb said.

LETTER FROM COLLEGE

MC closes Wednesday evening for short Thanksgiving holiday

By H.A. TUCK

EDUCATION

All the college facilities will be closed from 5 p.m. Wednesday through the weekend for the Thanksgiving holiday. Classes resume at 8 a.m. Monday for the stretch drive to the end of the semester.

Students have just two weeks of classes after Thanksgiving, followed by a week of final exams.

Tuck

We haven't said anything about early registration for the spring semester. But that's not an oversight. Only current students and those who have been here as credit students during the past two years have been registering for spring classes.

First time students will be registered in January, but we'll be letting you know the schedule on that later.

Spring course bulletins are available now, so prospective students can get a copies and plan what they want to take during the coming semester. Bulletins may be obtained at the Student Services Office in the Administration Building, at all Midland banks, or the Midland Chamber of Commerce office.

Monday at 10:15 a.m. the winner of the first annual Hilda Simmons Levitt Poetry Award will be announced. The ceremony takes place in the Health Sciences Building lecture hall. The winner receives a $500 cash award, plus a plaque. One other entry will be chosen for the second prize of $200 cash and a plaque. The award was established by Stanley Levitt in honor of his late wife, who had taken numerous classes at Midland College.

• • •

A commercial music concert is scheduled for 7:30 p.m. Tuesday in the Allison Fine Arts Building auditorium. This is a final exam-type project for the commercial music students. They'll be handling all the staging, sound and lighting equipment, as well as the music performances. Included will be pop, country-western, and Top 40 tunes.

There's no charge and the public is invited to attend. Jerry Tubb is instructor for the commercial music program.

While most of the students will be heading for family dinners, or toward hoped-for snow on the ski slopes, the Chaparral basketball team goes to Great Bend, Kansas, for the Barton County Coca Cola-McDonald's Thanksgiving Tournament.

Action begins on Wednesday with two games (Northeastern Colorado and Northern Oklahoma at 6 p.m. and Barton County vs. Carl Albert, Okla., at 8 p.m.), but the Chaps aren't involved until Thursday evening, when they play Murray State, Okla., at 8 p.m. Northeast Nebraska and Allen County, Kan., meet at 6 p.m. Games Friday and Saturday are at 2, 4, 6, and 8 p.m.

Next home game for the Chaps is Dec. 1 against the Howard College Hawks from Big Spring. Then South Plains College comes to Chap Center for a game on Dec. 5. Both games begin at 7:30 p.m.

• • •

Even though the Chaps won't be in town, there's going to be plenty of basketball action at Chap Center this week. Highlighting the action is the annual Tall City High School Boys Tournament Friday and Saturday.

Action begins Friday with games at 2, 4, 6, and 8 p.m. On Saturday, play begins at 8:30 a.m. and continues until the championship game at 8 p.m.

But wait, there's more! Monday has a unique triple-header with the Stanton girls taking on Lee High with the J. V. game at 4:30 p.m. and the varsity contest and 8 p.m. Sandwiched between those two is Stanton against the Midland High boys, with a 6:15 p.m. starting time.

• • •

We just got information about a number of mini-semester classes that are starting Nov. 28 and ending Dec. 16. All are three-hour credit courses, except for one, that will meet from 2-5 p.m. Monday through Friday for three weeks.

Courses being offered at the mini-semester are: Economics 2302, Principles of Economics II; English 2302, Masterpieces of the Western World; Legal Assistant 2211, Legal Research; Government 2302, State and Federal Government; Sociology 2301, Introduction to Sociology; and Phychology 2301, Introduction to Psychology.

Cost of tuition and fees will be $69 for in-district, $75 for out-of-district, and $219 for either out-of-state or aliens residents.

Parking isn't included.

Registration will be only at 2 p.m. Nov. 28, in the Allison Fine Arts Building auditorium.

For more information, you can contact the Student Services Office, Administration Building.

• • •

There's not a single short course starting this week! That's a rarity, of course. In fact the only Continuing Education class starting the remainder of the fall term is Multi-Engine Ground Training, which begins Nov. 29 and continues for two weeks. It meets from 7-9 p.m. on Tuesday and Thursday. Fee is $25.

You can enroll by visiting the Continuing Education Office in the Administration Building. More information is available by calling 685-4518.

The Sunday afternoon field hockey practices have been moved from the campus to Fannin Elmentary, Cimmaron and Mogford. Instruction and equipment are furnished. The 2 p.m. session is both for beginners and those who understand the game.

H.A. Tuck is public relations director at Midland College.

MC vocal concert features songs from contemporary to classical

From Staff Reports

A program ranging from classical to pop is planned by Midland College's vocal department for its fall concert Dec. 2.

The MC Chorale and Chamber Singers will be joined by the department's newest performing group, the Jazz Singers. The performance is scheduled for 8 p.m. in the Allison Fine Arts Building auditorium. Admission is free.

The Jazz Singers combine vocal presentations with choreographed dance movements for an exciting visual show.

Composers whose works are being presented include Brahms, Halsey Stevens, Palestrina, Copeland, and Haydn.

Dr. Michael Jordan, the college's coordinator of vocal music, directs the various vocal ensembles.

Bush ethics code offers fresh start

President-elect George Bush made a promise early in his campaign that if elected he would strengthen ethical standards. Now Bush has taken a step to do exactly that, turning a campaign pledge at least into the start toward much-needed reality.

Bush has indicated that members of his transition team will be required to abide by a code of conduct that will become a model for his entire admininistration. That is a step in the right direction, particularly in light of the fact that literally scores of officials and employes of the Reagan administration have faced either disciplinary or legal action for a host of illegal or unethical acts.

Although Robert Teeter, co-director of the Bush transition team, has been quoted as saying, "We want to send a message to the public ... that they can have full confidence in the people he hires to do the public's business for him," there was no question that Bush has to do more than make unfulfilled promises to beef-up ethical standards for his administration. With the ethical and legal "cloud" from the Reagan administration threatening to be left behind when Reagan leaves office in January, Bush needs to make it clear that he is going to start the next four years with a clear slate and a new ethical guideline. From all appearances, the code he's adopted for his transition team should achieve that result.

Early reports have indicated that the code will:

- Bar all transition employees and volunteers from both disclosing information and using inside information for private gain.
- Require employees to disqualify from transition matters which could conflict or appear to conflict with personal financial interests.
- Bar misuse of federal property.
- Require employees to ask the transition organization's legal counsel for advice if questions arise.

Bush also is requiring his transition workers to disclose personal financial information, as well as associations which could prove an embarrassment to him.

Michael Dukakis, Bush's Democratic opponent in the presidential race, had kept the pressure on Bush regarding ethical matters during the Reagan years and, now, Bush is showing that he recognizes the question of ethics is going to play an important role in his early months in office.

It's reassuring to see Bush giving ethics such a high priority. His new ethics code is the kind of follow-through on a campaign pledge that will give the American people the confidence they need in the new administration.

Another View:

The market warning

The dollar's quick drop — despite yesterday's (Nov. 14) rebound — and the stock market's slide tell Vice President Bush that his plan for reducing the budget deficit isn't credible. Nervous investors want quick and plausible reassurance. The presidential transition period lasts 11 weeks. President-elect Bush doesn't have that long.

It's too much to expect Mr. Bush to reverse overnight his firm campaign pledges not to increase taxes. But he could begin to think about and signal policy modifications that, at least at the margins, might raise needed revenue. And, as he recently promised to do, he should start negotiating promptly with Congress.

He has already had to douse one outbreak of market jitters. Yesterday on a beach in Florida he declared that, contrary to suggestions by one of his advisers, the Bush administration does not want the dollar to decline. He is also expected to fill his top economic policy slots this week with pragmatists like Nicholas Brady for the Treasury and perhaps Richard Darman as budget director. These two men are not frozen to rigid policy positions. That's good, but not enough.

Mr. Bush's problem is what he said and didn't say about the budget deficit during the campaign. The financial community doesn't share his view that the U.S. will simply grow enough to wipe out the deficit without higher taxes. The markets obviously view as inadequate his vague proposal for a "flexible freeze" on spending, but no lid on Social Security, and his adamant "read my lips — no new taxes." The latest official estimate of the 1990 deficit is $132 billion — $32 billion more than the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings budget law allows. And if recent years are any guide, it will get worse rapidly.

Normally the world might not learn what Mr. Bush plans until March, when he presents his budget for fiscal 1990, which begins Oct. 1, 1989. President Reagan must submit his budget for the same fiscal year in January. The last budget of a departing president is wishful fantasy, since he won't be around. So why waste time and effort on it?

It would make sense to let Bush nominees have a meaningful say in preparation of important parts of the Reagan budget. Or scrap that budget, send Congress a brief summary statement and let the Office of Management and Budget begin working on assumptions and goals set by Mr. Bush. Since both men come from the same party, there's a rare opening for real cooperation.

There is still another responsible move for Mr. Bush: Make use of the National Economic Commission, starting with serious appointees to the two seats that have been left open for the president-elect to fill. The bipartisan commission was created by law to devise a mutually acceptable deficit reduction plan. Mr. Bush has said that if it recommends higher taxes, he will ignore it. But it makes little sense to brush it off in advance, or downgrade it with token appointees.

Mr. Bush has already had his first warning from the financial markets. He shouldn't wait for a stronger one.

JACK ANDERSON

Indian tribes on war path — to court

WASHINGTON — For three decades, the Indians of the Hoopa Valley Reservation in Northern California have been locked in combat — not hand-to-hand, but lawyer-to-lawyer.

Jack Anderson

Their bickering can be traced to a muddled federal government trying to atone for the mistakes of history.

In the closing days of the congressional session, members of Congress fell over themselves to settle the dispute once and for all. In their haste, they promised the Indians a $15-million taxpayer bailout and unwittingly voted to offer the Indians a chunk of the prized forest in Redwood National Park to make everyone happy. Environmentalists cried foul and the redwoods were taken off the bargaining table. But the taxpayer subsidy and a settlement that may not settle anything were quietly signed into law by President Reagan this month.

The schism dates back to 1864 when Congress decreed that California should have only four Indian reservations. The onerous plan was to round up all of the Indians in the state and put them on those four reservations. The Hoopa Valley Reservation was one of the four, but not all of the Indians who eventually settled there were Hoopas. There are bits and pieces of 11 tribes calling it home today — the largest in number being Yurok, whose own reservation along the Klamath River was added to the Hoopa Reservation in 1891.

No one much cared who owned what until 1955 when the reservation began selling valuable timber — most of it on land that the Hoopas had lived on for centuries. A group of Yuroks sued saying they had just as much right as the Hoopas to the bounties of a reservation that the federal government put them on. A federal judge agreed and since 1975, courts have been trying to define who the tribal members are. The mess has been before 13 federal judges in all.

Fed up with the fighting, Rep. Doug Bosco, D-Calif., and Sen. Alan Cranston, D-Calif., sponsored the legislation this year to settle it once and for all. But the settlement has prompted threats of more lawsuits.

Congress will split the reservation, giving 90,000 acres to the 1,700 Hoopas, and 3,600 acres to the 3,500 Yuroks. After the split, the Hoopas will have the timber rich part of the reservation which, by some accounts, yields $3 million to $5 million a year. The Yurok share has little timber, and the fishing business on their land earned a mere $185,000 last year.

To keep the Yuroks from feeling shortchanged, Congress gave them some choices. Yuroks can join the Hoopa tribe if they qualify. (Attorneys for the Yuroks say only about 30 meet the qualifications.) Or, they can remain as Yuroks and get a lump sum payment of $5,000 each for the young people and $7,500 each for the seniors. (Their attorneys call this a "bribe.") Or they can renounce all tribal rights to the reservation and walk away with $15,000 each.

The last option is the most distasteful for some of the Yuroks who say it smacks of "termination." Last spring, Congress outlawed the federal government's ability to pay Indians in exchange for renouncing all their tribal rights. At that time Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, chairman of the Select Committee on Indian Affairs, said: "Termination was a doomed policy from its inception primarily because it was both morally and legally indefensible."

The Yuroks are now wondering why that doesn't apply to them. Some are tired of the legal battles that have kept their money tied up in court. They want to take their $15,000 and be done with it.

The money for the cash settlements will come from a $65 million fund of accumulated timber revenues being held in escrow. Since that fund won't cover all the claims, Congress ordered the Interior Department to throw in $10 million in taxpayers' money. The unhappy Interior Department asked Reagan to veto the bill, but he wouldn't.

Interior officials also aren't too happy with a requirement in the law that they spend another $5 million buying more land to enlarge the Yurok reservation.

RUSSELL BAKER

These mini-series getting longer than life!

Human life expectancy gets longer and longer. At first glance this seems like good news. But hold it: human life expectancy is not the only thing getting longer and longer. So are television mini-series.

Russell Baker

Well, you may say, it only proves that Parkinson's Law also fits human life: the entertainment expands to fit the time. The fact is rather more alarming. It is this: The length of mini-series is increasing much faster than human life expectancy!

In fact, the rate at which the lengthening of TV mini-series is outpacing the gain in life expectancy suggests a horrific possibility: to wit, that by the middle of the next century television may be producing mini-series that last longer than the human life span.

Imagine a world in which, after infancy's vision clears, you start watching a mini-series so long that you will not know how it comes out until your grandchildren start arriving in Paradise.

Preposterous, you say? Not at all. Let's examine the datum right before our eyes. It is a mini-series called "War and Remembrance," which will last 30 hours. The first 18-hour installment began Sunday and will continue into next week.

"War and Remembrance" is a fictionalized reconstruction of World War II. To grasp the sinister import of this business, consider a comparable entertainment of 50 years ago — a fictionalized reconstruction of the Civil War titled "Gone With the Wind."

"Gone With the Wind" lasted nearly three and three-quarters hours. It was famous for what was at that time incredible length. Almost four hours long! Yet it took "War and Remembrance" three hours Sunday night simply to get the plot under way. A length that seemed incredible in 1939 is now a trifle, like the throwaway time banquets allot for introductions of distinguished guests and the speaker's opening jokes.

When "War and Remembrance" finished clearing its throat, so to speak, it still had 15 hours to run before intermission, which will last until spring. After that, the second half will run another 12 hours.

Consider: In 1939 a fictionalized reconstruction of a major war could be viewed in 220 minutes; it now requires 1,800 minutes, or eight times as long as it did just 50 years ago.

We needn't get into the mathematics of rising life expectancy to see that it can't possibly keep up with the galloping length of mini-series. We are just not living eight times as long as we did in 1939, are we?

What's the explanation? In a mere 50 years we seem to have evolved an American who needs eight times as much entertainment as the 1939 model. Is it because the 1988 model is eight times as bored as the 1939 American? Or only one-eighth as energetic?

When "Gone With the Wind" first appeared, the first people to see it were closely interrogated. Was it really possible to sit doing nothing but watching a film all that time?

Now we seem able to sit through almost infinite hours watching stuff far inferior to "Gone With the Wind." I don't mean "War and Remembrance," either, anything with Robert Mitchum is worth a long, long stare, in my book. But the three-game football day is now a commonplace, and the average single football game — just one — now lasts longer than the Los Angeles rush hour.

So we have all this added life expectancy, but not the energy to take advantage of it. The sad conclusion is obvious: Increasing life expectancy takes all the snap, crackle, and energy out of Americans and leaves them sluggish, flabby-spirited and disposed to drag out everything eight times as long as necessary.

The recent political campaign was conclusive evidence that we don't know what to do with all the wonderful additional life that's being lavished upon us. Imagine a whole country putting up with a campaign eight times as long and eight times as vacuous as it had to be.

It's as though, enriched with extra years of life, the only thing we can think to do with it is bring all the old things around one more time, only this time making them last eight times as long.

The further we get from "Gone With the Wind" and World War II, the more remarkable it seems that we got them both finished so fast.

What remained of our fleet after Pearl Harbor was patched up and sent into the Battle of Midway in what now seems like a matter of hours. At the rate Pentagon jobs move nowadays, the work would have taken four years. World War II would have lasted eight times as long, ending in 1974, probably not in an American victory.

GEORGE F. WILL

PLO plan has trademark of 'final solution'

WASHINGTON — The Palestine Liberation Organization's wit, like the rarest wine in the cellar, is saved for special occasions, such as the Algiers conference. There Abul Abbas, planner of the Achille Lauro hijacking, said this about Leon Klinghoffer, the American shot in his wheelchair and dumped overboard: "Maybe he was trying to swim for it."

George F. Will

Abbas, the convicted murderer and member of the PLO executive committee, said that with a half-smile, thereby embarrassing the PLO, which is conducting a peace charade. It is having some success. Thus last week ABC's evening news said: "We begin tonight with a landmark decision in the Middle East. The Palestine National Council, which is in essence the Palestinian parliament in exile, has formally declared that Israel has a legitimate right to exist." That report was wrong.

More circumspect reports said the PLO "hints at" (New York Times) or "implies" (Washington Post) recognition of Israel, but even they erred. The Algiers decision, far from being a departure from the PLO's "rejectionist" stance regarding Israel, is designed to advance an explicit strategy of destruction.

The PLO has long been divided about how to pursue liquidation of Israel. One faction has simply favored terrorism leading to war. But so-called "moderates" argued for violence supplemented by diplomacy. They say force will work only after Israel has been shrunk to indefensible borders. This two-stage, two-state solution was affirmed in Algiers. It is peace as a tactic of war.

What flummoxed wishful-thinking Westerners was the PLO's dusty semi-approval of U.N. resolution 242, which endorses secure and recognized boundaries for "every state in the area." The PLO began with its standard misrepresentation of 242. It involves the missing definite article.

The resolution calls for withdrawal of Israel "from territory occupied" in 1967. The absence of "the" before the word "territory" expresses U.S. and Israeli insistence that 242 does not prejudge the final disposition of the West Bank, does not require restoration of the 1967 borders. The Algiers declaration says 242 requires withdrawal of Israel from "all Palestinian Arab territories occupied since 1967, including Arab Jerusalem."

More important, the PLO approves 242 only in the context of other U.N. resolutions "relevant to" Palestinian issues. Those resolutions have the cumulative effect of mandating Israel's destruction.

They include the 1975 resolution that characterized Zionism as racism and aimed at the de-legitimization of Israel. They include a demand for internationalization of Israel's capital, Jerusalem (which never has been the capital of an Arab or Moslem state). They include a demand for return to Syria of the Golan Heights from which aggression came in 1973.

They include partition plan 181 of 1947, under which Israel was to be three semi-triangles touching at the tips — without the Negev, without much of Galilee, even without the southern outskirts of Tel Aviv. (The Algiers declaration of an independent Palestinian state is based on 181, which the PLO charter has called "entirely illegal regardless of the passage of time." Israel attained its pre-1967 borders by winning the war launched by the Arabs when they rejected 181.)

The U.N. resolutions that condition PLO approval of 242 include the one affirming the "right of return" for Palestinians. That would strip Israel of an essential attribute of sovereignty, control of immigration.

The West's appeasement reflex confused people to identify dangerous men like Arafat as "moderates" who deserve encouragement lest "hawks" (in the Kremlin closet, in other Palestinian factions) supplant the supposedly embattled "moderates." So Arafat now says: Accept this plan or "I can always come back to our council and declare that moderation does not pay."

When Arafat soon seeks a visa to visit the United Nations — that author of so much mischief, where he once was applauded when he took a pistol to the podium — the U.S. government should say no. That decision will say that this government sees the extremism beneath the weasel-words and evasions.

Shortly before the Algiers meeting codified Arafat's thinking, he told Time magazine his thoughts: The United Nations, he said, has branded Israel a racist state and "we don't want a racist state in the area." In August, Abd al-Hamid Sayekh, chairman of the Palestine National Council, said the "interim solution" advances the goal of total control of Palestine. In September, Abu Ayad, Arafat's deputy, called the PLO initiative "a mechanism to implement the phased policy ratified in 1974" — the two-stage solution to the problem of Israel. In October, he said it implied no rejection of the PLO charter which vows destruction of Israel: "It is inconceivable that we will recognize the right of our enemy over any piece of territory on Palestinian soil."

There is a German word for the essence of the two-stage, two-state solution. It is Endloesung, meaning "final solution."

Nation's fascination with Kennedy years continues

Modisett

The fascination with the Kennedy years — the two years and 10 months he served as the nation's 35th president before being shot to death in Dallas — has endured for a quarter of a century. That fascination will continue, no doubt, because of the nature of his life and the tragedy of his death.

This year there's been more talk, more writing and more speculation about John F. Kennedy's time in office and his death than ever before. Part of it, of course, is due to the fact that Tuesday will mark the 25th anniversary of the day he was shot and killed — Nov. 22, 1963.

But there's another reason that every American recognizes, although perhaps subconciously. The Kennedy years — ostensibly 1960 through 1963 — were compelling ones for Americans. The nation was gripped by the issue of racial segregation, was coming into its own as a world power, was literally reaching for the stars, and was beginning to feel the stirrings of the environmental movement.

Today, two and a half decades later, some Americans will assert that we haven't come far at all in terms of progress on any of those fronts. To a degree, they're correct. America has still not resolved the race issue, the environment is demanding ever more our attention and concern and, yes, after the horror of the Challenger tragedy, we're only now beginning to reach for the stars, carefully, once again but this time with more hard-earned wisdom.

What separates the America of today from the America of John Kennedy's life is that Americans have lost their youthful naivete and brashness. Now we know there are limits. We've been to the mountaintop, to borrow a phrase from civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr., and we've seen our limits.

The Kennedy years weren't easy years. Those who believe they were are blinded by the soothing balm of time. The Kennedy years were climbing, growing and winning years. But they were also difficult and painful years. That's true because any change that brings growth or a greater awareness of one's surroundings necessarily entails giving up a part of yourself. The process of maturing is a painful process, but essential nonetheless.

Americans long for the Kennedy years because we we're vital during those times. No, Kennedy's achievements were not all great; time has tempered our assessment of his presidency. But during those years we were changing and growing and becoming great. And in the middle of it all, an assassin's bullet shattered the dream.

Today, we're still asking why. We're looking for answers that I believe may not be forthcoming. Jack Kennedy's death is shrouded by so much mystery, so much speculation, that even if the truth were known, it might not be accepted. Jacqueline, Caroline and John Jr. accepted it, but other Americans have not.

We've woven a web around those years and no one is likely to brush that web away.

Lyndon Baines Johnson, who stepped in to lead the country after Kennedy's assassination, said it best when he told the nation:

"This is a sad time for all people. We have suffered a loss that cannot be weighed..."

It remains so today.

Big dog dies after searching for home

A while back I half-watched as a big, red, beautiful Labrador-type dog crossed the Rankin Highway during 5:00 o'clock traffic. This beautiful female dog ended up on my street.

I watched her for weeks licking the food smell off the streets, and going from house to house in search for food and a home, where she was strongly urged to leave. After a few fruitless days she would rest on my drive in the shade.

I fed, watered and tried to give her a few words of encouragement, telling her that soon her master would be looking for her. And I was always rewarded with a lick.

A small boy took her in one day, not knowing how he could feed her, but I knew he was going to do his best. Later, the boy told me she died after she got weak and other dogs attacked her.

I pray her last weeks were worth the endurance she tolerated in her search for a place on this earth.

Reversing no-smoking policy double-standard

I support the no-smoking policy that the school board passed and I encourage them to stay with this policy for the benefit of MISD children and staff.

I feel that to reverse this action would be presenting a double-standard to our children and would not only say to them that we do not care that their environment is being polluted but also that it is alright for us as adults to do what we have forbidden them to do.

As a former smoker of 20 years I can attest that after not smoking for the past six years my health is better and even though quitting is hard, it can be done. It is repulsive to walk down the halls of a public school, which is supported by my tax dollars and is a learning center for my children, and smell cigarette smoke. I also feel it would be a waste of our money to build or designate a smoking room in the public schools which are now so overcrowded that we have some of our nurses' offices in book rooms and kindergarten classes in previous principals' offices.

How can anyone justify spending tax dollars or any dollars in today's economy, and with the emphasis we put on "Just Say No," on something that could injure not only their health but the health of other adults and children?

Some people may not know that this issue has once again come up for review with the school board. Please, I urge you if you are against it voice your opinion as such. You can be sure that the ones opposing this policy are voicing theirs.

MPD, MFD should be complimented

I would like to compliment Sgt. Ed Nicks, Sgt. John Urby, and Officer Theresa Fine of the Midland Police Department for the positive way in which they recently conducted the police agility test. They patiently "walked" us through the course and demonstrated to us the most agile methods in completing the course. Their supportive attitude influenced the group in that all potential recruits cheered for each other both as individuals and as a group.

I also would like to compliment the Midland Fire Department rookie class being taught by Training Chief Glen Harris for the members' enthusiastic observance of our agility test.

Although some of us didn't complete the course, it certainly was not from lack of support and enthusiasm.

John Pitts' column 'journalistic trash'

We were both shocked and disgusted by the John Paul Pitts article entitled "Wondering when and why it all went wrong" on the front page of the Business & Oil section of past Sunday's edition (Nov. 13). We agree that everyone is entitled to an opinion, however this journalistic trash posing as a newspaper article was not labeled as an opinion solely of Mr. Pitts, was not located on the editorial page, where it clearly belonged, and was not even remotely related to the topics of business or the oil industry. The Business section of your newspaper is extremely anemic. We recommend that you fill it with valid articles on business, the resources for which are countless, rather than extremist viewpoints more fitting for publication elsewhere.

Readers' views on: Coin flip

Coin should be only last resort

After reading the two articles from the Sunday Nov. 6 edition of the Midland Reporter-Telegram I became greatly displeased with the current situation of selection of district "champion" teams in case of ties.

Let's begin with this coin toss thing. From what I read Coach McCutchen was using a coin that had, "previously won 11 tosses." You would have thought after the first five tosses someone would have found a better way to do this. Someone did suggest a new system. If you'll look in the same issue I read with such displeasure that an alternative was suggested two years ago. The idea was probably pigeon holed. Who were the two teams in position for district champion when a solution was offered? One wasn't Midland High, but an honest effort was made to change the situation in favor of a more scientific way. Why was the subject left unattended for so long?

What are the alternatives? For starters we could implement overall records if district records fail to submit a clear winner. Those games are kept tract of just like district games. I can really see no problem with that solution even if we exclude games held on the new "open date."

Say we use preseason games and a clear winner doesn't emerge. Then let's use either first downs or penetrations to decide the winner. These stats are used to decide games and, after all, facts don't lie.

Suppose a dead heat persists to exists. Why not go with total yards? The chances of two teams having the exact same amount of yards is so narrow I would bet you couldn't slide a piece of onion skin paper between the possibilities. If a clear winner is as of yet not foreseeable then flip the stupid coin. But flip it only as a last resort.

The only area I think I haven't covered is who really loses in the haphazard way "champions" are selected. Your own sons, daughters, brothers, sisters, and grandchildren are being royally rooked of the things they deserve. I don't have much of a say in who does the winning or the loosing, but I do have the power to suggest changes, and you also have that power. I suggest that the booster clubs, student body representatives, athletic directors, coaches, teachers, school board officials, parents, or whomever it takes, work in cooperation with each other and the appropriate officials to remedy this unholy phenomenon.

The Midland High football team has done their best, and that's all anyone can ask of them. Unfortunately they've had to learn the lesson of "bad things happen to good people" the hard way. Let's not let this happen again.

District's way of breaking tie unfair

As a Rebel fan and a mother of two sons who played football for Midland Lee from 1983 through 1987, I could not help but be excited about the Rebels making their sixth consecutive trip to the playoffs.

But because I am a parent and a teacher who works with young people, my heart goes out to Coach Doug McCutchen, the Midland Bulldogs, and their parents and fans. The anguish that showed on Coach McCutchen's face that Friday night was felt by many other people, too.

I can only hope that in the near future the 4-5A district will begin to think about the young people participating in these sports. Other states, and possibly other districts, have found amicable ways to settle just this sort of situation. I realize that life is not always fair, but when a system is found unfair or unjust it is changed. This way of finding playoff-bound teams is both unfair and unjust.

Those who are involved in making changes have a responsibility and an obligation to the young people to change it. Then, and only then, can the integrity and character of the 4-5A match its talent-rich reputation.

Picking best team by coin flip injustice

Well I see that I'm not the only one who feels there was a great injustice done on the playing field that day the coin was tossed. I don't think it shows our young people what they have to look forward to in life, if their fate is judged by the toss of a coin.

What if our leaders were chosen by the toss of a coin; that wouldn't mean that we had our best people in there. I think the same goes for the football team. Have we got our best there to represent our town. I think not but we will never know will we?

I went to Midland High and I'm proud of it. I wouldn't have any other school. What if your job or education was decided by the toss of a coin. You go to enter college and they tell you, "We have a way of deciding your education. Now if you're really lucky and the toss of this coin lands in your favor, you get to go to our school."

A toss of the coin could be used in a lot of ways — your job, education, your life, your religion, they way you vote. Who has the right to do this for you?

You should be able to show your skills, whether it is in football, basketball or baseball. Let the people change this rule before it is too late. Our young people may decide it isn't worth it.

Coach McCutcheon lead team to defeat

In reference to our Coach Doug McCutchen's explanation of how sad he was for our Midland High School football team not going to the playoff berths. Our football team did their jobs and a job well done, but our own football coach, Coach Doug McCutchen led us to defeat after Midland High Varsity Football team worked so hard to get control, after all these years. The one our football team trusted so dearly stabbed them in the back, by this lesser of two evils, toss and its all gone down the drain to trash off. This is a great evil to our young youths and something should be done to change these evil doings in the Midland Independent School District Athletics Department, fair game for everyone.

Bush showing his capacity for presidential leadership

By WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST JR.
Editor in Chief, The Hearst Newspapers

Hearst

NEW YORK — President-elect George Bush has continued to show with remarkable swiftness his capacity for presidential leadership.

Within a day of his election victory, he announced the appointment of one of the most competent men in the Reagan administration, James A. Baker, to be his Secretary of State.

He announced he would retain Nicholas F. Brady as treasury secretary. A former senator from New Jersey, Mr. Brady shepherded the 1981 tax and spending cuts through Congress and played a major role in negotiating a 1983 compromise that shored up the finances of the Social Security system. He won wide acclaim for pushing Congress to enact a sweeping overhaul of the tax code that eliminated many tax breaks and reduced tax rates.

Last Thursday, the president-elect announced the appointment of New Hampshire Gov. John H. Sununu as his chief of staff. Gov. Sununu is credited with having made New Hampshire's economy one of the strongest of any state in the nation. When he took office as governor in 1983, he inherited a $44 million budget deficit and turned it into a surplus which still exists.

Known as a tough administrator, the 49-year-old Cuban-born governor, who was raised in New York and whose ancestry is partially Lebanese, played a key role in helping Vice President Bush win the New Hampshire primary.

In selecting the highly competent governor as his top White House executive, George Bush showed once again that, as president, he will make up his own mind independently of his close advisers' views. Just as was the case when he selected Dan Quayle as his vice presidential running mate, some of his aides thought Gov. Sununu would be a risky choice. They were concerned about his reputed reluctance to delegate authority and whether he could work well with a Democratically controlled Congress. However, Sen. Warren B. Rudman, against whom Sununu campaigned unsuccessfully in the 1980 New Hampshire Republican Senate primary, said anyone who gets to know the "enormously hard-working" governor, who served as chairman of the National Governors Association, will be attracted "by his competence and no-nonsense approach to things."

Gov. Sununu's background should encourage public confidence that as George Bush's right hand man in the White House, he will prove particularly effective in helping our new president to carry on the policies of the Reagan administration that brought us prosperity, preserved peace, and led to the Soviet-American agreement to eliminate an entire category of nuclear weapons for the first time since the dawn of the atomic age.

Which brings me to the question of whether President-elect Bush has a mandate to pursue President Reagan's policies. Liberal pundits and others who hoped the Democrats would win the presidency were quick to contend Bush has no such mandate because the Democrats retained control of Congress. Bernard Kaplan, our chief European correspondent, reported from Paris that the U.S. media barrage which portrayed Bush as a president "without a mandate" was viewed by European economists as responsible for the stock market plunge and sharp decline in the foreign exchange dollar value.

With Bush carrying 40 states out of 50 and the District of Columbia, it is malicious partisan politics to claim he has no so-called "mandate" to lead the American people. Washington Post writer Philip Geyelin said it was "nonsense" to claim the president-elect has no mandate just because the voters returned an overwhelmingly Democratic Congress.

Forty states gave George Bush an overwhelming presidential victory and endorsement to pursue President Reagan's policies.

That's just as much of a mandate as the Democrats have in Congress, and the latter does not have the power and influence of the presidency.

EDUCATION IN BRIEF

Welders are still needed in today's society, says Frank Wilkins, program chairman of Welding Technology at Texas State Technical Institute in Waco reports that he has on 65 students enrolled in TSTI's three welding programs, which means the welding program has found itself with more job openings for students than there are students enrolled.

Wilkins believes the main reason for the decline in supply, and surplus in demand, is that some Texas vocational administrators, directors and teachers have been describing welding as a "dying trade" to today's youth, thus directing them towards other vocations. He says there are still many welding positions and much income to be made within this trade.

For more information on the Welding Technology program at TSTI, call 1-800-792-TSTI or 1-817-799-3611, ext. 3530.

Winfrey's loss draws interest

YORK, Pa. (AP) — Oprah Winfrey apparently provided the inspiration some people needed when the 34-year-old talk show hostess revealed how she shed 67 pounds.

York Hospital, which offers the same Optifast weight loss program Ms. Winfrey used, has received more than 100 calls about enrolling, said Marta Smith, program director for the hospital's Nutrition and Metabolic Center.

"She was so inspirational," Ms. Smith said. "A lot of patients said, 'If she did it, I can do it.'"

On Tuesday's show, Ms. Winfrey, wearing size 10 jeans, talked about how she lost the weight with the liquid diet.

Ms. Smith said more than 40 people had enrolled by mid-week in an orientation program scheduled for later this month. It normally draws 25 to 30 people.

Only people at least 50 pounds overweight can participate, she said.

Mandrell

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP) — Country singer Barbara Mandrell has moved away from Barbara Mandrell Boulevard north of Nashville to a home in the country.

"We are farmers now, this is the first time in my life to be a real country girl," she said of the move to a six-bedroom log house on 136 acres northwest of the city.

Mandrell ties the move to her new album, "I'll Be Your Jukebox Tonight," a return to the country style of her youth.

Most of her hits have been pop tunes. But the latest album has two hillbilly oldies, including the 1961 Wynn Stewart classic, "Big Big Love."

"In the 1960s when that record was popular I played steel guitar for my father in his band," Mandrell said. "It was one of the songs that I did."

The tune marks the first time Mandrell, a musical prodigy as a child, has played steel guitar on a studio album.

She toured with Patsy Cline, Johnny Cash, George Jones and Don Gibson at age 13.

"I'm 39 years old but I'm 28 years in this business. I grew up in it; and that helped me to know and learn from Wynn Stewart and Tex Ritter and Joe Maphis and a lot of people who aren't with us anymore," she said.

Hall

BALTIMORE (AP) — Joy Hall, 11, enjoys talking in front of television cameras and radio microphones — when she isn't practicing gymnastics, bowling or playing basketball.

Those talents won the admiration of delegates to the National Easter Seal Society convention in Dallas, who selected the Baltimore youngster Thursday as National Easter Seal Child for 1989.

Joy, who lacks control of her arm and leg muscles and wears leg braces, was born with cerebral palsy, a neurological disorder that causes muscles to become weak, lethargic or spastic, said Rebecca Levine, spokeswoman for the Easter Seal Society of Maryland.

But Joy does not regard the handicap as an impediment to the activities she loves.

The sixth grader plays basketball at school, attends gymnastics classes geared to build strength in children with physical disabilities and loves to go bowling.

Joy will make a series of appearances for Easter Seals, including a trip to the White House in February, Ms. Levine said.

Baker Jr.

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — Former Tennessee Sen. Howard Baker Jr., who left retirement to be President Reagan's chief of staff during the Iran-Contra scandal, was named Saturday to receive the 1989 Harry S. Truman Good Neighbor Award.

It has been presented annually since 1973 by the Harry S. Truman Good Neighbor Award Foundation to a person who exemplifies the accomplishments and characteristics of the late Democratic president.

Baker, 63, a Republican, served in the Senate from 1967 to 1985. He was named White House chief of staff Feb. 27, 1987, following the resignation of Donald Regan. Baker resigned from the post on June 14.

Phil Pistilli, president of the foundation, called Baker "a distinguished statesman, highly regarded by all for his vital role in helping the United States at a time when the nation was in a crisis.

The award will be presented at a luncheon celebrating what would have been Truman's 105th birthday on May 8.

Greek shipping heiress Onassis led stormy life through four marriages

ATHENS, Greece (AP) — Greek shipping heiress Christina Onassis, who died Saturday of a heart attack in Argentina, was a global jet-setter worth an estimated $1 billion.

The only daughter of Greek shipping magnate Aristotle Onassis, Miss Onassis inherited his fortune — and control of his two major shipping companies, Springfield Shipping of New York City and Olympic Maritime of Monte Carlo, France — after her father's death in 1975.

Miss Onassis, 37, led a stormy life that often captured newspaper headlines. She was married four times and had one daughter, Athena, named after her late mother and her father's first wife.

Onassis' only other child, Alexander, died in a plane crash earlier in 1975 before his father's death, leaving Christina as the only heir to the family fortune, estimated at around $1 billion.

Miss Onassis reportedly didn't get along with her step-mother, Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis, who married her father in 1968. Mrs. Kennedy Onassis' first husband, U.S. President John F. Kennedy, was assassinated in 1963.

After Onassis died in 1975, his daughter and other members of the Onassis family reportedly offered Mrs. Kennedy Onassis a multi-million dollar settlement to give up her rights to the Greek magnate's estate, news reports at the time indicated.

Miss Onassis arrived in Argentina approximately two weeks ago to visit Marina Dodero, a long-time friend.

She reportedly was stricken as she prepared to go swimming in a pool at the country club home of Mrs. Dodero and her husband, Alberto.

Miss Onassis, who was a frequent visitor to Buenos Aires, also lived in Paris and St. Moritz, Switzerland. She also owned the Greek island of Skorpios in the Ionean Sea, which she inherited from her father. She at one time contemplated the idea of buying the island of Corisco, located in the Atlantic Ocean off the coast of central Africa, news reports indicated.

She was born Dec. 11, 1950, in New York City, and was first married in 1971 to Los Angeles real estate broker Joseph Bolker. The marriage ended in divorce nine months later.

She later married Alexander Andreadis, the heir to another Greek shipping fortune, but that marriage also ended in divorce in 1976.

In 1978, she married a third time, in Moscow to Sergei Kauzov, a Soviet shipping executive, but it lasted less than two years.

In March 1984, Ms. Onassis married French businessman Thierry Roussel in a civil service in the fashionable 7th district of Paris, followed by a religious ceremony at a Greek Orthodox church.

She told a French magazine at the time that she fell in love with Roussel when she was 21 and they vacationed together on Skorpios, the family island.

Roussel's grandfather was the founder of a leading French pharamaceutical company, Roussel-Uclaf, but it was sold by the family more than 20 years ago.

The couple had a daughter.

1. Are warranties handled locally?

3. Do the safety pads have AT LEAST a one year warranty?
If the answer to any of these questions is NO- BEWARE.

City has no plans to mark anniversary of Kennedy's assassination

DALLAS (AP) — City leaders say they plan no special ceremonies to mark the 25th anniversary of President John F. Kennedy's assassination.

After Dallas marked the 20th anniversary five years ago with a memorial service, officials decided it would be the last official remembrance of Kennedy on the anniversary of his death.

In the future, they said, he would be remembered on his birthday, May 29, as the Kennedy family prefers.

"The family supported that, and we felt better about that," said Sandy Kress, chairman of the Dallas County Democratic Party, which organized the memorial service five years ago.

So no official remembrances are scheduled next week. The 25th anniversary is Tuesday.

There are, however, a few Kennedy-related events planned, including a wreath-laying by former Green Berets on Sunday at the Kennedy Memorial and a benefit performance Tuesday by area artists at the theater where Lee Harvey Oswald, the man accused of killing the president, was arrested only hours after the assassination.

Also, photographer Bob Jackson, who won journalism's Pulitzer Prize for his photo of Jack Ruby shooting Oswald, will be among 30 press photographers on Saturday attending a gathering in commemoration of the assassination.

Employees of Parkland Memorial Hospital, at least five of whom were working when Kennedy was taken there for treatment, will hold a round-table discussion of the assassination Tuesday.

Dallas area painters, poets, performance artists and musicians will present a series of exhibits and live performances Tuesday at the Texas Theater.

During the daylong event, which will benefit a number of community organizations, old audio tapes assembled by police after the assassination, including an Oswald radio broadcast on behalf of the Fair Play for Cuba Committee, will be played.

Also planned are a concert of gospel music, readings by Dallas poets and an appearance by country and western singer Ray Wylie Hubbard.

Visual artists also have created pieces for the theater's lobby and walls, transforming the space into what organizer Mary Hatz calls a "community shrine."

Those who photographed events to gather this week

By TIM LOTT

DALLAS (AP) — It was no joyous occasion when photographers who chronicled the deaths of President John F. Kennedy and his suspected assassin gathered here Saturday for a 25th reunion.

About 30 photographers and photo editors, among them Pulitzer Prize-winning Bob Jackson, met at the Dallas Press Club, not far from where Kennedy was shot, to tell their photographic versions of what happened.

Jackson, who worked for the Dallas Times Herald at the time, won print journalism's most coveted prize for the photo he took as Jack Ruby shot Lee Harvey Oswald, Kennedy's suspected assassin.

"I was in a logical place at the time (Oswald was shot) and I was focused," said Jackson, who now works for the Colorado Springs (Colo.) Gazette-Telegraph.

Jackson also was in a logical place when Kennedy was shot, riding in a photographers' car about eight vehicles behind the president. But he was between rolls of film when the shots rang out.

Riding in the same press car, was Tom Dillard, who was a photographer for The Dallas Morning News. Like Jackson, Dillard says he missed the most significant opportunity.

"By the time I could focus on the building where Oswald was, it was too late," said Dillard.

The photographers joked with each other, many of them commiserating over that perfect missed shot they would have snapped, "if I would have ..."

Many recalled how former Morning News photographer, the late Jack Beers was just a few feet from Jackson when Ruby shot Oswald, but he snapped a photo just a split second before the shot was fired.

"There were so many photos that could have been perfect," said Harold Waters, who worked for The Associated Press at the time.

"That's what we're all here for," he said. "To tell the same old stories, the same old lies, to say what we could have done. I haven't seen a lot of these guys in 20 years. It's good to hear what they have to say."

Pollution hurts buildings

The Parthenon, Roman Colosseum, Westminster Abbey, the Taj Mahal and the cathedral at Chartres are examples of cultural treasures that are being damaged by air pollution.

President John F. Kennedy and his wife, Jackie, ride in an open limousine on Nov. 22, 1963, moments before his assassination.

Time stood still — and then moved on

World has changed since Kennedy's assassination

By HARRY F. ROSENTHAL

WASHINGTON (AP) — Oh, how the world has changed in 25 years.

Then, McDonald's bragged "Over a Billion Hamburgers Sold from Coast to Coast," now it's simply "billions and billions." The Chrysler Theater was on the air, the Weavers were on their farewell performance tour, and George Lincoln Rockwell and his American Nazi Party were peddling hate. In those days of the quickening civil rights movement, blacks still were referred to in newspapers as Negroes.

In 1963, "superb men's suits" sold in the Robert Hall clothing chain for $39.95, sirloin strip steaks went for $1.39 a pound, a quart of Dewar's White Label was $6.39. Snow tires on sale were $10.22, wheel balancing and mounting free. Joe Palooka and Terry and The Pirates were in the funnies and so was Pogo. Condoms were sold in gas station restroom vending machines or from under the counter in drug stores. Boys still blushed when they asked for them.

Tempus fugit. Time flies.

It stood still that day in Dallas when John F. Kennedy was killed. But the world that he knew — and that knew him — is a different world today.

Then, it cost $950 to send a kid to a state college, $1,907 to a private school — room, board and tuition. Now those figures are $4,445 and $11,330.

Northern Rhodesia of Kennedy's day is Zambia. Southern Rhodesia is Zimbabwe. The United Nations' 113 member states have grown to 159, the world's population from 3.2 billion to more than 5 billion, America's from 189 million to 244 million.

China, then an outcast, a technological pygmy, now bids to launch American satellites. The Soviet Union, which rattled the nuclear saber and blustered "we will bury you" in Kennedy's time, is working with the United States to reduce the number of horrible weapons.

At the time of Kennedy's Cuban missile crisis, the United States had 5,000 nuclear weapons, the Soviets only 300. Now each country has over 25,000.

Tempus fugit. Time flies. It stood still that day in Dallas when John F. Kennedy was killed. But the world that he knew — and that knew him — is a different world today.

Kennedy revived Depression-era food stamps as a pilot program; now 19 million people use them. The number of farms in the United States has fallen by more than 1 million, to fewer than 2.2 million.

Baseball's major leagues crossed the border to embrace Montreal and Toronto. Oakland, Seattle, San Diego and Atlanta got into the majors and so have Arlington, Texas, halfway between Dallas and Fort Worth, and Anaheim, Calif., home of Disneyland. The nation's game, however, is no longer played professionally in the nation's capital.

If you were shopping for early Christmas presents in 1963 you could choose from wood tennis rackets, home movie projectors, portable typewriters, most of which can still be gotten but who needs them in the days of graphite rackets, camcorders and laptop computers?

You couldn't buy a telephone then; you can now.

When people talked about using "calculators," they meant slide rules or adding machines. You could take the SS France to Europe, buy a VW bug, which everyone thought would be around forever. Cars from Japan? Don't be silly.

In 1963, Jack Nicklaus became the second golfer ever to make $100,000 — Arnie Palmer, of course, was the first. But that was before television invented Sunday afternoons. Last year Curtis Strange set the record for a single season, winning $925,941.

Buddhist priests were dousing themselves with gasoline and setting themselves afire in Vietnam. Kennedy had sent in 16,000 advisers, the advance contingent for America's longest and most controversial war that saw 543,400 troops there at the high point. More than 58,000 young Americans lost their lives.

People have become famous who weren't born yet or were pre-schoolers when Kennedy was killed. Michael J. Fox, the actor; Amy Carter, the presidential daughter; Jose Canseco, the World Series ballplayer; Mike Tyson, the heavyweight champion; Carl Lewis, the runner; Greg Louganis, the diver. Among the teenagers of that day, Steven Jobs, the computer whiz; Albert Gore, the senator; Dan Quayle, the vice presidential nominee.

John Kennedy's federal budget proposal for 1964 envisioned spending $98.8 billion, a record, with $11.9 billion in red ink. The deficit built into in Ronald Reagan's 1989 proposal — $129.5 billion — is more than the entire Kennedy budget.

The debt ceiling was $315 billion. It is now — hold your breath — $2.8 trillion. That's 2,800 billion dollars. Or: $2,800,000,000,000.

Eastern Airlines reported a net 1962 loss of $14,895,365. What's changed there? In 1987, the airline lost $181.7 million. Standard of New Jersey had earnings of $84 million; now, as Exxon, its earnings are $4.84 billion.

Mary Haworth has left the advice column field to Ann and Abby, the Nash Rambler has gone the way of the Studebaker, the DeSoto and the dodo bird, and the United States population has moved inexorably west and south, so that between 1960 and 1980 its center moved from 6½ miles northwest of Centralia, Ill., to one-quarter mile west of DeSoto in Missouri.

Lunch counters were still closed to blacks when John Kennedy was in the White House. To vote in most of the South, one had to pay a poll tax. Drinking fountains were labeled "white" and "colored."

In 1988, 6,829 elected officials across the nation are black, including 301 mayors and 429 judges of state courts. In 43 states, Martin Luther King's birthday is a holiday.

Only two of the Supreme Court justices of Kennedy's time, William J. Brennan and Byron White, still sit on the bench. And eight men who were serving in the Senate still are there, including Kennedy's youngest brother, Ted.

Around the world, a handful of national leaders who were in power in Kennedy's time remain. Fidel Castro in Cuba, Alfredo Stroessner in Paraguay, King Hussein in Jordan, and Kim Il-Sung in North Korea. Bobby Kennedy is gone, but his son is in the House of Representatives. JFK's son, John Jr., who saluted bravely as his father's coffin passed, is a strapping, handsome 28-year-old.

In 1963, 77 percent of American homes had television sets; 98 percent do today. And three out of four homes had telephones; now 93 out of 100 homes have them.

More than half of all homes have video cassette recorders, which were virtually unknown then. Radios have multiplied: 156 million in 1963 and 530 million now. There is no change in older folks' complaints about the younger generation's taste in music.

Kennedy had committed the nation to going to the moon in the decade of the '60s, and it did, but when he died only six Americans had gone into space. Since then, 12 Americans have walked on the moon and, in all, 208 astronauts have been aboard 57 U.S. space flights. The Soviets have sent 138 cosmonauts on 65 flights. They have female astronauts, and so have we.

In 1963, there was no transplanting of hearts, but there was cocky confidence that virtually any infection could be controlled with antibiotics and chemicals. That was before toxic shock syndrome, Legionnaire's disease and now, the dread AIDS.

Tempus fugit. John F. Kennedy's beautiful young wife is a grandmother. The world has changed. The torch, as he said, has passed.

Kennedy artifacts include the bizarre, the priceless

FORT WORTH (AP) — The shards of John F. Kennedy's assassination are scattered everywhere, and range from the irreplaceable to the bizarre: the car in which JFK was shot, Lee Harvey Oswald's sunglasses, and a diaper once used by John-John Kennedy.

With the help of researchers, assassination investigators, readers and the participants in and around that Nov. 22, 1963, weekend, the Fort Worth Star-Telegram in months of study has located many objects relating to the most debated news story of this century.

A sampling of the artifacts, both obvious and obscure:

■ JFK's parade limo: James Bond, JFK's favorite fictional hero, would have liked it. Dubbed X-100 by the Secret Service, the limousine had a sophisticated constant-temperature air-conditioning system, radio telephones to put the president in contact with the world, custom lap robes, retractable steps, a detachable bubble top and a gadget in the rear compartment to raise a seated JFK to greater visibility.

The bubble top was removed, at JFK's request, for the motorcade through Dallas. Some experts believe the top could have deflected the bullet that killed Kennedy. Despite its sophisticated features, the vehicle was not armored.

The 1961 Lincoln four-door convertible was customized by Hess & Eisenhardt Armoring Co. of Cincinnati, with collaboration from Ford Motor Co., at an estimated cost of $200,000. It was to that time the most expensive and elaborately outfitted presidential parade limo in history.

Following the assassination, President Lyndon Johnson ordered the car completely stripped and rebuilt. Hess & Eisenhardt updated the styling, changed the color from navy blue to black and installed armoring and bullet-resistant glass. First used again in late 1964, the rebuilt limousine weighed 1 ton more than the original version. Presidents Johnson, Nixon and Ford rode in it.

In 1978, The Ford Motor Co., which had leased the car to the government, donated the limousine to the Henry Ford Museum and Greenfield Village in Dearborn, Mich. It's still on exhibit there today.

■ Oswald's bed: Among Lee Harvey Oswald's many 1963 addresses in Dallas was 621 N. Marsalis Ave., a boarding house in which he rented a room for the week of Oct. 7-14.

The tiny room was furnished with a single bed, chest, dresser, table and night stand, all of which are on display in St. Augustine, Fla., at the Tragedy in U.S. History Museum.

Museum owner Buddy Hough obtained the room's contents from the landlady, Mary Bledsoe. He won't say how much he paid, but part of the deal was that he repair the boarding house's front porch.

Along with the furniture came several personal items Oswald left behind — plastic sunglasses, a straight-edge razor and a framed photograph of John F. Kennedy.

■ John-John's diaper: A used cotton diaper is stored away in a Dallas warehouse. It belonged to John F. Kennedy Jr., little "John-John," according to a woman who said she once took care of the Kennedy children. She gave the diaper to its present custodians, John and Estelle Sissom, who once operated the John F. Kennedy Museum on Dealey Plaza until 1981.

The diaper has never been displayed.

■ Jack Ruby's razor: A hank of hair — Ruby's — and the straight razor the jail barber used to shave him belong to the Sissoms.

The barber also gave the museum a haircut voucher signed by Ruby, a document now valued, because of the signature, at $125.

The Sissoms, too, have 50 scrapbooks of newspaper and magazine clippings about JFK and 10,000 frames of microfilm from five newspapers of every state during the 10-day period following the assassination. All items are in storage.

■ Kennedy's prayer book: Lyndon Johnson used JFK's Catholic missal when he was sworn in as president by federal Judge Sarah Hughes aboard Air Force One. Today, the prayer book is on exhibit at the Lyndon B. Johnson Library in Austin. If it were ever offered for sale, it would bring at least $50,000, experts estimate.

■ Oswald's ambulance: At 11 a.m. on Sunday, Nov. 24, in the basement of the Dallas City Hall, Jack Ruby shot Lee Harvey Oswald. A 1962 Ford station wagon ambulance sent by the Oneal Funeral Home carried the dying Oswald to Parkland Memorial Hospital.

Today, the ambulance is exhibited in St. Augustine, Fla., at the Tragedy in U.S. History Museum. Inside the ambulance is the stretcher on which Oswald lay.

Museum owner Buddy Hough bought the ambulance for about $1,500 from the funeral home after Oswald's death. "They were kind of ashamed of it, had it put away," he says.

The vehicle, he adds, is like new — except for a few faded paint spots caused by people touching it with their hands as they pass.

Cougars battle snow en route to Hawaii

UH downs Tech 30-29 in near blizzard

By TERRY WILLIAMSON
Assistant Sports Editor

LUBBOCK — The University of Houston Cougars landed a berth in the Aloha Bowl here Saturday afternoon with a most unlikely 30-29 victory over Texas Tech.

Unlikely? How about an early afternoon snow storm for a team that owns a Run and Shoot offense from a city that only reads about snow in the morning newspapers.

Well, Coach Jack Pardee's Cougars handled the powder nicely, erasing a 23-14 Tech lead and winning it with 2:03 in the game when quarterback Andre Ware hit Jason Phillips with a three-yard TD pass. It was redemption of sorts for Phillips, who had dropped three key passes earlier in the day.

"When we came out on the field for pre-game warmups, I wanted out of Lubbock," Phillips said. "I've never played in the snow. Every catch was a tough one, but I promise not to drop any passes in Hawaii. I hear there is no snow in the forecast for the Aloha Bowl."

The Cougars were officially invited to the Christmas Day bowl in Hawaii before UH team members were even allowed into the warmth of the dressing room. Each player was draped with lei amid shouts of, "Hawaii, Hawaii."

Houston's winning touchdown was set up when Tech's Chris Burns punted a meager 15 yards to the 21-yard line. Houston covered the distance in four plays.

The loss was a tough one for Tech coach Spike Dykes. The Raiders could have finished in second place in the Southwest Conference race with a victory and insured a third consecutive winning season. Neither happened.

"That's what was so tough about this loss" said Dykes. "I hurt for these kids because they played their fannies off and we had a lot to shoot for. It would have been a big feather in our cap to finish second."

But the weather didn't bother Dykes, saying, "When you play a team that can throw like Houston, you would order weather like this, but it didn't stop them from throwing, did it?"

The Cougars still put the ball in the air 61 times for 348 yards. Tech added 35 passes for 363 yards. In all, the ball was launched 96 times in weather not fit for man or beast in the battles between two former Midlanders — Dykes and Pardee.

Still, Pardee thought the Cougars did change their game plan. "We had to become a vertical team instead of a lateral one because you can't cut in conditions like this."

When asked what would have happened if the Cougars had been unable to throw under the nasty conditions, Ware said, "I don't know. We never discussed it. Who knows? We might have thrown 120 times under normal conditions."

Tech's James Gray and Houston's Chuck Weatherspoon exchanged touchdowns in the first period for a 7-7 tie. Tech led a second time when Scott Segrist kicked a 40-yard field goal.

Houston got a 14-10 lead when Mecredric Calloway returned a 30-yard interception return, but Tech took a 16-14 lead into the halftime when Ervin Farris caught a 34-yard TD pass from Billy Joe Tolliver.

Houston was stopped at the Tech one-inch line, at the Tech 20 and inside the Tech 40 on its first three possessions of the third period and the Raider offense responed at Tolliver and Farris connected on a 36-yard TD pass that was tipped by Houston's Alton Montgomery for a 23-14 lead.

Tyrone Thurman, a former Midland Lee star, fumibled the kickoff return and Houston got a 30-yard field goal from Roman Anderson. That opened the door for a Cougar comeback as Tech's lead fell to 23-17.

Ware hit Kimble Anders for a 15-yard TD later for a 24-23 Houston lead, but Tech struck back with Farris scoring his third TD of the game for a 29-24 lead only to set up the Aloha ending.

"Our offense is capable of striking at any time," said Pardee, "but it was hard to sustain things under these conditions. We dropped a lot of passes, but we caught some big ones, too."

Tech's Dykes said, "Our kids played hard. It wasn't an ideal game as far as execution is concerned, but the conditions weren't perfect, either."

Houston is now going bowling even though they have a regular season game left with Rice. The Cougars are now 8-2 on the season. Tech is 5-5 and must beat Oklahoma State, another Top 20 team, in Japan on Dec. 3. That game will be played at 10 p.m. CST and will be Dec. 4 in Japan. The game is billed as the Coca-Cola Bowl even though it is a regular season matchup.

"The one good thing about that game is it will take everyone in the states about two days to find out the results," said Dykes.

Tech finishes SWC play with a 4-3 mark, but now has to beat the Cowboys and Heisman candidate Barry Sanders to have a winning season.

Despite the loss, Tech's Tolliver established four school records and tied two others, all passing marks and has now established or tied 15 of the school's 18 total offense and passing records.

Houston's James Dixon became the first player to ever catch 13 passes against Tech.

Midland Christian falls 52-20

By BILL GRIMES

It was more of the same for the Midland Christian football team in the NewTex Christian Football Conference finals on a blustery Saturday afternoon at Mustang Field.

Coach Homer Jackson's team has never had much luck with the Jesus Chapel juggernaut from El Paso and Saturday was no exception, per the Chargers' 52-20 wipeout in six-man action.

Jackson admitted his troops were physically outmanned, especially speed-wise.

"The biggest difference was that they just had more talent than we did," Jackson said.

The Chargers' one-two punch of halfbacks Jon Smith and Robert Martinez delivered the knockout blow to Midland's knockout hopes by combining for 167 yards rushing and five touchdowns, four by Smith.

'Dogs hound Rangers

By BILL GRIMES
Sports Writer

"Meet the Press" aired Saturday in Chap Center.

But Lawrence Spivak wasn't running the show, the Midland High boys basketball team was. The Bulldogs opened their season by introducing Greenwood to a smothering full-court press that caused many a turnover in an 87-47 Bulldog romp.

Greenwood, 0-2, but with all five starters just one week removed from a bi-district football playoff, actually stayed with the 'Dogs for more than a quarter. But Dexture Young's three-point prowess along with "that press" caused the Rangers to self-destruct in the second half. MHS outscored the visitors 43-15 in the second half after enjoying an 11-point halftime lead.

Saturday's opponents played two close games last season, but Greenwood coach Robert Chaney says the 'Dogs are vastly improved, while the Rangers are still getting untracked from football season. Bulldog coach Jack Stephenson is similarly high on his team.

"My kids play a well-rounded game," Stephenson said. "They're good shooters, quick and have good size."

Depth was also a factor. Stephenson used 13 players in the first period alone, while Chaney pretty much stuck with his top eight while the outcome was in doubt.

Midland jumped out to an 8-3 lead in the opening minutes, but Greenwood roared back behind four free throws by Randy Donnell and a layup by Kane Harris to take a 15-10 lead with about three minutes left in the period.

That's when Young took over. The 6-foot-2 senior wing tied it up at 15-all with his first three-point shot, then added another 40 seconds later to put the 'Dogs up by five.

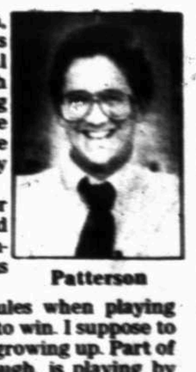
JIMMY PATTERSON

Singing a new tune in Aggieland



Patterson

Was it just my imagination, or were Texas Aggie fans cheering louder than usual during yesterday's game with TCU? Was the band playing with more intensity? The crowd just seemed a little more pumped than they normally do.

Aggies sort of band together in the face of adversity, and boy do they ever have themselves a problem (child) this time.

Some children bend the rules when playing football. Some children cheat to win. I suppose to those kids, cheating is part of growing up. Part of actually being grown up, though, is playing by the rules. But I guess too many of us just take it for granted that professionals are going to play fair and square.

In a Dallas Morning News story Friday, former Aggie George Smith said A&M head coach Jackie Sherrill paid him $4,400 "hush money" to keep his trap shut during an NCAA investigation of the school in September. These charges by Smith may not sit too well with Aggie fans. Rule bending twice in one season is just not acceptable. At any school for that matter.

But I suppose everything will be OK after Jackie chose to exile himself from Saturday's game to "take pressure" off his team. Just went right out and slapped himself on the wrist. What a guy. What a gesture.

One of the most famous sayings in Aggieland is "Highway 6 runs both ways." When an Aggie doesn't care much for you, he or she will likely make the suggestion which, roughly translated, means "Outta here ... before sundown."

After Friday's revelations, the Ags may now have to adopt a new phrase: "Hit the road, Jack."

Quite a few maroon-bleeders would probably pay four-grand to stand alongside Highway 6 and watch Jackie, thumb fully extended, trying to hitch a ride with the fastest truck bound for Pittsburgh.

If these allegations prove to be true, Sherrill is gone. As he should be.

Sherrill said during the inquiry that "If Jackie Sherrill does something, Jackie Sherrill will leave this institution." Roughly translated, we assume he he meant "You can't fire me, sir, I quit."

Got a hot tip for you, Jackie: You won't have time to quit if those allegations prove to be true. Hundreds of Angry Ags would throw you out if given the chance.

A&M students don't care too much for cheaters.

Another old saying in the Brazos Valley is that if you do something twice at A&M, it becomes tradition. The Aggies were already nailed once in September, forfeiting a post-season bowl game and a chance at competing for a fourth straight conference championship. A&M doesn't want to get caught twice in the same season. What would people say about tradition then?

This whole mess is a shame for people like basketball coach Shelby Metcalf and '64 Olympic gold medalist Randy Matson, now the director of the Association of Former Students. Matson and Metcalf are decent, hard working Aggies who always work for the institution. And there are many others just like them who today are blushing maroon instead of bleeding it.

And what of former coaches Tom Wilson and Emory Bellard? They are tucked comfortably away in small southeast Texas towns, coaching the relatively innocent game of high school football. No hush money in high school. Only pride and the desire to do well.

But Sherrill's problems — and A&M's problems — all go back to that time honored foundation of modern college football: Win at all costs. Whatever it takes, get me a winner, or get out. Or maybe it was another unfortunate message that Sherrill thought he heard: Get me a winner, get caught if you have to, and then get out.

They oughta make a movie out of this

By JACK KEEVER

COLLEGE STATION, Texas (AP) — Former Texas A&M running back George Smith on Saturday recanted his statements in taped interviews with a reporter in which he said A&M coach Jackie Sherrill paid him to keep quiet about NCAA rules violations.

"I called A&M as soon as I knew the story was going to come out. The information in the story is not true, and I told A&M I'd come to College Station to straighten everything out," Smith said at a news conference Saturday.

The Dallas Morning News reported in a copyright story Friday by reporter Doug Bedell that in 8 hours of taped interviews, Smith said Sherrill paid him $4,400 in cash and money orders since November 1986.

Smith read for about four minutes from a prepared text and then answered reporters' questions for about five minutes.

A&M Scandal

"It certainly was not hush money. I put great emphasis on that. It was not hush money," Smith said.

Smith said much of what he told Bedell was not true. It was to be used as a script for a movie, he said.

"Bedell was to compare a proposal for the book and send it to agents and give me a copy of the manuscript," Smith said.

Smith said he received $1,000 to $1,400 from Sherrill that he considered a loan, since at the time he received the money he was not a student-athlete at A&M. He said he planned to return the money as soon as he was able to do so.

Nebraska holds OU to field goal, captures Big 8 title

NORMAN, Okla. — Quarterback Steve Taylor sneaked one yard for a touchdown, capping an 80-yard march with the opening kickoff, and No. 7 Nebraska ended four years of frustration by defeating No. 9 Oklahoma 7-3 for the Big Eight championship and a berth in the Orange Bowl.

The Cornhuskers won their first outright crown since 1983 by shutting down Oklahoma's vaunted wishbone and holding the Sooners to 137 total yards and only 98 on the ground. Oklahoma came in as the nation's fourth best rushing team, averaging 367.9 yards a game.

The loss snapped Oklahoma's 31-game Big Eight winning streak, second longest in conference history, since a 28-11 loss to Kansas in 1984.

Nebraska finished the regular season with an 11-1 record — 7-0 in the conference — and will face third-ranked Miami in the Orange Bowl. Oklahoma, 9-2 and 6-1, will meet No. 15 Clemson in the Florida Citrus Bowl.

Nebraska had dropped four in a row and 13 of its last 17 games against arch-rival Oklahoma, three of them last-minute losses.

This time, an aggressive defense led by linebacker LeRoy Etienne continually stopped the Sooners from turning the corner on option pitchouts on a rain-slick field and held them without a touchdown for the first time in 62 games.

The Sooners were completely stuffed in the fourth quarter when they were held without a first down on four possesions and minus-11 yards on 13 plays. Nebraska rushed for 265 yards in the game and passed for 48.

After Todd Thomsen's opening kickoff sailed through the end zone, Nebraska drove to the game's only touchdown in nine plays, two of them big third-down gainers.

Penn State QB Lance Lonergan is slammed into by Notre Dame defender Chris Zorich.

No. 2 USC 31, UCLA 22

PASADENA, Calif. — Rodney Peete, who got measles earlier this week, passed for 189 yards and one touchdown, leading second-ranked Southern Cal over No. 6 UCLA, giving the Trojans a berth in the Rose Bowl.

Peete also scored a touchdown, and Aaron Emanuel scored twice as the Pacific-10 Conference champion Trojans, 8-0 in league play and 10-0 overall, qualified to face Big Ten champion Michigan in the Rose Bowl on Jan. 2.

But first, Southern Cal plays host to top-ranked Notre Dame next Saturday in a game which could ultimately decide the national championship. The Fighting Irish beat Penn State 21-3 Saturday to raise their record to 10-0.

The sixth-ranked Bruins, who completed their regular season with a 9-2 record and went 6-2 in the Pac-10, meet 10th-ranked Arkansas in the Cotton Bowl on Jan. 2.

UCLA will be bidding to become the first team in NCAA history to win bowl games following seven consecutive seasons.

Peete, a senior considered to be one of the top contenders for the Heisman Trophy, played the entire game at quarterback for the Trojans despite his questionable status entering the game.

No. 1 Notre Dame 21, Penn State 3

SOUTH BEND, Ind. — Tony Rice completed the longest pass play of his career for one touchdown and rushed for another, leading No. 1 Notre Dame over the first Penn State team in 50 years to have a losing season.

The loss dropped Penn State to 5-6 and gave Coach Joe Paterno his firt losing record in 23 seasons with the Nittany Lions.

While Penn State's season is over, the Irish take their undefeated record into a showdown next Saturday against No. 2 Southern Cal in a game that could go a long way toward determining a national champion. Southern Cal put its ranking and its own undefeated record on the line Saturday against No. 6 UCLA.

Notre Dame will meet No. 4 West Virginia in the Fiesta Bowl on Jan. 2 in Tempe, Ariz.

Notre Dame, 10-0, won despite two interceptions and a lost fumble in Penn State territory and penalties that cost the Irish a touchdown and set up Penn State's only score.

Penn State quarterback Lance Lonergan completed only 3 of 16 passes for 39 yards, and the Lions were held to 105 yards rushing, their lowest ground total of the season.

Rice completed 10 passes for 191 yards and carried 15 times for 84 yards.

He rushed 2 yards for a touchdown on Notre Dame's first possession, an 87-yard drive that gave the Irish the lead for good at 5:12 of the first quarter.

The Irish defense held the Lions to a net 4 yards on their next series, and Rice then led a 60-yard scoring drive in five plays that closed on a 22-yard rushing touchdown by Mark Green.

No. 4 WVU 31, No. 14 Syracuse 9

MORGANTOWN, W.Va. — Fullback Craig Taylor scored twice from the 1 and Fiesta Bowl-bound West Virginia forced six Syracuse turnovers in a win that gave the No. 4 Mountaineers their first perfect regular season.

West Virginia, 11-0, will play top-ranked Notre Dame on Jan. 2. No. 14 Syracuse, 8-2, accepted a bid to play Auburn or LSU in the Hall of Fame Bowl on Dec. 30.

More than 65,000 people packed Mountaineer Field despite a day of rain to watch West Virginia complete the best season it has had in 96 years of football. The victory avenged a 32-31 loss to Syracuse last year — when the Orangemen finished the regular season 11-0.

West Virginia took a 7-0 lead on its first drive, moving 60 yards in 11 plays after a Syracuse punt. Anthony Brown had runs of 12, 11 and 9 yards during the drive before Taylor slid off left tackle for the score.

Syracuse came back with a 17-play drive that covered 69 yards and 8:23, but quarterback Todd Philcox fumbled at the West Virginia 2 to turn the ball over. It was the first of four turnovers in the first half for the Orangemen, who were held to their lowest point total since a 26-9 loss to Ohio State earlier this year.

No. 3 Miami, Fla. 44, LSU 3

BATON ROUGE, La. (AP) — Steve Walsh passed for 220 yards and two touchdowns as third-ranked Miami jumped in front early and routed No. 11 Louisiana State.

It was the fourth victory in a row for the Hurricanes, 8-1, who accepted an invitation before the game to meet Nebraska in the Orange Bowl game.

The defending national champions added to their impressive road record, going to 24-2 away from home in their five years under Coach Jimmy Johnson. It was the Hurricanes' 40th victory in their last 41 regular season games.

Walsh was credited with an 18-yard touchdown pass in the first quarter when Cleveland Gary fumbled into the end zone, where teammate Randal Hill recovered for the score.

Walsh, who hit on 15 of 29 passes and had one interception, completed a 7-yard touchdown pass to Gary in the final quarter, giving him 28 for the year, breaking out of his tie for the school record of 26 set by Vinny Testaverde two years ago.

LSU, 7-3, had its five-game winning streak snapped, but the Tigers had plenty of chances to make it close in a game played at times in a driving rain.

The Tigers got inside the Miami 20 four times from the middle of the second quarter and the first six minutes of the third, but managed only one field goal, a 27-yarder by David Browndyke one second before halftime.

Gary scored on a 31-yard run on the first play of the second quarter and Carlos Huerta kicked field goals of 37, 21 and 22 yards.

UTEP wraps up Independence Bowl bid

EL PASO, Texas (AP) — Texas-El Paso marked up its winningest season in history and earned an Independence Bowl bid with a 31-24 victory over Air Force in El Paso's Sun Bowl Saturday.

It was the Miners' 10th win of the season against only two losses. The most victories they had recorded before was when they went 9-2 in 1956.

The Miners' bowl bid came after Wake Forest, which had the inside track, was tied by Appalachia State Saturday and finished with a 6-4-1 record.

The Miners will play Southern Mississippi in the Independence Bowl in Shreveport, La., on Dec. 23.

"Our players are really excited," said UTEP Coach Bob Stull. "We had a straw vote. I asked them and they just about tore the place down, so I think they unanimously wanted to go."

Air Force dropped to a 5-6 mark with one game to play. The Falcons will travel to Hawaii next week.

UTEP scored its winning touchdown with less than 4 minutes to play when tailback John Harvey ran the ball over from the 1-yard line. But Air Force came storming back, driving to the UTEP 6-yard line where the Miners held them on fourth down.

Harvey scored two touchdowns during the game to finish his college career with 51 touchdowns, an all-time school record. He also became the Western Athletic Conference's all-time leading scorer with 306 points.

Steve Bartalo of Colorado State held the previous record with 294 points.

The Miners finished second in the WAC with a 6-2 mark, their highest finish ever in the league. Air Force is 3-4.

Texas A&I wins first playoff game

KINGSVILLE, TEXAS (AP) — Tailback Johnny Bailey rushed for 231 yards and two touchdowns to lead Texas A&I to a 39-15 victory over Mississippi College in an NCAA Division II first-round playoff game Saturday.

Texas A&I moves into next weekend's quarterfinals against the University of Tennessee-Martin, a 23-6 winner Saturday over Butler (Ind.) University.

Fullback Heath Sherman rushed for 131 yards and scored three times for the Javelinas, who improved their record to 9-2 for the season. Mississippi College closed out at 9-3.

Sherman's two 18-yard TD runs and Jason Curlee's 21-yard field goal gave the Javelinas a 17-0 lead before Mississippi College got on the board late in the second quarter on wide receiver Ron Frank's 10-yard pass from quarterback Earl Lee.

Texas A&I put the game away in the third quarter on Bailey's touchdown runs of 12 and 40 yards.

The Choctaws got their final points on a one-yard run by Lee, and Sherman came back with a one-yard TD run for A&I.

We Realize It, Terry!!

It may not have been pretty to some, but to us, It Was Beautiful!

Thank you Terry. Someone finally put the 1988 football season in it's proper perspective. Everyone knew from the onset the possibility of a coin toss. How much better it would have been to show some class, congratulate the teams, make them feel proud. Then quietly go about getting the way ties are decided changed-This town talks constantly about building self-esteem in our young people-Well some, perhaps unknowingly, did a good job of trying to strip these 16 and 17 year olds of any good feelings they should be able to feel about themselves for doing what no one said they could do. After all, these are not pros being paid to go through pain and agony for the spectator's pleasure.

They weren't playing for you and they weren't playing for us. They play for themselves, so they don't need anybody to tell them how they are supposed to feel. They feel for themselves. You weren't out there on the field taking the punishment for them and you can't help them now. But you can hurt them. They are young and they want to please. But they will learn as all have to "you can't please everyone."

These are our young sons trying to grow up the best way they know how in the most perilous of times. We can hide the newspaper from them but we can't stop the wagging tongues. Were it not for the great coaching staff at LHS these boys might have ended their season feeling like failures-but, "The cream eventually rises to the top". Thanks guys! and Thanks Terry!

Sanders runs wild

AMES, Iowa (AP) — Barry Sanders rushed for 293 yards and four touchdowns, and Mike Gundy threw an 11-yard pass for the winning score with less than seven minutes to play as No. 13 Oklahoma State rallied for a 49-28 victory Saturday over Iowa State.

Oklahoma State came back after trailing 28-21 early in the fourth quarter to secure third place in the Big Eight Conference at 5-2 and raise its season record to 8-2. The Cowboys now are headed to the Holiday Bowl on Dec. 30 in San Diego against Wyoming.

Sanders, who became the Big Eight's single-season rushing leader, sprinted 80 yards for a touchdown to tie the score 28-28 with 14:04 left. Teammate David Bailey's interception of Bret Oberg's pass at the Oklahoma State 35 then set up the drive that produced the go-ahead touchdown.

The Cowboys covered the 65 yards in 10 plays. Sanders gained 15 yards on third-and-8 at the Iowa State 29 and three plays later at the 11, Gundy fired a pass to Hart Lee Dykes, who eluded Iowa State's Adam Beck just inside the 5 and bolted into the end zone. The go-ahead score came with 6:44 left.

Oklahoma State then broke it open with Sanders' 11-yard touchdown run, which came three plays after Stacey Watterwhite recovered an Oberg fumble at the Iowa State 34, and Garrett Limbrick's 4-yard scoring run with 2:20 remaining.

Sanders, who carried 32 times, also scored on runs of 4 and 25 yards in extending his NCAA season touchdown record to 35; set a national record for all-purpose yardage and moved to within 47 yards of breaking the NCAA one-season rushing record.

For the season, Sanders has run for 2,296 yards and compiled 2,897 yards rushing, returning kicks and catching passes. That breaks the national all-purpose record of 2,633 yards set by Temple's Paul Palmer.

Sanders also broke the Big Eight's season rushing record of 2,148 yards by Nebraska's Mike Rozier in 1983. The 5-foot-8, 197-pound junior has one more game to break Marcus Allen's NCAA rushing record of 2,342 yards. Oklahoma State concludes the regular season against Texas Tech in Japan on Dec. 4.

No. 12 Michigan 34, Ohio St 31

COLUMBUS, Ohio — John Kolesar returned a kickoff 59 yards to set up his own 41-yard touchdown reception with 1:37 to play, and Mark Spencer's interception ended a final Ohio State threat, leading No. 12 Michigan over Ohio State.

Michigan, 8-2-1 overall and 7-0-1 in the Big Ten, led 20-0 at the half then watched as Ohio State, 4-6-1 and 2-5-1, scored the next 24 points. Ohio State scored on its first five possessions of the second half.

The victory clinched Michigan's 12th outright Big Ten title. The Wolverines earned a berth in the Rose Bowl with a 38-9 victory over Illinois last week.

The loss ensured Ohio State's worst finish since going 4-5 in 1966.

After Ohio State took a 24-20 lead on Pat O'Morrow's 21-yard field goal with 8:30 left, Michigan drove 80 yards with Leroy Hoard, who had 158 yards on 23 carries, scoring on an 8-yard run with 4:20 left. Mike Gillette's extra-point kick made it 27-24 Michigan.

No. 15 Clemson 29
S. Carolina 10

CLEMSON, S.C. — Freshman Chris Gardocki kicked three field goals — two after South Carolina fumbles — as No. 15 Clemson beat the mistake-prone Gamecocks in the regular-season finale for both teams.

After the game, the two squads accepted bowl bids. Clemson, 9-2, will go to the Citrus Bowl against the loser of the Oklahoma-Nebraska game. South Carolina, 8-3, will play in the Liberty Bowl against Indiana.

With a record crowd of 84,500 watching at Death Valley, the Tigers used a short passing game to offset the Gamecocks' blitz and took advantage of four turnovers to capture the unofficial state football championship.

Clemson quarterback Rodney Williams had his best game of the year, hitting 13 of 26 passes for 192 yards with no interceptions.

Williams' counterpart, Todd Ellis, continued his late-season slump, hitting just 11 of 30 for 142 yards and one TD. Ellis hit 4 of 17 with one interception in the second half.

The Gamecocks, who ended the season by winning just two of their final five games, fumbled away their chances of victory in the first half. South Carolina fumbled on its first three possessions — the first two coming after driving to the Clemson 9- and 20-yard lines.

The Tigers were up 16-7 at the half thanks in part to the fumbles, then put the game away in the second half on touchdown runs of 1 yard by fullback Tracy Johnson with 4:56 left in the third period and 7 yards by Williams with 10:44 to go in the game.

Williams' score followed Rusty Charpia's interception of an Ellis pass at the Gamecock 42. Williams, one of 28 seniors playing his final home game, ran for 26 yards two plays later, then scored standing up two plays after that.

Washington State 32, Washington 31

PULLMAN, Wash. — Quarterback Timm Rosenbach scored on a fourth-down, 5-yard run with 9:06 left to give No. 19 Washington State a victory over Washington in a regular season-ending Pacific-10 Conference game played in snow flurries.

After the game, the Cougars, 8-3, received a formal invitation to play Houston in the Aloha Bowl in Honolulu on Christmas Day.

The Cougars rallied to win their intrastate Apple Cup with Washington, 6-5, in 34-degree weather after trailing 28-16 at halftime. It snowed off and on during the game.

With Washington ahead 31-26, Washington State got the ball on the Washington 13 when Shawn Landrum blocked a punt by Eric Canton with 10:42 left and Jay Languein fell on the ball. Washington was punting from its own 32.

The Cougars scored four plays later when Rosenbach, a junior who led the nation in passing going into the game, ran up the middle on a fourth-and-two play. Rosenbach attempted to run in a two-point conversion but failed.

Washington State, which will go to its first bowl since the 1981 Holiday Bowl in San Diego, came from behind in the second half with a pair of touchdowns and a field goal after committing four turnovers in the first half. The Huskies converted three of the turnovers into touchdowns.

R.C. Slocum became Texas A&M's Coach for a Day after head coach Jackie Sherrill threw himself into a self-imposed exile following allegations of wrongdoing. Slocum, the Aggies' defensive coordinator, led the Aggies to an 18-0 shutout over TCU. See related stories, Page 1C.

North Texas 33, Rice 17

HOUSTON (AP) — North Texas quarterback Scott Davis ran for two touchdowns and completed two touchdown passes, leading the Eagles over Rice.

The Eagles extended Rice's losing streak to 17 games, the longest in the nation.

Davis completed touchdown passes of 33 yards to Marcus Camper and 28 yards to David McGinty and ran for scores of 24 and 1 yards.

Camper zig-zagged between two tacklers and sidestepped safety Donald Hollas at the 15-yard line en route to the end zone.

Davis hit Camper on a 20-yard pass to set up his 28-yard touchdown strike to McGinty.

Davis highlighted North Texas' first half with his 24-yard touchdown run with 48 seconds left in the second quarter for a 12-3 halftime lead.

The Eagles' Gene Pool blocked Rice's first punt of the game out of the end zone for a safety and Keith Chapman kicked a 48-yard field goal.

Rice's Clint Parsons kicked a 22-yard field goal, his sixth in a row. Chapman's 48-yarder with 54 seconds left in the first quarter gave the Eagles the lead they never lost.

Rice rallied late in the fourth quarter with a 3-yard touchdown run by Richard Williams and Quentis Roper's 16-yard touchdown pass to Eric Henley.

The Owls dropped to an 0-10 record and the Eagles now are 8-3 for the season.

Baylor 17, Texas 14

WACO — Eldwin Raphel bolted 50 yards for a fourth period touchdown to rally the Baylor Bears over the Texas Longhorns in a windblown Southwest Conference game.

Baylor ended its season with a winning 6-5 record and 2-5 in SWC play. Texas, which has a game left on Thanksgiving night against Texas A&M, is 5-5 and 2-4.

Eric Metcalf ran 60 and 11 yards for touchdowns to present the Longhorns with a 14-10 lead before Raphel circled end, broke the tackle of Stanley Richard and scored his first touchdown of the year with 7:46 left in the game.

Interceptions by Ray Crockett and Yerritt Long of Shannon Kelley passes in the last 90 seconds of the game ended all hopes for the 'Horns.

The wind and slick turf from heavy rains hindered the offense. Winds gusted to 43 mph and rocked both goalposts as a cold front blew through dropping temperatures 20 degrees in an hour.

The score was tied 7-all at intermission with both teams taking advantage of the wind.

Metcalf dashed 60-yards for a touchdown in the first period, his second longest run as a collegian, to give Texas a 7-0 lead. Metcalf's previous career long run was 71 yards against Texas Christian in 1985.

Baylor tied it with 54 seconds left in the first half thanks to a fumble by backup fullback Deon Cockrell which was recovered by linebacker Gary Joe Kinney at the Texas 31.

Charles Perry gained 3 yards on a key fourth and two play. Then Baylor quarterback Brad Goebel found Darnell Chase behind defensive back Mark Berry for a 19-yard scoring pass.

Terry Syler's 32-yard field goal against the wind put Baylor ahead 10-7 in the third period before Metcalf's second touchdown run put the 'Horns up by four points.

Texas A&M 18, TCU 0

COLLEGE STATION (AP)— Texas A&M, playing without troubled Coach Jackie Sherrill, defeated Texas Christian behind the passing of Bucky Richardson.

Sherrill did not coach after a former player said the coach had paid him to keep quiet about alleged NCAA violations. Sherrill said the decision not to coach was to minimize the pressure on the team.

Richardson passed to Mike Jones for a touchdown, and set up a field goal with a completion to Rod Harris.

The victory for A&M, 6-4 and 5-1 in the Southwest Conference, extended its winning streak over TCU to 16 games.

TCU finished with a season record of 4-7. It is 2-5 in the SWC.

Any chance TCU had of winning in the rain and the flag-popping wind evaporated with six first half fumbles, three recovered by A&M.

Running back Tommy Palmer's fumble as he dove from the A&M 1-yard line for the end zone cost TCU an almost certain touchdown as A&M defensive back Alex Morris recovered at the A&M 5.

A&M scored on a 2-yard pass from Richardson to tight end Jones after a 49-yard pass completion to Harris, a split end, at the TCU 4.

A 27-yard Richardson-Harris completion to the TCU 20 set up Scott Slater's 38-yard field goal with four seconds left in the half for a 12-0 lead.

A fumble by second-team TCU quarterback David Rascoe at the TCU 30, on a sack by A&M linebacker John Roper, set up a 43-yard field goal by Slater.

Rascoe entered the game after starter Scott Ankrom was hurt as he made a first down at the A&M 28 but fumbled on TCU's first possession.

TCU had its own problems off the field. Three seniors, including placekicker Lee Newman, were suspended on the eve of the A&M game for disciplinary reasons.

Newman's substitute, walk-on Phillip Kuehler, missed a 28-yard field goal attempt in the second quarter.

Texas A&M President William H. Mobley said that Sherrill had not resigned and was not asked to resign. Defensive coordinator R.C Slocum assumed Sherrill's duties for the game.

Post season bowl picture becomes clearer

By BOB GREENE

Southern California and Nebraska settled two conference titles and four bowl matchups Saturday, while Notre Dame moved one step closer to a possible national title and a Fiesta Bowl showdown with West Virginia.

The Cornhuskers of Nebraska defeated Oklahoma 7-3 to capture the Big Eight Conference crown and clinch a berth in the Orange Bowl against Miami of Florida, the defending national champion. Despite the loss, Oklahoma heads to the Citrus Bowl for a Jan. 2 meeting against Clemson.

Notre Dame, hoping to play for the national championship when it faces West Virginia in the Fiesta Bowl Jan. 2, ran its record to 10-0 by crushing Penn State 21-3. The Irish will wind up the regular season next Saturday when they take on Southern California, which clinched a Rose Bowl berth against Michigan by defeating UCLA 31-22 for the Pac-10 title.

Despite the loss, UCLA will go to the Cotton Bowl against Southwest Conference champion Arkansas. The Southern Cal victory also means that Florida State will go to the Sugar Bowl against the Southeastern Conference host, either Louisiana State or Auburn.

Bowl bids were officially extended Saturday evening.

Notre Dame coach Lou Holtz said he's trying not to think about the Mountaineers yet.

"They seem to be a very good team, better than us right now," Holtz said from South Bend, Ind. "I've watched them on film, but all I can remember is they wore white (jerseys) on one film and dark on the other.

"The primary thing on our mind at this time is Southern Cal," Holtz added. "We have to play against a great team out there (in Los Angeles) and beat them."

Holtz said playing in the Fiesta for a national championship wouldn't put any additional pressure on his squad.

"I don't think it's the first time the cameras have been in front of us," Holtz said. "We're proud and happy to be 10-0 and going to the Fiesta Bowl. Our fans are excited, our faculty is excited and our football players couldn't be more excited. It should be a great game."

"I want to invite all of you — win or lose — to Phoenix to play the Irish," Pep Cooney, vice president of the Fiesta Bowl's team selection committee, told the Mountaineers and their coaches shortly before the 6 p.m. kickoff of West Virginia's game against No. 14 Syracuse.

"Out in Phoenix, we're just as proud of you guys as they are in Morgantown. We had our eye on you guys all year long."

Nebraska and Oklahoma lead four Big Eight teams playing in bowl games this season.

Steffi's win streak over

By ROBIN FINN
New York Times News Service

NEW YORK — The invincible one was felled by a common cold and an uncommon performance by Pam Shriver on Saturday.

Shriver stood sentry at the net and achieved a 6-3, 7-6 victory in the semi-finals of the Virginia Slims Championship that snapped Steffi Graf's winning streak at 46 matches.

"I had no chance," complained Graf, who felt poorly before the match and resigned after it. "I wasn't myself."

Graf, who used 1988 to solidify her hold on women's tennis by capturing the Grand Slam and an Olympic gold medal, won every major tournament she entered this year until this one at Madison Square Garden here.

She had hoped to defend her championship here, but instead she suffered an indignity her game had not seen since last spring. This was just the third time in 73 outings that Graf failed to win a tournament.

Her only other losses this year came against Gabriela Sabatini, who won Saturday's other semi-final. Sabatini, who has beaten her challengers like sparring partners, defeated Helena Sukova, 6-4, 6-2, to send herself into Sunday's final, which will be three of five sets and be worth $125,000.

Sabatini was defeated in four sets by Graf in last year's final, but Shriver, rarely a singles finalist in major tournaments, said she hadn't ever played a match under that format. Shriver, seeded fifth, holds a 5-3 career edge over Sabatini, who is seeded fourth.

Graf was the third highly seeded player in three days to lose. Martina Navratilova, seeded second, lost to Sukova Friday night and Chris Evert, seeded third, was beaten by Shriver on Thursday.

"What I already achieved this year is incredible to me," said the 19-year-old Graf, who had defaulted from her doubles match in order to prime herself for another singles title. "Sure, I wanted to have a better ending to my year, but it was not my choice."

The shots launched by the ailing Graf were a pale version of the real thing. The ashen-faced Graf, still running a temperature from the cold she caught earlier this week, only sporadically produced the sort of firebrand tennis that had outdistanced her from all challengers.

Her backhand slice lacked its usual punch, and often didn't clear the net. Her serve was adequate but not, as Shriver demonstrated as early as the second game, unbreakable. Even her renowned forehand was unreliable.

Graf said her weakened condition, and not Shriver's insistent serve-and-volley, was the cause of her downfall. "I was trying to play more topspin but it didn't quite work at all," she said.

Graf said she didn't notice heightened aggression from Shriver during the second-set tie breaker, which Shriver won by 7-5, reversing a tradition of tie-breaker collapses.

"She did it for the whole match," Graf said of Shriver's incessant charges on the net.

Graf's various letdowns were exactly what Shriver needed to let herself into the match. She was unperturbed by losing the first game, in which she twice double-faulted, because she broke back in the second.

No. 1 SFA ends with loss

NACOGDOCHES, Texas (AP) — Quarterback Scott Stoker completed 14 of 25 passes for 172 yards Saturday and led Northwestern State to the Southland Conference championship with a 20-17 victory over Stephen F. Austin, the No. 1-ranked team in NAIA Division I-AA.

Northwestern rolled up 437 yards in improving its overall record to 9-2 and a SLC mark to 6-0. SFA finished the regular season at 9-2 and 5-1.

The two teams will wait until Sunday afternoon to learn their playoff opponents.

Northwestern State, which entered the game ranked No. 10 in NCAA Division I-AA football, rolled to a 14-0 lead at the 9:50 mark of the second quarter.

After a scoriess period, the Demons moved 80 yards in nine plays as Mike O'Neal plunged in from the one. A 27-yard run by by Mark Mayfield padded the lead to 14-0.

SFA quarterback Todd Hammel connected with Joe Bradford for a 33-yard touchdown pass that made the score 14-7, and Chuck Rawlinson cut Northwestern Louisiana's lead to 14-10 with a 51-yard field goal in the third quarter.

Northwestern got its final score on a 2-yard run by Stoker with 5:38 left in the third.

SFA scored its last touchdown with 5:21 left in the game on 1-yard run by Marvin Davis.

Northwestern was able to kill run out the closk with a time-consuming drive.

Cowboys, Sweeney face mad pack of cats

By DENNE H. FREEMAN

IRVING, Texas (AP) — All Tom Landry needed facing his luckless Dallas Cowboys Sunday was an angry Cincinnati Bengals team.

The Cowboys have lost seven games in a row in their worst season in 29 years (2-9) and can't get a break.

The Bengals, division leaders in the AFC Central with an 8-3 record, come calling at noon today after a 31-28 loss to lowly Kansas City.

"We got outplayed and we've got to start our momentum over again with Dallas," said Cincinnati coach Sam Wyche.

Cincinnati blew a nine-point lead with six minutes left in the upset victory by the Chiefs.

"There was no way we should let Kansas City beat us," said Bengals' quarterback Boomer Esiason. "It tells you that the ballclub can't stand prosperity. It forgets that it has to play a full game. At the most crucial moment, mistakes happen. When you have those mistakes, you're not going to win the game.

"I'm more ticked off now than I've ever been."

Just what the Cowboys want to hear.

Landry said, "I imagine Cincinnati will be pretty fired up when they get here after what happened in Kansas City. We're not getting very lucky this year. We'll just try to be ready."

The Cowboys, fresh off a 43-3 flogging by the Minnesota Vikings, haven't won a game since they beat Atlanta 26-20 on Sept. 25.

Dallas and Cincinnati have met only three times, the last time on Dec. 8, 1985, in Riverfront Stadium with Esiason passing for three touchdowns and 265 yards in a 50-24 victory.

The Bengals befuddled the Cowboys with their no-huddle offense.

"They caught us off balance that time," Landry said. "We'll have to be alert for the no-huddle. It can really confuse your defense."

Dallas has defeated the Bengals twice at Texas Stadium, 38-10 in 1973 and 38-13 in 1979.

"We had to prepare for two games this week," Landry said. "We have to turn right around and play the Houston Oilers on Thanksgiving."

Kevin Sweeney will get a second chance start at quarterback for the Cowboys.

He suffered four interceptions, five sacks and two fumbles in the rout by the Vikings in his first start of the season.

"Kevin deserved another shot," Landry said. "We gave him such bad protection it's a wonder he didn't end up dead."

Sweeney nursed a bruised right shoulder all week and Steve Pelluer shared practice time.

Landry said, "I won't hesitate to change quarterbacks if we don't get going offensively. Kevin and Steve will play a lot in our next five games. We have to see who will be our quarterback for next year."

Playoffs on line for Houston, Phoenix

By MICHAEL A. LUTZ

HOUSTON (AP) — Houston Oiler tight end Jamie Williams no longer depends on the exuberance of youth to carry out his assignments.

Now he's a thinking tight end, and those who watch Williams think he's become a premier blocker.

"I'm changing my style for each player," Williams said. "That happened to me when I was younger. Guys would change their style on me and neutralize me.

"Now I study each guy individually and try to do things to take him out of his game. I've shut out a couple of Pro Bowlers and I've dominated some guys."

Williams and the Oilers take on the Phoenix Cardinals Sunday in the Astrodome with playoff implications involved for both teams.

Houston has a 7-4 record and is in second place in the AFC Central Division and the Cardinals have a three-game winning streak for a 7-4 record and a tie for first in the NFC Eastern Division.

Williams started the season wanting to be more involved in the Oiler passing game and he still wants to catch passes.

But it hasn't detracted from his blocking skills.

"I'm a tight end from the old school," Williams said. "I know you have to do more than catch passes. Their tight ends don't work as hard as I do in some areas.

"As long as our offense is basically dynamic, I don't worry about it. I'd rather be a tight end that's also a receiver."

Williams has caught six passes for 46 yards this season but he's been more concerned with confusing his opponents.

"I want to be on a guy so much that he forgets about his responsibility and starts worrying about me," Williams said.

Williams' concerns about receiving are that he often doesn't get a chance to redeem a dropped pass.

Williams missed a key pass in last week's 27-24 loss to Seattle.

"There's usually a lot more to a play than you see," Williams said. "I realize that but the only thing that worries me is I only get one or two passes a game."

The Oilers are averaging 151 yards per game rushing, fourth in the NFL, but their passing attack is near the bottom.

Starting quarterback Warren Moon missed five games with a broken shoulder bone, causing a drop off in the pass-oriented offense this season.

Mike Rozier leads the Oiler rushers with 676 yards on 176 carries followed by Allen Pinkett with 431 yards on 99 carries and Alonzo Highsmith with 354 yards on 68 carries.

Phoenix ranks third in the NFC in rushing, led by Earl Farrell with 729 yards on 148 carries and Stump Mitchell with 518 yards on 118 carries.

Television networks continue to exercise control over NFL

By DAVE GOLDBERG

In the spring of 1984, in an unusual attempt to placate its fans rather than the television networks, the NFL adopted some new guidelines:

■ No longer, said the owners, would commercial breaks be permitted after a turnover that puts the ball in scoring positions.

■ No longer, they declared, would there be commercials after kickoffs ending the practice that led in one 1983 playoff game to four commercials around three plays: commercial-touchdown-commercial-kickoff-commercial-end of quarter.

But almost as soon as the guidelines took effect, the backsliding began — in the second game of the 1985 season, in a game between the Packers and the Giants, a fumble recovery that gave New York the ball on the Green Bay 25 was followed by a commercial.

Moreover, it's gotten worse — the touchdown-kickoff-commercial series is quite common again. Why? Because, the NFL says, the networks get behind in the number of commercials when there are long drives and have to make them up.

Not quite — the NFL deliberately lets them get behind, particularly in doubleheader games.

"Boy this game is going fast," a spectator remarked at the Washington-New Orleans game a few weeks ago as the first quarter whizzed by. Sure it was, they hadn't taken a commercial break despite three punts.

Why? Because the NFL routinely allows the networks to wait until all the early games are finished before beginning the late games. That way, fans who are brought in from the first game will miss most or all of the first-quarter action in the second game, but they won't miss the commercials.

Sure enough, after the Bucs-Bears and Giants-Cowboys games had ended, the Saints-Redskins contest slowed down — with three commercials following kickoffs.

Maybe the doubleheader should be billed as a running commercial rather than a game.

PASSING FANCIES

All you had to know about the outcome of the Miami-New England game two weeks ago is that Miami's Dan Marion passed 52 times and completed 29 for 351 yards. Or that Doug Williams and Mark Rypien combined for 324 yards against the Bears last week.

The winners: New England 21-10 and Chicago 34-14.

In fact, there have been 45 instances in 154 games this season in which NFL teams have grossed more than 300 yards through the air. Twenty-two have won, 22 have lost and one was involved in a tie — Steve DeBerg of Kansas City passed for 312 yards in a 17-17 tie with the Jets.

That's why coaches are basically conservative, obeying the old Darrell Royal axiom that three things can happen when you pass and two are bad. Actually, it's three bad things of four — De Berg, for example, was sacked six times in that tie with the Jets.

Midland High's Marty Skaggs prepares to get hammered underneath by Greenwood's Terry Morgan (35) and Jason Harris.

MHS

The Bulldogs built their lead despite running into foul trouble in the first half. However, Greenwood was unable to capitalize, missing six front ends in the first half alone.

Meanwhile, the Bulldog press was causing the Rangers problems, fueling many an easy basket for MHS. Stephenson said intense pressure was part of the plan from the beginning.

"Our whole plan was constant pressure, pressure, pressure," Stephenson said. "Pretty soon, it got to them.

"Not taking anything away from Midland's press, but we just didn't handle the pressure," Chaney said. The Ranger coach lamented his team's propensity to play into MHS' game plan.

"The press did that to us. When we came downcourt and passed once before shooting, we were playing right into their hands."

MHS nearly shut off Ranger scoring entirely in the second half. Greenwood managed only five second-half baskets, and couldn't even draw many fouls despite the continously thorny press.

MHS, 1-0, will travel to Pecos Tuesday. Greenwood, 0-2, tries to break into the win column at home against Monahans Tuesday.

Bird's surgery a success

By HOWARD ULMAN

BOSTON (AP) — Larry Bird underwent "very successful" surgery on both heels Saturday and the Boston Celtics' star should be able to return to basketball in three to four months, his surgeon said.

Dr. Arnold Scheller, who performed the 90-minute operation, said Bird would remain hospitalized for one or two days and wear fixed casts for about six weeks. He estimated that for the following six weeks Bird would wear removable casts.

Then, he said, it would be up to Celtics' Coach Jimmy Rodgers to decide when Bird could play in an NBA game.

If Bird returns in four months for Boston's game with San Antonio March 20, he would be back with 19 games remaining in the regular season.

Scheller said at a news conference that his reason for changing his original estimate of a three-month rehabilitation "is the potential for rupture" of the Achilles' tendons. The tendons were cut in both heels to remove the bone spurs that were irritating them.

He said 30 percent of the surface area of the tendons was damaged in the operation, performed under general anesthesia, rather than the 40 to 50 percent he suspected Friday night.

Asked about the possibility that Bird might be so eager to play he would rush back to action before he is ready, Scheller said, "He's extremely cooperative on this. He realizes the magnitude of the problem."

The tendons, he said, "will rupture if you bring him back prematurely."

The thickness of the tendons and discomfort in the heels will affect how soon Bird returns, Scheller said.

Celtics' General Manager Jan Volk said the team had not filled Bird's roster spot.

"I'm pleased that we have what appears to be a good result," Volk added. "We want a good result in the long run" and won't rush Bird back.

Scheller said he thought that after rehabilitation, Bird, 31, could return to his usual level of play.

He said he was concerned before the operation that the tendons might have degenerated.

LSU's Brown outspoken opponent of Prop 48

By AUSTIN WILSON

BATON ROUGE, La. (AP) — Dale Brown was disenchanted by Proposition 48 before. Now he's outraged.

"I know what some people will say sour grapes. But I'm for human dignity above everything else," he said.

Three of Brown's recruits at Louisiana State University did not meet the NCAA's academic requirements this year, including widely recruited 7-foot center Stanley Roberts. In its college basketball edition, Sports Illustrated magazine picked an All-Proposition 48 team, and included Roberts.

"It's a lifetime stigma. It's the mark of Cain. People are pointing fingers and laughing at these young men. It's not fair," Brown said.

"Why should a 15 set you free and a 14 make you a slave?"

Proposition 48 — more accurately NCAA bylaw 5-1-(j) — sets academic standards for the eligibility of entering freshmen. It requires passing grades in a core of 11 high school academic subjects, plus a score of 700 on the SAT (Scholastic Aptitude Test) or 15 on the ACT (American College Testing Program).

Failure to meet those standards means the player must sit out his freshman year and lose that season of eligibility.

"I'm for upgrading our schools," Brown said, rattling off a string of survey results that seem to indicate America is producing a generation of clods.

"I was for Proposition 48 when it was introduced. But it wasn't intended to be applied this way," he said.

Basketball is dominated by black athletes, and the press, Brown claimed, notices only the failure of top recruits to meet the Prop 48 requirements.

"The average SAT for the nation last year was 906. For blacks, 728," he said. "If we're talking about equity, if we're talking about raising opportunities for blacks to be educated, maybe we ought to consider that these tests are racially and culturally biased."

He said he would prefer the NCAA to declare all freshmen ineligible, then give them four years of eligibility afterward. Doing it that way would cost colleges more money, he said, but it would also increase graduation rates and give players the protection of federal privacy laws that forbid releasing grades or test scores.

"Don't give them any 'breaks' once they're in school. Don't do them any 'favors.' If they make it, fine. If they don't, sorry, come back and visit some time," he said.

"And if (some school) is making it easier on its athletes than LSU is, well that's their problem. That's something they have to live with."

"We're demanding that these kids entertain us, win, be our heroes, raise money and still carry a full academic load. The migrant farm workers didn't have it as bad as our present college athletes. They need a Cesar Chavez," he said.

"When a school goes out to raise money, they seldom take the chemistry professors with them. It's always the coaches and athletes."

"I don't have a doubt in my mind that college should be very difficult. It's higher education, and we should educate them properly," he said.

"But in educating, we need to have a system that will not embarrass.

"Nobody should be pointing fingers and calling them stupid," he said. "My mother finished eighth grade. Does that mean she was stupid? I'd bash your head in if you called her that."

Alysheba honored

LOUISVILLE, Ky. (AP) — Racing fans bade farewell Saturday to Alysheba, the world's richest thoroughbred, during a parade at historic Churchill Downs.

Chris McCarron, who rode the colt to victory in the 1987 Kentucky Derby and this year's Breeders' Cup Classic, said he knew Alysheba was an exceptional horse, but "I never dreamed he'd be this good."

"I'm thrilled to be here to get on his back one more time," McCarron said. "I'm going to miss him."

Alysheba paraded in the paddock prior to the day's seventh race and on the track before the eighth race with cheers and applause from a crowd of 13,841.

Will Farish, owner of Lane's End Farm in Versailles, telephoned Churchill Downs President Tom Meeker on Nov. 12 to inform Meeker that Alysheba was being retired and to ask if the track would be interested in parading Alysheba.

Dorothy and Pamela Scharbauer's 4-year-old bay son of Alydar, who earned $6,679,242 to surpass John Henry's $6,597,947 as tops in racing, will go to stallion duty at Lane's End. There, Alysheba will stand for a $75,000 stud fee, according to a Churchill Downs news release.

"People love being close to this horse, and Alysheba loves being the center of attention," Hall of Fame trainer Jack Van Berg said before Saturday's parade. "By parading him in the paddock and on the track, we'll give his fans a chance to take pictures and to see him up close one last time."

Alysheba, winner of 11 races in 26 starts, took the earnings lead by winning the $3 million Classic at Churchill Downs on Nov. 5.

He was bred in Kentucky by Preston Madden and out of the multiple stakes-winning producer Bel Sheba, by Lt. Stevens.

Alysheba's only two appearances at Churchill Downs were in the Derby and the Classic.

Among the 12 other stallions at Lane's End are 1985 Kentucky Derby winner Spend a Buck and 1987 Arlington Million winner Manila.

Jesus Chapel running back Robert Martinez (10) runs past Mustang defenders R.P.JohnsonandJoel Hobbs.

MUSTANGS

In fairness to Midland Christian, the two dominated all other Charger opponents, gaining over 1,100 yards each as Jesus Chapel rolled up an average of almost 60 points a game in its first 11 contests.

Meanwhile, the cold, windy conditions and an injury to freshman halfback Patrick McAdams stunted Midland Christian's offense. The Mustangs rushed for only 105 yards in McAdams' abscence and 45 of those were on a last-minute drive against the Chargers' second-team defense.

And, both weather and the Charger rush were rough on MC quarterback Joel Hobbs, who finished his career by completing only nine of 25 passes for 171 yards and two touchdowns.

Things were especially rough for Hobbs in the second half, when he was only three-for-12 and underthrew several open receivers. "It seemed to get colder in the second half.

"I threw as hard as I could, but they (his passes) just kept diving. They were just a better team today."

The Mustangs got off on the wrong foot when freshman Jay Dallas fumbled the opening kickoff and was stopped on the Mustang one-yard-line. LaFollette then rushed in from defensive end on the first play to trap Dallas in the end zone for a safety and a lead the Chargers would never give up.

After a free kick, the Mustang defense forced a fourth down and long yardage situation, but Martinez swept around right end for a 33-yard scoring run with 7:24 left in the period.

After the Mustangs lost the ball on downs in their second possession, Smith broke free for a 39-yard scoring run toward the end of the period.

But Midland Christian's Hobbs-to-(Aaron) Petree passing combo clicked in the final minutes of the period for gains of 26 and 33 yards. The 33-yard play put the Mustangs on the scoreboard and all-conference kicker David Christopher booted his 17th extra point of the season to cut the Charger lead to 14-8.

Extra-point kicks are worth two points in six-man football.

Smith outfought Petree for a 20-yard scoring pass in the final minute of the first half, then struck a telling blow with his 80-yard TD return of the second half kickoff to make the score 27-8.

Nevertheless, Midland continued to stop Jesus Chapel up the middle, forcing Charger coach Cloyd Helton to change plans.

"We're pretty well known for running up the middle, so we expected them to key on us there. We threw many more passes than we usually do."

Gomersall and Smith, who filled in at QB in the second half, combined to complete six of 12 passes.

After Hobbs engineered one final touchdown drive early in the fourth quarter, finishing with a four-yard pass to Randy Cloyd, the Mustang reserves took over and drove 55 yards in nine plays. Cloyd wrapped it up with a one-yard run off a devastating block by halfback Drew Akins.

Freshman QB Kevin Jackson keyed the drive with a 20-yard scamper down the right sideline.

Creighton shows heart of sports

Associated Press

OMAHA, Neb. (AP) — Creighton University basketball coach Tony Barone says his team's plans to assist the homeless on Thanksgiving and throughout the basketball season continue to draw national attention.

He told an audience of about 70 attending the second of eight Barone basketball luncheons Friday that response to the formation of the Creighton Basketball Pride Club has drawn national television and interviews, although that wasn't the purpose of the plan.

The Bluejays announced last weekend Pride Club memberships will carry an annual fee of $5, with $1 of that being donated to help Omaha's homeless. Club members will receive two $6.50 tickets to any Creighton game and will be mailed the "CU Hoop Scoop," a weekly newsletter.

THE BLUEJAYS' 14 players and five coaches will spend part of Thanksgiving Day at the Francis House in Omaha working the soup line. "Good Morning America" has scheduled an interview with Barone while they are there.

"We have kind of mixed emotions about that," Barone said. "The purpose of the club is not to generate publicity for the basketball team or the university or the program."

The coach said he was pleasantly surprised at the interest the Pride Club generated the past week.

AGGIES

Ralph Langer, vice president and executive editor of The Dallas Morning News, said in a statement released after the news conference that the newspaper reported accurately what Smith said took place.

"We have approximately eight hours of taped interviews with George Smith. We have a signed statement from him that the information he gave us was true," Langer said.

"Reporter Doug Bedell and Smith had a separate personal contract to develop a book proposal and submit it to a publisher and-or agent. Such a proposal was submitted to an agent and to Smith in October.

"That contract specifies that nothing was ever to be paid to Smith for information to be used in any book or for stories in The Dallas Morning News even though he had requested such payment," the newspaper executive said.

Concerning Smith's denial that some of the funds paid him constituted hush money, Langer said, Smith said in a taped interview on the morning of Oct. 21, "... all that was to keep me quiet for another couple months."

The last payment from Sherrill, according to Smith, came on Sept. 27, 1988, four days after an announcement that the NCAA was placing Texas A&M on probation for numerous rules violations, the most serious involving former quarterback Kevin Murray.

Smith said he got other packages of money, all by Federal Express, in June and on Sept. 13.

"It was not uncommon for me to seek help from Coach Sherrill and Coach (George) Pugh. I called them often and sought advice and help with jobs and my getting started in a career," Smith said.

"It was nor a surprise to receive some help I had asked for. It certainly was not hush money," Smith said.

The news conference came shortly after Texas A&M defeated Texas Christian 18-0 in a Southwest Conference game. Because of the controversy surrounding Smith's revelations, Sherrill announced Friday he wouldn't coach the Aggies in the game. Instead, he watched on television, turning the team over to defensive coordinator R.C. Slocum.

However, Sherrill said he will be back on the sidelines for Thursday night's game with Texas.

Smith said Texas A&M paid for his flight to College Station for Saturday's press conference.

Smith said his fiance and his family encouraged him to "tell the truth regardless of the consequences."

Smith said he wanted to apologize to A&M president William H. Mobley, to the A&M student body, to the football team, and to "Aggies all over the country."

AP Laserphoto

Asked why anyone should believe Smith's version Saturday of the situation, Smith said, "If you don't believe me, that's fine."

Mobley said Sherrill had not resigned, had not offered to resign, and had not been asked to resign. Mobley also said that anyone involved in the matter should avoid a "rush to judgment."

Mobley noted that the allegations in the Morning News story, according to Smith, "were not true and are not true."

He said the proposed book that was to be written based on his interviews with Bedell include "some things that never happen."

As an example, he cited a report in the Dallas Morning News that Sherrill and Pugh paid for round-trip plane flights between College Station and Smith's home in Atlanta.

"This never occurred," Smith said at the news conference. "I never got any help on plane tickets from anyone other than my mother in first getting to A&M, and my uncle in later trips."

The News also reported that Sherrill was aware that a booster was paying Smith $100 for his game tickets.

"I never sold any game tickets, and the only time I ever picked mine up was to give to other teammates. I was never paid any money for tickets," Smith said Saturday.

Smith had told Bedell that Sherrill gave him money for room and board during a summer stay in a Texas A&M residence hall, but Smith said Saturday he paid for his lodging costs with money he earned as a construction worker. He received no other funds from anyone, he said.

His claim that Sherrill gave him between $200 and $400 to do minimal work around Sherrill's house also was untrue, Smith said.

"This is not true. I did work there a couple of times cleaning the pool or raking but was paid only $20-30 for my work. This was done during the summer, when it was perfectly legal to do so," Smith said.

Of payments he received in June and September of this year, Smith said:

"It was not uncommon for me to seek help from Coach Sherrill and Coach Pugh. I called them often and sought advice and help with jobs and my getting started in a career. I considered myself to be very close to them.

"Earlier in the year, I had written Coach Sherrill and later talked to him on the phone seeking some help financially to get started. Then I needed to rent an apartment. And once I discussed the control data training school. I once discussed Tampa Bay tryouts and Coach Perkins. Once I asked Coach Sherrill about employment with GTE South, but he only knew someone with GTE West."

Texas A&M regents were scheduled to meet in College Station over the weekend, but A&M public information director Lane Stephenson said the meeting was set up months ago and has nothing to do with the controversy over Smith and Sherrill.

Although the regents could be briefed about the sitution, the regents are not expected to take any action regarding Sherrill, Stephenson said.

Almost Historic Home

Families have been gathering for years for Thanksgiving in this formal living room. The home was built in 1939 and has many features which are still popular today.

Text by Jill Hancock Photos by Doug Sehres

As extended families begin to gather during the week for Thanksgiving, this week's featured home seemed very appropriate due to the many Thanksgivings that have been shared here. This house was originally built for the J.O. Nobles family and the interior of the home is just as fashionable today as it was in 1939. Arched entry ways, hardwood floors and a sequestered master bedroom are only a few of the qualities that this Southwestern style home affords.

With four children, the Nobles planned the formal living and dining rooms to accommodate their large, active family - and through the years for their children's families as well. According to Martha Nobles Black, who was already married when this house was built, this home contains a lot of holiday memories. One Thanksgiving that she remembered well was during the early 1950's. It was a special holiday that year because it was one of the first times that her three brothers and their families were all present for Thanksgiving.

"This particular Thanksgiving was memorable because we all were able to be together with our own families. Everyone would bring a covered dish and Mother would always cook the turkey and dressing. The adults would have their meal in the dining room and while the children ate in the breakfast area in the kitchen," explained Ms. Black. "

An arched entry way leads from the foyer into the formal living room. The living room focuses on a fireplace with a carved mantle and a tile hearth. Above the fireplace a mirror reflects the many beautiful antiques that fill this nine foot ceiling room.

The formal dining room is adjacent to the living room. A very unique feature of the room is a bow window highlighted by bottle glass squares. This room also has two other windows that are situated on both sides of the bow window. The other walls in the room are ideal for an antique china cabinet and server.

The eat-in kitchen is found next to the dining room. The Southwestern feel of the home can be seen in the arched wall above the General Electric self-cleaning range. One architectural feature that older homes are noted for are corner windows and this kitchen has one that provides a grand view of the front yard. The kitchen also has a Hotpoint dishwasher, a broom closet and a large pantry.

Next to the kitchen, the service porch is located. A door opens to lead down into the basement and at the top of the stairs is the hook where Mr. Nobles used to hang the ranch key. The current homeowners decided to preserve a little of the home's history by not painting over the space where he had written "ranch key." The basement has storage closets and is brightened by a window. It is very unusual to find a home in Midland with a basement and the uses for this room are endless - for hobbies, exercise or for a pool table - as well as a shelter during the tornado season.

A door leads outside from the service porch to the two car garage that is paneled in rough cedar. The garage can accommodate today's large family vehicles and has automatic door openers. Behind the garage, the utility room, half-bath and work shop are situated. Originally, explained Ms. Black, this area was used for live-in help with one room opening into the service yard where the clothesline is still standing and where her father would plant a garden each spring.

A walkway leads between the gray brick house with slate trim and the garage. The garage displays the same weather vane, of a horse, that showed the ranching heritage of this family. The walkway opens onto a spacious backyard, with the sequestered service yard to the right. A flagstone patio is the perfect place to sit and relax while noticing the unusual landscaping that the yard has. A brick and wrought iron fence surround the backyard which is still landscaped with plants that were very popular during the era when this home was built.

Re-entering the home through the service porch, a person winds their way through the kitchen into the rooms behind the formal living room. The first room was designed as a study or den and it features a wall of bookcases. This area has putty walls and mauve carpeting.

The den flows into the sunroom which was an addition after the home was built for an extra room for the family to relax in. This room has lots of windows and a door leads onto the flagstone patio.

Please see HISTORIC, Page 2D

The dining room is highlighted by a bow window with inlaid bottle glass.

HISTORIC

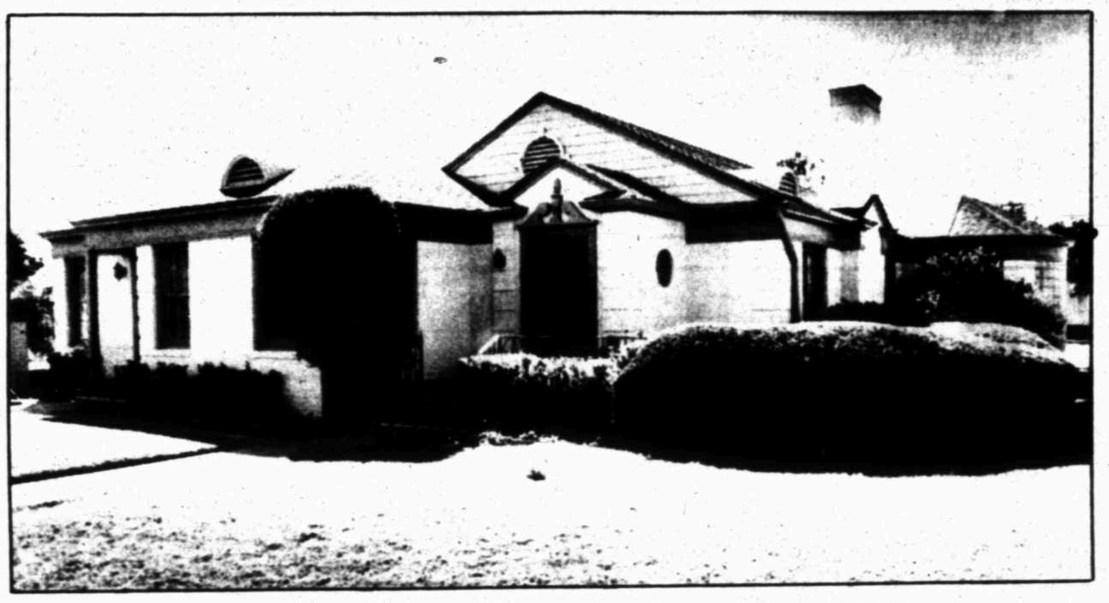
The sequestered master bedroom is situated to the right of the den and is decorated with pale rose walls. An antique quilt, in addition to the sitting area by the corner window, helps a person to see how this room must have looked years ago. This room also has two spacious closets.

An arched wall above the vanity and bathtub highlight the master bath. The arrangement of this bath is ideal for two people. A vanity, which was designed as a make-up area is situated along one wall, with the sink on another wall.

Walking through the den area, a hall leads to the home's other bedrooms. Both of these rooms have windows which provide lots of sunshine, hardwood floors, and big closets. The second bedroom has a door which leads to the side yard. Pale pink line the walls of the hall bath that is shared by these two bedrooms.

The other amenities of this "almost historic home" that is situated on a spacious corner lot are a sprinkler system, cedar closet and solid plaster walls. The home contains approximately 2,600 square feet and First Realty of Midland/Better Homes and Garden is offering it for $119,000.

The master bedroom has pale rose walls and a corner window provides a wonderful place for a cozy sitting area. The room is also spacious enough for a second sitting area or an antique dresser across from the bed.



Although this home is 49 years old, the gray brick with slate blue trim make this home very appealing. The house is located on three lots and the landscaping conforms to the era when the home was built. The plants along the front walkway were provided by La Casa Verde.

Survey shows need for short-term housing

How important is temporary housing when a family moves? Very, according to a research project conducted by Homequity, Inc. of Wilton, Connecticut, the nation's oldest and largest corporation relocation management company. The study was undertaken because of the problems relocation families have finding temporary housing between the time they close on their home at the departure location, and the time they have access to their new home in the destination area.

"This is a much more serious problem than it would appear to be," said Traci McFadden with the Residential & Commercial Management Department of Don Harvey, Realtors. "The obvious answer is to find a hotel or motel for a few days until the family can occupy their new home. But, unfortunately, that isn't usually the way it works. Most of the time," McFadden says,"the need for temporary housing is for a much greater time - as long as three or four months. That can become very expensive for a family of four, not to mention the frustration of being cooped up in a single room and taking all of their meals at restaurants.

There are a lot of other considerations that one would not ordinarily think about. For example, McFadden says, temporary housing isn't just finding a place to live. That is easy. But if the children are of school age, it becomes a problem to live in one school district and then have to transfer to another in a matter of a few months. Not only is this disruptive of the child's education, it is a hardship on the family in other ways. Such arrangements, while serving as a stopgap for one problem, create more problems for all the members of the family. There is the stress factor caused by the frustration of have many things to do associated with moving into a new home, and the seemingly endless delays before it is possible to get started.

"The survey show that this is a real problem in many areas," McFadden says. Seldom can people sell at one end, buy at the other, vacate and move into the new home without long lapses of time necessitating temporary housing. Sometimes the transferee is the only one needing temporary housing. This is a relatively easy one to solve. The transferee really only needs a bedroom and a bath, and they can be located in nearly any part of town. But when the whole family needs accommodations it presents a problems of major proportions," says McFadden.

"There is also the problem of furniture storage," continued McFadden, establishing shopping patterns, getting to know the neighbors and all of those things a new family in a neighborhood needs to do. But they don't want to do it twice for a single move, and temporary housing is not always available in the same neighborhood and school district as the new home.

"Here in Midland, no apartments are being built now. Most of the construction is in single family residences. These are being built for sale, not for short term lease," McFadden says.

The problem is intensified nationally because some areas have a custom of possession being granted 30 days after closing, the study shows.

Don Harvey, Realtors is a member of the Homequity Relocation Centers, a national network of some 300 independent real estate brokers composed of some 300 members whose 30,000 agents serve 325 leading market areas.

Attractive table setting reflects individual style

By The Associated Press

An attractive table setting, it is said, enhances a meal.

Before selecting your tableware, you should decide on the point of view you want to take and choose a pattern that reflects your individual style.

"Dinnerware will be the foundation of your well-dressed table," says Alice Kolator, director of public relations for Lenox China and Crystal. "Keep a close eye on pattern and color. When mixing and matching patterns, follow the basic rule that background colors should always match."

"Flatware," she says, "can repeat and enhance a motif established by a dinnerware pattern. Or it can make a statement all its own. It offers great flexibility when mixing and matching patterns."

As for crystal, the "crowning jewel of your table," Ms. Kolator advises: "A more heavily cut crystal is best when joined with simple dinnerware. Delicately cut crystal is more versatile and can be used with a wide variety of dinnerware patterns."

"The younger generation is fascinated with food and it's spreading to their dinnerware," says Peter Jungkunst, executive vice president of Jungkunst China. "People are investigating the consumer benefits as well as the aesthetics of china."

Jungkunst says eating from china encourages food variety in a meal. "People are more likely to include all four of the food groups when serving a meal on china," he says, "while eating on paper plates encourages one to eat an imbalanced meal."

Adequate insulation makes winter more comfortable

Seasonal comfort in your home is possible without higher energy bills. By installing adequate insulation you'll be more comfortable, and you'll be getting the most from your heating and cooling dollar.

On average, 60 percent of your home's monthly energy bill goes for heating and cooling. By adding the proper amount of insulation to your home, you may cut these costs by up to half. Remember that the higher the insulation's resistance, or "R" value, the lower your losses will be in terms of heating and cooling dollars.

Your home's attic and basement are two essential areas for insulation. The walls should be considered also, but because insulation here is more difficult to install, you need to weight the extra costs against your expected energy savings. Your local electric utility or an insulation contractor can give more information on this trade-off.

And don't forget an insulating blanket for your water heater. After home heating and cooling, water heating is your largest energy expense.

Langston Realtors Talk About...

Changes in the real estate market

Q. Even though I bought my house nearly 40 years ago and am not even considering making a move, I look forward to reading your column and am disappointed when one is not in the Sunday paper. I am amazed at the changes that have occurred over the years in the buying and selling of homes; do you think these have been for better or for worse? E.H.S.

Langston

A. We, too, bought a home nearly 40 years ago (34 to be exact, and it was our first!) but unlike you, have sold and bought 6 times since then. Therefore we experienced first hand many of the changes in addition to dealing with them through 23 years of being in the real estate business. We agree, it's not like the old days but then what is! Some of the changes are for the better: innovative Mortgage programs that enable more buyers to qualify for home ownership; expanded educational requirements for real estate licensees; increased co-operation between Realtors because of expanded Board and Multiple Listing Programs; the amenities and quality found in new construction; more comprehensive zoning restrictions.

Many more changes involved because of litigation and through necessity: the new disclosure statement reminding buyers that the Realtor is the agent for "he who pays", normally the seller; the property inspection business; contracts promulgated by the Texas Real Estate Commission in co-operation with the State Bar of Texas; truth-in-lending disclosure on mortgage applications; adjustable rate and non-assumable mortgages that protect lenders from commitment to below market interest rates 20 or more years down the line;

However, we do have to admit that some of the changes, even though necessary and unavoidable, have made buying and selling homes more difficult for all: higher interest rates; mortgage documentation requirements that increase costs and extend the loan approval process, sometimes for weeks; closing procedures that delay the seller receiving his money until the next day or so; the decrease in assumable, non-qualifying mortgages; the drastic rise then fall in Midland's home prices during the past ten years; the restrictions and hassles of VA Mortgages.

Let me hasten to add that these changes are not the "fault" of the lending, closing, appraisal or real estate companies, but a result of the economy and a product of the advances (?) being made in home buying and selling. Unfortunately, the days of 20 percent down, five percent interest rate mortgages on $20,000 purchases of 2700 square foot homes with closing in two weeks are probably gone forever. So, are the days of offers hand written on the hood of the car by a purchaser trying to be the first to submit a contract for a $2,000 equity on a $16,000, 2400 square foot home with a non-qualifying assumable six percent mortgage.

But look at what we have instead: beautiful new subdivisions such as Polo, Saddle Club, Trinity, Wydewood and the Crestgates inhabited by young families; the amenities of two baths, covered patios, appliianced kitchens and refrigerated air conditioning, in more and more homes priced at lower and lower figures; a wide range of new innovative mortgage programs that enable an ever increasing number to become home owners. Better or worse? You decide.

If you have any questions on real estate that you would like answered in this column, you are invited to call or write me at Langston Realtors, 1908 West Wall, Midland, Texas 79701 (915)682-9495.

Experts tell ways to free sticking windows

By JOHN WARDE
New York Times News Service

Although double-hung windows — the kind with upper and lower sashes that slide vertically — have been popular for centuries, all-wood models usually stick at some point, from warping or accumulated layers of old paint.

Freeing stuck double-hung sashes is easy in principle, but sometimes hard in practice. Try the simplest remedies first. If these are unsuccessful, wait for pleasant weather and start early in the day to try more complicated cures.

The simplest procedure is to pry the molding strips that form the sides of each track away from the sashes to which they are stuck. Use a hammer and a stiff-bladed putty knife four to six inches wide. Hold the putty knife parallel to the pane and insert a corner of the blade in a crevice between the molding and the sash. Tap the knife handle gently with the hammer (be careful of the glass) while pivoting the blade, until its entire edge goes in. Drive the knife blade an inch or so farther; then wiggle the handle back and forth to widen the crevice and break loose any paint inside.

Repeat the process along the length of any molding you can reach that touches a sticking window sash. In addition, unless one or both sashes are partly open, position the knife blade down and drive it between the two sashes where they meet in the middle of the window.

If a lower sash is stuck, also drive the putty knife blade down between the lower part of the sash and the edge of the window stool (the interior ledge on the sill). If an upper sash is sticking, drive the knife blade up between the upper edge of the sash and the horizontal strip of molding that forms a side of the top track.

At this point, wiggling the sashes often frees them. Be sure they are unlocked and that no fasteners have been installed to prevent movement. It may be impossible to remove fasteners without disassembling the window frame.

If further persuasion is necessary to free a sash, or if a sash merely binds but is not stuck, drive a block of solid wood into the window tracks as close as possible to the sash, using a hammer. This will spread the sides of the track apart. Use a block about an eighth of an inch wider than the track.

There are two other techniques for freeing a lower sash, provided you can work from the window's exterior. Either pry upward on the underside of the sash using a wide pry-bar (protect the sill with a piece of thin plywood), or force a wedge like an ax blade between the sash and the upper surface of the sill. Strike the wedge with a wooden mallet or a light sledgehammer, not an ordinary carpenter's hammer, which might splinter.

If the sashes still will not budge, you will have to remove the molding strips. To free the lower sash, remove the molding on the interior side of the window frame. Use the same putty knife employed earlier, or one with a thinner blade. Insert it carefully into the seam where the molding meets the window frame and pry the strip away from the frame, working gradually along its entire length. The strips are usually mitered at the top, so you may have to loosen or remove the horizontal upper strip as well.

With the side strips off, the lower sash can be lifted from the frame. However, before doing this, detach the counterbalancing mechanisms from the sides of the sash. Spring mechanisms can be unscrewed from the top or sides of the sash. They will be under tension if the sash is down, so grasp each one firmly as you free it, and let it retract gradually.

When unfastening cords or chains that link the sash to counterweights — these are hidden inside the frame — secure each one to a screwdriver or long nail before letting go. Otherwise, as the weight drops when freed from the sash, it may carry the cord or chain with it into the wall cavity.

If you have access to the exterior of the window, the upper sash may be removed by prying away the outer molding strips. However, if you cannot work from outside, free the upper sash by removing the center strips of molding instead. These, called parting strips, usually are set in a groove cut into the window frame, and separate the two sash tracks.

To remove the parting strips, first remove the lower window sash. Next, in as many places as you can, score the paint where the strips meet the sides of the window frame, using a utility knife. Then grip each strip near one end with a pair of sturdy pliers and pull it toward the center of the window opening. Often, the strip will pull free, nails and all. If you damage the strips, replacements are easily found at a lumberyard.

Vegging Out

Thanksgiving celebrations always seem to include parades and football games and families gathered around over-laden tables; tables covered by platters and bowls filled with turkey and dressing, mashed potatoes and giblet gravy, cranberry sauce, sweet potatoes, three-bean salad and 17 different kinds of pie.

However, for vegetarians, Turkey Day doesn't include the turkey.

Vegetarians are simply people who chose to eat a meat-free diet. Therefore, their Thanksgiving celebration is the same as other Americans, only without with the meat.

Cyn Choate of Midland is a vegetarian; however, her Thanksgiving feast will include a turkey this year. She and her family are expecting "close to 16 people" to attend their Thanksgiving dinner, so there will be a turkey "for those guests who aren't vegetarians."

But, those who are will have plenty of dishes to choose from, such as zucchini lasagna, rice and walnut dressing, sweet potato and dried apricot casserole, green bean casserole, marinated vegetables, cranberry nut bread, pumpkin pie sweetened with fructose, deep-dish apple pie, baked apples and fresh fruit salad.

"There are a lot of wonderful fruits in the fall," she said.

Mrs. Choate and her husband, Gary, began their vegetarian lifestyle a few years ago. "Four years ago my husband smoked about three packs of cigarettes a day and drank two liters of Coke a day," Mrs. Choate said. "He watched the (1984) Olympics and realized at age 30 that he couldn't have done any of those things because he didn't have the stamina."

CHOATE QUIT smoking, eliminated sugar-sweetened soft drinks from his diet and began an exercise program with an emphasis on running, his wife said. "He didn't impose his will on the rest of the family. He wanted to do it for himself."

Two years later, Choate was running seven miles a day. He became interested in triathalons, so he included biking and swimming in his exercise program. And Mrs. Choate and the couple's then-2-year-old son joined in the program.

"Our diet evolved through the exercise program," Mrs. Choate said. "First we cut out sugar, then we cut out fats. Then we realized red meat is the greatest offender for fat content."

The family made other concessions to their new lifestyle.

"When Gary started entering triathalons, he asked me to cook a low-fat diet and exclude all meat, including fish and chicken," said Mrs. Choate. "Fish and chicken have not as much fat as red meat, but are pretty high." The fish that are lowest in fat are orange roughy, water-packed tuna and salmon, she added.

A balanced diet does contain some fat, Mrs. Choate said. "Children have to have a certain amount of fat to help produce the gray matter in the brain. Polyunsaturated fats help break down certain amounts of cholesterol."

When she does use fats in preparing foods for her family, she uses safflower or olive oil, she said.

VEGETARIANS OBTAIN their needed dietary requirements through sources other than meat, Mrs. Choate said, including legumes such as beans and peas, cheeses such as farmers' cheese or skim-milk mozarella, skim milk, Egg Beaters and vegetables. "Fruit doesn't have any protein, but it is one of the things we use as sweets."

Mrs. Choate said she likes to prepare meatless stews, meatless chili, homemade soups, pasta dishes, burritos with Egg Beaters and potatoes, and trail mix or granola sweetened with apple juice. "Sometimes I use honey or fructose," she added.

Grocery shopping for a vegetarian family is not as difficult as most people think, she added. "If you study it and take the time, there are a lot of ready-made products on the market that won't offend the system."

Cheese is a good source of nutrition in many vegetarian diets, but shoppers should be aware that "the more yellow the cheese, the more high the fat content," Mrs. Choate said. "A lot of cheese comes in low-fat if you'll look for them."

Other foods in their diet include whole wheat products instead of processed white flour, decaffinated tea and coffee, low-sodium salt in some quick breads, and apple juice, honey or fructose in place of refined sugar.

Have you heard...?

By MARILYN McKNIGHT HARRISON

Congratulations are in order to former longtime Midland Reporter-Telegram editor W.H. "Bill" Collyns, who turned 80 on Nov. 11.

To celebrate the milestone occasion, his wife, Alyce, and their daughter, Lorraine (Mrs. Bill) Harris of Plano hosted a reception that afternoon in the atrium of the Petroleum Club.

A chocolate birthday cake, hors d'oeuvres, wine and coffee were served to the large number of friends and business associates who turned out for the occasion. Presiding at the guest book were Anita (Mrs. Spencer) Blocker and her daughter, Sonya Blocker.

Among the well-wishers were Mr. Collyns' nephew, Joe Collyns, and his wife, Char, of San Angelo; Luke Crawford and Phyllis Reeves, both of Odessa; Alva and John P. Butler, Dot and Winston Barclay, Mary Katherine and John B. Mills, Lola Adams, Jo and Ernie Barbee, Paul McHargue, Bill Pomeroy, Mary Maude and Ralph Hickman, Nancy Chandler, Betty Simmons and Charlie Spence.

Following the reception, Evelyn and Leroy Stewart and Anita and Spencer Blocker entertained the Collyns family with dinner at the Plaza Club.

A native of San Angelo, Mr. Collyns, whose name has long been associated with the newspaper business, the Chamber of Commerce and Lionism, came to Midland in 1935 with Humble Oil and Refining Co. A year later, he left to become manager of the Midland Chamber of Commerce, a position he held until 1946, when he was named editor of the Reporter-Telegram. He retired from the newspaper in 1980, but has remained active in civic and church work.

Currently, he serves as vice president of the Board of Trustees of the Permian Basin Petroleum Museum, secretary of the Industrial Foundation of Midland, a director of the Texas Good Roads Association and is elder emeritus of First Presbyterian Church.

Mr. Collyns is a past president of the Midland, West Texas and Texas Chambers of Commerce, Texas AP Editors Association, West Texas Press Association and Midland Downtown Lions Club and has served on numerous boards in the community. He was charter secretary of the Midland Jaycees 50 years ago.

The Collyns have two grandchildren, Carol, a flight attendant based in New York City with American Air Lines, and Russell, a sophomore at the University of Oklahoma.

BEST WISHES go to Debbie Meckler and Al Spinks, who were united in marriage Saturday evening at First Baptist Church. The reception followed in the Fellowship Hall.

Wedding week festivities began on Thursday with a dessert and rice bag party at the home of Paige (Mrs. Bill) Kerr. Cohostesses were Ann Fullinwider and Lisa Montgomery.

Friday's events began with a luncheon honoring Debbie and her bridal attendants at Midland Country Club. Hostesses were Betty (Mrs. William) Sumner, Mary (Mrs. Steve) Fish of Phoenix, Ariz., and Avalyn (Mrs. Harwell) Whitmire of Odessa. The groom's parents, Helen and Alan Spinks, hosted the rehearsal dinner that evening at the Plaza Club. A Bachelor Bash for Al followed at the home of Kevin Sparks.

A wedding day brunch was held for the out-of-town guests at the home of Wally and Jerry Fullinwider. Co-hosts were Martha and Dan Kallus, Marilyn and Jim Yates, Altie and Bill Russell and Barbara Tom Jowell. Out-of-towners also are invited to a breakfast today at the home of the groom's parents.

The newlyweds were honored at a number of other fun and clever parties in the weeks prior to the wedding.

FORMER MIDLANDER Marge McColl Petty was elected to the State Senate in Kansas during the Nov. 8 election. She is the daughter of Fran McColl and the late Arch McColl.

Marge and her husband, Ty, an Episcopal chaplain at Stormont-Vail Hospital in Topeka, and their children, Brandon, 14, and Megan, 8, hosted a victory celebration at their home on Election Night.

Marge has served on the Topeka City Council for the past four years and was elected deputy mayor in her second year of office. A graduate of Midland High School and Texas Christian University, she has her own management counsulting firm, Petty & Associates.

CAREN BURNETT and Porter Hibbitts, both of Lubbock, were honored here last weekend at parties to celebrate their engagement and approaching marriage.

Porter's parents, Edna and Mack Hibbitts, hosted a cocktail buffet at their home of Saturday evening.

Last Sunday morning, the home of Sarah Lew and David Grimes was the setting for a brunch and Christmas ornament shower. Co-hosting were Judy and Don Dunbar, Ginger and Jimmy Floyd, Jane and Gary Garlitz, Betty Jo Morgan, Schatzie and Charlie Tighe and Gwen Watson.

Caren, who is employed with the FDIC, and Porter, who is working on his MBA at Texas Tech, will be married Jan. 14 in Dallas, where they are to be honored with more parties in early December.

IMAGINE RUSTY AND ANDREA FREEMAN'S surprise when they were settled in for the night last Monday, and at 10:30, a group of friends arrived to celebrate Rusty's 40th birthday!

After serenading the Birthday Boy, the group brought out the champagne and offered toasts and shared birthday cake.

The serenaders included Nancy and Skeet Doss, Linda (Mrs. Frank) Powell, Stephanie (Mrs. Bill) Rogers, Ellen (Mrs. Bob) Hinson, Jon Short and Rusty's parents, Nell and Leon Freeman.

AND CONGRATULATIONS to Laura Hickey and Davey Davis, both of Dallas, who exchanged wedding vows Saturday evening at St. Ann's Catholic Church. A number of parties in Midland and Dallas preceded the wedding.

The Midland weekend was kicked off with a Halloween party hosted by Kay and Will Beecherl and Sharon and Bobby Floyd at the Beecherl home. Laura was honored with a Saturday luncheon given by Jean (Mrs. Buzz) Banks, Sue (Mrs. Bill) Marshall, Renie (Mrs. Bob) Zonne, Jean (Mrs. Wes) Pittman and Stephanie Beard, at the Marshall home. A cocktail party was held that evening at the home of Marty and Jim Conine and co-hosted by Dyan and Kip Agar and Mary and Bill Kennedy.

Earlier this month, a kitchen shower was held at the home of Joann (Mrs. John) Foster. Cohostesses were Paula (Mrs. Frank) Cahoon, Betty Rae (Mrs. Paul) Davis, Patti (Mrs. Watson) LaForce, Betty Jo (Mrs. George) Moberly, and Carole (Mrs. Johnny) Warren.

The wedding week parties began Thursday night with a cocktail buffet given by Mary and Henri de Compiegne and Betty and Pom Smith at the de Compiegnes. The bridesmaids' luncheon was hosted Friday at the Racquet Club by Laura's sisters, Cynthia (Mrs. Rob) Brown and Michele (Mrs. Rob) Arnot; her sisters-in-law, Mary Margaret (Mrs. Billy) Hickey and Nancy (Mrs. Clifford) Hickey, and her maid of honor, Angie Roberts.

The rehearsal dinner was given Friday evening at the Petroleum Club by the groom's parents, Sally and Dick Davis of Dallas. A wedding day brunch was hosted by Laura's parents, Andree and Bill Hickey, at the Midland Hilton. The wedding reception was held at Midland Country Club.

Marilyn McKnight Harrison is social columnist for the Reporter-Telegram.

VEGETARIAN

In spite of these changes in the family's diet, Mrs. Choate doesn't believe in completely forbidding her young son such childhood rituals as birthday cakes. "There are so many legitimate 'nos' in life," she said. "I don't want sugar to be such a big deal. I allow him to have it (once in a while), but not in excess."

Some of the recipes that will be included in the Choates' family Thanksgiving celebration this year follow:

BAKED APPLES WITH ALMONDS

1 cup almonds, ground in blender
¼ cup honey
2 egg whites
8 medium apples
3 tablespoons apple juice concentrate
½ cup wheat germ

Whip almonds, honey and egg whites in blender until a smooth paste is formed. Peel and core apples almost to the bottom. Brush with juice concentrate and roll in wheat germ. Fill center of apple with almond paste. Sprinkle remaining wheat germ on top. Place apples closely together in shallow baking dish. Add water to depth of ¼-inch; cover and bake 40 minutes at 375 degrees, until fork tender. Serve warm. Serves eight.

SWEET SALMON PASTA

1½ cups blend of non-fat yogurt mixed with light evaporated skim milk (consistency of cream)
1 7-ounce jar sliced pimientos, drained
Non-stick cooking spray
2 cloves garlic, finely minced
½ teaspoon ground white pepper
Dash light salt
¼ cup dry white wine
1 6¾-ounces boneless chunk pink salmon
Prepared angel hair pasta
Freshly grated Parmesan cheese

Combine yogurt blend and pimientos in blender; cover and process until smooth. Set aside.

Coat skillet with non-stick spray. Place over medium-high heat until hot. Saute garlic until lightly browned, about 1 minute. Add reserved yogurt blend and white pepper. Bring to boil, reduce heat and simmer about 15 minutes or until mixture is reduced and thickened. Stir in wine and salmon. Serve over pasta with light sprinkle of fresh Parmesan cheese.

CRANBERRY RELISH

4 cups cranberries, finely chopped
1 cup honey
1 large orange, cut up (peel and pulp included)

Place chopped cranberries and cut-up orange in food chopper (use orange that has not been waxed). Stir in honey. Blend. Cover and refrigerate at least 3 hours. Makes 3½ cups. Flavor improves if made day or two ahead.

WHOLE WHEAT ORANGE BREAD

1½ cups whole wheat flour
1½ cups white flour (unbleached)
¾ cup honey
2 tablespoons grated orange peel
2 teaspoons baking powder

Combine above ingredients in large bowl. Add:
¾ cup fresh or frozen orange juice
⅓ cup skim milk
⅓ cup oil
¼ carton eggbeaters or one egg white

Stir until moistened. Pour into 9x5-inch loaf pan sprayed with non-stick coating. Bake 60-65 minutes at 350 degrees. Serve with cranberry relish.

FRUIT COMPOTE

5 cups in-season melon balls
1 cup raspberries
1 cup blueberries
1 cup strawberries
2 cups fresh pineapple
1 cup lemon-lime soft drink

Toss fruit in soft drink and chill.

FIVE VEGETABLE CASSEROLE

6 medium zucchini, unpeeled and sliced
1 green pepper, chopped
1 onion, chopped
10 large fresh mushrooms, sliced
¼ cup wheat flour
1 tablespoon paprika
Dash red pepper
3 large tomatoes, peeled and chopped
2 tablespoons brown sugar (can substitute molasses, honey or apple juice concentrate)
1 cup shredded farmers cheese

Place zucchini in 13x9-inch dish sprayed with non-stick spray. Saute bell pepper, onion and mushrooms in microwave in glass dish covered with paper towel for 2 minutes on HIGH. Turkey dinner without turkey is tricky business

By LORNA J. SASS
Copley News Service

Planning a vegetarian holiday meal is tricky business. Not only have people come to associate festive occasions with an extravagant cut of meat, but the Thanksgiving turkey and the Christmas goose are considered by many to be the focal point of the meal.

For advice on planning a vegetarian Thanksgiving menu, we turned to Annemarie Colbin, director of Manhattan's Natural Gourmet Cooking School and author of "The Book of Whole Meals" (Ballantine, $8.95), and the forthcoming "Natural Gourmet Cookbook" (Ballantine, spring 1989).

Although no longer a strict vegetarian herself (she eats fish occasionally), Colbin avoided animal protein for many years and continues to counsel people who maintain vegetarian regimes for health or moral reasons.

"First of all, when you are planning a vegetarian Thanksgiving menu, don't even attempt to imitate a meat meal," Colbin advises. "There's no way you are going to find anything in the vegetable kingdom that even remotely resembles a turkey, so forget about trying.

To sum up, here is Colbin's approach to planning and enjoying a vegetarian meal this Thanksgiving:

■ Choose the main focus or protein base. This will be some form of whole grain. Consider supplementing it (to create a complete protein) by incorporating dried beans or peas, seeds, nuts or a soy product such as miso or tofu.

■ Pick accompaniments from among the fresh vegetables that are in season, keeping in mind color combinations and contrasts in texture and shape, as well as taste. Avoid using the same vegetable in more than one dish in the same meal.

■ Check to see that the five tastes — sour, salty, spicy, bitter and sweet — are represented in the menu.

WATERCRESS CELERY SOUP

1 tablespoon toasted sesame oil (available in health food and Oriental grocery stores)
1 tablespoon light vegetable oil
1 clove garlic, minced
1 large onion, peeled and coarsely chopped
2 cups finely chopped celery
6 cups water
3 to 4 tablespoons white shiro or barley miso, or to taste (see note)
2 bunches watercress
Tamari soy sauce or sea salt to taste, if desired

In soup pot, heat sesame and vegetable oils. Add garlic and saute for 30 seconds, stirring steadily. Add onion and continue cooking over medium-high heat until onion begins to brown. Add celery and saute for additional 2 to 3 minutes. Add water and bring to boil. Reduce heat and simmer 5 minutes, or until celery is soft.

Puree soup in batches in food processor or blender. (Soup will be thin.) Return puree to soup pot and stir in miso to taste.

Coarsely chop watercress leaves, reserving stems for another use (such as vegetable stock). Stir in watercress and soy sauce to taste, and heat soup just until it begins to boil. Serve immediately.

NOTE: The tastiest type of miso (fermented soybean paste) is the unpasteurized variety found in the refrigerator section of your health food store. Add miso to taste as there is some variation in the density of flavor and amount of saltiness.

STUFFED ACORN SQUASH

3 medium acorn squash
2 small onions, peeled and minced
2 tablespoons virgin olive oil
½ teaspoon basil
½ teaspoon oregano
⅛ teaspoon ground sage
2 cups cooked brown rice
½ cup currants
⅓ cup roasted pumpkin or sunflower seeds
2 teaspoons tamari soy sauce, or sea salt to taste, if desired

Preheat oven to 375 degrees. Wash squash. Halve each squash and slice off just enough of top and bottom so that each half can stand on its own. Bake squash cut-side down on cookie sheet until easily pierced with fork, about 45 minutes. Scoop out seeds at this point. Reserve cooked squash in a warm place.

While squash is baking, prepare filling. In 2-quart saucepan, saute onions in olive oil for 5 to 6 minutes. Add basil, oregano and sage, and cook 2 minutes longer. Add rice, currants, pumpkin seeds and soy sauce to taste. If mixture seems too dry, stir in a few tablespoons of water or vegetable broth.

Mound about ½ cup filling into each squash. Return to oven just until squash and filling are hot throughout.

PECAN PIE

FOR THE CRUST:
Vegetable oil for preparing pie plate
1½ cups rolled oats
½ cup whole-wheat pastry flour
Pinch salt
¼ cup oil
¼ cup maple syrup
2 to 4 tablespoons water

FOR THE FILLING:
3 large eggs, preferably free-range or organic
1 teaspoon vanilla
Pinch salt
½ cup maple syrup
2 cups toasted pecans

Lightly oil sides and bottom of 9-inch pie plate and line bottom with circle of baking parchment. Lightly oil baking parchment. Preheat oven to 325 degrees.

In blender or food processor, spin oats for about 45 seconds, or until they resemble coarse flour. In bowl, combine this oat flour (you should have about 1 cup) with whole-wheat pastry flour and salt. In large measuring cup, stir together oil, syrup and 2 tablespoons water. Pour liquid slowly into flour while constantly stirring with fork until mass of moist (but not sticky) dough is formed, adding extra water if needed. With fingertips press dough evenly into prepared pie plate. Bake for 10 minutes and set aside.

To prepare filling, whisk together eggs, vanilla, salt and maple syrup. Evenly distribute nuts on prebaked piecrust and pour filling over. Bake at 325 degrees until set, about 30 minutes.

'Simple foods' from garden's produce

By LORNA J. SASS
Copley News Service

"Live hard not soft; eat hard not soft; seek fiber in foods and in life."

One of my most prized memories as a journalist is the trek I made to Maine in 1982 to visit Helen and Scott Nearing.

Having lived through some five decades of homesteading in New England, the Nearings had adopted the above quotation as their guiding philosophy of life. They wrote many books about the satisfactions and rewards of living off the land and are perhaps best known for the one titled "Living the Good Life."

With their strong belief in the principle of self-sufficiency, the Nearings were vocal and ardent vegetarians who sustained themselves as much as possible from their own garden. They also preferred raw food to cooked in the belief that "the more we move toward a diet of chiefly unfired food, the healthier and more vigorous we shall become."

The occasion of my visit at the time was the recent publication of Helen's cookbook, "Simple Food for the Good Life" (NAL paperback, $9.95). Seconds after I pulled up on the dirt path to the Nearings' hand-built stone house on Penobscot Bay, the sprightly 78-year-old Mrs. Nearing came bounding out of the house, cradling a striped cat in her arms.

"Welcome to Forest Farm," she said.

Scott Nearing, then 98 years old, could be seen through the living room window, rousing himself from a nap. It was Sunday, and the Nearings were on their once-a-week juice fast and taking it fairly easy.

After I had a tour of the home and garden, the conversation turned to cooking and eating. Helen got straight to the point, making no bones about the fact that she would rather be setting stones into mortar than stirring soup.

"I think cooking is drudgery," she told me.

So why did she bother writing a cookbook?

It seems that each year as the frost broke and dozens of visitors stopped by Forest Farm to find out for themselves what homesteading would be like, Helen found herself cooking for a crowd.

"They helped us with our building projects in return for room and board," she told me. "I never knew how many people there would be for dinner and I didn't want to spend any extra time in the kitchen, so I tossed some beans or vegetables from our garden into the pot and went off to build a wall or play my violin."

Everyone always said the food was delicious and asked for the recipes.

"I continued to be amazed," said Helen, "especially when they kept asking me to write a cookbook."

A glance at the recipes in "Simple Food for the Good Life" quickly reveals that if the right ingredients are on hand, a delicious and nutritious vegetarian meal can be whipped up in a matter of moments, or to put it Helen's way, "It should take less time to prepare a meal than to eat it."

The following recipes have been adapted from "Simple Food for the Good Life."

COUNTRY SOUP

1 cup dried lima beans and 1 cup dried kidney beans, rinsed, then soaked overnight in ample water to cover
3 carrots, sliced
1 onion, sliced
1 clove garlic, minced
1 head celery, chopped (reserve hearts for salad)
2 tomatoes, quartered
1 teaspoon dried mint, tarragon or thyme
Sea salt to taste, if desired

Cook beans in soaking water over low heat until tender — about 1½ to 2 hours. Drain beans, reserving cooking liquid. Add vegetables to beans, along with cooking liquid and enough water to equal 4 cups. Continue cooking, covered, until celery is tender, about 30 minutes. During last 30 minutes of cooking, add desired herb and salt to taste.

UNCOOKED NUT LOAF

1 cup (about 4 ounces) ground almonds
½ cup chopped walnuts
¼ cup rolled oats
¼ to ½ teaspoon sea salt
Generous pinch dried thyme (see note)
2 to 4 tablespoons cold water

In bowl, mix nuts together, then add oats, sea salt and thyme. Moisten gradually with water. Pour mixture onto large sheet of waxed paper and firmly press into shape of small loaf.

Chill at least 1 hour before serving. Slice with sharp serrated knife. (The loaf may still be slightly crumbly, even after chilling.)

NOTE: You may wish to press extra thyme into top of loaf; the additional flavor and color are pleasant.

BANANA DRINK

4 ripe bananas
1 tablespoon (or more) maple syrup or honey
1½ cups water

Process ingredients in blender until smooth.

Because bananas turn brown quickly, this drink should be made just before serving.

Matchmaking: Marketing mates

By JAMES HIRSCH
New York Times News Service

NEW YORK — For Stuart Fromm and Suzanne Seid, the road to their November wedding began in a penthouse office at 400 Madison Avenue, where singles employ the matchmaking services of Helena Amram to meet, perchance to marry.

Last year, when he was a 30-year-old vice president at a Wall Street investment company, Fromm told Amram that he had everything — except a wife.

"She quoted me her price," $5,500, "and I told her she was out of her mind," Fromm said. "Then I went home and thought about it, and realized I lose more than that every day in the stock market."

He met Seid last November, through Amram, and they became engaged in February. The experience made Fromm so bullish on matchmaking that he became a partner in Mrs. Amram's company, Helena International VIP Club.

As the movie "Crossing Delancey" suggests, there are times when matchmaking may be the only cure for young New Yorkers' woes. But unlike the frowzy old woman in the film, the handful of practitioners in New York and other cities are no relics; names of the lonely are often computerized, and psychologists, handwriting analysts and image consultants are part of the service. And unlike dating services, matchmakers determine which clients are recommended to other clients as potential mates. Dating services allow members to select whom they want to meet from the pool of fellow members.

The dean of the New York matchmaking profession may be Dan Field. His company, Field's Exclusive Service, was founded by his grandfather in 1920.

"Women have careers, don't have time to meet people, and some get married and divorced," said Field, who has run the company for 27 years and now charges $250 to introduce clients to an unlimited number of potential dates. "What do these women do? Come to Field's."

"Matchmakers used to be old and very religious," said the 39-year-old Amram, who also has offices in New Jersey, Israel, where she was born, and London, and who says her company has 10,000 clients worldwide.

Today, matchmakers say, their clients are mostly professional people in their 30s and 40s, who have come to believe that almost any service can be had for a price.

"People who make a lot of money like having their hand held," said Barbara Tackett, a San Francisco matchmaker and owner of Meet the Elite, which charges some clients $25,000. The cost, she said, is part of the allure.

Amram said her fee encourages people to marry because no one wants to waste his investment. Fromm is less than two months away from becoming another illustration of her theory. He took over Helena International's New Jersey operation, adding two offices, in Princeton and Morristown, and moved another one from Fair Lawn to Fort Lee.

While matchmakers' styles and prices differ, their routines are similar. They interview clients about their interests and backgrounds, search their files, recommend people for dates and hold follow-up interviews.

Does it work?

Abby Hirsch, founder of the Godmothers, a nine-year-old matchmaking company with 1,000 clients and offices in New York and Washington, said that 12 percent of her clients marry and 30 percent have relationships of longer than six months.

Clients face a rigorous selection process; 60 percent are rejected, their money returned, Amram said. The company hires detectives to verify biographical information and requires a medical examination, a handwriting analysis and a session with the company's psychologist, Dr. Norman D. Polansky. He administers the Rorschach test, in which a client gives impressions to abstract images on flashcards. The results may indicate, for example, that a prospective client who sees too much white space could be rebellious or difficult. He has sent several rejected clients to therapists.

Mrs. Amram, who lives in New Jersey with her husband and two sons, has told candidates that she would not accept them until they lost weight or saw a plastic surgeon. Those who are accepted participate in an individual session with the company's image consultant. Amram said this was particularly important for men because many did not know how to dress or how to use a deodorant and an after-shave lotion that complemented each other.

During an introductory interview, Amram told a 29-year-old nurse about a plastic surgeon and a nurse who worked on the same hospital floor and were her clients. "They said hello to each other every day, and I got them married," she said.

In another room, a 21-year-old man was sent packing after a brief interview. "He's not ready," Amram said. "He has to play his games."

Before Amram left for the night, a furious client called the office and complained about the three men she had met. "She says she wants her money back, or she's going to the newspapers," Mrs. Amram said. "I'll give it to her. My reputation is more important than the money."

Then Helena the matchmaker shrugged. "She'll call back in six months."

Dining out is alternative to cooking Thanksgiving dinner

By LOREEN ARBUS
and NORM CHANDLER FOX
Copley News Service

That time is almost here again. We can feel it coming when visions of pilgrims and drumsticks dance in our heads. Thanksgiving is a time of joyful family reunions. It's also a time when we can celebrate or commiserate over the results of this year's presidential election.

Whether it's going to be a small or large gathering, we know for sure that preparing the traditional holiday meal is a lot of work. For a change, why not go out for your Thanksgiving dinner? We guarantee that your family and friends will love the change, and for once, you can actually be seated throughout the entire meal and be served like a guest of honor.

We have chosen a number of American cities where we have dined out over the past year or two, and we are recommending the places where we think you'll get a wonderful and memorable holiday repast.

BOSTON
DEVON ON THE COMMON
617/482-0722

This is the city that we so closely associate with the Thanksgiving holiday, and if you reserve early, you might be lucky enough to get a picture window table overlooking the historic Boston Common. We recommend that you try the succulent quail with cornmeal stuffing as a variation on the turkey theme, and closet carnivores can indulge on the mesquite-charred steaks and chops. There is an excellent wine list, and after a few glasses, you'll feel that the pilgrims did indeed make some progress.

ST. LOUIS
AMERICAN ROTISSERIE
314/241-6664

Located in the handsome Omni International Hotel, this place radiates with a burnished aura that almost glows. American regional cooking is the specialty here, so we propose a possible menu as follows for your Thanksgiving gustatory memories: smoked goose breast as a starter, followed by mussel-oyster bisque. Veal with wild mushrooms is the entree, and you can choose any of the fancy desserts with the knowledge that you won't be disappointed.

PHILADELPHIA
THE CITY TAVERN
215/923-6059

What could be a nicer Thanksgiving treat than to dine in one of the city's most historical districts? The restaurant is an authentic re-creation of an actual 1773 tavern that stood on this very site. The serving people wear Colonial costumes, and there even is a resident harpsichordist who plays hits from the 18th century. The broiled fish and seafood platters are excellent, and the sherry and black walnut trifle makes a thoroughly decadent holiday dessert.

HOUSTON
LA RESERVE
713/871-8177

Located in the plush Inn On the Park Hotel, we've always felt this place is one of Houston's best. Game dishes are a specialty, so why not start the holiday meal with cream of rabbit soup. The medallions of venison with lingonberries are sensational, and for seafood lovers, there's an elegant ragout of lobster. The desserts here are worth deviating from your diet.

MINNEAPOLIS
THE 510 RESTAURANT
612/874-6440

This is considered to be one of the Twin Cities' classiest places, so naturally, we chose it for your Thanksgiving meal. The very elegant surroundings will only whet your appetite for the outstanding menu. You might try the wild mushroom tart with walnut brandy sauce as a starter or the excellent sherried crab bisque. We suggest the pheasant in season for an entree, and by all means, order a fresh fruit souffle for dessert. It will get you in training for the delights of Christmas as well.

PORTLAND, ORE.
JAKE'S FAMOUS CRAWFISH
503/226-1419

The atmosphere feels like the turn of the century with walnut walls, plush fabric on the booths, and crystal gas lamps everywhere. Although the specialty is crawfish, we've never been here when the crawdads were in season. We do recommend the exquisite salmon preparations that we feel is quite fitting for Thanksgiving since much fish and seafood were served at those Plymouth Rock repasts.

IT'S YOUR LIFE

Aged parents need love of adult children

By STEVE EDWARDS

Edwards

In dealing with aged parents, adult children often experience a myriad of feelings, including love, tenderness, respect, generosity, devotion, concern and sadness in realizing their parents are past their primes.

In facing the possible mental decline of a parent, adult children often have difficulty understanding, or accepting, the parent's mental deterioration. Throughout their lives, adult children have looked up to their parents and seen them as strong, immortal protectors, whether or not the parents lived up to the children's needs or expectations.

The physical or mental decline of a parent can make adult children feel more vulnerable themselves. Their feelings of sadness may be mingled with anger because they feel vulnerable and because they feel abandoned by their parents. This anger may be accompanied by feelings of hostility, resentment, dread, helplessness, shame and guilt, all of which is triggered by the awareness that the parent's are now dependent on them due to their disabilities.

In some cases, these negative feelings emerge because the adult child does not want to be responsible for his parent. The child may dread being the caregiver, and may feel angry, helpless and ashamed at his own inability to do anything or his feelings of not wanting to do anything.

Adult children most commonly feel guilty about their feeling toward thier parents, which usually comes from three sources:

- The adult child feels he has not lived up to his parents' expectations.
- He feels he hasn't lived up to some code of ethics or morals such as "Honor thy father and thy mother."
- He hasn't lived up to his own expectations.

When dealing with emotions, remember that feelings — both comfortable and uncomfortable — are continually changing. New stresses can intensify existing negative feelings, while resolution of crises can produce more positive feelings. The more adult children educate themselves on problems of the elderly, the more equipped they will be in handling future crises.

Steve Edwards is executive director of Community and Senior Services and the Visiting Nurse Service of Midland.

Creative cuisine from nature's harvest

This trend of utilizing whatever is available on the land harkens back to ancient agriculture according to Carolyn J. Niethammer, author of "The Tumbleweed Gourmet: Cooking with Wild Southwestern Plants." According to Ms. Niethammer, most of the agricultural crops and wild foods grown in the United States were first domesticated by Neolithic societies.

However, in recent years, harvesting wild foods has mostly been the work of the environmentally conscious.

Ms. Niethammer says she was inspired to cook wild plants after reading the "Global 2000 Report to the President," which states in part, "In the beginning of the 21st century, there will be a 100 percent increase in the price of food."

ACCORDING TO Robert Rodale, publisher of "Organic Gardening and Farming," "Americans will need to return to putting their homes and neighborhoods to full use as food system centers."

Niethammer agrees. She said, "This means gardening, as 42 percent of American households do, and it also means gathering the bounty of free wild produce that continues to grow throughout the continent."

Although Californians have been feasting on dandelions and flower petals for years, wild foods are seldom served up in restaurants outside the Golden State. Ms. Niethammer, a resident of Tucson, Ariz., said she discovered that Zuni Indians were still using foods of their predecessors. The Indians, however, are using modern techniques in preparing the wild foods.

"No rule says you have to use ancient techniques in preparing ancient foods," Ms. Niethammer writes, "Blenders, food processors and slow cookers can make quick work of what took Indian and settler women all day. In other words, it is not necessary to go to a stream bed and pound mesquite beans with a 20-pound pestle in a bedrock mortar.

"Just as ancient foods can fit into our modern cooking techniques, so also can they be incorporated into our modern dishes," she said.

One advantage of using these foods is that one need not own a farm to take advantage of free, wild foods. Many of the foods can be picked from public lands.

One caution, however, there are plenty of wild foods which are poisonous and cause illness, injury or death. Those procuring wild foods should be certain they know exactly what they are picking, as many desert plants look alike. Therefore, those who elect to gather such plants should take special care to check them against a standard guide to regional flora.

STATE AND LOCAL regulations for gathering plants, seeds and fruit on public lands also vary widely. In Texas, no foods may be picked from roadsides due to safety reasons, according to Melanie Sikes of the United States Soil Conservation Service. Public lands also include national parks which are strictly off-limits for gathering anything — rocks or plants — according to Wayne Chappell, captain of the law enforcement division for the Texas Wild Life Department in Austin.

The best places to gather foods safely on Texas public lands, according to Chappell, would be near public sections of riverbeds. "But, nonetheless, it's always best to check, before gathering," he said.

But the beauty of harvesting natural foods, according to Ms. Niethammer, is that residents of the Southwest often need to look no further than their own backyards for plants.

NATURE

The availability of wild plants "gives everyone the opportunity to partake of a genuine American culinary tradition. The difference is delightful and nutritious," the cookbook author said, drawing on recent ethnobotanical research.

Although the use of prickly pears in the United States has generally been confined to prickly pear jelly, Ms. Niethammer's cookbook includes recipes for kuchen, muffins, sherbet, candy and rice pudding, all made with prickly pears.

However, aficionados of prickly pear (nopal) often grow their own since it is not plentiful. Also, biologists say that white-tailed dear depend on prickly pear for about 30 percent of their diet. The javelina (collared peccary) demands enough for 60 percent of its diet.

Once dried, like figs, and pounded into flour by the Coahuiltecan Indians, now people eat prickly pear fruit breaded and fried, pickled, steamed, jellied or candied.

Ms. Niethammer suggests using tongs to collect prickly pear pads. To prepare the pads for cooking, boil or steam them for about 15 minutes. When tender, place them on a hard surface such as a cutting board and scrape off the stickers with a small, sharp knife. Cut off the base which is usually 1/16 inch around the entire edge of the pad. Rinse the pad and check closely under a strong light for stickers or little hairs which are actually tiny barbs. Allowing the pads to dry for a few hours or overnight reduces their gummy quality.

Some of Ms. Niethammer's recipes follow:

BRANDIED PRICKLY PEARS

1 cup large, cleaned prickly pear halves
1 cup apple juice
½ cup sugar
10 cloves
1 stick cinnamon
¼ cup brandy

Sterilize a pint jar and canning lid by boiling in water for 15 minutes. Combine apple juice, sugar and spices and boil for five minutes to form a syrup. Add the cleaned prickly pear halves and heat.

Place fruit, syrup and spices in hot, sterilized pint jar and top with the brandy. (If you have too much liquid to add the brandy, return it to the pan and reduce it as much as necessary by boiling.) Store in the refrigerator for at least a week before eating to allow the flavors to mingle.

Mesquite, valued by barbecue fans for the distinctive smoked flavor it gives to grilled meats, also is valuable for its bounty of sweet pods. The invasive tree, which is often bulldozed by ranchers, once was a source of food, fuel, shelter, weapons, tools, fiber, medicine and hair dye for desert Indians.

MESQUITE MOUSSE

2 cups of mesquite broth (recipe follows)
1 can (12-ounces) evaporated milk
½ cup water
6 tablespoons cornstarch
2 beaten eggs
¼ cup praline liqueur (optional)

Combine mesquite broth and milk in the top of a double boiler. In a small bowl or cup, combine water and cornstarch and stir until smooth. Add to mesquite mixture. Cook over boiling eggs in bowl. Carefully add one cup of the mesquite mixture and cook and stir over boiling water for four minutes.

Slowly stir in the praline liqueur. Rinse a one-quart mold with cold water. Pour mixture into mold and chill until set, about four hours. Unmold to serve.

Basic Mesquite Broth:

This sweet, caramel-like broth's secret ingredient is mesquite pods.

4 cups broken mesquite pods
8 cups water

Place the broken mesquite pods in a large pot, add eight cups of water, cover and boil for one hour. Cool. Wring and tear the pods in the broth, stirring and mashing the sweet pith into the liquid. Or put one cup of the pods and just a little of the broth into a food processor fitted with a steel blade and whirl until the pods are shredded. Repeat until all the pods are shredded. Return the material to the broth and stir to get as much of the pulp into the broth as possible. Drain off the liquid and discard the fiber. Simmer the liquid uncovered until reduced to three cups.

JELLIED TUMBLEWEED SALAD

1 cup tightly packed tumbleweed sprouts (picked when they are 2-3 inches tall)
2 envelopes of unflavored gelatin
½ cup sugar
1 teaspoon salt
1½ cups boiling water
1½ cups cold water
⅓ cup vinegar
⅓ cup lemon juice
½ cup finely shredded cabbage
½ cup chopped celery
½ cup shredded carrots
¼ cup chopped green bell pepper

Wash and sort tumbleweed sprouts, discarding roots and any sprouts which have matured to the point of feeling prickly. Chop fine and set aside.

Mix gelatin, sugar and salt in a large bowl. Add boiling water, vinegar and lemon juice. Chill until partially set. Add chopped tumbleweed sprouts, celery, carrots and green bell pepper. Mix. Rinse a seven-cup mold with cold water. Pour in the gelatin and vegetable mixture; chill for four hours or until set. Unmold on lettuce leaves.

STEAMED TUMBLEWEED SPROUTS

Gather sprouts and wash well, pinching off and discarding the roots and any sprouts which have matured to the point of feeling prickly. Steam for five-ten minutes. Toss with butter and lemon juice.

The following recipe is from "Texas Highways Cookbook" by Joanne Smith.

ENSALADA DE NOPALITOS
(Prickly Pear Salad)

2 cups nopal cactus, spines and barbs removed
2 medium tomatoes, chopped
3 tablespoons olive oil
4 teaspoons red wine vinegar
¼ teaspoon oregano
½ cup white onion, chopped fine
½ teaspoon salt
6 sprigs fresh cilantro
Freshly ground pepper
Lettuce and sliced avocado for garnish

Mix all ingredients in a large bowl and set aside for one hour. Before serving, garnish with lettuce and avocado slices.

'Epicurean Gardener' too much of a good thing

By MARK STITH
Associated Press

ATLANTA — This is almost a very good gardening book. In "The Epicurean Gardener" (what a great title), John Adams has compiled an impressive collection of advice on edible gardening.

He certainly knows his produce: Just about anything you can grow, eat or season with is covered in exhaustive detail. Chapters run from growing the underground foods — onions, potatoes and others — to "Big Fat Fruits that Grow on Vines": squash, cucumbers, cantaloupes and watermelons.

Some of it is garden-by-the-numbers, but I kept being delighted by his anecdotal writings. One of the stranger stories Mr. Adams tells concerns U.S. government efforts during World War II to graft hemp (marijuana) plants, the fibers of which were used to make ropes, onto hops vines, which, of course, are used in making beer. It didn't work, but consider the legal ramifications of such a plant.

I wasn't entertained often enough to recommend the book, however. It suffers from a few fatal flaws and some lessons for other garden writers.

Lesson one: Don't let family members draw illustrations in your book. (I've only known one family team that can do that today: Laura Martin and her sister, Sharon Coogle.)

Lesson two: Although it may be chic to sound like a fussy "Morris the Cat" of gardening, don't go overboard. In the first chapter, Mr. Adams takes a friendly (?) swipe at other garden writers, United States Department of Agriculture pamphlets, and organic gardening. Who's left to inform the masses? Him?

Lesson three: If you're going to write eight pages on nothing but raspberries, throw a picture in for fun. I like raspberries — a lot — and just don't care to read page after page about them. Or any of the other plants mentioned, for that matter.

The Epicurean Gardener is by John F. Adams. It is available for $18.95 from E.P. Dutton Publishing Co.

Foreign plants threaten Florida's environment

Associated Press

MIAMI — Florida is under invasion by a rapidly spreading foreign army that threatens to change the face, and even the climate, of the region. Many of the invaders were invited, to help improve the economy or beautify the state, then turned on their hosts.

More than 400 foreign plant species have taken root here, including the Australian melaleuca and Indian ficus that are spreading alarmingly, and the Brazilian pepper tree and African castor bean, poisonous to humans and animals.

The danger to the Everglades is so serious that government biologists say Florida's famous river of grass may disappear within a lifetime.

"It is going to be very hard for any botanist in the future to tell what is native and what isn't," says Julia Morton, a University of Miami biologist who must drive two hours north along the high-speed Florida's Turnpike to see native flora. "Exotic plants are multiplying and becoming so widespread they are taking over."

Ironically, the most destructive species were introduced decades ago by well-meaning experts who did not understand the region's delicate ecosystem.

The melaleuca tree was planted in the Everglades 80 years ago in hopes of creating a lumber industry in what was seen as a useless wasteland.

Its economic potential proved elusive. Instead, the thirsty tree from arid regions of Australia soaks up the water, muscles out water-dependent species not used to competition, and the chemicals in its bark prevent all but the hardiest birds from even landing on it.

"Ten years ago in the east Everglades we only found 20 melaleuca trees," says botanist Robert Doren, vice president of the state's Exotic Pest Plant Council. "Now it has invaded 500,000 acres of the park, and 50,000 acres are essentially pure stands of melaleuca. Within our lifetime it could dominate the park — and a lifetime isn't very long."

THE RESULTANT damage has economic as well as environmental implications. Any major change in the Everglades will affect surrounding waters, drying up Miami's drinking water and sabotaging the shrimp, lobster and fishing industries in the Keys and Florida Bay.

One major factor contributing to the spread of the plant pests is Florida's rapid development. "Most of the plants that are a problem do best in disturbed areas. You take a naturally balanced area, then you build canals, roads, farms, and bring in a new plant with no natural predators," Doren says.

About half the 400 foreign plant species that have taken root in Florida were imported for economic or ornamental reasons, said Ms. Morton.

One ornamental plant that may haunt Florida's future is the ficus, a rapidly growing tree that can break up streets and sidewalks and take over whole yards. The plant was imported because it was thought unable to reproduce itself here, and therefore safe. Dismayed biologists recently have discovered seedlings sprouting in sidewalk cracks; the hardy tree has found a way to survive without the help of man.

Beside melaleuca and ficus, biologists generally agree Brazilian pepper and Australian pine present the major tree threats to Florida.

Brazilian pepper, marked by red berries and imported as a pretty bush, turns out to grow unabated in Florida's hospitable soil and climate. It spreads seeds everywhere and has covered thousands of acres of South Florida, growing as high as 40 feet with a trunk three feet in diameter. "We find it on coastlines and in mangrove stands. No one knows how it got here, but it does what kudzu does up north."

A Polynesian import, the lead tree, has been found recently, and in 60 or 70 years, could be where the melaleuca is now, he said.

MS. MORTON worries about highly poisonous foreign plants, many of them attractive to animals and children. She blames a series of unexplained horse deaths outside Miami on creeping indigo, brought to the area by the University of Florida in the 1930s as an experimental ground cover.

Castor beans, which now grow all the way to South Carolina, carry toxic seeds that are highly attractive to children.

The attractive berries of the rosary pea from India, a rapidly growing plant used by missionaries to make rosary beads, contains toxins that digest body tissue and can cause internal bleeding.

Some steps are being taken against the most high-profile invaders. Crews are poisoning and cutting down the melaleuca trees, and biologists are seeking natural enemies in Australia.

Ms. Morton dismisses the search for biological enemies as too little, too late.

"They're monsters, they're hard to control, and now they are running wild," she said. "We need to take bulldozers out there and take them down, then use safe herbicides to get the sprouts."

Experts agree that there are some rays of hope, at least as far as awareness is concerned. Dade County and others have adopted tough rules against planting exotic pests, and there is widespread understanding now that the invaders are a problem. Even so, there is a long way to go.

Texarkana gardener writes about the plants she grows

TEXARKANA (AP) — Alice Yeager not only does gardening right, she writes only gardening she's done.

"The things I write about, I have a connection with," she says, sitting at the typewriter in her home just north of Texarkana where she writes articles for gardening magazines all over the country.

"I'm not one of these garden writers who grabs an encyclopedia for their information. To me, that's like cheating. I have either grown or had personal experience with everything I write about."

Even her home is as organic as she and her husband, James, could make it. They built it themselves in 1958 on land his grandfather homesteaded, using mostly trees cut from their land and hauled out by mules to a nearby sawmill.

She got started writing in 1976 with an article on celery in "Natural Food and Farming" magazine. Celery, she explained to readers, may not be common in this area but it's not nearly as hard to grow as people think.

Her more recent articles include a story on dracunculus vulgaris (a more common name is Devil's-Tongue) in "American Horticultural" magazine, a story on turnip grees in a National Gardening Association guide to growing fruits and vegetables, and a story on Japanese persimmon trees in "America's Weekend Gardener" — complete with a recipe for persimmon pie.

In "Secrets of Master Gardeners," a book published by the Rodale Press, her article on growing Orient pear trees made her the only woman featured in the book.

Mrs. Yeager is a member of the Garden Writers Associaton of America, a 40-year-old organization of some 970 writers "dedicated to improving the standards of horticultural journalism in printed and broadcast media as a service to the gardening public."

THE GARDEN WRITERS directory lists her as "specializing in growing and using food plants, particularly new and unusual varieties."

Mrs. Yeager's husband takes the photos that go with her articles. "I'll see that it's a good time to get the photographs of some peppers, say, and we will get out there and take as much trouble with those plants as most people do photographing people," she says.

AP Laserphoto

Alice Yeager, standing next to a Japanese persimmon tree, started writing about gardening in 1976. She said she doesn't write about any plants which she hasn't grown herself.

She says dealing with magazine editors involves its share of trouble as well.

"I've learned a lot. Those rascals are always moving around. I've learned not to put a specific person's name on the envelope unless I am absolutely certain he is still there. I've had letters lie around for six weeks and then come back saying they left no forwarding address," she says.

"I subscribe to lots of gardening magazines. You have to keep up with the trends. And you don't want to send someone an article on daffodils if they have just published a big spread on daffodils. They probably won't want to hear anything about daffodils for two years.

"Some editors will really change your article around. I got pretty hacked over what one did to one of my fig articles. They might as well put their name on it after they change it that much, because they're not your words anymore."

LEARNING HOW TO garden was a lot simpler for Mrs. Yeager. It was just part of growing up.

"I came up in the Depression era," she says. "My father was an organic gardener. He very seldom used any chemicals. My mother raised flowers and she was the same way.

"People were not affluent like they are today, and they traded plants with each other and took care of their plants. They were valuable to them. So I came up in a plant society. And as I grew older, I just sort of clung to those ways."

Mrs. Yeager says part of the reason she writes about gardening is to pass on what she knows to younger generations who are growing up without learning much about gardening.

"So many young people today, no one has taught them about gardening. They think you just put some seeds in the ground and they will grow. But unless you have some awful good soil, it won't work that way."

Gardening has enjoyed quite a surge in popularity lately, at least partly as a result of the Baby Boom generation discovering its age-old benefits. "Time" magazine recently devoted a cover story to the new gardening mania. Mrs. Yeager believes gardening is good for everyone.

"Besides being able to get good, chemical-free fruits and vegetables, gardening its tremendous exercise. I don't like jogging because I don't see I'm getting much good out of it. But when I work in my garden, it pays off.

"I don't see why anyone wouldn't try to garden if they possibly could. If you have just a small space, you could try a patio garden or gardening in pots. Or in many places, people are developing community gardens."

SHE SAYS getting good advice can save novice gardeners from making common mistakes like planting next to a tree, trying to grow plants that only do well in other climates and digging holes too small for their plants.

But the best advice Mrs. Yeager says she can offer gardeners is to do their growing naturally. "I think some people depend on chemicals in their garden too much. They have a chemical dependency, so to speak," she says.

"Once in a while, if I can't get by any other way, I will resort to some sort of degradable chemical. But I avoid chemicals as much as possible. When you start killing your earthworms, you are damaging your soil. They are doing a lot of work for you, keeping the soil tilled for you.

"Also, there are so many things you can use instead of throwing them away. If plants have not gone to seed, you can till them back into the soil. You can start a compost pile. You can use discarded grass clippings, pine needles, straw, all sorts of things.

"I know you can't always do the things we do when you are working on a larger scale. You would need different techniques in larger-scale farming. But the extension services have a lot of information available for that type of farming."

In a world facing immense environmental problems, she says, gardening in a more natural, ecologically sound way just makes common sense.

"I don't think people realize what they are doing. Sooner or later, we are going to drown in our own trash."

Couple forced out of neighborhood for refusing to cut lawn

Associated Press

POTOMAC, Md. — One person's natural garden is another's weed patch.

When Walter and Nancy Stewart's tractor broke down a few years ago, they decided to turn about six of their seven acres of lawn in this affluent Washington suburb into a natural meadow.

The shaggy grasses and plants prompted an unsigned hostile note in their mailbox. Some people shout catcalls at the Stewarts as they drive past. Someone tossed a flare into the meadow.

Faced with a county order to trim their lawn, the Stewarts are standing firm in what has become a fight for a principle. They are challenging the ordinance that limits the height of lawns to 12 inches. A public hearing was held on the issue in June.

The Stewarts, he a research chemist, she a lawyer, are the latest in a succession of U.S. homeowners and renters who have attracted national attention by opting, not out of sloth but out of concern for the environment, to let their yards go natural.

Things got even rougher for Stephen Kenney and his wife after they planted wildflower seeds in the small front yard of their rented house in Kenmore, N.Y. As flowers blossomed amid uncut grass, neighbors' choler rose proportionately.

In the summer of 1985, the Kenneys received threats to burn down their house. Herbicides were sprinkled in their yard. Their cat was stoned. Birds were shot on their property. Snakes were placed in their nascent meadow — only to slither away into better-tended yards.

A local court convicted the Kenneys of "creating conditions hazardous to health" and fined them $50 a day, which they refused to pay. When neighbors cut down the growth, the Kenneys filed a complaint of their own. They ended up paying a $100 fine.

Today they live in rural Bear Creek, Pa., surrounded by patches of wildflowers. Kenney continues work on his doctorate in English and Mrs. Kenney teaches mathematics. Their departure was hastened by the "pressure cooker" atmosphere in Kenmore, Kenney told National Geographic. "It was all getting pretty tense and scary."

But deeply instilled habits are hard to break. One authority on lawns, biologist John H. Falk of Annapolis, Md., traces Americans' fixation on close-cropped grass from the longtime English obsession with tidy groundkeeping to the explosive growth of look-alike suburban yards after World War II.

"What sort of got lost in the process were the aesthetics," he says. "I think our tastes will change. Gradually this love affair with grass monoculture will disappear."

Pushed by organizations such as the National Wildlife Federation and the National Audubon Society, it may already be disappearing. They argue for natural ecosystems for animals, birds and insects, against environment-polluting chemicals.

The Wildlife Federation has been promoting its backyard habitat program since 1973. Toni Pepin, coordinator of the program, says more than 6,300 yards have been certified nationwide.

To be certified, a yard must offer sources of food, water, cover and places for birds and animals to raise their young. "This is landscaping for wildlife not abandonment of wildlife," she says.

Lorrie Otto of Bayside, Wis., a well-known lecturer and naturalist, advocates wildflower-filled meadows in front yards as well as back.

"It's the foundation of motherhood to try and take care of the Earth," Ms. Otto says. "The only way you can keep your sanity is to make a landscape as diverse as possible for the insects and the birds. You're just a guest."

Many local governments don't see it that way. But Stewart Mckenzie, environmental adviser to the Montgomery County Council, says, "They're unconstitutional, these ordinances."

Among common arguments of the monoculturists: Unmowed lawns attract rats and snakes and pose a fire hazard. "The fact is that none of the health hazards have fared very well in the courts," says McKenzie. As a result, some "weed laws" have been removed from the books.

McKenzie foresees an eventual liberalization of the Montgomery County ordinance.

One possible compromise would allow lawn meadows but would require both a mowed strip next to adjoining property and eradication of designated noxious plants.

"This kind of mindless reaching for the chemical gun at the hip is something I think you're going to see the end of in 10 years," McKenzie predicts.

American gardeners growing exotic non-native fruits

Tropical fruits planted in California, Florida

By ELIZABETH SCHNEIDER
New York Times News Service

Every American who grows exotic fruits hopes to come up with a kiwi. The kiwi was first produced commercially in New Zealand. It appeared in the United States in 1962 and became so popular it was established in California so kiwi lovers could be kept happy in New Zealand's off-season.

Last year the American crop was 53.6 million pounds; imports from New Zealand were 39.5 million pounds.

In recent years many other tropical and subtropical fruits have taken root in American soil, mostly in Florida and California, where the weather accommodates warm-climate plants.

Backyard fruits once considered too expensive, too fragile or insufficiently productive for commercial purposes are being planted in Florida: the carambola (kah-rahm-BO-la), litchi (LEE-chee or LIE-chee), white sapote (sah-PO-tay), atemoya (ah-tay-MOY-ah) and mamey sapote (MAH-may sah-PO-tay).

Other non-native fruits that flourish in New Zealand have fared well here, too: cherimoya (cheri-MOY-ah), tamarillo (tah-mah-RILL-oh), kiwano (kee-WAH-no), feijoa (fay-ZHO-ah), pepino (peh-PEE-no), Cape gooseberry and an occasional babaco (bah-BAH-co), a papaya relative.

Ten years ago, such fruits were the domain of amateur growers who tracked down varieties to suit particular microclimates, eliminated weak strains and shared information and seeds with fellow enthusiasts.

GEORGE FRICKMANN, president of the California Rare Fruit Growers, a nonprofit group, explained that the 2,600 members "comb the globe for rare species."

As a result, he said, "local interest has been stimulated throughout California, and uncommon species appear at farmers' markets with some regularity."

The expanding specialty fruit market has led one-time hobbyists like Loren and Kathy Toomey to move into the commercial arena. They own Toomey's California Subtropical Fruit in El Toro in Southern California, and grow passion fruit, feijoa, tamarillo and kiwano. They sell all they grow to Frieda's Finest Specialty Produce in Los Angeles, the nation's largest such distributor.

In Florida as well, numerous part-time growers have begun expanding production of tropical fruit.

"Public interest is so high that commercial cultivation of crops previously considered eccentric seems normal," said Bill Schaefer, director of marketing for J.R. Brooks & Son, a Florida grower and shipper of tropical fruit.

The Brooks packing plant in Homestead, in southern Florida, is in the only area of the continental United States where tropical fruit can be grown commercially.

Schaefer attributed much of the popularity of warm-climate fruits to people wanting "nutritious variety," and "new colors, new shapes and new flavors."

He added: "Asian and Latin immigrants, now well entrenched, are looking for foods from their homelands. Farmers from these same lands who have settled in America are growing the foods to fill the demands of their countrymen.

"The interest seems to be contagious. A Florida-born shopper watching a Cuban-born shopper select sugar apples and mamey sapote will not be happy to continue on to the lettuce and tomatoes. She'll wonder what she's missing."

CNS Graphic

MAMEY SAPOTE is expensive to produce. It takes nine years for a newly planted tree to bear, and 12 to 18 months for each harvest to ripen. Because its size and skin tone do not indicate whether a mamey is mature, the stem end of each fruit on a tree must be nicked to check for ripeness.

Add to these difficulties the lack of topsoil: trees must be set into holes bored into the limestone by augers, then fed and watered to a fare-thee-well.

"The ground merely holds up the plants," Schaefer said. "Then it's up to man to do the rest."

The rolling hills of southern California — places like Carpinteria, San Diego and Ventura — are the sole U.S. home of the cherimoya, a temperamental fruit that cannot be sprayed, requires hand pollination in the 12-hour period that the flowers are receptive, takes four years to fruit, is prone to scarring and beloved of snails.

Cherimoya must be picked weekly, right through the winter rains. It blackens if chilled, ripens very quickly and unpredictably once picked, and cracks easily.

Nevertheless, California Tropics of Carpinteria will send half a million pounds of cherimoya to market this year; it began with 50 pounds in 1972. The company also grows other hard-to-handle fruits: white sapote, feijoa and passion fruit. Jonathan Brown, an owner, said he expected production to double over the next two years.

As he looked across his land, David Dixon, who owns Dixon Ranch in Sebastopol in Northern California, exclaimed: "When Luther Burbank said this was the greatest growing area, he knew what he meant. I can grow a southern Mexican crop like white sapotes, and a northern European one like red currants, both outside. It's amazing."

DIXON HEDGES his horticultural bets by planting many exotic crops, including pepinos, Cape gooseberries, passion fruit and white sapotes.

Marc and Kiki Ellenby, the owners of L.N.B. Groves in Homestead, Fla., grow sugar apples, sapodilla, carambolas, canistel, jakfruit, litchis, longans, jaboticaba, black sapotes, atemoyas, wampi and more. "The market is there," Ellenby said.

What happens once the fruits get to market and whether they will remain in demand is another story. Growers may provide beautiful fruit and shoppers may be fascinated by the novelty, but unless retailers and consumers learn to select, store and use the produce, its success may be short-lived.

"If only we could teach people how to handle it, the fruit would sell itself," Schaefer said.

Some exotic fruits:

■ ATEMOYA (Annona hybrid): cross between cherimoya and sugar apple; gray-green, resembling a melted pine cone; when ripe, white flesh is studded with heavy black seeds; very sweet, creamy-textured.

■ CAPE GOOSEBERRY (Physalis peruviana and related species): encased in a weblike husk; mustard-golden, the cherry-sized fruit is aromatic and medium-sweet.

■ CARAMBOLA or star fruit (Averrhoa carambola): glossy yellow ellipse with five ribs that form a golden star in cross section; lightly scented; may be tart or mild and sweet, depending on variety; flavor and texture suggest a blending of apple, grape and lemon.

■ CHERIMOYA (Annona cherimola): similar to atemoya, but smoother and greener; ripe fruit is white studded with black seeds; milky-sweet with texture of flan and a hint of honey, banana, mango or pineapple, as variety dictates.

■ FEIJOA or pineapple guava (Feijoa sellowiana): oval, deep green and egg-sized; rich aroma of grapes, guava, pineapple and mint; medium-sweet, slightly granular in texture; seeds edible.

■ GUAVA (Psidium guayava): a green-skinned, plum-sized ovoid; may be cream, pink or yellow inside; granular and dense in texture.

■ KIWANO or African horned cucumber or jelly melon (Cucumis metuliferus): member of gourd family rechristened kiwano in New Zealand; rubbery skin is golden-orange when ripe; pulp is bright emerald peppered with cucumber-like seeds; taste seems a bland mixture of cucumber and kiwi.

■ LITCHI, also spelled lychee or lichee (Litchi chinensis): a small Ping-Pong ball in size; rosy or rust-colored shell; grapelike flesh, juicy and aromatic with hint of rose

■ MAMEY SAPOTE or sapote (Pouteria sapota): baseball or football size and shape; brown skin; heavy and dense flesh of flamingo hue; softens to oily-creamy tenderness; pulp suggests a blend of avocado and sweet potato with honey.

■ MONSTERA or ceriman (Monstera deliciosa): think of it as a banana encased in green armor plate; when tile-like scales separate, black-speckled, creamy pulp is ripe, tasting like banana and pineapple combined.

■ PURPLE PASSION FRUIT (Passiflora edulis) and YELLOW PASSION FRUIT (Passiflora edulis forma rough-shelled, wrinkled, creased; egg-sized; pulp, yellowish with dark seeds, has scent of a tropical garden.

■ PEPINO or pepino melon (Solanum muricatum): juicy, melonlike flesh and tiny edible seeds; gold-and-mauve skin resembles an eggplant's.

■ TAMARILLO, also called tree tomato (Cyphomandra betacea): egg-shaped, elongated; garnet to golden in hue; flavor is both sweet and bitter, fruity and vegetablelike.

DEAR ABBY

Other woman story ends sadly

By ABIGAIL VAN BUREN

Van Buren

DEAR ABBY: I was the other woman again. I'm 35 years old, still single, very attractive, and suffering through my third affair. The age-old story — worked for a businessman, his mid-life crisis, a close working relationship, his vulnerability and mine. He said he loved me, yet I knew he had a good wife and a loving family. So, where am I now?

I lost my job because of the gossip, and I'm alone again.

Someone said you once printed a classic letter about women who have "affairs" with married men — and the usual outcome.

Please print it again. Maybe I'll learn that life is indeed too short to be miserable, and it will lessen the pain.

Also, I am sure that there are others who are either in a relationship of that kind — or contemplating one — and they could learn from it. Sign me ... THREE-TIME LOSER IN MONTANA

DEAR LOSER: I published two "classic" letters dealing with this problem. Here they are. I hope they help:

DEAR ABBY: This is probably just like a million other letters you've received from women who have had affairs with married men. But this one contains a piece of advice that hasn't been emphasized nearly enough.

Last year I started seeing an absolutely fantastic guy from work. I knew he was married, but we played it cool and thought we could handle it.

It was terrific while it lasted, but it had to come to an end. (The old story: We got too serious. He didn't want to hurt his wife and kids. Then he got "noble" and told me he couldn't allow me to invest any more time in a man who couldn't marry me.)

I'm not blaming anybody but myself. I'm a mature woman and should have known better. The moral to this story is: If you must have an affair, don't choose someone you will see at work every day. When it's over, the daily contact is torture. — STILL HURTING

DEAR STILL: You seem to have overlooked another "moral" or two: "Thou shalt not commit adultery" and "Thou shalt not steal."

DEAR ABBY: May I give your readers the benefit of my very valuable experience? I address this to any woman who is "in love" with a married man:

Never expect to see him on Sundays or holidays.

Never call him at home.

Don't ever expect him to take you out in public, but be prepared to entertain HIM at your place. He may bring a bottle or the steaks occasionally, but in actual dollars and cents you will spend more on him than he'll spend on you.

Never depend on him in times of personal crisis.

Don't believe him when he tells you his wife is a shrew, cold, homely, too fat (or too thin) and hasn't slept with him for 10 years.

Don't ever expect his wife to divorce him — even if she catches him. She knows you are not his first and won't be his last. Also, she is not about to give up her social status, financial security and retirement income because of you.

However, her discovery will probably terminate his affair with you, so be prepared to get some new clothes, circulate, and find another married man whose wife is a shrew, cold, homely, too fat (or too thin) and hasn't slept with him for 10 years. Sign me ... HIS WIFE

Financial institutions cater to children

By ERMA BOMBECK

Bombeck

One of the big trends projected for 1989 is banks for kids. Assuming children will be active in running them, God help an adult who wanders in seeking a loan. Based on my experience with children, I would rather ... this comes hard for me even to write ... I would rather live within my means than borrow money from them. If you had ever borrowed $800 from a 3-year-old for a new septic tank, you'd feel the same way.

Some of you may ask, how did children become rich enough to warrant their own financial center in the first place? Mostly through those eight little Donald Trump words: "Do I have to use my own money?" By the time our kids were 5 years old, they had enough money from grandparents on birthdays and holidays to get their own apartments. Yet when there was some toy they were lusting after, it was always, "Do I have to use my own money?" Since their food, lodging, health care, education, entertainment, clothing and incidentals were all provided free of charge, the only things they used their own money for were deposits and investments in baseball cards.

They also stashed away big bucks from five sources of income: paper routes, rewards for good grades, household and yard chores, allowances and breathing. (I once gave a kid a blank check to stop cracking his knuckles while I was eating.)

The Great American Allowance was supposed to give them a sense of what it's like to handle money. Last year, more than 5 million kids received enough money from investments and other sources of incomes to file a tax return. As many as 100,000 of them out there are delinquent and still waiting for an answer to "Do I have to use my own money?"

Despite the fact that Mother's Day does not inspire a boy to dip into his own resources, there is one thing that will part him from his hard-earned cash. That's a girl he has known for two weeks. The sky's the limit. A girl will make a withdrawal from her stash only if it's a health problem. She will no longer breathe if she does not get a designer sweater.

What we're seeing here, folks, is a new generation of tycoons who have outgrown the little pig with the slot in his head. It's not unrealistic to assume that in a few years we'll have magnates at age 8, authors of best-selling books with a title like "Iacocca Was a Loser" at age 10, a take-over of the family house and car at age 15, and income tax evasion by age 16.

Kids have figured out how to make money. They just haven't figured out what they're supposed to spend it on yet.

Lilacs, roses add surprisingly good flavor to meals

By ELIZABETH SCHNEIDER
New York Times News Service

Flowers and herbs have contributed culinary color to meals, both regal and lowly, for centuries.

But today lilacs, mimosa, roses, spearmint and violets — candied, swirled into syrup, infused in cordials or otherwise preserved — are reappearing in innovative cuisine.

Flowers like squash blossoms and nasturtiums are part of the decorative-edible larder, too, and fresh herbs are playing an ever larger role.

Until well into the 19th century, dandelion and elderberry wine were part of the American cook's repertory.

Now, dandelion leaves and blooms are being incorporated in salads, and elderberry blossoms are deep-fried in a fritter batter, then sugar-dusted.

Day lily buds (golden needles) — a must, in their dried form, in moo shu pork — are used fresh in salads in restaurants in Berkeley, Calif.

Rose petals, which traditionally add their aroma to both sweet and savory dishes in Morocco, are now found on menus in Massachusetts.

Squash blossoms are as popular in contemporary Italian and California cuisine as they are in early Pueblo and Navajo cooking.

And herb- and flower-strewn salads are as deliciously whimsical today as the bud-bedecked "sallets" of Elizabethan England.

Until recently, herb lovers who wanted a regular supply of the more esoteric scented staples had no choice but to plant their own.

BUT NOW, PURPLE pansies are tucked into tidy plastic containers alongside alfalfa sprouts in a small market in Manhattan, and small plastic bags of marjoram, thyme, sage, rosemary and frilly cilantro are part of supermarket displays from coast to coast.

The reasons have as much to do with horticultural advances in growing techniques and consumer demands for healthful fare as with culinary stylishness.

"It seems like a natural extension of the general food revolution," said Frank McClelland, the chef and owner of L'Espalier in Boston.

"But I don't think it could have happened without the innovative, small-scale farmers who take the time to learn to grow better products."

Those farmers have found a market among chefs eager for quality produce and consumers looking for healthful, natural foods.

"With the attention paid to a cardiovascular diet, with the easing off of salt use, people have rediscovered taste," said Marilyn Hampstead, owner of Fox Hill Farm in Parma, Mich., a supplier of herbs and wild foods to mail-order customers and and restaurants.

Rick McCain of Quail Mountain Nursery in Watsonville, Calif., who owns more than 60 acres of fresh herbs and flowers, said: "Much of the explosion is a result of the back-to-the-earth movement. People want healthy food. With dried herbs, many of them imported, you don't know what's on them."

Paul Friedman, the president of the Green House, a major herb farm in Encinitas, Calif., concurs: "People are buying herbs because they know that fresh is healthy, that fresh flavors are the power behind good food."

The five-year-old company has a market share of more than 50 percent of all the fresh herbs sold in supermarkets nationwide, and its figures show that basil, mint and dill are the most popular.

DURING A RECENT visit to Windfall Farms in Montgomery, N.Y., in the Catskills, a supplier of organic produce to some 50 New York restaurants, the moist, tropical heat in the large new greenhouse accentuated the fruitiness of honey melon sage and the tang of lemon verbena.

Morse Pitts, a co-owner, had his own explanation of why flowers have again become a part of the cuisine.

"I think they're popular because chefs get bored and need new kicks," he said.

Not so, McClelland said.

He contends that flowers have been underrated for eating because of their beauty.

"What is so amazing is that so much flavor, so much power is concentrated in that small flower," he said. "The beauty is secondary."

Whatever the reasons, adventurous chefs are finding ways both subtle and flamboyant to use fresh edible flowers and herbs in their dishes.

At the Rattlesnake Club in Denver, Jimmy Schmidt places a blaze of nasturtiums across his salad of hearts of palm and julienne of roasted fennel, the whole seasoned with a bright-green dressing of pureed basil, roasted garlic and balsamic vinegar.

Among the rainbow of sorbets offered is a rose hip and rose geranium blend.

AT LAVIN'S in Manhattan, Jay Silver garnishes an appetizer of fresh black Mission figs and duck prosciutto with blue borage blossoms, a faintly sweet and cucumber-flavored herb that is increasingly popular.

John Novi of the Dupuy Canal House in High Falls, N.Y., floats chives blossoms on his gazpacho, and Johnny-jump-ups on a tart sorrel soup.

At L'Espalier in Boston, McClelland, who is particularly partial to herb flowers, is serving grilled marinated squid with garlic noodles topped with tarragon and thyme flowers.

His desserts include an ice cream of violets (the custard base flavored with violet water, the soft ice cream finished with a generous quantity of fresh flowers).

Mrs. Hampstead sees the chef's role as key.

"As the press has allotted more space to chefs' creations, as these stars share their recipes, readers become accustomed to seeing fresh herbs as an ingredient," she said.

"Herbs have trickled down from the restaurant business into the consumer marketplace."

At Plantation Spice Growers in Goulds, Fla., Janell Smith brushed her hand over a feathery profusion of leaves.

"Advances in technology allow for a whole range of fresh items," she said on a tour through several plots on the 250-acre farm.

Arugula and basil are shaded by black netting, which keeps the plants cooler and moister and discourages insects.

A controlled-drip irrigation system customizes water and fertilizer for each herb plant.

Ms. Smith said agricultural schools were encouraging advances in the industry by offering studies in herbs, greenhouse production and cultivation of small-scale, high-profit crops.

The edible flowers that Plantation ships all over the East Coast are also sold in supermarkets: Jewel in Chicago, Kroger in Cincinnati and Atlanta, Giant Food in Washington and A&P in Baltimore.

Frieda Caplan, the founder and chief executive officer of Frieda's Finest Produce Specialties in Los Angeles, said the company's new potted herbs had zoomed up on its list of best sellers this year.

MAXINE SISSON, owner of Maxi a la Carte in Sebastopol, Calif., cultivates 15 species of flowers, and her three-year-old company supplies floral fare to restaurants in the region, including John Ash & Co., Restaurant Matisse, Truffles, Sonoma Mission Inn and Greens.

Fuchsias, violets and pansies are particularly popular these days, but a few chefs are recognizing the charms of lemony tuberous begonias and of fruity, fleshy feijoa blooms.

"Cooks are more and more entranced with tasty herb blossoms, which bridge the gap between flavorful and beautiful," Mrs. Sisson said.

"A few years ago in California," she continued, "we were worried about being overdressed whenever we went out. Now it's OK to be beautiful, to care about refinements. And flowers on the plate make everything look special."

OPEC PREVIEW

Analysts like chances of accord

Four issues could be sticking points

By ALLEN E. HOWLAND
Assistant Business/Oil Editor

Only time will tell if this week's saber-rattling by Saudi Arabia can be turned into next week's handshaking by OPEC members on production quotas.

In recent days, Saudi Arabia has succeeded in triggering a crisis within the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries with its stern warnings to other cartel nations, carefully orchestrated to galvanize the members into cutting production and lifting oil prices.

If the cartel is sufficiently frightened by the threat of single-digit oil prices which could result from the Saudis opening their spigots, the 13 members should be able to forge a new agreement during this week's meetings in Vienna, according to one team of OPEC-watchers.

Thomas Escott, Lawrence Crowley, Robert Phaneuf and Phillip Pace of the Dallas brokerage firm Rauscher Pierce Refsnes, have prepared a strategy brief entitled "Showdown in Vienna" which examines the prospects for success during the week.

The four analysts cite a 60 percent chance that OPEC will be successful in forging a new agreement because the risk of failure is too great for the nations involved to endure. They contend the cartel will avoid an all-out price war, because OPEC economies could not stand the strain of a severe drop in revenues.

But they warn of four separate issues which could delay or derail an accord:

- Getting Iraq and Iran to agree on quotas for each other;
- Acquiescence by the other OPEC members to a revised and flexible quota system that allows greater shares for Iraq and Iran;
- Resolution of the condensate issue within the quota; and
- Cooperation of non-OPEC producers to at least hold the line or to cut production.

None of these are trivial problems, the authors state. The pressure has been building for years, and it will not be a simple matter to resolve all of these issues in a few days in November.

The current quandary differs from the similarly critical OPEC meetings during the price collapse in 1986 in that much more complex issues must be worked out.

"In 1986, quota numbers were in place, all they really had only to agree to agree," Phil Pace, an RPR research analyst and one author of the brief, said Friday in a telephone interview from Dallas.

"This time around, numbers have to change and the logistic challenges are great."

A serious impasse on any item could collapse the entire OPEC meeting, leading to an all-out price war, which RPR analysts say could present $10 per barrel prices, and which OPEC Secretary-general Subroto has said could create a $5 world price.

On the more optimistic side, the analysts point out that OPEC needs only to cut its current production about 2.5 million barrels of oil per day, from 21 million to about 18.5 million barrels a day.

If the "supply overhang" for Western producers is truly just five percent of total demand, then the group feels OPEC can be convinced to embrace the wisdom of selling 18.5 million barrels at at $16 rather than 21 million barrels a day at $10 or less.

"We believe the probability of OPEC accepting this strategy is better than 60 percent, but recognize it could take more than a week in late November to resolve the complex political issues involved," the group wrote.

Given that outlook, prices could continue to be extremely volatile at least through the end of the year, as the cartel works toward a resolution, Pace said.

Although RPR had prepared their report well in advance of the meeting, Pace said the political posturing and rhetoric, particularly by Iran and Iraq in the final days before the meeting was understandable and to be expected.

The most surprising development during the week, Pace said, was that prices remained as solid as they did despite the dire warnings coming out of the Middle East.

In the past Iraq has refused to abide by an OPEC quota, saying it wanted the same, higher level given Iran. Iran has argued against granting Iraq an equal share.

Iraqi Oil Minister Issam Abdul Raheem al-Chalabi told reporters outside Thursday's closed-door meeting, "It's very clear our position hasn't changed."

Non-OPEC threat abates

HOUSTON (AP) — Mushrooming non-OPEC oil production has struck a costly blow to the cartel's hold on the energy market, fueling an oil glut that has sent prices through the floor.

But the days of rapid non-OPEC oil expansion are mostly over, experts say. Today, the big production increases are coming from the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, and they say it's up to OPEC to stop them.

"Our feeling at this point through mid-1989 is that we have a problem in the Persian Gulf, not a worldwide production problem," said Sara Emerson, vice president of Energy Security Analysis in Washington. Some OPEC leaders are using the non-OPEC oil growth of recent years as a smokescreen to hide a larger problem within the cartel, she said.

INVENTION Mother Of FRUSTRATION

By SHARON BENOIT
Copley News Service

Got a great idea for a new product? Terrific. Thinking up the idea is one of three easy steps to launching a new product. However, there are at least 20 tougher steps you'll have to climb before you actually get the product off the ground. And, if you think steps four through 20 are going to be a piece of cake, forget it.

"The market is not waiting with bated breath to accept any new product," according to Norman Rips, founder and former owner of Rips Vision Centers. "Inventors must look forward to an extremely heartbreaking, difficult and frustrating period of time before a breakthrough comes along. That is, of course, if it ever comes along."

As an example, Rips cited the trials of the inventor of Xerox.

"I believe he struggled with his new product for a period of eight years and practically drove himself mad before the Xerox was finally accepted on the market. Today, it is one of best most successful products — some people even use the word Xerox as a generic term for photocopying. And the inventor lived to see it."

Rips has a lot in common with most inventors of new products. He's learned a few lessons through trial and error. His advice to newcomers or would-be inventors is simple.

"Most developers or inventors of new products do not have the financial sense to bring a product idea to market without the help of venture capitalists or the like. And, in the pursuit of bringing a product to market, oftentimes, the inventor/developer will end up with a small percentage interest in the product. If the product is greatly successful, he/she may be able to reap the rewards of a minor interest partner, rather than what is truly deserved by the inventor."

These are the cold facts. Life in the world of inventors is not a bed of roses. Rips believes it's filled with many thorns. So be prepared.

"Without down-to-earth business knowledge and acumen, an inventor runs the risk of not being able to protect himself/herself. There are many people out there who are ready, willing and able to take that good idea away from him/her if the opportunity arises," notes Rips.

About four years ago, Rips developed an optical device known as Kromx Lense System, which is a way of producing opthalmic multifocal lenses to prescription in less than five minutes. This product has been on the market for about a year.

"This is a lense that is a wave of the future. I'm very proud of this product. But if I had it to do over, I have my doubts if I would have ever brought it to market. I had to contend with many frustrations," Rips says.

P. Jeffrey Wield, an inventor from San Diego who has his name on one patent as a development engineer at Hewlett Packard, just recently was granted a patent on a new product he plans to market on his own.

"It's an aluminated flying saucer — a Frisbee with two LED lights that create individual points of light around the perimeter of the disc when thrown."

Actually, there are three different types of protections an inventor can get — patent, design patent and copyright. A patent is usually associated with mechanical ideas, while copyrights deal with a piece of art (books, games, paintings — anything that sits on a shelf for artistic reasons). If something carries a copyright, the rules of piracy are easier to win than a patent or patent design.

Wield says the general public tends to have a misconception about what a patent is and what it can do for an inventor.

"Basically, a patent gives the inventor the right to exclude anyone else from selling your product on the market. A U.S. patent is only good in the U.S. If you want to export your product to a foreign country, then you need to apply for a patent in every country being considered. Europe has one central filing location, Japan has another."

Lately, foreign countries have become good markets for U.S. inventions, and by the same token the U.S. has become a good market for foreign inventors. Last year 47 percent of all patents issued in the U.S. were held by residents of foreign countries. Japanese inventors alone held more than 19 percent.

What the patent doesn't give you is the right to sell your product. In Wield's case, he has a Frisbee with pulsing lights on it. If there was a patent on the Frisbee itself, then Wield wouldn't be able to sell his product unless he had an agreement with the guy who invented Frisbee.

Fortune names 1988 top products

NEW YORK (AP) — For the first time, Fortune magazine has named an animal to its annual list of the nation's hottest products. That fits well with an overall trend for this year's list to the small and technologically advanced.

Fortune's report, contained in the Dec. 5 issue, names 12 top items:

- Genetic mouse. Last April, Harvard University received the first patent for an artificially engineered higher form of life. The mouse, being sold to researchers at $50 apiece under the trademark OncoMouse, was created by injecting genes suspected of causing cancer into fertilized mouse eggs. The offspring carry the implanted gene.
- Video Walkman. For $1,300, video junkies no longer have to leave their favorite tape at home.
- "E.T." on video. Six years after the movie made its debut, MCA has brought out a videotape of "E.T. — The Extra-Terrestrial" and already has received orders for more than 11 million copies at $24.95 each.
- NEC Ultralite laptop computer. Small enough to fit into an interoffice envelope, NEC's computer is powerful enough to run the Lotus 1-2-3 program and four times faster than IBM's XT personal computers. It lists for $2,999.
- Rogaine. The first prescription hair-growth medication approved by the Food and Drug Administration, Upjohn Co.'s product sells for about $50 for a month's supply. The minoxidil preparation must be used constantly or its effects stop, and only about 39 percent of the men in clinical tests experienced even moderate hair growth.

TEXAS BUSINESS

Pistachios: The next Texas crop?

By HOLDEN LEWIS
Associated Press Writer

SARAGOSA, Texas — Iranians trying to salvage that nation's war-ravaged economy may find a little competition from an unexpected corner: West Texas fields where row upon row of pistachio seedlings are spreading across the plain.

Iran supplies more than 90 percent of the United States pistachio market, but Texas Land Commissioner Garry Mauro hopes Texas can nibble into that share and increase U.S. consumption of the tasty seeds.

The idea for a Texas pistachio crop was born when Mauro visited Israel in 1984 with state Agriculture Secretary Jim Hightower. During the fact-finding trip Mauro drove through the Negev desert.

"I'm driving down the road and looking out the window and wondering, 'What am I doing in a place that looks like West Texas?' " he said. "Then I passed a farm with tomatoes and cotton and vegetables, and I said, 'Wait a minute — we don't have that in West Texas.' "

Actually, a lot of cotton grows in West Texas, but the land is of little use for edible crops because West Texas groundwater is too salty.

But after talking with an Israeli consulting firm called TAHAL, Texas officials discovered that pistachio trees are well-suited to the sunny West Texas climate and salty water.

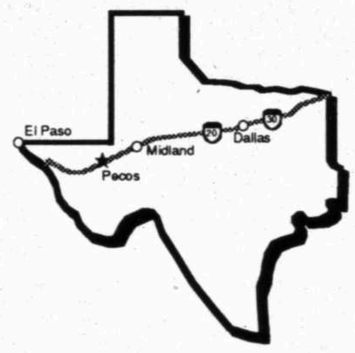
The upshot is that 20 acres of pistachio seedlings were planted last May in a field about 3 miles north of Saragosa. The trees are on Permanent School Fund land managed by Mauro's office.

Bruce Hackett, who is leasing the tract and growing the trees, said the pistachio seedlings are doing well. The plants have long, narrow, dark-green leaves. Most of them stand about two feet high.

They probably will begin producing fruit — pistachios are berries, not nuts — in three to five years.

The state owns about 800,000 acres of Permanent School Fund land west of the Pecos, and about a quarter of that land is barren. Mauro hopes to have about 7,000 unproductive acres planted with pistachios within a few years, following a profit-sharing program similar to the one between Hackett and the state.

"We'd like to see thousands and thousands of pistachio trees," Mauro said. "We think it's an industry that could bring lots of jobs to the region."



Mauro visited the field recently to make videos for presentation to potential investors.

It takes a lot of money to plant pistachios, install underground drip irrigation systems and maintain the trees for the five years until they begin producing seeds.

"We're having very little luck with the banks because they don't have much money and they need cash flow — and we won't have any cash flow for four or five years," Hackett said.

His investors group has spent about $165,000 on the 20-acre site in the first six months of the project, mostly on one-time items such as buying the plants and putting in the irrigation system.

Hackett said he wants to plant 300 more acres. The cost of buying seedlings and planting, irrigating and maintaining them over five years could exceed $1 million, he said. Hackett is leasing the land from the state for $1 an acre per year. For the first 10 years, he'll give the state 20 percent of any profits.

It will take about 15 years for the trees to reach full size — about 15 feet high and 20 feet wide at the tops. The trees are spaced 17 feet apart, so their crowns will mesh together — allowing workers to harvest the berries by shaking every other tree.

Mature trees should yield about 50 pounds of pistachios annually, said Buck Hoelscher, a former cotton farmer who tends the experimental pistachio grove.

The signs are flashing better, brighter times

Pitts

The light has changed from red to yellow and is about to flash green for go.

After being brought to a dead stop by the downturns of 1982 and 1986, Texas is about to get on the move again. One can see it in the frequency of good events.

Several years ago in Denver, I had the privilege of hearing futurist John Naismith, the author of Megatrends, tell how to spot emerging trends in business and lifestyles.

Basically, all you do is watch magazines, newspapers and TV for the frequency of news coverage on certain issues, according to Naismith. When that frequency reaches a certain pitch — normally perceptible only to one who scans a wide variety of news material — one can clearly see emerging trends and predict them.

Mr. Naismith may have developed that future-telling technique into a highly paid profession, but it is not exactly unique. For generations, newspaper editors have been doing essentially the same thing — reading volumes of information and making observations about possible emerging trends.

Each week, in my capacity as business/oil editor, I read approximately 100-140 wire stories from four separate wire services and about the same number of press releases received in the mail. I also read a minimum of 20 newspapers per week and six to eight magazines.

At this point, based on that reading, I am prepared to predict that the economic future of Texas is destined to be brighter and better before the end of the decade.

Consider the frequency of good economic news in the last year:

A TEXAS PRESIDENT — For the first time in history, a Texan, a Midlander, an oilman who has lived in a "shotgun" duplex in Odessa, raised money for drilling deals, sold oil field equipment, drilled dry holes, and has a son who dips snuff, is president of the United States — perhaps for eight years. There is no way that earthy background can be anything but positive for Texas and the oil industry.

POLITICAL CLOUT — Now consider how Texas political power stacks up below the White House: Texan Jim Baker has already been pegged as Secretary of State and former Sen. John Tower is expected to be named Secretary of Defense.

Lauro Cavazos of Texas Tech is Secretary of Education. Tom Loeffler of Huht is in the running for Secretary of Energy. Jerry Langdon of Midland is a commissioner of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission.

Moreover, it's probably safe to say that more Texans will land choice presidential appointments before the Bush administration is firmed up.

Meanwhile Sen. Lloyd Bentsen, who was the one redeeming factor in a lackluster Democratic ticket, is back in the Senate with new clout, still heading the Senate Finance Committee. Another Texan, U.S. Rep. Henry Gonzalez, D-San Antonio, is likely to head the House Banking Committee. And Jim Wright, of Fort Worth, remains Speaker of the House.

At no time in history has any state had as much political clout as Texas will have come January 1989.

HIGH TECH — It is a clout matched only by Texas' growing dominance as a world leader in high technology.

Sematech, a consortium of 14 semiconductor manufacturers and a magnet for $100 million in federal funds annually, has located in Austin with MCI, and TI is in Midland and all over the state. This makes Texas, in the view of many, the new semiconductor capitol of the world.

News this week that Texas had been selected as the site for the Superconducting Super Collider, will have an enormous effect on the state economy, creating about 21,000 jobs during construction and a total of 5,775 jobs once the facility is built, according to Dr. Ray Perryman of Baylor University Forecasting

INVENTION

If Wield couldn't get permission, then his product cannot be sold. But he can exclude anyone else from selling a Frisbee with pulsing lights.

"All a patent does is offer the right to exclude. It's not a law and doesn't give you as much protection as one might think."

If you're considering stepping into the ring with a new product invention, Wield feels you should seek out a trustworthy patent attorney first.

"You need to protect yourself before you even finish conceptualizing the new product idea," he says. "I went to the least expensive patent attorney in my area, and he helped me file for the patent with the U.S. Patent Office in Washington, D.C."

While Wield feels very strongly that patent attorneys can help you get this right worked out, Rips tends to be skeptical and cautious.

Says Rips: "Seeking a good attorney is worthless. Hopefully he won't steal the idea from you. Yes, it's true you do have to have a patent attorney help you, it's difficult to do by yourself. But just be careful. Check out the attorney before you give any idea to him."

Inventor John Wolens of Glencoe, Ill., tends to agrees with Rips but also insists, "Trying to handle your own new product from start to finish is like performing brain surgery on yourself. Once you find a good patent attorney who is trustworthy, start preparing yourself for discouragement every step of the way. Selling new ideas is the hardest single business in the world."

However, Wolens and Wield firmly believe you should invest in getting a copyright on the idea.

"Copyrighting is nearly free," notes Wield. "The U.S. government issues patents to encourage scientific development. The government will give you the exclusive right to allow no one else to sell your product if you will agree to fully disclose your invention to the public. But you have to give up the patent after 17 years. It cannot be renewed. Copyrights may be renewed over and over again. The Frisbee has been around since 1935. It started out as Mrs. Frisbee's Pie Plate."

Also, you can determine quickly if something is a copy of an original piece of art. Wolens emphasizes, "If it's a device, there are mechanical tests that need to be done to determine whether something is operated the same way as a patented device."

Wolens holds about 35 patents on products that most of us have used in our kitchens for years. His first invention, the air popcorn popper, taught him bitter lessons. He tried to get it marketed through various companies and ended up having to sue four Fortune 500 companies in U.S. federal courts to save the product idea.

"I won three cases and lost the fourth," he said. "I had to mortgage my house and spent $300,000 to save that product. But, I'm a success story. For every patent I hold, I've got 100 failures."

The company who won the suit against Wolens in the air popcorn popper suit was able to show that its hot air was different from his ... and that was all it took.

Wolens figures the cost per patent is between $3,000 and $5,000. It usually takes between one and two years to get a patent issued. But, according to all of the inventors queried, this doesn't mean you have to wait to proceed with a good idea.

"If you want to get the idea marketed, make people you are disclosing the idea to sign a non-disclosure form so they can't steal it," advises Wolens. "If they do steal it after they've signed the form, your litigation will be easier to win based on breach of a confidential relationship of trade secrets."

Key to this was the famous Sears, Roebuck suit in which the inventor of the ratchet wrench had a patent and a confidential disclosure agreement with Sears. In this case, the inventor won the lawsuit based on the confidential disclosure agreement rather than the patent. So Wolens' advice is to get both.

Richard Disanto, marketing director for Twin Wiper Blades, a new product now being introduced to the United States via Australia, says the product's parent company has been waiting for a patent for nearly a year.

"We're introducing this product with a patent pending seal in January," he said. "It was patented in Australia two years ago and in the U.K. earlier this year. A patent is pending in Germany and Japan, too."

Twin Wiper Blades will retail for about $6.95 each. It's being promoted as an easy-to-apply, newly designed twin-bladed wiper that gives twice the action to what is on the market today.

"It's been 60 years since someone redesigned the windshield wiper," notes Disanto. "We decided it was time for improvement."

The pistachios, which grow in bunches like grapes, probably would wholesale for $2 to $3 a pound.

Mauro hopes to persuade investors to build a pistachio processing and packaging plant west of the Pecos River. The irrigation system already is made in Texas.

"One of the real exciting things about this project is we're trying to find a better way to manage our water system," Mauro said.

The TAHAL officials in Israel recommended an aboveground drip irrigation system that Sul Ross State University researchers in Alpine later determined would leave too much salt on the soil surface.

Texans came up with a system that pumps brackish well water into water lines 9 inches underground. The lines feed into soaker hoses made from shredded old tires, and each tree gets 1.7 gallons of water a day. Only 2 percent of the water is lost to evaporation, Hoelscher said.

■ Personal fax machines. They took off this year, zooming to a 30 percent share of the $1.9 billion fax market, offering features once contained in office versions.

■ Erasable optical disk. The disks allow the electronic storage of data equivalent to 300,000 pages of type. Analysts predict sales will grow to $1 billion a year within a few years.

Service.

The direct outlay of $4.4 billion will result in spending of $11.85 billion during the construction period.

Moreover, the project will serve as a catalyst to develop more high-tech industrywithin the state and as a magnet to attract more high-tech firms from outside the state.

NATURAL GAS — While the future for oil prices does not appear so bright, the future of natural gas is nothing but bright. Economic recovery led by natural gas is upon us.

National security and environmental concerns will dictate natural gas as the fuel of choice not only in electrical generation, industry, and residential heating, but also as a transportation fuel.

Efforts by state officials to form new alliances and coalitions and open new gas markets are well underway and results should be seen shortly. Shallow gas prospects are now in demand and gas prices are expected to take a healthy jump in January.

PETROCHEMICALS — On the Gulf Coast, the petrochemical industry is booming with new plant expansions being announced almost weekly. This week it was announced that a new $104 million plant to handle "refinery waste" would be built in Corpus Christi, which was recently designated as a U.S. Naval Homeport.

NEW INDUSTRY — GTE announced this week that it would bring 4,500 jobs to Irving. Last year J.C. Penney brought over 1,000 from New York City.

The message is out to industries and corporations: Texas is the place to relocate. And more will.

If that wasn't enough, consider: the MAQUILADORA FACTORY boom is on along the Texas-Mexico border; forecasters are predicting an improved year for RETAIL SALES; and a bumper year for nearly all Texas CROPS.

This is not to say all is well. Banking, real estate, oil exploration and agriculture are still troubled, and more shaking-out is inevitable.

But generally speaking, the economy in Texas is on the mend and the outlook is bright. There are just too many positive things happening to predict anything else.

John Paul Pitts is business/oil editor of the Reporter-Telegram.

Touchtone celebrate 25 years

NEWARK, N.J. (AP) — Twenty-five years ago today, AT&T told Americans to reach out and touch some buttons by introducing Touch-Tone telephones.

The invention of the transistor in 1947 led to a 10-year development period that culminated in the Nov. 18, 1963, announcement that push-button telephone service would begin in two small Pennsylvania communities, Carnegie and Greensburg, said Bell Laboratories spokeswoman Maureen Lynch in Short Hills.

"We all thought it was pretty great stuff," said J.H. Ham, who supervised the design and marketing of the phones for Bell Labs, AT&T's research arm. He spoke by Touch-Tone phone from his home in Indianapolis, where he retired in 1964 after 42 years with American Telephone & Telegraph Co.

"We all felt that we were on the forefront of a new service," he said Thursday.

Fifty-five percent of U.S. residential phones now are tone dial, according to industry figures. The rest are rotary or push-button phones that dial by the traditional pulse method.

"It let women have longer fingernails," joked Ham, who added that long nails were an actual source of complaints about rotary phones.

Creation of the tone dialing system has led to other consumer technologies.

Banks, airlines, railroads and other businesses have computerized answering systems that allow callers to receive information or leave a message by pressing the appropriate digits. Tone phones also can be used to retrieve messages from many phone answering machines by punching in a code, thus doing away with separate tone-generating devices.

Preceding the new services were years of complex research and testing in areas ranging from the proper type of tone to the arrangement of the push-buttons on the phone itself.

AT&T had experimented with push-button phones since the 1890s.

Small businesses more optimistic

BUSINESS MIRROR

By VIVIAN MARINO
AP Business Writer

NEW YORK — Small businesses are feeling better about the economic outlook these days, with an increasing number thinking about adding more jobs, building new plants and maintaining relatively high inventory levels.

But don't expect to see too much in the way of salary increases over the next few months, according to the latest quarterly survey by a leading trade group.

The National Federation of Independent Business — whose 500,000 member firms employ about half the country's non-farm work force — reports that its small-business optimism index rose to 102.9 in October from 100.5 in July.

The seasonally adjusted index, which assumes conditions that existed in 1978 equal 100, reached a high of 108.7 in January 1984 and a low of 81.1 in April 1980. Earlier this year it had been slippping.

"Firms had become decidedly less optimistic about future economic growth during the year," explained William C. Dunkelberg, dean of Temple University's business school and originator of the survey.

"But the declines of early 1988 were reversed in October ... returning to levels that prevailed in 1986 and early 1987."

The data compiled in the survey of 2,084 small responding businesses includes predictions on expected business conditions, the climate for expansion, earnings, job openings and hiring plans and plans for capital outlays.

Dunkelberg said the overall sentiment of responding firms could be summed up this way: "There is still no sign that there is substantial weakness in the economy or that a recession is likely to start anytime before mid-1989.

"Strong earnings are supporting strong plans to hire and spend on inventories and capital projects."

Among details of the report:

■ Eighteen percent of the firms plan to increase total employment in the next three months, while 11 percent plan reductions. The percentage of firms with job openings set a record for the current expansion, rising to 25 percent and surpassing the previous high of 23 percent last January.

"The employment rate should continue to fall under such pressure," the report said.

■ Twenty-nine percent reported raising prices in the third quarter, unchanged from the previous period, while 8 percent reduced prices, down two percentage points from July. Plans to lift prices fell one percentage point from July levels, to 25 percent of all firms.

"Although not large, there is a clear upward drift in the percent of firms planning to raise prices. (But) ... non-food inflation should fall off somewhat in the fourth quarter," the report said.

■ Planned capital outlays rose to an all-time seasonally adjusted high of 35 percent. Fifty-five percent reported outlays in the last six months, although the spending rate is still nine percentage points below the high level set in 1979.

■ Plans to add to inventories were unchanged from July levels, but remained strong in comparison to the past four years. Seventeen percent planned to add to inventories, while 17 percent planned to reduce.

"Accumulations have been heavy among retail and wholesale firms, perhaps in anticipation of the Christmas selling season," the report said.

■ The percentage of firms borrowing on a regular basis rose to 38 percent from a record-low 35 percent of all firms. "Apparently profits and cash flow are sufficient to meet he capital needs of most small firms."

■ Twenty-six percent reported increases in employee wages in the third quarter of 1988, up one percentage point from the previous period. Plans to increase wages rose three percentage points to 21 percent of firms.

"With job openings at expansion-high levels, there is still little evidence that compensation is responsiding in any substantive way to labor market tightness," the report said.

Heritage Plaza fetches $110 million price

HOUSTON (AP) — The new owners of Heritage Plaza are planning an aggressive leasing program and a $5 million renovation of the property, which they bought for $110 million.

Heritage Plaza, the downtown area's newest and emptiest skyscraper, was sold by 261 Associates Ltd. on Tuesday to a Houston-based partnership whose major investor is the Michigan Employees Retirement System.

Coventry Fund III was the buyer and Coventry Investment Group, a Houston investment adviser, will manage the building as general partner. The Michigan pension fund and Laudio III, a Spanish investment company using pension money from a Spanish pipe and steel company, are limited partners.

Heritage Plaza, a silvery tower with a top reminiscent of a Mayan temple, was completed in 1986 but has yet to attract a large tenant. Only 8 percent of the 1.2-million-square-foot plaza is occupied, Coventry officials said.

The 1 million square feet of space available to lease is the largest contiguous block of new, high-quality office space downtown.

Texaco Inc. and several other companies have been shopping for large blocks of office space downtown, said R.F. Howard, president of DMH Properties, a newly formed unit of Coventry.

U.S. rig count plunges 45; Basin up 6

From Staff and Wire Reports

The number of working oil and gas rigs plunged 45 this week to total 897, marking the largest single-week decline since February, industry watcher Baker Hughes Inc. reported.

The sharp drop continues a seesaw trend in the volatile energy industry, but contradicts a traditional year-end increase, said Baker Hughes spokesman Ike Kerridge.

"The count has been moving up and down, but it's been within a narrow range for several months," Kerridge said. "We don't have any explanation for this, except to say that it's probably the result of of uncertain crude prices."

The Permian Basin count bucked the national trend, gaining six rigs to 107.

A year ago the local count was 182 and the national tally 1,174, Baker Hughes said.

The lowest level this year was the reported 880 rigs on May 2. The 897 reported this week is the lowest since Aug. 1, when 894 rigs were working.

Among major oil producing states, Texas posted the biggest drop with 20 fewer rigs, followed by Wyoming, five; Colorado, New Mexico and Ohio, four each; California and North Dakota, three each; and Kansas, one.

States that saw increases include Oklahoma, three; Pennsylvania, two; and Michigan, one. Louisiana's count was unchanged for the week.

Lea County, N.M. remains the most active area locally with 13 rigs working, two fewer than last week. Joining Eddy County, N.M. at a count of 10 this week is Upton County, up two from last week.

Ector, Andrews and Midland counties remained active with nine, seven and six rigs, respectively.

NON-OPEC

"Non-OPEC production is a cancer to OPEC, not a heart attack," said Philip Verlger of the Institute for International Economics in Washington. "The U.A.E. is a heart attack." The United Arab Emirates recently has been producing nearly double its OPEC quota of 948,000 barrels a day.

Non-OPEC countries, which produce about 38 million barrels of oil a day to OPEC's 21 million, are still turning up new reserves — including a handful of fields in the range of a billion barrels.

But few come close to rivaling those in Saudi Arabia, and at today's distressed prices, some are far too expensive to develop.

"We believe non-OPEC production will peak out in the early 1990s, level off, then gradually start to decline," said Tim Zoba, vice president with Petroconsultants Inc. in Houston, one of the few consulting firms that closely studies non-OPEC producers.

That will provide a small boost for OPEC members, he said, because it will allow them to reclaim some of their lost export market. It also should create support for slumping prices.

In the short term, analysts estimate world demand will rise annually by about 1 million barrels a day. If non-OPEC production grows by 200,000 to 300,000 barrels a day as analysts predict, the rest will belong to OPEC.

While every little bit helps, it's small consolation to OPEC. The cartel is capable of producing some 6 million to 7 million barrels a day more than it is pumping from the ground today, said Ted Breton of ICF Inc., an energy consulting firm in Fairfax, Va.

Most non-OPEC countries, on the other hand, are producing at or near capacity, a situation cartel members find distressing.

Non-OPEC production has more than tripled since 1960 from about 12 million barrels a day to about 39 million, according to Petroconsultants' figures.

OPEC experienced equally rapid growth, but its growth curve began turning south in the 1970s. The 13-member cartel saw its production rise from about 8.7 million barrls a day in 1960 to a high of nearly 31 million barrels in 1973, then decline gradually to about 21 million.

The 1973 Arab oil embargo — in retaliation against U.S. support for Israel in the Yom Kippur war — was an open invitation for OPEC's hungry competitors to grab a big share of the export market.

From the embargo until 1985, the cartel's share of free-world exports slid from 86 percent to 55 percent, and its share of production fell from 67 percent to 42 percent, according to World Oil Trends, a study compiled by Arthur Andersen & Co. and Cambridge Energy Research Associates.

Mexico, the United Kingdom and Norway have accounted for the lion's share of non-OPEC growth since the embargo, increasing their combined output tenfold, from 582,000 barrels a day to about 5.6 million.

Mexico produces about 2.5 million barrels a day, the United Kingdom about 2.4 million and Norway about 1.1 million.

North Yemen is one of the newest and fastest-growing non-OPEC producers. Even though its current output of about 200,000 barrels a day is a drop in the bucket compared with others, its production is expected to double by the early 1990s, Zoba said.

North Yemen did not have an oil industry until three years ago, when Hunt Oil Co. developed the Alif field, Zoba said.

Colombia, Brazil, Angola and India hve roughly tripled their production in the last 10 years, while Malaysia and Egypt have doubled theirs. Oman, Syria, Russia and China also have made major production gains.

China has raised its daily production by 700,000 barrels in the last 10 years to about 2.7 million, Zoba said. Russia, by far the world's largest oil producer, raised its production by 900,000 barrels during that period to more than 12 million barrels a day.

New discoveries in those countries will allow them to add some new production in the future. And unlike the United States, where low oil prices have halted most new exploration, many foreign governments are providing incentives to keep their oil industries churning.

Brazil, which is a net importer of oil, has claimed an additional 5 billion barrels of reserves in the deep-water Campos basin, Zoba said. In addition, Texaco and the Brazilian government believe they have found large oil reserves at the mouth of the Amazon River.

Colombia has discovered an estimated 1 billion barrels in the Cano Limon and other fields. India has found about 700 million barrels, and about 500 million barrels have been discovered in Papua, New Guinea. Egypt and Syria also have found new reserves in the 200 million- to 300 million-barrel range, Zoba said.

A more speculative region where oil is believed to abound is East Africa — Somalia, Ethiopia, Zambia, Tanzania and Botswana — he said. Some believe the same rift system in which the North Yemen oil lies extends through those other countries and contains huge reserves. But the areas have yet to be explored.

Elf Aquitaine, the French energy company, is looking for oil in South Yemen, signing an exploration agreement this month with that government.

Houston geologist Michel Halbouty added to the list of major unexplored oil frontiers the Tarim basin in China, Siberian oil and gas regions such as the Samotlor basin and numerous smaller finds in South America.

"This is the reason the major oil companies are going to foreign lands," Halbouty said. "If you know the geology of these countries, there's a lot of oil and gas to be found."

But experts caution that any new, non-OPEC production will be constrained by two factors.

One is that some of this oil is simply too expensive to develop. A good example is recently discovered offshore reserves north of Norway, Zoba said. Icy, hostile waters in that region are a costly place in which to drill — certainly too costly at $13 to $14 a barrel.

These countries also will be constrained by the fact that there is a limit to the amount of new oil the world can swallow.

OPEC leaders — who will try to bring Iraq back into their quota system and rein in other quota cheaters at meetings during the next two weeks — have indicated they will begin leaning on non-OPEC countries for production concessions.

But analysts believe few non-OPEC countries will cooperate. One reason is that for years they have enjoyed the benefits of OPEC's production and price deals without having to pay any dues.

"It's going to be a real coup if they can pull off an OPEC-non-OPEC agreement," Emerso said. "Everybody wants to increase production so they can increase revenues."

Many of the major non-OPEC producers are Third World nations desperate for cash to pay foreign debt and raise their standard of living. Those countries will keep the spigot wide open because they need the money, experts say.

More-prosperous Norway has cooperated somewhat by holding back about 7 percent of production capacity.

OPEC

Iraq has said repeatedly it would not accept a ceiling that was a barrel less than Iran's.

Analysts estimate Iraq has been producing at least 2.6 million barrels a day, an amount that could hit 3.7 million barrels next year with completion of a new pipeline through Saudi Arabia to the Red Sea. Its quota under a 1986 agreement was 1.5 million barrels a day

Iran also is believed to be exceeding its quota of 2.4 million barrels.

A member of one OPEC delegation told the Associated Press on condition of anonymity that Iran would not agree to the same level as Iraq.

Iran, he said, has proposed that its quota reflect a higher domestic demand of some 1 million barrels a day. Iraqi internal demand is estimated at 300,000 barrels a day, he said.

Ministers of eight OPEC nations began committee meetings Thursday, which were expected to run through Saturday.

On Monday, all 13 oil ministers will meet at OPEC headquarters in Vienna for their winter meeting.

Oil state senators organize

Associated Press

U.S. Sen. John Breaux said Friday that he is trying to organize senators from petroleum-producing states to protect the U.S. oil industry from such threats as Saudi Arabia's plan to increase production by 40 percent.

Meanwhile, two state senators traveled to Vienna, Austria, for this week's meeting of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries.

Breaux's plan calls for senators to oppose the confirmation of key Cabinet members who do not propose a strategy to protect the United States from the threatened new glut.

"I will oppose, and encourage others to oppose, the confirmation of those nominees who do not recognize the fact that we are headed toward a disastrous energy crisis," Breaux, D-La., said in a statement released by his office. "I want them to tell us what they propose to do about it during their terms as Cabinet members."

Breaux's strategy is aimed at President-elect George Bush's nominations for U.S. trade ambassador and for the secretaries of state, energy, defense and commerce, according to the senator's office.

"His first step is to try to round up support for this position, first with the oil senators but not just limited to them," a Breaux aide said.

State Sen. J.E. Jumonville, D-Ventress, will represent Gov. Buddy Roemer during the OPEC meeting and Sen. Samuel Nunez, D-Chalmette, will lead a delegation of legislators from the Southwest Energy Council to meet with OPEC oil ministers.

Jumonville's trip will be paid out of the Legislature's budget, while the council said it is paying Nunez's expenses.

Roemer said he was asking Jumonville to gather information and report his findings.

"We just felt it would be in Louisiana's best interest to have our eyes and ears at the OPEC meetings," the governor said in a statement issued by his office. "I feel that more will happen in the next week in Vienna affecting Louisiana than will happen in Washington, D.C., or Baton Rouge for the remainder of the year."

New Mexico leases total $1 million

SANTA FE, N.M. (AP) — The New Mexico Land Office collected $1.12 million in bonuses from the sale of oil and gas leases this month, Commissioner W.R. Humphries said today.

Leases offered at the regular sale this week covered 62 tracts on 21,530 acres in known producing areas. Sealed bids averaged $53.88 per acre, and oral bids averaged $47.72 per acre.

The highest individual sealed bid was made by Exxon Corp. of Houston, which offered $87,768 for a 630-acre tract in Lea County, about 19 miles west of Eunice.

The highest per-acre sealed bid came from Mewbourne Oil Co., of Tyler, Texas, which offered $215 per acre for a 198-acre trace in Eddy County about six miles south of Carlsbad.

The highest oral bid came from C.W. Trainer of Kingsland, Texas, who offered $85,000 for a 480-acre tract in Lea County, 19 miles south of Minument.

The highest per-acre oral bid was made by Yates Petroleum Corp., of Artesia, which bid $325 per acre for 40 acres in Chaves County, about eight miles south of Melena.

Income from the lease sales is used for the Land Office operations and at least 80 percent is distributed to the beneficiaries of the state's trust lands. Royalties from the production of minerals are deposited in the $2.7 billion state Permanent Fund.

Japan's fiscal clout threatens U.S. dreams

By BETH HUGHES
Hearst News Service

With increasing control over the global economy's most strategic single resource — money — Japan's emerging dominance of financial services may well spell the end of the American Dream.

Daniel Burstein, a New York journalist, has covered Pacific Rim issues for 10 tears. In "YEN! Japan's New Financial Empire and Its Threat to America," he examines Japan's replacement of the United States as "banker of the world." He cites:

- The U.S. depends on Japanese investors to finance 30 percent of the American government's budget deficit.
- The world's 10 largest banks are Japanese. Eight years ago, only one Japanese bank made the cut.
- Nomura, Japan's largest securities firm, is 20 times the size of Merrill Lynch Pierce Fenner & Smith, America's largest.
- In the last three years, Japanese investors bought $18 billion worth of U.S. real estate.

Burstein's specifics for the U.S. are painfully succinct: cut the budget deficit and reduce reliance on foreign capital, with taxes on gasoline and higher taxes for those with higher incomes; develop a realistic approach to managing American interests in global trade; freeze financial deregulation; promote long-term investment; encourage savings; and create a brain-trust at the cabinet level responsible for "researching, developing and implementings many of the initiatives necessary for to restructure the U.S. economy."

It is, he contends, a "relatively clear-cut case of 'adapt or die.' "

The long-term effects of these decisions will be painful. And fine-tuning the agony is already a "conscious goal of an increasingly influential section of the Japanese business community," Burstein writes.

Burstein believes the full explanation of the squeeze originated in America's ignorance of the Japanese tax system.

Kodak chief spreads manufacturing gospel

Colby Chandler champions industrial might

By RANDOLPH PICHT
AP Business Writer

ROCHESTER, N.Y. — Colby Chandler, chairman and chief executive officer of Eastman Kodak Co., has spent 38 years learning the lessons of business, the theories of economics and the inside-out story of the world's largest photography company.

Now, after five years at the helm of Kodak, Chandler is ready to take his message on the future of manufacturing to the masses.

So, move over Lee Iacocca because here comes Colby "America won't make it without manufacturing" Chandler.

At 63, the low-key engineer, who grew up and still lives on a farm, is learning how to become a stand-up spokesman for corporate America. If it sounds political, it is.

"Watching the swing toward a service-intensive society and listening to some parties say that's good is scary," said Chandler in an interview at Kodak's headquarters in Rochester.

"I have no intention of talking to the walls on this subject," Chandler said.

Kodak's chief has been out preaching the manufacturing gospel to business groups, college students, politicians and anybody else who will listen. The company also commissioned a study by three leading economists on the importance of manufacturing and started its first-ever public affairs advertising campaign on the issue.

Chandler also is using his last few weeks as chairman of President Reagan's Export Council, the chief advisory group to the Department of Commerce, to drum up support.

Colby Chandler uses Kodak's headquarters studio to record a message pitching increased political involvement for the survival of American manufacturers.

"The importance of manufacturing to the economy has been something that's been so obvious to me, and I'm sure to others like me, that it might not have ever occurred to us that it wasn't obvious to everyone else," he said.

Although leaders of service industries might disagree, Chandler claims that one job making a car, or a copier, or a computer, is 10 times more valuable to the economy than a job selling insurance, or waiting on customers in a bank, or making airline reservations.

The percentage of workers employed in manufacturing in America — 20 percent of the work force — is lower than at any time this century, according to the Kodak-commissioned study "The Case For Manufacturing in America's Future."

What that means, Chandler said, is that the large "multiplier effect" manufacturing has in stimulating the economy through higher wages, buying supplies and raw materials, and creating new and improved products is drying up.

"It's a very critical ... edge that we walk," Chandler said. "We're not the country with leading productivity gains. That's a sign. When we reach the real crisis, we will have gone so far that bringing it back is going to take decades and decades."

The best way to help manufacturing in the immediate future would be to eliminate the federal deficit, Chandler said. But for the long-term, he suggested:

- Urging the government to make education and other people-oriented benefits a priority.
- Using spending and tax policies to encourage investment in new technology and research.
- Implementing an incremental investment tax credit that would provide incentives for companies to expand a plant or buy new equipment.
- Altering the nation's tax structure to put a higher emphasis on taxing consumption rather than the current system of taxing investment and saving.

Chandler has always had a reputation on Wall Street as "Mr. Long Term," even before he took over as chairman of Kodak.

He came to the company in 1950 after graduating from the University of Maine with a physics degree. His worked as a quality control engineer and then held various management positions.

He received a master's degree in management from Massachusetts Institute of Technology in 1964 and directed the development of Kodak's Ektaprint copiers and duplicators in 1973. He was named president of the company in 1977 and chairman in 1983.

As chairman, Chandler has sent the yellow Kodak banner charging into Japan and given assembly-line workers almost complete control over film and other products they make.

And he's added aspirins, batteries and household cleaners to the list of products Kodak sells through new ventures and the acquisition of Sterling Drug Co.

"He never seemed as concerned with the nuts and bolts stuff of today or tomorrow. What interested him was Kodak three, five, 10, 20 years from now," said Brian Fernandez, a stock analyst with Brean Murray, Foster Securities.

AG's office seeks to settle Leroy deposits

AUSTIN (AP) — The state is seeking a compromise settlement in the liquidation of Leroy Bank that may allow individual depositors of the bank to receive part of their money, the Texas Attorney General's Office said.

In liquidation proceedings, the attorney general's office is trying to block NCNB Texas from foreclosing on all assets of the bank.

At the time of its closing, Leroy Bank owed NCNB, formerly First RepublicBank, nearly $1.1 million. As a secured creditor, NCNB has claimed it has first priority to obtaining its money, the attorney general's office said in a prepared release.

But the attorney general's office said such a move would leave depositors with nothing.

Joe Bowles, a spokesman for NCNB, said he was not familiar with the proceedings and was unable late Wednesday afternoon to contact anyone who knew about the case.

Leroy Bank was closed more than a year ago when it was found to be insolvent by Texas Banking Commissioner Kenneth W. Littlefield. Depositors have been unable to collect their money because the bank was not federally insured. When the bank closed, its deposits totaled $5.2 million.

The attorney general's office has proposed a plan that would reduce NCNB's claim, force the bank to refinance some notes owed by Leroy Bank, and keep $136,000 in the liquidation estate.

Also, NCNB would receive the first $640,000 in cash available from the assets of Leroy Bank and then divide any cash over that amount with depositors.

Beaujolais Nouveau opens with splash

TOKYO (AP) — Japanese wine lovers plunged into the first batch of France's 1988 Beaujolais Nouveau this week, marking the start of what industry officials predict will be a record year in sales of the wine in Japan.

A fleet of more than 400 trucks loaded to the brim with cases of new Beaujolais spread out across Tokyo to deliver the red burgundy to restaurants and distributors following its release by customs.

Because the distribution embargo on the wine was lifted at midnight local time around the world, Tokyoites received their Beaujolais Nouveau eight hours ahead of Parisians.

Corks popped and wine glasses brimmed over at one of the first Beaujolais Nouveau parties of the year at Le Maestro, a French restaurant in Tokyo.

Shigeta Saito, a well-known psychiatrist and one of some 30 guests at the restaurant, led the toast by announcing: "The Beaujolais Nouveau of 1988 has arrived ... Bravo."

The 72-year-old Saito, who says he indulges in all types of alcoholic beverages, said he came to the early-morning gathering "just out of curiosity."

Participants, who paid $40 a head, all said they were pleased with the newest batch of wine, released every fall following the grape harvest.

Hiroshi Yamamoto, lawyer and organizer of the wine-tasting, said Beaujolais Nouveau, a newly fermented wine, appeals to Japanese wine drinkers because it contains less tannin than wine fermented for longer periods of time.

"And traditionally, Japanese have fun drinking and consuming the fresh food items of each season," he added.

Industry officials are already predicting a record year in sales for the wine, which is produced in France's Beaujolais region.

Officials of Suntory Ltd., a major Japanese distiller and leading importer of Beaujolais, said overall imports of the new wine will total 153,000 cases in 1988, an increase of over 70 percent compared to last year.

Suntory alone will import 23,000 cases of the 1988 Beaujolais Nouveau wine, up from 12,000 cases last year, to meet the growing thirst of Japanese wine drinkers, said Kiyoshi Inoue, a spokesman for Suntory.

Suntory's Inoue estimated that airfreighted Beaujolais will be sell in the range of $14 to $30 a bottle, while wine arriving one month later by ship will for $6.50 to $15.

'Nutcracker' is Ballet Midland's annual Christmas presentation.

'Nutcracker'

Text by Georgia Todd Temple

Long ago and far away at a Christmastime party, a young girl named Clara receives a gift of a nutcracker from the magician Drosselmeyer. She doesn't have her new toy long before her brother breaks it.

Later that night, when she goes to bid good night to her invalid toy, she suddenly finds herself in the midst of a battle between toy soldiers and mice. The soldiers, led by the wounded nutcracker, fight gallantly but are outnumbered. As the mice seem ready to triumph, Clara throws her slipper at them. They retreat.

Magically, the nutcracker is transformed into a handsome prince who rewards Clara by taking her to the Land of Sweets. Their journey carries them across a country where snowflakes dance together. Upon their arrival, they are greeted by the Sugar Plum Fairy who presents for their entertainment Arabian, Chinese and Russian dances.

During the years following its American debut, given by the Ballet Russe de Monto Carlo in New York City, Oct. 17, 1940, the "Nutcracker" story has become a familiar one to American audiences.

Since the first full-length American "Nutcracker" was presented in 1944 by the San Francisco Ballet, this Russian ballet has found its way into the repertoire of most ballet companies, and the American public has come to expect to see it on television, and in many areas in person, during the holiday season.

Ballet Midland, in continuing its tradition, will present this yuletide favorite at 8 p.m. Wednesday and Friday, at 2 and 8 p.m. Saturday and at 2 p.m. Nov. 27 at Theatre Midland, 2000 W. Wadley Ave.

Tickets, priced at $12 for adults and $6 for senior citizens and children under 12, may be purchased at the door and at the Kiosk in the Plaza, Plaza Shopping Center. For operating hours at the Kiosk call 683-2027.

In addition, the Nutcracker Club offers children the opportunity to have treats, special gifts and their picture taken with the Sugar Plum Fairy and the cast of the "Nutcracker" following the Saturday matinee performances. Membership cards for the Nutcracker Club, which cost $5 per child, may be picked up at the Kiosk in the Plaza or at the door. For more information call 697-2700.

Diane Gaddy, artistic director of Ballet Midland, will dance the role of the Sugar Plum Fairy. The role of the prince will be danced by Octavio Nieto, Ballet Midland staff member and principal dancer. In addition, Eric Eggleston will dance the role of Snow King, and Jamie Rasnick and Robyn Rapp will dance the role of the Snow Queen. Clara will be danced by Caitlin Durham.

Of Ballet Midland's production, Ms. Gaddy says, "We have continued our process of revamping our production of 'Nutcracker.' The sets and scenery this year are much nicer."

"Nutcracker," the third and last of Tchaikovsky's ballets, was commissioned in 1891, two years before the composer's death at the age of 53.

Initially not enthusiastic about the scenario given him by Marius Petipa, Tchaikovsky became inspired as he wrote. Thus, on March 7, 1892, months before the stage premiere, he conducted excerpts from the ballet at a concert of the Russian Musical society.

GEORGIA TODD TEMPLE

Pianist's performing seems effortless

Temple

With his hair brushed up and back from his forehead, John Browning looks taller than he is. Dressed in a traditional black tuxedo, his back military-straight as he leans over the keys, Browning's demeanor is one of devoted concentration to the playing of Beethoven's Concerto No. 5 in E-flat, Opus 73 during the Midland-Odessa Symphony's recent master series performance.

Since it was first performed in Leipzig Nov. 28, 1811, this work has been considered among the supreme challenges a pianist can attempt in the classical repertoire.

Yet, as Browning's fingers glide across the keys, he makes the playing of this masterpiece appear effortless.

At times, he doesn't appear to hit the keys hard enough to achieve the full sound he needs. However, the sound comes forth. His fingers sail through the work, the pressure he exerts on the keys cannot be seen in his hands.

Closer inspection discloses his cheeks shaking as he plays certain passages. He pulls out his handkerchief and wipes his face during the pauses in his playing.

Browning's touch is something to see and hear. It's obvious, he's done his homework and not just recently. His superb finger legato, a smooth linking of tones by the fingers alone, is acquired only through years of hard work.

Beethoven's life as a composer is often divided into three periods. This concerto was written during his second period, a time when he was criticized for his lack of elegance and measure and for his wildness.

The concerto's Vienna premiere in 1812 was not as well received as had been the Leipzig performance. The symphony's program notes state that one writer of the time said the reason was that "Beethoven, full of proud self-confidence, never writes for the crowd; he wishes to be understood with the intelligence as well as with the heart, but the difficulties he insists on introducing into his work result in his being able to obtain the support only of connoisseurs who, in this case, are in the minority."

This work has stood the relentless test of time, which grinds the mediocre into oblivion and lifts the great into remembrance.

Today's audiences find the work understandable, and the symphony's crowd found Browning's execution of it memorable enough to call for an encore.

His soothing selection — Chopin's D-flat Nocturne — provided a perfect close.

BALLET

The audience demanded encores of five movements of the suite.

The reaction to the ballet's premiere Dec. 17, 1892, at St. Petersburg's Maryinsky Theatre was lukewarm. Numerous charges were leveled at the choreography and some at Tchaikovsky's score.

Nevertheless, the ballet survived.

The ballet is based upon two short stories — "The Nutcracker and the King of Mice" by German fantasy writer Ernst Theodor Amadeus Hoffmann and "The Nutcracker of Nuremberg," a French re-telling of the same tale by Alexandre Dumas, pere.

In their stories, Drosselmeyer (Drosselmeier) is the young girl's eccentric godfather. A judge in Hoffman's story, he is the town's medical commissioner in Dumas' tale. Hoffman says he's short; Dumas says he's tall. Both agree he's round-shouldered, wears a black eye patch, has a wig made of white glass and spends his spare time constructing mechanical toys and fixing clocks.

In the ballet, he's a magician who brings to the party an assortment of amazing toys and dolls that dance.

Many don't know that Tchaikovsky was not the first to write a musical "Nutcracker." The adventures, as retold in a piano suite by Carl Reinecke, had achieved a level of popularity as salon music in the 1880s.

"Based upon a Romantic fairy tale and set to a score of almost symphonic proportions, 'Nutcracker' communicates such an abundance of joy and wonderment that some critics are sure the ballet has significance far deeper than is at first apparent," says Jack Anderson in the December 1966 issue of Dance Magazine.

Anderson cites others who have commented on "Nutcracker," including Soviet critic Vera Krasovskaya, who said the the ballet's "principal thought," is "youth's hope for happiness" and Soviet composer and musicologist B.V. Asafiev, who said the ballet depicts "the ripening soul of a little girl, at first playing with dolls, and then arriving at the dawn of love through dreams of a brave and manly hero; in other words, the process of the 'education of sentiments.' "

In his second essay on "Nutcracker," written in the 1950s, American writer and dance critic Edwin Denby called the ballet "the story of a child's presentiment of handsome conduct, of civilized society; it is no foolish subject, and it gives the ballet its secret radiance."

British-born poet W.H. Auden called "Nutcracker" "a festival of joy." Auden, who became a U.S. citizen in 1948, said, "Only those who have lost their sense of you and for whom, consequently, ballet is a meaningless art, will find that juvenile."

Ms. Gaddy, who traces the popularity of "Nutcracker" to the opportunity it provides for children and adults to express themselves creatively onstage and to its theme, says, "It deals with romance or the childhood imagination of romance where Clara meets her prince and is taken to a fantasy world where everything is sweet and beautiful and glittery — everything a dream could be."

'Crossing Delancey' enchanting

By MYRA LEE SALCEDO

Salcedo

"Crossing Delancey," the film starring Amy Irving (wife of Steven Spielberg) is not exactly a Jewish "Moonstruck" but it does play on the same theme of old world traditions conflicting with modern mores. Ms. Irving is Isabel ("Izzie"), a single 33-year-old woman who is moving up in the world by working for a New York bookstore noted for its celebrity-attended soirees. Her job allows her access to the unlisted phone numbers of prominent authors — including, Izzie says with ethnic pride, that of Isaac Bashevis Singer. She has a doting grandmother, Bubbie (74-year-old Reizl Bozky), a product of old world culture, who lives happily in New York's Lower East Side. Izzie's parents live in a retirement community "in Florida with Red Buttons," according to grandma.

Although Izzy is attracted to an eloquent but self-serving writer (Jeroen Krabbe), who speaks romantically of "ripe plums" and prefers reading his work to writing it, her grandmother has other ideas about her ideal mate and hires a matchmaker (the brassy Sylvia Miles).

Bubbie's choice is pickle merchant Sam Posner (Peter Riegert), a caring, responsible man. Izzie and Sam don't hit it off right away and she is noticeably turned off by his career choice. Izzie is headed for snobbishness but Sam detours her by reminding her of her roots. There is a nice story about a man losing his hat while "crossing Delancey Street," and Sam's gift of a Fedora for Izzie is another nice touch.

Probably the most surprising aspect of the film is that Ms. Irving proves she is no longer an ingenue in need of acting lessons, and delivers a vivid and appealing performance. She expresses her feelings well, especially when her romantic illusions are stripped away at the moment when she first sees Sam dipping his hands into pickle barrels.

The best and most natural scenes however, belong to Ms. Irving and the scene-stealing Ms. Bozky, this year's Olympia Dukakis.

Ms. Miles plays a caricature of the Jewish yenta. "Ya look, ya meet, ya try, ya see," she says. Rosemary Harris, in a small part, is a divinely arrogant member of the literati set.

There is some interesting dialogue including Izzie's comment to the writer, "What I love most about your writing is its deceptive accessibility. It reads like pulp fiction, and then you hear music." There also are some arresting scenes of New York City and quirky characters including a woman who wanders into a diner singing "Some Enchanted Evening," which seems perfectly fitting since "Crossing Delancey" is an enchanting, engaging film. It's greatest flaw is that it ends too soon — don't miss it.

"Crossing Delancey," rated PG with one scene of women in risque lingerie, is playing at North Park Cinemas.

Quaid experlty plays 'All-American'

"Everybody's All-American" opens in 1956, the year that running back Gavin Grey (Dennis Quaid) was nicknamed "The Gray Ghost" (in recognition of his supernatural qualities to slide past his opponents). It was also the year that Gavin was named All-American from Louisiana, and Babs Rogers (Jessica Lange), Gavin's sweetheart, was named Magnolia Queen. "Did you ever see two more gorgeous creatures?"one admiring fan asked.

Standing on the sidelines is Gavin's nephew, Cake (Timothy Hutton), a studious man destined to become enmeshed in a triangular relationship with Babs and Gavin which will span the course of 25 years.

At first, The Gray Ghost's future seems to fulfill the promise of his youthful hopes. A successful career in professional football beckons Gavin while Babs remains a traditional Southern belle with few goals beyond her home and husband. "I'm majoring in Gavin Grey," Babs says. She sees her greatest sacrifice as giving up a chance to win the Miss America crown by marrying her high school sweetheart.

Gavin battles in the brutal world of profootball, but refuses to acknowledge his losing battle with time, and his star fadeing along with his fading athletic skills. Although Gavin says, "I'm special just as long as I keep making touchdowns. When it's over, it's over," he can't face retirement, and stays with the game far too long.

Despite Gavin's dwindling finances he refuses to sell-out, especially to shady deals proposed by an obsessive fan. "The ghost stands for something," Gavin says. "We have to take care of that image."

Bab's star dims along with her husband's, as one woman says, "Most of us were the queen of something. Now, we're just player's wives."

The characters' situations aren't terribly dramatic, but Quaid brings drama to his role, nonetheless. He expertly renders pain and disbelief when he realizes the fans are no longer cheering for him — a poignant moment, and a great bid for Oscar. Quaid also ages well, with a swelling paunch and tinges of gray in his flat-top. Ms. Lange ages gracefully, befitting a Southern belle, and Hutton always looks youthful despite the additions of moustaches and beards.

Gavin's good-old-boy buddy, Lawrence (John Goodman of television's "Roseanne Barr"), does a tremendous job as a supporting actor in the role of a racist with a self-destructive attitude. Aside from the presence of Lawrence and Narvel Blue (Carl Lumbly) a neglected black football player (with the talent comparable to Gavin) the racism of the '60s is lightly handled, one of the film's few flaws. There are black and white newsreels of Martin Luther King and John F. Kennedy for good measure. Blue becomes a civil rights leader, but most racial issues seem to border on the peripheral edges of Gavin's life.

However, "Everybody's All-American" does have fully rendered characters and a nice visual texture. In this age of steroid scandals, it's gratifying to see a larger-than-life athlete dealt with in simply human terms. Taylor ("An Officer and a Gentleman") Hackford's stirring direction also enhances the film.

By the time Gavin and Bab's 25-year reunion rolls around, and Gavin professes that there is "more to life than touchdowns," it's hard not to get a lump in your throat. The film is loaded with romance and earns its R rating with steamy sex scenes. The film is a love story for adults, and there is a universal appeal in watching the athlete whose glory days are gone. In the span of a few hours, the film manages to cover a great time period which is done so well you feel like you have been in the theater longer and participated in a large segment of the characters' lives. Although the characters seem shallow at first, their personalities creep up on you.

"Everybody's All-American" is easily one of the best films of the year and kicks the ball out of the field. See it with someone you love.

"Everybody's All-American," rated R for steamy sex scenes, is playing at North Park Cinemas.

'Mystic Pizza' satisfying slice of life

Although the title is mysterious, "Mystic Pizza" is not a psychic Italian pie endorsed by Shirely MacLaine. It is however, a comedy with "all the works."

"Mystic" refers to Mystic, Conn., a coastal town with a pizza parlor run by the gruff but motherly Leona (Conchata Ferrell). Leona guards a family recipe for a secret tomato sauce, and dishes out advice for the three Portuguese-American heroines who all find first loves in the course of the film. All the women build their relationships with men on shaky foundations however, and their love lives soon begin to unravel.

The film opens with JoJo (Lili Taylor), the most rambunctious young woman of the trio, fainting dead away at her own wedding. JoJo thinks she loves Bill (a dark curly-headed Vincent Phillip D'Onofrio, best known for his role as the brooding obese recruit in "Full Metal Jacket" and more recently as Thor in "Adventures in Babysitting"), but she isn't sure she is ready for commitment. Her friend Kat (Annabeth Gish), the brainy one with an astronomy scholarship to Yale, becomes enamored with a married Yalie when she babysits his daughter. And Kat's sister Daisy (Julie Roberts, sister of actor Eric Roberts), the smoldering and strong-headed beauty of the bunch hopes to find a way out of her backwater town with the dashing rich kid, Charles (Adam Storke).

Even though the situations are predictable, the actors and actresses all manage to create genuine and engaging characters. Even the small roles, including one of the acerbic restaurant critic, called the "Fireside Gourmet," are memorable.

Donald Petrie, first-time feature director, gives a professional polish to the film. His inexperience isn't evident. The script is enhanced by a nice blend of wit and warmth with the aid of Alfred Uhry (Pulizter Prize-winning playwright and author of Broadway's "Driving Miss Daisy"). The picturesque beauty of Mystic belies its label as a "backwater town" as does the fact that even low-level jobs in Mystic (the mother of one of the heroines works on a pier, putting rubber bands on the claws of newly caught lobsters) have a certain touristy charm.

The best part of "Mystic Pizza" is that the characters are fully drawn, and each one is capable of a surprise or two. They all exhibit different perspectives of their personalities. Even better, "Mystic Pizza" is a refreshingly unhip (refreshing in the era of John Hughes coming-of-age films) and marvelously warm comedy-drama.

Comparing life's mysteries to a secret sauce formula may seem far-fetched, but the film's heart and humor transcends the situations. No matter how you slice it up "Mystic Pizza" is a satisfying slice-of-life.

"Mystic Pizza," rated R for language and sex scenes, is playing at Midland Park Mall Cinemas.

'Child's Play' evolves into kids' stuff

There is something spooky about voice-activated dolls, especially those which move their mouths and roll their eyes when they talk. But if this weren't spooky enough, "Child's Play" takes the scary concept one step further by having the evil spirit of Charles Lee Ray (Brad Dourif), possess the body of a doll named "Chucky." Chucky, who belongs to a line of "Good Guy" dolls, inadvertantly becomes the property of 6-year-old Andy Barclay (Alex Vincent).

Andy is infatuated with Good Guys and wears Good Guys tennis shoes and clothes. He even eats Good Guys cereal while watching Good Guys cartoons. But it isn't long before Andy discovers that his Good Guy doll is really a bad guy. The problem is, nobody believes that Chucky says lines other than "My name is Chucky and I'll be your friend until the end."

However, Chucky soon makes his presence known by seeking vengeance on old enemies. The irony is that the most reasonable people on the screen believe in the living, murderous doll while the quirkiest and most despicable characters don't believe Chucky is alive.

With the aid of Officer Mike Norris (Chris Sarandon), Andy's bewildered mom (Catherine Hicks) tries to figure out what's going on. Once Chucky begins terrorizing the town and becomes little more than a pint-sized slasher, "Child's Play" turns into kid stuff.

The first half hour with Andy being blamed for Chucky's misdeeds is the best part and the film is surprisingly well cast. Young Vincent has a particularly good crying scene. Unfortunately the script occasionally allows the main characters to act like airheads. Andy's mom never wonders how her friend (Dinah Manoff, in a small but well-acted role) happens to crash through her skyscraper window and fall to her death while babysitting Andy. Even worse, Ms. Hick's character is too stupid to move her head away from a door when Chucky keeps sticking a knife through it.

But the voodoo mumbo jumbo is a little much and makes "Child's Play" a so-so supernatural thriller. Despite all its flaws, however, the teen-age audience (many who haven't become jaded by the killer doll genre) applauded the film during the credits. They thoroughly enjoyed the kid's stuff.

"Child's Play," rated R for violence, is playing at Midland Park Mall Cinemas.

The bidding:

Opening lead: King of ♡

There are two types of spectators at a bridge game: kibitzers and dorbitzers. The kibitzer is entitled not only watch, but also to make comments on the bidding and play after the hand has been completed. Dorbitzers can speak only to kibitzers. But when either makes a remark during the play, strange things can happen.

This deal cropped up many years ago at New York's renowned Cavendish Club. A well-known expert held the South cards, and he quickly arrived in five diamonds, a well-conceived action in view of his weakness in the majors.

West cashed the king-ace of hearts, and then went into a huddle. A kibitzer sitting between South and West began getting impatient. He leaned over to look at West's cards and then announced: "It makes no difference what you do. You can't defeat the contract."

Taking the kibitzer at his word, the players exposed their cards. One look was all East needed to snarl: "Are you nuts? Another heart lead beats it!"

The other players agreed. Once again, a kibitzer had been proved wrong. The Card Committee was convened to adjudicate. East would ruff the third heart with the queen of diamonds, thereby promoting West's jack to the setting trick.

They awarded North-South each 800 points for making the rubber and East-West each 100 points for defeating five diamonds one trick. And then they debited the kibitzer's account with the 1,800 points the four players earned on the deal!

A reception will be held for the artist at this meeting. There is a $1 donation for non-members of the OAA.

In addition, members will have an exhibit and sale at Winwood Mall, Dec. 1 through 4.

Judge for the Fall Exhibit will be Charles N. Pruitt of Midland.

Pruitt paints in oil and considers himself an "Impressionist of the Southwest" because of his devotion to working from life, painting in oil directly from nature.

Kimble chamber to host dinner of wild game

JUNCTION — The Fourth Annual Wild and Exotic Game Dinner will be held in Junction Saturday.

Sponsored by the Kimble County Chamber of Commerce on Thanksgiving Saturday each year, the event features a combination of native and exotic game donated by area landowners and hunters.

The venison on the menu comes from a variety of deer, including native white tail and exotic axis, sika and fallow. Other meats include Barbados and mouflon sheep, eland, black buck antelope, Catalina goat, mountain oysters, and alligator tail. Game birds, including dove, quail, and wild turkey, are also served.

The entire community works together to stage the dinner. A local church provides its revival tent to house the serving lines and to provide additional seating for overflow crowds if the community theater fills to capacity. Even some of the many thousands of hunters who come to Kimble Couty each year donate meat and assist with the cooking.

The Wild and Exotic Game Dinner is held at the Coke R. Stevenson Memorial Center on Highway 83, just north of interstate 10 at Junction. Advance reservations are not necessary. Serving begins at 6:30 p.m.

Fort Concho to host holiday celebration

SAN ANGELO — Fort Concho National Historic Landmark will be filled with costumed entertainers, merchants, craftsmen, food vendors, and shoppers during the seventh annual Christmas at Old Fort Concho celebration, Dec. 2, 3, and 4.

The festival is one of the largest Christmas heritage celebrations in Texas and Fort Concho's biggest public event during the year. Officials expect 37,000 visitors from across the nation to attend.

Admission to the 40-acre site is $2 for adults, children under 12 are admitted free.

Fort Concho was a U.S. military post from 1867 until 1889. It is considered one of America's best preserved western frontier forts. During the three day festival, the fort's twenty historic buildings are decorated to celebrate the diverse ethnic backgrounds of area residents. The glow from flickering luminarias and campfires tented by soldiers, cowboys and Indians light the grounds at night.

Inside the cut limestone buildings, more than 100 merchants and artisans from San Angelo and across the Southwest will offer items for sale, some available only at this event.

Buildings decorated in ethnic themes include the English Victorian House, Mexican House, German House and Early Texas House.

Food and beverages will be served at three locations on the fort grounds, including the Arc Light Saloon, which celebrates San Angelo's wild West beginnings.

"Every evening at 6 p.m. relive the past at 'A Fort Concho Christmas Carol' when over 150 costumed singers, dancers, and actors plus horses, mules, and wagons trace the history of the Concho Valley," says a release from the fort. "From conquistadors, Indians, and soldiers to settlers from such far away places as Scotland, Czechoslovakia, France, England, and Germany, they came to put their mark on the West and helped build Fort Concho and San Angelo."

To learn more about Fort Concho and its Christmas festivities, call 1-657-4441 or 1-657-4444.
