Those present declared the address was on a par with Mr. McMillan's former address delivered here some two months ago, which received much favorable comment.

And be it further resolved that a copy be sent the sister, a copy spread upon the minutes and a copy published in the Sanderson Times.

In the two first innings the first five men of the Lobos to face the local slaban were struck out. Good fielding on the part of the Lobos, and several errors for the local team, resulted in a costly finish, Lobos 7, Sanderson 6.

Sanderson got eight hits and the Lobos seven. Cavender struck out eleven men while Miller struck out three. Good playing featured the game for both sides.

NEW GARAGE OPENS WITH A DANCE.

Keefer's new garage was the scene of a happy and joyful time last Tuesday night when the informal opening took place, in the form of a large dance, with the Balmorhea Orchestra as the entertainers. There were seventy-five or eighty couples on the floor dancing and all sides, corners and other spaces were filled with spectators. Each ticket purchased by a gentleman entitled him to a drawing on a full set of casings and tubes to fit his car. About thirty drawings took place before the lucky number was drawn and Rob. Duncan won a set of Ford casings with No. 63. Ice cream and lemonade were served throughout the evening. Everyone present reported having a wonderful time.

Grand National Ranks as England's Greatest

Since 1839, the Grand National has ranked as the principal steeplechase that is run in England. As to the merits of the horses that are successful, or that approach success, in this event, no sort of doubt can exist. "Liverpool" horses, as they are called, must possess extraordinary stamina; they must have been perfectly schooled; courage is an essential and they must be at the very perfection of fitness. No, too, of the jockeys, amateur and professional, who ride. It takes a bold and skillful horseman to cover the four miles and a half over 30 fences, and he, too, must have heart and muscle in the right place, or there is little hope of his completing the long journey.

Walter Johnson Pitched to Jim Delehanty First

Jim Delehanty, new American association umpire, was the first major league batter ever pitched to by Walter Johnson and Jim simply cannot forget that experience.

It was early one afternoon in 1908. Walter had reported the night before and this afternoon had warmed up preparatory to pitching to the Washington players in batting practice. It so happened Delehanty was up for his turn when the big raw-boned westerner strode into the box.

He just took a short wind-up and let go.

"I never had time to take the bat off my shoulder," says Del. "That ball shot right by me, right in the groove and was in the catcher's hands before I knew it had left the rookie's hand. And when he came right back with another in the same spot, I laid my bat down and, walking to Joe Cantillon, said: 'Better get him out there, he'll kill somebody.'

"What's he got," asked Cantillon. "Has he got a fast one?"

"Has he got a curve?" followed up Cantillon.

"I don't know and I don't care. What's more, I am not going back to find out until I know how good his control is."

Avoids Bright Lights

The athlete that amounts to much nowadays is he who takes the best care of himself. For instance, that is the secret of the success of Tommy Gibbons. Gibbons is a fighter to whom the bright lights mean nothing. His home is his rendezvous. He has put brains into his work and hence he has developed further than the rest of them at his weight.

Star Illinois Athlete

Capt. "Pitch" Johnson (St. Louis), University of Illinois hurdler, was placed second to Kinzie of Illinois when the latter tied the world's record in the 75-yard high hurdles. He was also second to Kinzie when the latter tied the conference record of .07 6.10 in the 60-yard high hurdles. Johnson is also a broad jumper.

PROFESSIONAL NURSE SAYS TANLAC HAS NO EQUAL

Mrs. J. Clark Says Tanlac Was More Than Match for Her Troubles.

By reason of the fact that she speaks from her long experience as a professional nurse, the statement of Mrs. J. Clark, of 415 Walsworth Ave., Oakland, Calif., will be of interest to all who are in need of an upbuilding tonic.

"In all my fifteen years' experience as a trained nurse," says Mrs. Clark's statement, "I never found the equal of Tanlac as a stomach medicine and tonic. Two years ago an attack of influenza left me without appetite and my stomach in such a bad fix that the little I did eat seemed to do me harm instead of good.

"Stomach pains would make me so weak I would feel right faint. The least exertion would completely exhaust me and six months before taking Tanlac I was so weak I had to hire my housework done. I was in bed most of the time for two months and was getting desperate.

"Tanlac was more than a match for my troubles and eight bottles left me feeling fine. I eat and sleep like a child and have energy and strength that makes life a pleasure. Tanlac is simply grand."

Tanlac is for sale by all good druggists. Accept no substitute. Over 40 million bottles sold.

Question of Royalty

There wasn't much royalty left to discuss, but the teacher thought it sufficient to warrant some explanation. So she told the children about the law of succession, and how the first born son always succeeded to the throne.

Suddenly a little fellow waved his hand. "Please, teacher," he asked, "if the first one happened to be twins, which one would be king?"—Indianapolis News.

PEOPLE DON'T ADMIRE ROUGH, PIMPLY SKIN

Before you can impress some one of the opposite sex enough to get them to share the happy state of love with you, you certainly must keep your appearance pleasing and attractive. Thrifty Man

A thrifty housewife used to put the coffee grounds where the chickens could get at them. She never really knew whether they ate any or not, but the fowls did peck at them a little. Her even more thrifty husband told her not to put the grounds in the chicken yard any more.

"All right," she went on; "be as shocked as you like. I mean you to be. I'm trying to wake you up. Innocence is a good thing to have, but it isn't the only thing in the world. You'd lost yours long before you were as old as she is. In more ways than you mean about her. You'd run amuck. You'd get down, you'd often told me, to the edge of the gutter. You're proud of it, too! Because of the way you built yourself up from there. By yourself. Without any help from anybody."

"Well, she's like you. You've said that yourself, but I told you you'd never be able to remember it. She's got to find things out for herself, even if she gets hurt, now and then, doing it. Nobody can help her unless they begin by trusting her to find her own way. And if she sees that you don't—finds you watching her and spying on her—it'll do her more harm than any drunken lover could do her at the end of a joyride. I mean that, Joe; literally."

His only answer, for the moment, was to say that he wouldn't have believed a woman—a good woman—could have talked like that.

She uttered a mirthless laugh. "I don't believe you know much about good women. I doubt if you know one when you see one."

"I'm not going North again," he said, after a heavy silence. "There were a few things I wanted to finish up, but they can stand over. I've got a job here; I can see that. I couldn't expect anybody else to do it for me. She's my daughter; that's the difference. I'm going to look after her my own way. I don't mean to spy on her. She won't know I'm watching or asking questions. But I'm going to know!"

With Joe home there was no longer any need for Jennie to remain with the girl and so she returned to her own home. The first night she was miserably lonely. She wanted Trix, hanging in, hugging her at haphazard, sprawling on the chair-arm or the rug, talking neither very wisely nor very wittily, at random, yawning, fondling her shoulder or her knee for a moment with a careless hand, and saying she was going to bed. Naive, pathetic, lovely, young, just beginning to find herself! What right had Joe to come tramping into this little garden, just because a momentary casual act of his, forgotten for twenty years, had begotten her? His daughter, was she?

Their conferences over the patent situation endured for days. It was sense of the directors that an arrangement should be made. Crawford made a formal motion that the settlement be made, when it was made, in stock.

This put Joe in a corner. Real danger always quieted him, and his argument, though forcible, low-voiced and conciliatory. The fundamental difficulty about organizing this company he pointed out, has been over the question of control. He had felt at first that since he was putting his whole fortune into the company and was to be its technical head he was entitled to full control. It had been with the greatest reluctance that he had consented to a divided control, an even fifty per cent in his hands and fifty in the hands of the associates. He had relied upon a gentlemen's agreement that this balance should not be disturbed by the issuance of treasury stock. He felt that the payment of the inventor in this stock was dangerous to his interests as likely to disturb that balance. It would be a much easier matter for Williamson, Corbett, and Crawford, or their friends, to possess themselves of that stock than it would be for him. He urged, therefore, in the interest of fair play, that the cash price, or, rather, the best compromise they could make on a cash basis, be accepted.

"Question," Corbett murmured when they had heard him in silence to the end. But Frank Crawford, after a glance down the table at Henry Craven's troubled face, made a little speech of reassurance. The agreement was still a gentlemen's agreement, and there was no disposition on the part of any one to violate it. The control had from the first been ambiguous, and it would be no more so after the stock sale had been made. There was no reason to believe that the inventor was not entirely disinterested. Crawford was voting for a stock payment both because he did not wish the company's financial resources depleted and because he did wish the personal strengthened, as he believed it would be by the enlistment of a man whose talents, as an inventor, had been so highly praised by their president.

The vote was then taken and the motion carried. Joe, Jennie, and Nathan voting against it. It was supported by Williamson, Corbett, Crawford—and, most unhappily, by Henry Craven. Joe shook hands with him after the meeting and told him not to feel bad about it. He'd acted in accordance with the clear understanding under which he'd been elected. He hadn't the heart to stay around, however, to talk it out with Joe and Jennie, and left with John Williamson.

Jennie, tired out and thoroughly dispirited, hadn't much wanted to stay and talk it out, either, but she had been detained by an imperative signal from Joe. She stood looking out the window over the lake while she waited for the room to clear. When the door had shut for the last time, she turned with what began as a smile of encouragement for her defeated boss. But it ended with a gasp.

"Joe!" she cried. He was gazing after John Williamson's back, with his most brilliant grin.

"We've got 'em, Jennie! We've got 'em by the short hairs!"

"Was this what you were working for all along? But Joe, why?"

"Lord, yes! Didn't you see it? I hoped you wouldn't, because it made your face safer, but I didn't suppose I could get by with you. I'm pretty good when I can do that."

"I don't see, yet," she confessed, "what you've got out of it, unless this inventor you were so anxious to have them look up is somebody you—own more or less."

"H—!" said Joe. "I own the patents. Patented the whole thing myself—as an infringement—before I patented the others. Cornstalks was a d—n good idea, wasn't it? They might have found the thing before they went in and gummed the whole game. But they didn't. Jennie, do you think I'd go into business with that bunch without something up my sleeve?"

"That stock will stay right where it is, see, until they try to pull the rug out from under me. I may not have to show down even then, if I can get Henry. I believe I could have got him today if I'd wanted him. I could only use him once, of course."

"Even feeling sorry for the old man, have you? Well, next time you wait. We've got 'em by the short hairs, Jennie, and when we get ready they're going to yelp!"

CHAPTER VII

True Love.

Joe's misgiving about the use Beatrice had been making of her liberty was warranted. She had picked up George Burns on a drug-store corner more than once, and though this did not happen as often as her father, with deliberate exaggeration, had suggested to Jennie, the bond between the pair was stronger than anything his speculations ran to.

On the third day after George's dismissal, Trix, with an elaboration of clandestine contrivance, had met him and had a long talk with him. She'd chosen a rendezvous, unhappily, upon the Municipal pier, a place packed with people. Joe, sitting in a corner, real danger always quieted him, and his argument, though forcible, low-voiced and conciliatory. The fundamental difficulty about organizing this company he pointed out, has been over the question of control. He had felt at first that since he was putting his whole fortune into the company and was to be its technical head he was entitled to full control. It had been with the greatest reluctance that he had consented to a divided control, an even fifty per cent in his hands and fifty in the hands of the associates. He had relied upon a gentlemen's agreement that this balance should not be disturbed by the issuance of treasury stock. He felt that the payment of the inventor in this stock was dangerous to his interests as likely to disturb that balance. It would be a much easier matter for Williamson, Corbett, and Crawford, or their friends, to possess themselves of that stock than it would be for him. He urged, therefore, in the interest of fair play, that the cash price, or, rather, the best compromise they could make on a cash basis, be accepted.

"Question," Corbett murmured when they had heard him in silence to the end. But Frank Crawford, after a glance down the table at Henry Craven's troubled face, made a little speech of reassurance. The agreement was still a gentlemen's agreement, and there was no disposition on the part of any one to violate it. The control had from the first been ambiguous, and it would be no more so after the stock sale had been made. There was no reason to believe that the inventor was not entirely disinterested. Crawford was voting for a stock payment both because he did not wish the company's financial resources depleted and because he did wish the personal strengthened, as he believed it would be by the enlistment of a man whose talents, as an inventor, had been so highly praised by their president.

The vote was then taken and the motion carried. Joe, Jennie, and Nathan voting against it. It was supported by Williamson, Corbett, Crawford—and, most unhappily, by Henry Craven. Joe shook hands with him after the meeting and told him not to feel bad about it. He'd acted in accordance with the clear understanding under which he'd been elected. He hadn't the heart to stay around, however, to talk it out with Joe and Jennie, and left with John Williamson.

would. If he didn't, she thought perhaps she'd ask him.

But the mere sight of him was disconcerting. She'd never seen him before in an ordinary straw hat and regular civilian clothes, and a certain air which she'd regarded as inseparable from him was gone. It would be a little too much to say that he looked cheap, but he would never, for a fact, have served, like this, as lay figure to hang romances about a disguised prince upon. She suspected, too, that she had somewhat impaired herself with him, arriving soot, hot and flushed and flecked with soot from the vomiting funnels of the little excursion steamers.

The pair found a corner where they could sit in the shade. The fact that they loved each other got itself declared and accepted as a basis almost at once. He put his arm around her—half of the paired people out here were linked that way—and during a moment of fortuitous privacy they kissed.

But the feel of the adventure was pedestrian, not aerial. George pointed out that he hadn't a job, and, he added with a manner which struck her as a little unnatural, practically no money. She had nearly four hundred dollars of her own, she said—with her; but he told her hotly that, when they ran away to get married, it wouldn't be upon her money that they did it. She didn't contest the point; lacked the spirit to do it, somehow.

Anyway, he went on to say they'd have to come down eventually to living on what he could earn. Mr. Greer would do nothing for them, even in the way of making an opening for him. Forlornly she conceded this, too. She knew how implacable her father's resentments were, though she was rather surprised that her lover should see so clearly.

If they'd been sitting, while they had this talk, in the big roadster, skimming swallow-like along some white ribbon of road, or pulled up in the shade of some secluded lane, she might have been able to romanticize the idea of poverty with her lover and insist upon embracing it. A tiny cottage, a single room, anything that sheltered the pair of them together would be enough.

But out here on the pier this couldn't be done. There were too many objections all about. Thrill children carrying all-day suckers on sticks, harassed mothers, a sheepish father here and there, peremptory denials of any more pennies for the slot-machines—this was pleasure! This was a red-letter day!

Her courage wasn't equal to it, nor his, either. The truth was, for the present they'd have to give it up. If a piece of luck came George's way—He had a plan in mind, but wouldn't tell her now what it was.

They exchanged some promises that day; she, never to have anything more to do with Ware or his bunch, or any one like them, and to quit drinking—as he had done, absolutely, two months before; he, never to take another job as chauffeur, but stick it out for something that looked toward the future; and not to lose himself where she couldn't find him—if she needed him.

They parted mournfully enough, but comforted somewhat by the meeting, for all that. He'd never distrust her again, he said, whatever happened. He had thought when her father fired him, that night on the way to the train, that she might have thrown him over—made him the goat.

"I never told him anything—about you," Trix asserted. "How do you suppose he found out?"

It must have been Miss MacArthur, then. George had talked to her. He'd had so much on his chest that night that he'd had to blow off to somebody. He'd realized he was giving himself away more or less, but had thought Jennie too good a friend to take advantage. So the warmest emotion Trix went home with that afternoon was a lively hatred of Jennie.

This was short-lived, of course, for it was on that very evening that Jennie offered her treaty and won a victory. This might, it is easy to believe, have been much more complete than it turned out to be; for, after all, Jennie failed.

Beatrice saw George, for the first time since their parting, the day she read in the paper of his having got a job as pilot in the air-mail service. They had an afternoon together, in the car again, revisiting some old haunts of theirs, but despite the romantic accessories it was not a very happy time. He pressed her hotly now to marry him and said some pretty bitter things when she refused to promise anything. Wasn't the job good enough to suit her? He got a base pay of fifty a week and five cents a mile. On the Cleveland run this figured nearly fifty a week more. And between round trips, one day each way, he would have two days off. He wouldn't take him at that—"I couldn't stand it, just waiting. You'd be away half the nights, even." They both thought, when they parted that day, that it was the end of everything.

Going to school, though it represented at first nothing more than a random attempt to escape from the tyranny of her need of him, afforded her, presently, a more hopeful idea. Most of her fellow students, she found, were not here to pass the time nor even to improve themselves, but with the sharply defined aim of learning to earn themselves a living.

He wasn't very sympathetic toward this idea when she broached it to him; they were always on the edge of quarreling over it, and she was some two confident of it herself. Indeed, there was nothing very confident or clear about her life, within or without, during the weeks that intervened between her father's disastrous flying visit in August and his final return late in October. Her wishes and her dreams contradicted each other and frequently themselves, and her actions followed as best they could through the maze.

Before Joe took up his post as sentry, determined, as he said, to know, she had drifted into a modus vivendi with her lover. She saw him once during each of his off-duty periods in Chicago, for as long as she could safely give him, usually in the afternoon. In fine weather they drove out into the country; for bad days they found various ignoble and humiliating hiding-places in town. They didn't plan much nor hope for much. They merely drifted, dangerously they both knew, compromising as best they could with the desire that held them in the grip of its great disinterested hand.

Beatrice, as Jennie prophesied she would, saw through her father's intentions like so much glass, but the note between them was not always hostile. During the month that elapsed before the final explosion they were together more than ever before, and often, for hours and even days on end, the surface they presented each other was one of unbroken confidence and tenderness. Trix sometimes believed in the honesty of her own—managed to think she loved him as well as ever—but she never wholly trusted his.

Her knowledge that she was being watched—spied upon—was fortified by evidence, though the items of it were too minute to be reported; a glance at the superscription of a letter, the too casual tone of a question, an explanation a little too circumstantial of his plans for the day, an occasional something queer about a telephone call.

She took a rather cruel pleasure, though it wasn't entirely wanton, in feeding his suspicion with false clues, making small mysteries of nothing. She didn't believe he was on the main trail. Ware, whom she hadn't seen since his licking, and some of his associates were still in her father's thoughts, and he seemed uneasy, too, about some of the new friends she had made at school. These suspicions of his she deliberately inflated.

The victories were not all with her, however. He was a strategist, too. Within a week of his return he maneuvered her out of half her liberty by appropriating the roadster to his own use. The closed car was at her disposal, but since it was a limousine the chauffeur naturally went with it, and this unescapable social convention made it useless for the most important of her purposes. Yet in the teeth of the bleak autumnal weather she couldn't avow a preference for the open car.

In another way, too, the weather helped force the situation. When Joe finally got round to going North again, about the middle of November, there was no possibility of giving the journey the color of a pleasure outing for Trix, but she went at his invitation.

During the whole ten days the journey lasted, storms and the mud kept her virtually a prisoner in a succession of small hotels. She wrote long daily letters to George Burns while her father was away about his business, and in the evening when he came back she entertained him with a sulky silence, varied sometimes by a spiritless acquiescence in a suggested movie show or by a pretended absorption in a magazine. Before they returned they had worn the situation down to its last shred of tolerability.

The one thought in her mind was to get to George as quickly as she could. She had figured this as one of his off days, and was sure, having written she was getting home today, that he would be waiting at his boarding-house to hear from her.

She was angrily incredulous of the voice—that of a boarding-house slavey—which informed her that Mr. Burns was out, and after this assurance had been rammed home to her there was a black moment or two when she turned her wrath upon her lover. Then it occurred to her that he might be the victim of a change in his time-table, and, calling up the office of the superintendent of the air mail, she learned that this was true. Pilot Burns had taken out the Cleveland mail that morning. He'd be returning with it tomorrow, some time around noon.

A panicky foreboding took possession of her, that she might not again be allowed even such qualified liberty as she enjoyed today.

In the train of this half-serious notion she spent the rest of the morning buying a traveling-bag and equipping it with a complete outfit for the emergency she foresaw: including suit, hat, and shoes, all inconspicuous and serviceable.

She deposited this "iron ration" in the care of the head porter in one of the smaller downtown hotels, a man who had already served as her ally in one or two small matters. It was to be kept till called for, no matter when, tomorrow or next year. Now if she quarreled with her father in the middle of the night or during an evening party she couldn't be kept prisoner by a lack of clothes.

Her afternoon's entertainment consisted in looking at furnished rooms which had been advertised for light housekeeping. To the landladies she saw she gave her name as Mrs. George Burns and described herself as the wife of one of the mail aviators. She got a good deal of emotional stimulus out of this, for they were without exception interested and in one case deeply sympathetic. Mrs. Henderson didn't see how she could endure the suspense of knowing her husband might be killed any day. Any day, absolutely! And Fridays! She hoped Mr. Burns never had to fly on Friday! She got a thrill, too, from the domestic intimacies one place suggested. It consisted of a sitting-room with a double bed in an alcove, a bathroom, and a closet equipped as a kitchenette. She almost hired the place outright, and she left with a strong intimation that she would do so, if it weren't taken in the meantime, within a day or two. Things couldn't go on as they were at home much longer, anyhow. Mightn't she as well make an end of that intolerable situation now as later?

But she found on reaching home about six o'clock that this decision had already been taken out of her hands. The look in Anson's face when he met her in the hall told her that something unprecedented had happened.

"Father home yet?" she asked, with an affected carelessness which didn't sound just right. Her heart, for some incomprehensible reason, had come up into her throat.

"He was brought home, miss," Anson said, reproachfully. "Around eleven o'clock this morning, in an ambulance. He'd been in an accident."

She was bewildered by this news. In the first flash it seemed unfair, sweeping her own concerns off the boards as it did, so summarily. "He's in bed, I suppose," she interrupted. "I'll go to him. I can see him, can't I?" Some involuntary significance of Anson's part was what made her ask that last question.

He said, "Certainly, Miss," but she waited for him to explain his reluctance. "You may not find him quite himself," he warned her, and added that the doctor's orders were strict against any excitement.

Well, of course, Anson knew the sort of terms she'd been on with her father lately.

The pillows were packed behind him so that he half reclined, his head was incased in bandages, his left forearm lay across his chest in splints; there was a strong hospital-like smell in the room, of iodine or something of the sort. All this she was prepared for—and instantly thrust aside as unimportant. What engrossed and frightened her was the way he was looking at her as if her appearance bewildered him, as if he found it unaccountable.

She said, in answer to its seeming question, "Don't you know me, Dad? It's Trix!"

"Of course I know you," he answered, petulantly, and thickly—as if his tongue were swollen. "I'm not out of my head. What made you think I was?" Anson been talking?"

"It was just the way you looked at me," she said, shakily, and then went to him. "Oh, Dad, I'm so sorry!" she cried.

"I didn't know, of course. I just came in this minute. I haven't heard yet what happened, or how. Are you well enough to tell me?"

Instead of answering her question he asked one of his own. "Where you been all day, Trix?" For a moment his look pinned her fast; then it wavered away and left her.

"Nowhere much," she answered. "Shopping for a while, and then just—wandering around. There didn't seem to be any special point in coming home."

"Alone?" he asked. "She found herself crying as he answered yes. When she'd wiped her tears and controlled her voice, she elaborated. "Absolutely alone, Dad. All day. I haven't spoken to a person I knew since I left you this morning. There wasn't anybody I knew to talk to. Dad, it's true! You do trust me as much as that, don't you?"

He shook his head, but it wasn't, she thought, so much in dissent as in perplexity; as if she'd thrown him back upon some puzzle of his own. The expression was lost in the twinge of pain the movement cost him. "Poor Dad, you must lie still," she admonished him, gently. "Tell me what happened to you."

Hot Springs.

Hot Springs, Ark., is widely noted for the hot waters that flow from 72 springs, included in a space of ten acres on the west side of Hot Springs mountain. The waters of these springs range in temperature from 76 to 157 degrees F., and are especially beneficial in the treatment of chronic diseases. In 1822 four sections of land were set off by congress as a government reservation. Since then the government has established on the mountain the Army and Navy General hospital.

Family pride has ruined the prospects of many a fine young man.

KNITTED TOGS FOR CHILDREN; CHIC ACCESSORIES FOR SUMMER

IF PERCHANCE there be an impression that grownups have a monopoly on knitted outerwear fashions vanish the thought! True it is that mother and big sister are more than justified in enthusing over the season's delectable knitted apparel styled to the queen's taste. However, juvenile displays of sweaters, frocks and gay-colored capes affirm that it is ditto with the little folks. Designers are showing no partiality and knitted togs for tots bear every evidence of artful creation and choice coloring.

Knitted artistry as applied to the fashioning of children's costumes is at

Last year we had the Desauville kerchief and this year we have the scarf holding the center of fashion's stage. Scarfs range from small affairs four inches wide to be worn choker fashion with tailored suits, to wide, airy ones of the sheerest fabrics that are half as large as a shawl. They have invaded dress for the street, for sports and for formal affairs and are everywhere present in many varieties. For

Most of the shops are featuring for little girls frocks in two pieces, combining a belted smock with straight knitted bloomers.

For older girls there are two-piece models composed of a sweater gay in all-over design done in many colors, with a plain knitted skirt.

One-piece frocks in high colors are also featured trimmed with bands in contrasting shades. These often have practical long sleeves and they are ideal for school wear.

The general contour of the sweaters as well as their trimming details close-sports and dressy wear hats to match are much in evidence and a scarf of georgette, lined with silk and adorned with ribbon and flowers, is shown with its millinery companion piece in the picture. There are sets of three matching pieces also for summer days, with a parasol initiated into the ancient order of the scarf. For sports wear cretonne accounts for gay paravols that may match hats or short jackets or trimming or bandings on the costume.

Link bracelets of gilt or silver have joined the ranks of glass and other bracelets which travel like a small bodyguard with morning, noon and evening costumes. Necklaces and choker strands of beads continue to finish off the toilet and short strands

A sweater which appeals to the young girl is knitted in the jacquette style of artificial silk, with cross-over front and loose sleeves. Frequently colored embroidery forms a border at the neckline.

Children are taking particular delight in the monogram fad and many a sweater and scarf proudly bears an initial-like motif.

Some dress accessories are confident of attention season after season because they are indispensable, but there are always in their company other niceties of dress that are not necessities. We could go along without them but nobody wants to. The of pearls are approved with tailored suits.

Vestees and cuffs of white pique make an incomparably smart finish for tailored suits and vestees of white or white and black crepe provide variety for the same purpose. A little book could be written on the subject of ties, and brilliant silk ties with little kerchiefs to match are the darlings of the mode for brightening up the plain, tailored street suit. Just for a touch of swagger and nothing else the cane of "swagger-stick" finds plenty of admirers. Bags of many kinds in leather, beads and silk have taken on novel shapes to add to their interest and a few of these are shown in the picture.

Is Your Work Hard? Is your work wearing you out? Are you tortured with throbbing backache—feel tired, weak and worn out? Then look to your kidneys! Many occupations tend to weaken the kidneys. Constant backache, headaches, dizziness and rheumatic pains result. One suffers from kidney irregularities; feels nervous, irritable and worn out. Don't wait! Use Doan's Pills—a stimulant diuretic to the kidneys. Workers everywhere recommend Doan's. They should help you, too. Ask your neighbor!

A Louisiana Case W. M. Hawkins, painter, 604 Ann St., Lake Charles, La., says: "I was troubled a long time with kidney troubles. I believe it was caused from inhaling the fumes of the turpentine. I had an ache across my back, and across my hips. I found it difficult to do much lifting. I used Doan's Pills and they helped me immediately. I was soon cured of this trouble."

Daddy's Evening Fairy Tale

MARY GRAHAM BONNER
SWAMP WHITE OAK

"Sometimes," said the Swamp White Oak, "I've heard mothers telling their children they must not get their feet wet."

"Or, if they have got their feet wet, I hear them being told to come home at once and change their shoes and stockings so they will not catch cold."

"That seems so funny to me, so funny," Billie Brownie said.

Billie Brownie had gone to call on the Swamp White Oak and Billie was sitting curled up in one of its small branches.

Billie had not liked to say that he didn't care to stand in the swamp for he was afraid it might hurt the Swamp White Oak's tree feelings!

He thought perhaps it might be rude so he had said:

"Oh, may I sit on one of your branches? It would be so comfortable, I feel sure."

And the Swamp White Oak had agreed.

"Of course," Billie Brownie said, in answer to the Swamp White Oak's speech, "people do catch cold when they get their feet wet and you don't catch cold."

"If you sneezed and coughed and had to blow your nose you might feel different."

"That is the thing that happens when people catch cold and it is most uncomfortable."

"I've never seen a tree with a cold and I don't suppose a tree could have a cold."

"I've never heard that they sold handkerchiefs in stores for trees and I've never heard a tree sneeze, nor seen one blow its nose."

The Swamp White Oak laughed. "No, we trees never catch cold. But, of course, all trees would not like it in the swamp as I do."

"I'm the special oak which likes swamp life. And I wouldn't be happy anywhere else. I amuse myself in all sorts of little ways."

"I shed my bark and it curls up and shows bright green underneath. It's rather an untidy habit but it amuses me. When I am young you do not notice this habit as my foliage covers all this up."

"But dear me, we can't all set just alike. What a dull world it would be if we did."

"There I agree with you absolutely," said Billie Brownie.

"I think," he added, "one of the reasons the world is so interesting is because so many have different ways."

"But I gather from your remark," the Swamp White Oak said, "that you do not agree with me about wet feet!"

"Nothing makes me happier than to stand in wet ground all the time."

"I was given the name of Swamp White Oak because I am a white oak tree which loves swamps."

"Yes, I like to stand in swamps and to feel the cool, wet ground under me."

"That is what I like above everything else, and when you see me or any of my family you will know how happy we are with our wet feet—or wet roots, perhaps you'd better say."

"Yes," said Billie Brownie to himself, after he had said good-by, "the world is filled with different tastes!"

"Theistic Scientist"
A "theistic scientist" would, by definition, be a scientist who is a theist, or believer in God, a god or gods.

What his particular form of belief might be depends upon his individuality. Perhaps no two people in the world hold exactly the same religious beliefs, though they may subscribe to the same creeds.

In order that young pigs will continue to gain after the operation with retardation of growth or other ill effects they should be castrated at a time which will allow the wounds to become entirely healed before weaning.

At such age pigs are easily handled, the operation is conveniently and successfully performed, and perfect healing of the wounds is facilitated through their being nourished and protected by the sow. Complications with attending stunting of growth, which sometimes happens at later ages, are not liable to occur at this age.

Castrating before weaning is a good practice.

When possible, cool days should be selected for the operation, and cold, damp weather avoided. The pigs should be kept on a light diet for the 24 hours preceding the operation.

The digestive tract should never be distended with feed at the time of operating. A thorough washing of the scrotum with an antiseptic solution of liquor cresolis compositis, or cleaning with soap and water, is a part of the operation which should not be neglected.

Extremely irritating solutions are painful to the cut surfaces, serve no useful purposes, and should be avoided. They may cause rubbing of the wounds and so result in greater injury to the parts.

FARM STOCK

TAKE PRECAUTIONS FOR TREATING PIGS

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Ordinarily the castration of young pigs is a simple operation and one which many farmers know how to perform. There are precautions to observe, however, in sanitation and in the case of certain conditions, such as rupture, which should be given more careful consideration than is ordinarily done.

If the best results are to be had, the hardness of these animals and their ability usually to withstand such operations favorably often leads the hog grower to consider the operation of castration as one requiring no particular care.

It is only a little after the breakfast hour when a young man rang the bell of his best girl's house, and waited, hat in hand, on the doorstep.

If the girl's mother was surprised at this early call, she managed to appear gracious about it.

"Good morning," chirped the youth. "Can I see Pansy? She was blooming at the ball last night."

"I'm afraid you can't see her," responded her mother, not unkindly. "Pansy is a trifle wilted this morning."

Man Held Responsible for Cholera Outbreaks
"If you want to see the bird responsible for new outbreaks of hog cholera, look up the owner or caretaker of the sick hogs in which the disease first developed," says J. K. Atherton, a government inspector in charge of hog cholera work in an eastern state.

According to his statement the man who accuses sparrows of carrying the infection frequently does so to cover up his own carelessness.

Crows and buzzards may possibly carry the disease, but not if the owner of the dead hogs does his part to burn or bury all carcasses where dogs and birds cannot reach them.

New outbreaks of cholera can invariably be traced to garbage containing bones or meat scraps; to sick animals introduced into the herd or abuse of the double treatment. On rare occasions a careless peddler or similar person may be responsible for the disease, but here again the hog owners are to blame for allowing such irresponsible people near the hog yards.

In one state there has not been a single case of spread of cholera infection in six years from herds in which the outbreak was promptly reported. If birds were spreading the infection they would continue to do so whether or not the disease had been reported to the authorities. After all, the human is the greatest carrier of hog cholera.

Grinding Corn for Stock
Iowa experiments a number of years ago demonstrated that hogs under 200 pounds in weight usually made more economical gains on ear corn than on ground corn. With cattle there is a slight economy in grinding as a rule, but if there are hogs following the cattle, it seems that the expense of grinding is not justified. Dairy cows seem to appreciate ground corn, but neither fattening hogs nor fattening steers will, as a rule, pay for the cost of grinding.

If You Need a Medicine You Should Have the Best--Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root

Have you ever stopped to reason why it is that so many products that are extensively advertised all at once drop out of sight and are soon forgotten? The reason is plain—the article did not fulfill the promise of the manufacturer. This applies more particularly to a medicine.

A medicinal preparation that has real curative value almost sells itself, as like an endless chain system the remedy is recommended by those who have been benefited to those who are in need of it.

A prominent druggist says, "Take for example Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, a preparation I have sold for many years and never hesitate to recommend, for in almost every case it shows excellent results, as many of my customers testify. No other kidney remedy has so large a sale."

According to sworn statements and verified testimony of thousands who have used the preparation, the success of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root is due to the fact, so many people claim, that it fulfills almost every wish in overcoming kidney, liver and bladder ailments, corrects urinary troubles and neutralizes the uric acid which causes rheumatism.

You may receive a sample bottle of Swamp-Root by parcel post. Address Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., and enclose ten cents; also mention this paper. Large and medium size bottles for sale at all drug stores.—Advertisement.
