Jordan Unit ready to start up industry phase

By CHERYL BERZANSKIS
Lifestyles Editor

Beginning in September, inmates of the Rufe Jordan Unit will go to work.

Scheduled for opening is a 15,000 square foot production facility designed for the manufacture of mini and vertical blinds and production of inmate shoe uppers.

Another 5,000 square feet will be devoted to warehouse space for raw materials and finished product. The estimated cost of construction was $1,106,000 according Texas Department of Criminal Justice construction inspector Ray Medley.

The concrete-floored metal building is heated by natural gas, cooled by electricity, and features smoke and heat detectors in the ceiling. Also inside are offices, restrooms and a classroom. A secure storage area protects items prone to theft.

Inmates will be selected for employment based on past production experience and expectation of trainability, said Bill Barnett, a 12-year veteran of prison industry. He will serve as plant manager for the factory.

When the factory is fully staffed, it will employ 110 to 120 inmates. They will work 4:45 to 11:45 a.m. Monday through Friday. Seven TDCJ supervisors will oversee the operation.

"This is TDCJ's first venture into blind making, said Warden Darwin Sanders. The blinds will be sold only to tax-supported agencies, and the shoes, called a workman's brogan, will be used only for inmates through TDCJ.

Shoes will be manufactured in D,

EE and EEE widths in sizes six through 16. The uppers will be made of both prison and free-world generated leather products. Barnett reports that each inmate goes through 2.9 pairs of shoes per year at a prison industry cost of $7 per pair. Shoes are manufactured in case lots of one dozen. It is estimated that about 1200 pairs of uppers per day will be stitched by about 40 sewing machines when the factory is in full operation.

Slat for mini blinds are created by running a metal ribbon through a machine with the formidable name "venetian blind slat forming punching machine." The machine cost about $16,000, Barnett said, and can form a slat up to 12 feet long. A $12,000 computer programmable sewing machine is designed to automatically sew weight pockets in the slats of vertical blinds.

The estimated cost of production for a 48 inch-by-60 inch blind is $20. The expected sale price is 20 percent over cost. All prison industry products which range from office partitions to clothing are available only to tax-supported agencies.

"We can't compete with the free-world industries," said Barnett.

Upon completion, items are shipped to warehouses in Snyder and Huntsville. All supplies are inventoried coming in and going out.

Besides economic benefits to the taxpayer — the $7 brogans are estimated to cost about $36 to $45 in the free world — there are bonuses to prison management and the inmates.

"Any time anybody has idle time, they tend to get into a little mischief," Sanders said.

Too much idle time, he explained, is detrimental to the rehabilitation process. In terms of rehabilitation, prison industry provides inmates with manufacturing skills similar to those available in the free world. Many inmates have never held jobs, or held them only briefly, and working in the factory provides some with pride in their work, Barnett explained.

It is hoped that a regular job will also instill the work ethic in inmates who are assigned to the industry. For those wishing to transfer out of the factory, it is within the discretion of TDCJ to reassign the inmate, taking into consideration the needs of the factory and the best interests of the inmate, Barnett said.

Work time translates to time off the back end of a sentence for the inmate.

The inmate's afternoon hours are devoted to lunch, recreation, education or parole interviews.

Difficulties in supervision mimic the problems encountered in the free world with one additional aspect, Barnett explained. That difference is security. Tools are accounted for carefully at the end of shift, and if any are discovered missing, no one leaves until they are found.

Cross training alleviates monotony and provides back up for the inevitable absences. Some inmates are selected to learn factory repair. All are schooled in safety and oriented to the factory atmosphere, Barnett said.

Skellytown citizens asked to help survey for PRPC

SKELLYTOWN — Skellytown city officials are looking for a few good volunteers Tuesday to go door-to-door taking a survey in an effort to repair or replace the community's water tower.

Over 60 years old, the lining of the water tower is pulling away from the inner shell and the interior is beginning to rust, according to Courtney Sharp of the Panhandle Regional Planning Commission.

City officials are developing a state grant application to defray the costs associated with the water tower, Sharp said. Information gathered during Tuesday night's survey is necessary for the grant application.

"The Texas Department of Housing and Community Affairs (TDHCA) annually receives funds from the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development," Sharp said. "Part of this money is allocated regionally through the Texas Community Development Program (TCDP) to help cities like Skellytown to address key community development needs."

Because applications for the funds exceed the availability, the process is extremely competitive,

Sharp said. Projects are selected based on a two-tiered procedure using a committee of government-appointed elected officials and the TDHCA staff. The review committee and TDHCA staff base their judgments on predetermined criteria.

One of the criteria is that at least 51 percent of the persons to benefit from the project have an income of 80 percent or less of the median income in Carson County, according to Sharp.

Using census data, the low and moderate income percentage of Skellytown as a part of Carson County is only 45.14 percent. In an effort to get a more accurate count, the city staff will go door-to-door from 5:30 p.m. to 9 p.m. Tuesday surveying the city.

Sharp said the survey includes nine questions and takes about two to three minutes to complete. "The city would appreciate the full participation and cooperation of all the households in Skellytown," Sharp said, "as they endeavor to provide better facilities and conditions for their citizens."

Anyone wanting to help can contact Mayor Max Owens or Becky Ulmer at City Hall, Sharp said.

Gray County facing increase in teen STDs

By JOHN McMILLAN
Staff Writer

Warning: having sex with the wrong partner can be harmful to your health.

There has been an increase in the number of sexually transmitted diseases (STDs) in Gray County in the 15- to 19-year-old age group over the last few years, said Carolyn Hall, the public health nurse who supervises testing for such diseases at the Texas Department of Health office in Pampa.

The increase in STDs over the past few years has been especially pronounced for chlamydia and gonorrhea, Hall said.

Symptoms of chlamydia in men include a discharge from the penis, painful or frequent urination, and itching or burning around the opening of penis. Symptoms of chlamydia in women include vaginal discharge or itching in the genital area, pain in the lower abdomen and bleeding between menstrual periods.

However, most women with chlamydia and some men with the disease have no symptoms of it, according to the Texas Department of Health in Austin.

Symptoms of gonorrhea in men and boys include a burning pain during urination and a yellowish discharge from the penis that occurs from three to five days after exposure to the disease, according to the TDH in Austin. In women and girls, there usually are no outward signs of gonorrhea during the initial stages of the disease.

The third major STD for which the Pampa office of the TDH tests people is syphilis, Hall said.

Left untreated, sexually transmitted diseases can cause sterility, cancer or even death. No cure has been found for the sexually transmitted disease of AIDS, which is fatal.

Those seeking testing for sexually transmitted diseases at the Pampa office of the Department of Health, located at Kingsmill and Somerville avenues, are assured of confidentiality, Hall said. Such testing is offered at the facility in Pampa from 8 a.m. to noon and from 1 p.m. to 4 p.m. Monday through Friday.

Hall attributed the recent rise in the incidence of STDs among teenagers ages 15 to 19 to an apparent increase in the number of young people who are sexually active.

Some of the young clients visiting the Pampa office have individually reported having as many as 60 sex partners per month, Hall said.

There has been a recent increase in the incidence of "group sex" or "sex orgies" among young people in this area, Hall noted. In some cases, she said, "everybody in a gang may have sex with one girl," engaging in either consensual sex or rape.

Contributing to the incidence of promiscuity among young people in Gray County has been an inadequate amount of parental supervision of teenagers and extensive travel outside of the area by many young people, Hall said.

In July, the Pampa THD office tested three to six people per week — the majority of them teenagers — for sexually transmitted diseases, Hall said. About half of those tested for STDs that month also were tested for the HIV-virus, which can lead to contracting AIDS, she said.

Anyone who is uncomfortable with taking such tests at the Pampa office can obtain a referral to another testing site by calling the office at 665-0746.

The number of tests for the HIV virus at the Pampa Department of Health office has increased dramatically in recent years, from eight such tests in 1989 to 406 in 1992, Hall said. She declined to say how many of the HIV-virus test results from the individuals testing in 1992 had been positive, saying the information is confidential.

Hall noted that she expects the number of HIV-virus tests given this year at her office to increase to about 460.

Hall recommended that a person practice abstinence from sex to avoid sexually transmitted diseases.

For those who do engage in sex, Hall recommended that they get to know someone, including his sexual history, before deciding whether to have sex with him. Hall also advised that they use a condom or other form of contraceptive during the sex act.

Monogamous sex is the safest form of sexual activity, because it minimizes the risk of spreading a disease through the sex act, the public health nurse said.

Those with more than one sex partner should be tested at least once a year for sexually transmitted diseases, Hall said. She also advised that a person with more than one sex partner keep a record of each partner's address, phone number and age, along with a description of his or her appearance.

If someone testing at the Pampa office is found to have a sexually transmitted disease, information about the sex partner might be helpful elsewhere in the state to the Texas Department of Health, Hall said. A disease intervention specialist at another office of the Department of Health could make use of such information in contacting other people with an STD and referring them for treatment, Hall said.

"If someone has been sexually active, he can go back and be celibate, and we really encourage that," Hall emphasized. "But it's that individual's choice."

Among the alternatives to having sex that can still allow a person to experience intimacy with someone are hugging or holding hands, Hall said. "Sometimes people can engage in conversation and be very fulfilled," she added.

Incinerators wanted for infectious waste disposal

PUEBLA, Mexico (AP) — Officials are calling for use of incinerators to properly dispose of some 300 tons of infectious waste produced by hospitals in this city southeast of the capital, a report said.

The wastes are produced by some 10 hospitals and 59 private clinics and dumped near this city, some 65 miles southeast of the capital, according to a report by the Intimex waste agency.

Juan Carlos Munoz, a hazardous waste expert, said incinerators were needed to get rid of potentially dangerous wastes.

Jury deliberating penalty for drug kingpin

BROWNSVILLE (AP) — A federal prosecutor told jurors Saturday that only a death sentence could stop a convicted drug boss depicted as a "chameleon" who corrupted and killed even his own family.

"If we don't stop this man. Who do we stop?" Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark Patterson asked jurors considering the death penalty for Juan Raul Garza.

Jurors began deliberating Saturday afternoon in the penalty phase of the trial. They were sent home after an hour and 45 minutes and told to return Monday morning to resume.

The same panel convicted Garza on Thursday of three murders and drug charges naming him the leader of a ring that imported large amounts of marijuana between 1983 and 1993.

Prosecutors sought a rare federal death penalty under a 1988 "kingpin" law that has secured only a handful of federal death sentences nationwide.

The jury convicted Garza in the 1990 killings of Erasmo de la Fuente and de la Fuente's frequent companion, Gilberto Matos. Witnesses testified that Garza blamed de la Fuente for the loss of a marijuana shipment.

Garza also was convicted in the January 1991 death of Thomas Albert Rumblo, who had agreed to cooperate with authorities after he was caught loading marijuana for Garza.

During the penalty phase, prosecutors introduced testimony from former gang members that Garza ordered or carried out five other killings, four of them in Mexico, to protect his business.

Prosecutors said Garza enforced loyalty by bringing some family members into the business, killing workers who failed him and turning henchmen into hitmen.

"He corrupts them and he eventually kills them, like he did Bernabe Sosa, his own son-in-law," Patterson said. "(He's a) chameleon who blends in among us, but if you get too close, you're likely to be killed."

Defense attorney Philip H. Hilder told jurors that Garza would never get out of prison and urged them to spare his life.

"I'm not embarrassed to ask you mercy on the life of Juan Garza because mercy is an integral part of justice," Hilder said.

"To kill Mr. Garza really accomplishes nothing. There is no reason to compound the killing that has already occurred," he said.

Hilder said much of the government's case relied on uncorroborated testimony from witnesses once tied to Garza.

The defense attorney complained that the government didn't seek the death penalty for the hitmen, most of whom testified against Garza in exchange for a lighter sentencing recommendations from prosecutors.

But Patterson said Garza molded people who worked for him into killers.

"Would they be killers if they had never met Juan Garza? I don't know. I don't know. But I know one thing: He made them what they are," he said.

Patterson argued that the witnesses had risked their lives by coming forward.

Then he told the jurors that all people who might become drug dealers would take note if Garza were spared the death penalty.

SPS continues negotiations on lower rates

Southwestern Public Service Company said it continues to be open to negotiations in Texas that could result in lower SPS electric rates — which already are among the lowest in the nation.

"We recognize that economic conditions are changing such that lowered costs of capital and continued SPS operating efficiencies may indeed make a rate decrease possible," said SPS President Coyt Webb.

"We have had two settlement discussions with representatives of the Texas cities we serve and the staff of the Public Utility Commission. If a settlement is not reached, all parties will be facing a protracted rate hearing beginning Aug. 30."

Webb pointed out that SPS did not initiate any request for a rate increase. Earlier this year, the company was required to provide cost-of-service information, amounting to more than 11,000 pages, to the PUCT in response to a filing by the PUCT's general counsel.

Although SPS believes a rate decrease may eventually evolve from the negotiations, Webb said that SPS feels strongly that the level of reduction proposed by the cities and PUCT staff is not justified.

"This is especially true given the fact SPS residential rates are the lowest among all investor-owned utilities in Texas — and among the lowest in the nation," Webb said.

"According to the PUCT's own rate survey for July, an SPS residential customer who uses 1,000 kilowatt hours a month pays $64.72. Customers of other investor-owned utilities in Texas pay from $75.11 up to $101.19 for the same amount of electricity."

SPS provides electric service to 75 Texas cities, along with portions of New Mexico, Oklahoma and Kansas.

CWA honors Rep. Chisum for his efforts in Legislature

AMARILLO — Rep. Warren Chisum, D-Pampa, was honored Friday with the Families First award by the Concerned Women for America of Texas.

Betty Lou Martin, state director of CWA, presented Chisum with the award for "his tireless efforts" in the 73rd Texas Legislature.

CWA's Families First award is given to individuals who demonstrate unusual commitment and courage in standing up for the rights of families.

CWA is the largest non-partisan, politically active women's organization in the United States, with over 600,000 members nationwide and some 30,000 members in Texas, Martin noted.

In making the presentation, Martin said the 73rd Legislature could be called the year of the child.

"This session saw bills to mandate explicit sex education, school-based clinics, condom distribution in schools and parent training by the state, as well as to create a children's resource district (yet another taxing entity) and a commission on children," she said.

Martin claimed each of these bills would have eroded parental rights, wasted tax dollars and furthered the position of the state as "super parent."

As president of the Texas Conservative Coalition, Rep. Chisum led the fight to protect the rights of Texas families by defeating or materially amending each of these bills, Martin said.

"Rep. Chisum became so adept at using rule technicalities to kill anti-family bills his colleagues in the House began referring to him as 'Dr. Kervorkian,'" Martin said.

But even legislative colleagues who oppose Chisum's conservative agenda "grudgingly admit" that his Conservative Coalition and its emphasis on pro-family, efficient, limited government was the most successful caucus of this legislative session, according to the Houston Chronicle, Martin noted.

"Perhaps the stellar achievement of Rep. Chisum and the Coalition this session was the reinstatement of the statute prohibiting sodomy in the new penal code," Martin claimed.

Although the statute is rarely enforced, conservatives recognize its importance in providing the state with the legal basis on which it precludes same-sex marriages, homosexual adoption rights, pro-homosexual curricula and special rights legislation for homosexuals, the CWA state director said.

"Rep. Chisum withstood a great deal of pressure from his liberal colleagues and special interest groups in order to protect the families of Texas," Martin said. "CWA is proud to honor State Rep. Warren Chisum with its Families First award."

Survey: Open records law still violated

DALLAS (AP) — In 1991, more than 20 percent of the police departments and almost 15 percent of the state's school districts refused to comply with a newspaper's requests for documents whose access is guaranteed by the state's Open Records Act.

The Dallas Morning News reported in its early Sunday editions that to test how agencies were complying with the open records law, it sent letters to each of the 704 police departments, 1,041 school districts and 254 tax appraisal districts in Texas.

Citing the records law, The News asked each agency for records that had long been held by the Texas attorney general's office and the courts to be public information — the cover sheets on police investigations, school district budgets and records kept by the appraisal districts on property owned by the county sheriffs in those districts.

The newspaper said it never heard from 150 of the police agencies, 142 of the school districts and 10 of the appraisal districts.

A follow-up survey was sent in November 1992, to the police and school agencies that violated the records law. The appraisal districts were not re-surveyed.

In that 1992 survey, 45 of the offending police departments and 30 of the school districts again failed to respond.

One police chief in South Texas refused to release a police report on an unsolved slaying — the same type of report that most other departments in the state routinely sent at the request of The News.

"I don't release anything," said Sealy Police Chief Paul J. Martin Jr., who acknowledged that there was an unsolved slaying in the town of 4,500 about 50 miles west of Houston.

Martin, who has a master's degree in criminology from Sam Houston State University, said he was familiar with the open records law but refused to release information on the 2-year-old killing because he said the case had international implications and might be compromised if details were known.

Martin said other types of information — such as accident or burglary reports — could be obtained for a $5 fee. He said he told his officers not to prepare the type of fact sheet for their reports that courts have ruled are public information.

The attorney for the Kennard Independence School District near Houston wrote to say the district was willing to release a copy of the budget. But in violation of an anti-intimidation feature of the act, he asked the purpose of the inspection.

He wanted to make sure the newspaper was not seeking the document "for the purpose of public ridicule or criticism" of the district.

The Houston Police Department, however, did not respond within the required 10 working days, but later said it could comply with the request — at a cost of $705. The News had told the department that it was willing to pay any reasonable fees for compiling the information, but the Houston cost request was the highest of any agency in the state.

Braum's stops sale of ice cream flavor

Braum's Ice Cream and Dairy Stores recently announced that sales of Oatmeal Cookie Dough ice cream have been stopped due to a labeling error by the company.

Because of the mistake, peanut butter, which is in the Cookie Dough ice cream, was not mentioned among ingredients which appears on the package lids in the list of ingredients.

According to Braum's, people who are allergic to peanuts run the risk of "serious or life-threatening reactions" if they consume the mislabeled ice cream.

"All Braum's Ice Cream and Dairy Stores are aware of this error and consumers who have purchased this flavor and feel that they may be 'at risk' are urged to return this product ... (and) receive a refund or exchange for another flavor of premium ice cream," read a press release.

New packages have been ordered and Oatmeal Cookie Dough ice cream should be available in approximately 30 days, according to the press release.

For more information, Braum's customer service telephone number is 1-800-327-6455.

Trinity Fellowship plans back-to-school assistance

Trinity Fellowship Church will be offering its back-to-school outreach program this month, with registration beginning Monday.

The program provides assistance with school supplies for students entering kindergarten through 12th grade who are in need of aid in obtaining the supplies.

Pastor Lonny Robbins said Trinity Fellowship's program is aimed primarily at children of single-parent households, but others may apply.

Registration is scheduled for Monday through Friday this week, from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. daily, at the church, 1200 S. Sumner. Parents need to bring their children's Social Security card or a birth certificate.

The church will purchase supplies for qualified applicants according to the school district's recommended list for each grade level.

The supplies will then be distributed Saturday, Aug. 14.

Pastor Robbins reminded parents that they must register their children for the program this week in order for them to receive the supplies on the distribution date. No supplies will be handed out this week.

For more information on the church's back-to-school outreach program, call 665-3255.

Other dates for the seminar sessions, which all will be held from 5:30 p.m. to 7 p.m. each date, are the four subsequent Tuesdays, Aug. 10, 17, 24 and 31.

Seminar organizers said those planning to attend should expect to be at all sessions to receive the full benefit of the program. No children under 16 are allowed to attend, and the seminar will be closed to additional participants after the second session on Aug. 10.

Subjects to be discussed include what to expect, the process of grief, living with the memories, and what now. "Life After Loss" is a program made possible by volunteers of the American Cancer Society in conjunction with Crown of Texas Hospice.

To register or to receive more information, call (806) 353-4306.

CORRECTION THE OBEDIENCE OF FAITH

"... through whom we received grace and apostleship, unto obedience of faith among all the nations, for His name's sake; among whom are ye also, called to be Jesus Christ's." (Rom. 1:5-6.) Paul's work as an apostle was to preach the gospel to the Gentiles (Acts 9:15.) The end result of his preaching was the obedience resulting from faith. The very mention of the word "obedience" is utterly distasteful to the proponents of the false doctrine of salvation by grace through faith only. While there is no question about salvation by grace through faith (Eph. 2:8-9), the Bible nowhere teaches salvation by faith only.

The works of Eph. 2, which cannot justify, are meritorious works, or works worthy, in and of themselves, of salvation. This would exclude grace. But the works we are to do are works of obedience, ordained of God, for man to do. The works of obedience are only deserving of salvation because God says they are (Heb. 5:9.) In other words, salvation is so great that no works we are capable of would or could be worthy of such a reward.

Our obedience must be by faith. With complete trust in God, based on a deep-seated conviction in Him, we submit to His will. We must have this kind of faith in order to please Him. Hebrews 11:6 says: "and without faith it is impossible to be well-pleasing unto Him; for he that cometh to God must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of them that seek after Him." It is not then, just a question of what we do, but also why we do what we do. As Abraham obeyed God, even to the offering of his son Isaac upon the altar of sacrifice, so we must believe in God completely. And so, whatever He commands, we do because we believe. Hence, it becomes "obedience of faith."

The very fact that Paul states that the purpose of preaching the gospel was in order to obedience of faith necessitates obedience. Faith is established first and then obedience follows. This is the obedience of faith.

EVER STRIVING FOR THE TOP O' TEXAS
TO BE AN EVEN BETTER PLACE TO LIVE

Let Peace Begin With Me

This newspaper is dedicated to furnishing information to our readers so that they can better promote and preserve their own freedom and encourage others to see its blessings. Only when man understands freedom and is free to control himself and all he possesses can he develop to his utmost capabilities.

We believe that freedom is a gift from God and not a political grant from government, and that men have the right to take moral action to preserve their life and property for themselves and others.

Freedom is neither license nor anarchy. It is control and sovereignty of oneself, no more, no less. It is, thus, consistent with the coveting commandment.

Opinion

But is it really a serious plot?

There's enough evidence of actual plans to commit violent acts—as compared to a bunch of pathetic thugs talking trash—behind the arrests of eight alleged white supremacists in California last month to be alarming. Whether the threat warrants a lot more government activity or citizen concern deserves open-minded, searching consideration.

Eight people were arrested and accused of being part of a plot by the self-styled Fourth Reich Skins to blow up the AME Church in Los Angeles, kill many in the congregation and assassinate Rodney King, presumably to attract media attention and start an outright race war. Federal agents said they caught three of the militants even as they were making a letter bomb. They also seized machine guns, pipe bombs, other weapons and Nazi paraphernalia.

As this story develops, we need to weigh various issues carefully. Planning an actual violent act or murder, and taking concrete steps to carry out such a plan are the kinds of violence from which we hope the government will protect us. But in a society that values freedom of speech and freedom of association, holding reprehensible views and talking about doing nasty things is not criminal.

"Gangsta" rappers have the right to do quasi-musical pieces with lyrics about cop-killing, and skinhead punks have the right to talk about starting a race war—so long as they don't take overt action to carry out their reprehensible ideas. Overt action is something else.

Do violent skinheads constitute a serious threat in Los Angeles—or Texas? These arrests might spur reconsideration, but a report this year by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith said the skinhead movement in the nation has lost steam over the last several years. Just a few wackos with weapons can wreak a good deal of damage, of course. But the presence of a few wackos in California doesn't constitute evidence of widespread racism or racial hostility.

Finally, the dangers posed by violent racist groups need to be weighed against the dangers of letting government agencies get too over-wrought or convinced that the end justify the means. A jury in Idaho just acquitted white separatist Randy Weaver and a friend of murder and other charges after it became apparent during the trial that the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms had entrapped him and responded with incredible force to a trivial threat. It can happen here.

Any plot to kill innocent people, whether for racist motives or any other reason, is reprehensible. If this was a real plot and it's really been squelched, fine. But making generalizations from this incident can be dangerous too.

Berry's World

"OK, Pal, if you think you're ever going to be on my talk show, you can FORGET it!"

Let's talk simple economics

Some things sound wonderful at first blush, but simple economics should give us second thoughts. The political talk these days is job creation. You don't have to be smart to create jobs. Congress could create millions of jobs simply by outlawing harvesting machines and trucks. Sure a few hundred thousand workers would be laid off at companies like John Deere and Mack. But think of the many more who'd find millions of jobs available hand-picking corn, building wagons and stage-coaches, raising horses and cleaning up after horses. Under this scenario, there'd be many more jobs, but we'd all be poorer.

You say, "Hold it, Williams; nobody is as loony as to be talking about creating jobs that way!" That's right, but there are variants on that theme. For example, there are increasing calls for higher tariff and quota restrictions that keep cheaper foreign-made products out in an effort to provide more jobs for some Americans. This makes consumers pay billions in higher prices and enjoy a lower standard of living and ultimately translates into fewer jobs.

Plenty of jobs does not necessarily translate into Americans being better off. In fact, I make the argument that higher standards of living are associated with market-oriented job destruction. Those oldsters among us will remember the disappearance of the ice man's job. The job of dentists who only fill cavities will be gone soon. The locomotive fireman would be out of a job if it weren't for colusive union make-work rules. That's what progress is all about: jobs coming and going with the discomfort of worker relocation in the process.

California farmers crave government subsidies, saying, "If it weren't for this or that subsidy (read: handout), we wouldn't be able to farm." That's right. California farmers use about 85 percent of the state's water, and it's subsidized so much, residential users pay up to 100 times more than farmers. Water is so cheap that some farmers use out-moded irrigation systems and waste so much that high humidity is not unknown in California desert areas. They even grow rice, a swamp crop, in geologically desert areas of California.

Here's the rub. Residential and business users consume no more than 10 percent to 15 percent of the state's water. But, during California's drought, the state legislature passed laws limiting car washing and lawn watering, preventing restaurants from serving a customer a glass of water unless he asked and mandating low-flow showers and toilets. That's equivalent to calling for deck rearrangement while the Titanic sinks.

Are we so desperate for farm products and places to grow them that we must make the desert bloom? If you say yes because it creates jobs, why not have government subsidies erect climate-controlled buildings in Alaska in order to grow bananas? Then Alaskan banana growers could boast, "Without the government program, we couldn't farm bananas!" The benefit of the market system is that precious resources wouldn't get put to these low-valued uses. Or to use Rep. Dick Armey's (R-Texas) Axiom No. 1: "The market is rational, and the government is dumb."

That explains why there is so much hostility in the free market in some quarters—inept practices would have short lives. In a free market, we wouldn't see hideous, seemingly permanent hindrances to American progress such as the U.S. Postal Service, cable television monopolies, rotten government schools and Social Security. The bottom line is if you really want to screw Americans, you need government suppression of market forces.

Today in history

By The Associated Press

Today is Sunday, August 1, the 213th day of 1993. There are 152 days left in the year.

Today's Highlight in History:

Fifty years ago, on Aug. 1, 1943, race-related rioting erupted in Harlem, New York City, causing several deaths.

On this date:

In 1291, the Swiss Confederation was formed.

In 1774, British scientist Joseph Priestley succeeded in isolating oxygen from air.

In 1790, the first U.S. census was completed, showing a population of nearly 4 million people.

In 1834, an emancipation bill outlawed slavery throughout the British empire.

In 1873, inventor Andrew S. Hallidie successfully tested a cable car he designed for San Francisco.

Entering the rocking-chair years

I've been doing a lot of sitting on my front porch lately. I do this late in the evenings after the intense summer heat has subsided.

I suppose there are two primary reasons. One is, television just gets more rotten by the day. I've got 50 channels. And I still have trouble finding anything worth watching. I'm even tired of the Spice Channel. The plots simply never change.

I also come from a long line of front-porch sitters, and, before air conditioning and television, that's the way a lot of people used to spend their evenings.

I did that with my own family when I was growing up. My grandfather and I used to count cars and listen for trains.

I have been sitting on my front porch with my dog Catfish, the black Lab, and counting BMW's. He growls when Volvos come by.

I live on a nice street and I have a nice front porch. I have a swing and two rocking chairs. I sit in one of the rocking chairs.

The swing is a little hard on what is left of my rear following the weight loss I incurred as a result of my heart surgery in March.

One thing I have noticed is that there are a lot of other people, at least in my neighborhood, who aren't sitting inside watching television in the evenings either. They aren't, however, sitting on their porches. They are out engaging in some sort of exercise.

There aren't just joggers anymore, either. In fact, there seems to be less joggers everyday.

(I was sitting in my doctor's office a few weeks ago when a nurse looked in and said to him, "Cable News Network is on the phone. They want to know your advice on running in the road race in this hot weather." My doctor looked up and said, "Don't." (A man had a heart attack and died in that particular race.)

A lot of bicycle riders come by my house while Catfish and I are on the porch. They wear helmets and tight pants and race past in large packs. The other evening, maybe 15 came by in a blur. Three minutes later a lone cyclist raced past. He appeared to be attempting to catch up with the others.

"He reminds me of horses I tend to bet on," I said to Catfish.

I get a lot of people out walking their dogs. A man comes by walking a dog that looks like a rat. He sort of looks like a rat, too. They say people often begin resembling their pets after a time.

Catfish and I have been together for over a decade, but my ears seem to be the same length as always.

I get roller skaters, too. They tend to be younger than the other exercisers. A roller skater came by my house recently, going downhill, at what must have been 35 miles an hour. If he had fallen, they would have had to scrape him up all the way to the airport.

There's another group that comes by my house that is exercising in a manner in which I am not familiar.

They aren't jogging but they aren't simply strolling either. They are walking very fast and slinging their arms back and forth, prissily.

"That's powerwalking," somebody told me. "It's not as hard on you knees as jogging."

It once was the custom to speak pleasantly to anybody who happened to come past while one was sitting on one's porch. I wondered how that would play in a large American city in the '90s.

So one night whenever the joggers, powerwalkers or dog walkers would come by (the roller skaters and cyclists were going too fast) I would call out, "Good evening."

Amazing. To a person, each called back, "Good evening."

I must have said "good evening" 20 times, and not once did anybody ignore my attempt to be pleasant.

That made me feel awfully good. Made me feel good about myself, my neighbors and my city.

We may even take up front-porch sitting full time, me and ol' Catfish. By the way, he said he thought the powerwalkers looked as if they were moving prissily, too.

We don't look alike, but I guess we're starting to think alike as we enter our rocking-chair years.

Get tougher on illegal immigration

SANTA ANA, Calif. — Apocrypha: When the pilgrims debarked from the Mayflower, they walked to Plymouth Rock, watched the next boatload of immigrants arrive, and said, "Uh oh, there goes the neighborhood." (Neither group had green cards.)

The neighborhoods around here, a continent and four centuries away, look pretty good—even as CBS comes to shoot their rising-tide-against-immigration pieces.

In Santa Ana there is a shopping street that could be a set for a Mexican movie, except that after school the local youth go there to see Clint Eastwood's In the Line of Fire and Jurassic Park, with non-bilingual dinosaurs.

Up the road is Garden Grove, once called "Garbage Grove," until revitalized into "Little Saigon." On side streets, suburban Vietnamese teenagers run wind sprints, getting ready for football tryouts.

Still, sentiment against immigration grows. As Professor Rita Simon's historical studies show, the public never shouted "Hooray! Let's have more immigrants! They enrich the American fabric!"

And yet, without immigration in this century, America would have lost Albert Einstein, Joe DeMaggio, I.M. Pei, Fernando Valenzuela, Michael Dukakis, Antonin Scalia, Bob Hope, Colin Powell, Ed Muskie, Lee Iacocca, Henry Cisneros, Michael Chang, Andre Agassi, Paul Orfilla (former CEO of Dow Chemical), Roberto Goizueta (CEO of Coca-Cola), Mario Cuomo, Oscar de la Renta and scientists from Taiwan trying to cure anemia and osteoporosis.

A Gallup/USA Today/CNN poll shows 65 percent of Americans favor decreased immigration, up from 49 percent in 1986. Alas, the poll, like much immigration dialogue, does not differentiate between legal and illegal.

Why now? Start with California. It is our biggest state, with the most immigration, hardest hit by recession, with crime, welfare and a riot—and plenty of media spreading the word.

Add Islamic terrorists and Chinese boatpeople. Fold in less global repression and more global recession, each pushing up emigration. It's a recipe for a turbulent melting pot.

What to do? The right thing is to get tougher on illegal and semi-legal immigration. The wrong thing is to get tougher on legal immigration. The danger: We may do both.

The Clinton administration will soon offer legislation tightening "asylum" regulations, stressing "summary exclusion" for immigrants who trump up claims of persecution.

A consensus is growing to bolster the border patrol with Mexico. Sen. Alan Simpson's plan for a national tamperproof identification card also looks better these days, as a forgery industry undermines the law that punishes employers for hiring illegals.

Sen. Pete Domenici suggests that Mexico should do more on its side of the border, as a pre-condition to NAFTA.

But we still engage in what Los Angeles Supervisor Mike Antonovich calls "de facto legalization." Court decisions and federal legislation have provided that illegal immigrants, or their children, may receive welfare, medical care, education and housing subsidies. That's illegal!

Antonovich, and others, are calling for better deportation procedures, more immigration judges, better border fences and some temporary federal reimbursement to local areas picking up the social costs of federal policy.

This makes sense, but not for the reasons generally offered. The evidence does not show that illegals "take jobs from Americans," or that they "depress wage standards," or even that most of them "live off welfare."

The big problem is that illegals are illegal. That drives the public crazy, and with some merit. Such a climate brings out the nativists who use it as a reason to cut back legal immigration as well as illegal immigration. "Take a time out," sing the nativist sirens, calling for "a moratorium" on all immigration.

Such policy would mean a radical break with non-apocryphal American history. It would shut down the avenue that brings us the best and brightest from around the world. It could go a long way toward shutting off the expansive American spirit. Demographically, we would become a no-growth superpower in a high-growth world.

The remedy is clear: Support legal immigration, get tougher on illegal immigration.

Business

Minding your own Business

By Don Taylor

A good secret source

Nearly every day I have a client who asks me a question I cannot answer. That can be a challenge when you are paid to answer questions and solve business problems. I have a secret source that I'm going to share with you who regularly read this column. The best place I know to get answers and information is at your local library.

Start at the reference desk. Your reference librarian will help you locate company information, demographics and vital statistics. For example, if you are looking for information on national companies, several directories and resource books are available. Some of the publications that will help you in your search include Standard and Poor's Register of Corporations, Dun and Bradstreet's Million Dollar Directory, The Thomas Registration of American Manufacturers, The National Business Telephone Directory and Ward's Business Directory. You can use these directories to locate potential suppliers or corporate customers for your business.

If you need financial averages and industry ratios, look at publications such as Robert Morris Associates' Annual Statement Studies, Industry Norms and Key Business Ratios and Value Line Investment Survey. These guides offer key financial information for comparative purposes. I would also suggest that you call for a copy of the annual report of any publicly owned business. The annual report contains detailed financial information on the firm and may offer other valuable information as well.

Hot Off The Press

The Business Periodicals Index lists recent business articles published by subject, company or individual, and gives the publication name, date and page numbers. The index is a great resource and is often available in computer, print and microfilm formats. Just look up the topic in question and find out what is being written on the subject.

Many sources also exist for finding statistics. The Statistical Abstract of the United States gives population, business, agricultural and manufacturing information that is current through the latest census. Other good resources include Facts on File, Information Please Almanac, Survey of Current Business and World Almanac and Book of Facts.

The Encyclopedia of Associations is a three-volume set that lists all associations in the United States. It is a valuable source for industry and trade information. Another source worth noting is a reference book titled Directories in Print. This book lists more than 10,000 business and industry directories that give detailed information on virtually any subject.

Start-up Help

If you are thinking of starting your own business, most libraries have several source books devoted to helping you get off to a fast start. Copies of The Small Business Sourcebook and Business Information Sources should be available at the reference desk. You may also find books on starting and operating a business in your state. There are hundreds of books detailing information on marketing, management, advertising, personal selling, accounting and record keeping, taxes, franchising and other subjects.

Most libraries subscribe to several business magazines and papers. They can be a valuable source for staying current with trends and shifts within specific business areas.

There are three recommendations I would make to ensure that your quest for information is successful. First, know exactly what you are looking for when you start. Make a detailed list of information required and the form in which you need it. Second, use common sense. Look for natural sources for the required information and realize that you cannot answer all questions. Finally, if you can't find exactly what you are looking for, ask a librarian.

I love libraries and I love librarians. The library is my secret source for answers and information. Now that you now about my source, why don't you make it your source too.

Pampa man cited by insurance group for service record

A Pampa man has been cited for producing $3 million of life insurance by a national insurance group.

As a Fraternal Insurance Counsellor, Meyer was required to complete training, pass three examinations and meet established criteria. He has been a representative in Pampa since August 1991.

Warden Darwin Sanders expressed his appreciation for the community's support of the Pampa Unit by presenting a painting to the Pampa Chamber of Commerce from the Rufe Jordan Unit.

The true 'good neighbor'

To the editor:

Did you ever read or hear something that was so ridiculous that it didn't deserve a response? Such is the case with Gayle Nichols' letter to the editor last week (July 25, 1993) in which she seemed to be upset because Carolyn Hood has not moved from her property because of the contamination.

To Ms. Nichols, and others who have a problem understanding Mrs. Hood's plight and that of many others out here, let me attempt to explain. Try to imagine leaving property you have paid for, worked on, raised your family on and made memories and friends on for many, many years. In my case it has been 25 years. Besides the tremendous financial and physical burdens, we are also having to deal with extreme emotional pain. Where will we go? Who will hire us at the age we are? Will our property be vandalized or deteriorate after we leave? Who would even consider buying our property? Would you? When we do relocate, how long will it be before the effects of years of exposure to emissions from the plant catch up with us? You see, Ms. Nichols, not all of us would be able to just pick up, move and start over, some because of physical reasons and some because of financial reasons. There are some in our community in their 70s, 80s and 90s.

No, this is not "a greedy attempt to make money" as stated by Plant Manager Jerry Moore last week to KFDD News. We are talking about our whole lives here. Mr. Moore also indicated that he was pleased that the Texas Air Control Board was placing an air monitor in the Pampa area so we could "separate fact from emotionalism." To Mr. Moore I say — The two cannot be separated. You bet we're emotional. We did not ask for this nightmare.

Yes, we are angry and we are afraid, and you should be, too, Ms. Nichols. The problem is right under your nose and you fail to see it. It's not just the Kingsmill well that is contaminated. I have my own well one mile north of Celanese and it, too, is contaminated. But at least I have made the attempt to educate myself as to what is going on around me and, believe me, it has been an eye opener. You should do the same.

Over the years since the litigation against Hoechst Celanese started, Carolyn Hood has taken a lot of heat because of her outspoken crusade against the contamination occurring in our soil, water and air. Let me tell you that she is not the only one in this area that feels that way. I feel like I can safely say that she has spoken for the majority of us. The fact is, we, as her friends and neighbors, have unfairly placed the burden on her to represent us in the countless letters she has written and the tremendous amount of work she has done to put a stop to the ongoing contamination of our environment. The term "good neighbor" has been, in my opinion, inappropriately applied to the wrong party in the past. The true "good neighbor" in all this has been Carolyn Hood.

On Oct. 4, 1993, we have a trial setting in Sweetwater, Texas in which once and for all the total truth will come out about the true villain in this awful situation. Let me extend to you, Ms. Nichols, my personal invitation to attend, to see and to hear for yourself the whole truth and nothing but the truth. I will even go further with my invitation and offer to take you with me in my vehicle.

Health is already affected

To the editor:

In response to the little lady from White Deer concerning the water and our priorities: I haul my drinking water. Am I supposed to move just because someone screwed up the water? Do you think just because my house and property are paid for I should move off and leave it? You and I don't see things the same.

I just thought you might want to come by my house and get you some drinking water. If not, then shut up! You are on your own when you drink it.

My wife has sores on her back, arms and legs and has had diarrhea for five years. She can't control her bowels and kidneys and has stomach cramps. I am under the care of the V.A. Hospital with numerous health problems. What good would it do to move now? Our health is already affected.

I draw $736 per month. I can't move. I can't pay rent. I don't have the money to pay rent or to pay doctor bills. Everything I own is here. To this I guess you will say, "tough luck, your problem, not mine."

Meteor shower delays shuttle launch

WASHINGTON (AP) — Even the heavens seem to be conspiring against the flight of space shuttle Discovery. The space mission, twice delayed because of mechanical problems, now is being postponed because of a meteor shower.

NASA announced Friday that the launch of Discovery's satellite delivery mission will be delayed until Aug. 12 so the shuttle won't be in orbit while the Earth is bombarded by the Perseid meteor shower expected to peak Aug. 11.

Officials said the mission delay was ordered because of the risk the shuttle could be hit and damaged by a falling bit of space rock.

Discovery was originally scheduled for launch July 17. That liftoff was scrubbed less than an hour before launch because of a failed electrical switch.

On July 24, the shuttle was within 19 seconds of liftoff when the countdown was again halted. That time the fault was in the steering system in Discovery's right solid rocket booster.

U.S.-brokered truce halts Israel's offensive

BEIRUT, Lebanon (AP) — A U.S.-brokered truce halted Israel's weeklong military blitz in southern Lebanon on Saturday, lessening for the time being the latest threat to Middle East peace talks.

About 500,000 Lebanese had been driven from their homes by the air and artillery assault, launched July 25 in retaliation for guerrilla attacks that killed seven Israeli troops in southern Lebanon.

The offensive was Israel's broadest and bloodiest in Lebanon since its 1982 invasion to rout Yasser Arafat's Palestine Liberation Organization.

At least 126 people were killed and 496 wounded. Beirut's mosques, schools, slums, and waterfront sidewalks are teeming with refugees. More than a tenth of Lebanon's population fled the fighting.

The cease-fire agreement was worked out by Secretary of State Warren Christopher with leaders of Israel, Lebanon and Syria, the de facto power in Lebanon. Christopher is scheduled to visit the Mideast this week to try to revive the stalled peace process, which had been jeopardized by the violence in south Lebanon.

Israel said the cease-fire went into effect after the Shiite Muslim Hezbollah militia agreed to stop firing rockets into northern Israel. U.N. monitors said the guns fell silent on schedule.

Oded Ben-Ami, defense affairs spokesman for Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin of Israel, said any breach of the truce would be met with a "strong reaction" from the army.

Ben-Ami indicated that Syria and Lebanon — as well as other powers in the region that support Iranian-backed Hezbollah — had promised to squelch the rocket attacks, which killed two Israelis and wounded 30. There was no immediate comment from Hezbollah officials in Lebanon.

Hezbollah opposes the 21-month-old Mideast peace process and has vowed to sabotage the talks by escalating hostilities in southern Lebanon, the only active Arab-Israeli war front.

Hezbollah and allied Palestinian guerrillas backed by Syria have been fighting for years to drive Israeli troops from a 440-square-mile sector they occupy in southern Lebanon to protect Israel's northern settlements from cross-border attacks.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Michael McCurry urged all parties to "work to assure calm prevails."

The cease-fire should permit the villagers of southern Lebanon to return to their homes. Before the truce was announced, the foreign ministers of 21 Arab countries pledged $500 million in aid for refugees.

In eastern Lebanon's Bekaa valley, about 100 carloads of refugees returned to the southern town of Mashgara and nearby villages.

In an apparent attempt to try to stop Hezbollah fighters from returning to the area, the Lebanese army set up checkpoints and searched incoming cars for weapons. There was no indication whether the army would expel guerrillas still inside the Bekaa.

Minutes after the truce was reported by radio stations, hundreds of jubilant residents surged into the streets of the coastal city of Tyre. Shops quickly reopened.

Residents of northern Israel reacted cautiously to the cease-fire announcement, especially because they were told to remain in their bomb shelters. More than 100,000 people have been living under ground since the Israeli operation began and guerrillas began firing more than 200 rockets in retaliation.

"I really hope its over, but we are still waiting for the police to tell us it is OK to come out," said Alica Assor of the northern town of Kiryat Shemona.

The Israeli army said beefed-up Israeli forces would remain deployed in southern Lebanon and there would be no change in Israel's occupation of its self-declared "security zone."

And Rabin said Israeli forces would remain on alert in northern Israel because there were no guarantees the Hezbollah militia was curbed.

Rabin urged Syria to use its army to help Lebanese forces disarm Hezbollah. "If that happens, there will be calm, and if there is calm, it will be possible to find a solution to the entire problem of south Lebanon," Rabin said at a news conference in Tel Aviv.

Broyles captures sixth Tri-State title

Jake Broyles scored his best back nine of the tournament Friday in capturing his sixth title in the Tri-State Senior Golf Tournament.

After a shaky first nine where he went four over par and lost two strokes off his lead, Broyles sank a monster putt from the furthest edge of the green on ten for par, and from there he sailed to go two-under on the second half of the par-71 Pampa Country Club course.

"I really struggled on the front nine, but I made the long putt for par on 10 and turned my game around," Broyles said. "It turned me loose where I could play."

The champion posted a two-over 73 for the day for a three round, personal Tri-State best total of 215. He kept the five stroke lead from Thursday's second round and faced no serious challenges after getting past the front nine.

Behind Broyles in second was Bob Sanders of Amarillo with a 220 followed by Andy Manning of Richardson with a 224 and Dill DeLoach of Carrollton with a 227.

Despite Broyles' troubles on the front side, the other leaders failed to make-up any ground as all four players had difficulty executing on the greens, especially on the front nine.

"The greens were a little severe in some places," DeLoach said.

Sanders had to settle for bogie on seven after just missing the cup. Broyles looked on as a straight shot rolled out of the cup on nine. The extremely fast and sloping green on 15 wrecked havoc with Sanders and DeLoach.

Manning had problems with 10 and said his putting cost him a tie for second.

"If I would have just made those four short puts on 10, 11, 12 and 18, I could have tied for second," Manning said. "But, I still couldn't have caught Jake."

That in spite of his having the second best round of the tournament with a 71 Thursday.

"I just had trouble reading the greens," Sanders said.

Broyles shot the best and only under par round among Championship flight players in the tournament on Thursday when he scored a one-under 70.

Sanders consistently drove well from the tee box, sending the ball an average of 20 yards past the other tee shots, but inefficient putting Friday and a first round score of 75 held him in second.

DeLoach's game fell off considerably Friday as he experienced severe back pains from the start of the third round.

"My back wouldn't hold up. The last 14 holes were just misery, but I finished," he said.

Broyles won his first championship in 1983. His other four, including three consecutive titles came in 1986, 1989, 1990 and 1991.

"This one may be a little sweeter. I'm older and not expected to win it, especially playing against these younger guys," he said.

Two Pampa residents competed in the Championship flight. Don Babcock finished with 238 and Whitey White came in with 245.

Play wrapped up in the other flights Friday. Dean Foshee of Texline came from behind over three other players to win the President's flight with a 233. After tying for second with two other golfers after the second round, he came back with his best round of the tournament Friday with a two-over 74.

Pampa All Stars take field in regional Bambino tourney

ROGERS, Ark. - The Pampa All Stars take to the field today here in their first game in the Southwest Regional Bambino Baseball Tournament.

At stake is a trip to the Bambino World Series, which will be held in Lebanon, Mo.

More than 600 people crowded into the Elmwood Junior High Cafeteria for a banquet and to hear from former Dallas Cowboy Cliff Harris kick-off the 1993 Southwest Regional Bambino Baseball Tournament on Friday.

As a former free safety for 10 years with the Cowboys, Harris played in a record five Super Bowls, went to the Pro Bowl six times and was All-Pro four years. He was a member of the Cowboys Silver Season All-Time team.

Harris told of playing football with Roger Staubach, Lee Roy Jordan and Charlie Waters and praised the Bambino Baseball program for teaching team work and concluded by quoting Winston Churchill, "Never, never, never quit."

The Pampa 11- to 12-year-old All Stars drew a bye in Saturday's opening day action. They will play the winner of the Idabel, Okla., and tournament host Rogers, Ark., game at 1 p.m. today.

Representing Pampa are Jeremy Miller, Chad Clardy, Courtney Lowrance, Cody Shepard, Eric Greer, Billy Rushing, Heath Cowan, Brandon Hill, Jesse Francis, Amos Valmores, Kyle Gambelin, Jonathan Waggoner, Tommy Lozano, Kory Nickell and Caleb Snelgroves. Aaron Haynes is serving as bat boy.

Ronnie Haynes is the manager of the Pampa team again this year and is assisted by Tim Hill and Johnny Miller.

Defending Regional Champion New Orleans Lake Shore has been dubbed the favorite to advance to the Bambino World Series. The Louisiana team came through the losers' bracket in Pampa last year to defeat Rogers for the regional title. Lake Shore returns with good pitching and 12 of their 15 team members batting over .300.

Lake Shore faces Fort Smith Boy's Club in the first round. Fort Smith defeated Pampa 7-6 in the first round when they hosted the regional tournament three years ago. They have defeated their opponents 89-20 and had five different players hit home runs to win the Western Arkansas State Tournament.

A newcomer to the regional tournament is Comfort, Texas, who beat several San Antonio teams en route to the South Texas State Championship. Comfort takes on the Little Rock Junior Deputies, who have won the South Arkansas State Tournament two consecutive years.

Perennial power Abbeville, La. goes up against Fort Worth, the East Texas State Champions. Only in the program's second year, Fort Worth is a new face in regional play.

Idabel has won the Oklahoma State Tournament two straight years and was a winner over Pampa in the first round of the Regional Tournament last year.

Tom Woodruff, the manager of the Rogers West All Stars, who served as master of ceremonies for the banquet, praised Idabel.

"Oklahoma scores a bunch of runs," he said. "They are aggressive base runners, they bunt, fake bunt and they steal bases. They are a finesse-type team. We have to be alert."

Rogers is making its fourth consecutive appearance in a regional tournament.

The tournament is scheduled to conclude Wednesday or Thursday.

Andretti takes pole position for Marlboro 500

53-year-old breaks 230 mph

By MIKE HARRIS
AP Motorsports Writer

BROOKLYN, Mich. (AP) — Mario Andretti stole the show Saturday in time trials for Sunday's Marlboro 500, turning the fastest qualifying lap in motorsports history.

The 53-year-old Andretti took the pole position for the 500-mile race with a blazing lap of 234.275 mph on a virtually perfect day at Michigan International Speedway.

Andretti's effort knocked Newman-Haas Racing teammate Nigel Mansell's 233.462 out of the top spot and was considerably quicker than the 232.618 lap by Roberto Guerrero in 1992 at Indianapolis that had stood as the fastest official qualifying lap until Saturday.

The record-smashing lap on the bumpy 2-mile, high-banked oval was not quite as quick as the hand-timed unofficial Indy-car closed-course record of 234.5 set by Jeff Andretti, the younger of Mario's two racing sons, during a test session on Feb. 23 at Texas World Speedway.

"I was a little worried about how things were dragging today," Andretti said. "Things weren't going off on time and I was afraid the track conditions would deteriorate if we waited too much longer. But it seemed like everyone was running a little faster than this morning (in practice), so I just held my breath and went for it."

"The track was great," he added. "The only thing that would have made it better is if it had been overcast."

Mansell already had qualified on the warm, calm and sunny afternoon, breaking Andretti's track qualifying mark of 230.150, set last year. So Andretti, who upped his Indy-car record to 66 career poles, knew he had his work cut out for him.

The first of Andretti's two warmup laps in his Ford-Cosworth-powered Lola was 229.432. He followed that with another warmup of 232.551, took the green flag and ran 233.875 and then topped that on his last hot lap.

"I attacked the track from the word go," the four-time series champion said. "We needed to build momentum and reach the speed. I was on the redline (on the tachometer) all the way. I didn't think I could reach that 233-234 because we hadn't done it in practice. But it all came together in qualifying."

Mansell, the 1992 Formula One champion and a sensational Indy-car rookie, had complained bitterly after practice Friday about the bumps scattered around the rough Michigan oval that get the 1,550-pound cars airborne.

Saturday, however, Mansell said, "My biggest problem here is that I'm not used to the place. I didn't know what to expect and I've had a big shock out on the circuit. It's the fastest track in the world I've driven on."

Arie Luyendyk, the Indianapolis 500 pole-winner in May, was a solid third at 229.885, followed by Raul Boesel at 229.562 and Paul Tracy, the winner of the last two Indy-car races, at 227.468 and defending race winner Scott Goodyear at 227.408.

Andretti, who became the seventh different pole winner in 10 events this season, said he expects the pace at least early in Sunday's race to slow down, but not a whole lot.

"On a track like this, even a slight condition change can make a big difference," he said. "But, with more good weather, conceivably, you'll see laps over 220 consistently in the race."

Mansell, who never had even seen the Michigan track until Friday, said, "It should be very competitive. After all, there are 13 drivers within 1 1/2 seconds at the front of the grid."

Twenty-four drivers qualified for the race, but the car put into the lineup by rookie Adrian Fernandez was later withdrawn by team owner Rick Galles, who said it was never intended for the inexperienced Fernandez to drive in this event.

He was pressed into service after Danny Sullivan, a former Indy-car series champion and Indianapolis 500 winner, became ill. It was first believed that Sullivan had the flu, but he was later diagnosed with a possible bacterial infection. He flew to his home in Aspen, Colo., on Saturday.

Fernandez, who has driven an Indy-car on only one other oval — the Milwaukee Mile — had qualified 20th at 214.354.

Palmeiro gets three homers to cap best-hitting month

OAKLAND, Calif. (AP) — Rafael Palmeiro got hot when July began and he never cooled off.

Palmeiro capped the best-hitting month in Rangers' history by driving in three runs with a homer and two doubles as Texas defeated the Oakland Athletics 8-2 Saturday.

"I've had a good month. This is the best month I've ever had," Palmeiro said. "But it's over and now I have to start a new month."

Palmeiro's home run was his 11th of the month and the three RBIs gave him 35 for July. His .426 (46-for-108) average was a club record for any month and he set a club record for most RBIs in July. Larry Parrish drove in 35 runs in May 1987.

"He's stepped forward in July, that's for sure," Texas manager Kevin Kennedy said.

Palmeiro's production has helped keep Texas in contention on through a rash of injuries. Jose Canseco is out for the season and catcher Ivan Rodriguez has a fractured cheekbone, though he could be back by the middle of the week. David Hulse went on the disabled list Tuesday with a sore left hamstring.

"I come to play," Palmeiro said. "Our team is in bad shape. We've got a lot of guys hurt. They're depending on me to be in there."

Kevin Brown (8-7), who threw a shutout in his last start against Oakland on June 27, allowed two runs, struck out one and walked four in eight innings. Tom Henke pitched the ninth inning.

Bobby Witt (8-9), traded from the Rangers last August as part of the Canseco trade, gave up six runs on seven hits in 2 1-3 innings. He walked two and struck out two.

He was battered for six runs in one-third of an inning Tuesday against California, the shortest starting out of his career.

Palmeiro's 24th homer in the first drove in Butch Davis, who had doubled.

"Both pitches were sliders," Witt said. "They were right there. I overthrew the ball to Palmeiro. I wanted to last more than a couple of innings. I wanted to keep us close and I didn't."

Davis and Palmeiro teamed up again to start the Rangers' four-run third. Right fielder Ruben Sierra dropped Davis' fly ball for a two-base error, and Palmeiro followed with a double.

Consecutive singles by Julio Franco and Geno Petralli produced the inning's second run, and after Dean Palmer struck out, Dan Peltier hit a two-run double to chase Witt.

Texas added two runs in the ninth on RBI singles by Franco and Doug Strange.

The A's made it 6-1 in the fifth when a backpedaling Palmer dropped Sierra's popout behind third base to score Rickey Henderson. Henderson also scored Oakland's second run, when he walked with one out in the seventh. Brent Gates singled and then executed a double steal with Henderson, who came home on Sierra's groundout.

The Rangers finished July at 17-11 to match the club's highest win total for the month (17-9 in 1990).

Hall of Fame ceremonies turn emotional for inductees

By RUSTY MILLER
AP Sports Writer

CANTON, Ohio (AP) — The five inductees into the Pro Football Hall of Fame Saturday had a bet riding on who would get the most emotional during their acceptance speeches.

Walter Payton, presented by his 12-year-old son Jarrett, won easily. Payton's voice broke in the opening seconds of his acceptance speech, shortly after greeting his son with a long hug.

"After getting up here and hearing my son talk, I don't care if I lose the bet," said the record-setting Chicago Bears running back.

Payton faltered at times, as did San Francisco 49ers coach Bill Walsh, San Diego Chargers quarterback Dan Fouts, Pittsburgh Steelers coach Chuck Noll and Miami Dolphins guard Larry Little during an emotional series of acceptance speeches.

Payton's son, the first son to ever present a father, said, "Not only is he a great athlete, he's a role model — he's my role model."

His father rushed for 16,726 yards — more than any other pro back — during a 13-year career with the Bears. The elder Payton said his family played an integral, if unknowing, part of his development.

"I was the baby in the family and on Saturday mornings when Mom went to work, it was the job of my brother Eddie and sister Pamela to clean the house," Payton said. "I was the baby. I didn't have to do that. But, hey, those guys beat me up. That how I got the moves I had. When you have an angry sister and brother with a broom and a wet dishcloth, you move."

Payton also was close to tears when apologizing to his family for being hard to live with during his career, vowing he would take care of them for the rest of his life.

Walsh, who coached the 49ers to three Super Bowl titles, had said he feared freezing up and not being able to talk in front of the thousands surrounding the front steps of the hall, where the induction took place.

But he ended up challenging a partisan crowd of Steelers fans.

"I've heard about great teams today," Walsh said. "But we'll play you, I guarantee you."

Eddie DeBartolo Jr., owner of the 49ers, introduced Walsh as a "master magician" and "the 49er for all seasons."

Walsh took over an awful franchise in 1979, inheriting a team that had gone 2-14 a year before. In three years, the 49ers beat the Cincinnati Bengals 26-21 to win the Super Bowl. They followed that up with Super Bowl victories in 1985 and 1989.

Fouts is one of only three NFL quarterbacks to throw for more than 40,000 yards. He had Walsh as an assistant coach over him for a short time and also studied as a rookie under Hall of Famer quarterback Johnny Unitas.

But he said he didn't belong in the same company with Unitas.

"I know Johnny Unitas and I'm no Johnny Unitas," Fouts joked.

Fouts blossomed as a pro under head coach Don Coryell, who presented him.

Noll downplayed his role in assembling the four-time Super Bowl champion Steelers. He said the team's successes were a result of the Steelers' love and respect for each other.

"The single most important thing we had with the Steelers was the ability to work together," he said. "We had a lot of people who didn't worry what somebody else did. ... Whatever they had to do to win, they did it."

Noll went 1-13 in his first year as a head coach, but then — through careful talent evaluation and a deft hand with the draft — he built the team into a Super Bowl winner in 1975, '76, '79 and '80.

He was presented by Dan Rooney, president of the Steelers and the man who took a chance on the Baltimore Colts' assistant coach in 1969.

"No one was more misnamed than Larry Little," Miami coach Don Shula said. "He was a giant."

A building block up front for the Dolphins' bruising running game of the 1970's, Little was an undrafted free agent who originally signed with the Chargers for $750 in 1967. Traded two years later, he flourished in his hometown of Miami — adept as both a pass- and run-blocker.

"I didn't care how much money I made," he said. "Just being in the league was enough. All I wanted was an opportunity."

The induction increased to 169 the number of Hall of Fame members.

(AP Photo) Packers' offensive lineman Joe Sims (68) bumps Raiders' defensive end Anthony Smith (94) out of bounds at the two yard line after Smith intercepted a pass in the second quarter of the Hall of Fame game Saturday. The Raiders went on to win 19-3.

Cowboys open pre-season against Vikings

By DENNE H. FREEMAN
AP Sports Writer

IRVING, Texas (AP) — Jim McMahon makes an appearance with his fourth NFL team Sunday night when the Minnesota Vikings play the tired and beaten up world champion Dallas Cowboys in a pre-season game at Texas Stadium.

McMahon came to the Vikings as a free agent after playing for the Philadelphia Eagles. He will share quarterback time with Rich Gannon and Sean Salisbury, who will start Sunday's game and play about two series.

McMahon, who previously played for San Diego and Chicago, will start the game with the Buffalo Bills next week in Berlin.

Seventh-round draft pick quarterback Gino Torretta, the Heisman Trophy winner from Miami, also is on the Vikings roster.

Hugh Millen, picked up as a free agent in the offseason, will start at quarterback for the Cowboys while Troy Aikman rests from surgery for a herniated back disc.

Dallas coach Jimmy Johnson said the Cowboys will field a hodgepodge team, "depending on who's healthy."

"This will be one game where we won't have much of a unit. We might have the third team mixed up with the first team," he said.

Johnson said the Cowboys aren't even using a game plan.

"We won't run much special," Johnson said. "The Vikings can scout us real good. All they have to do is get a tape of our three days' workouts with the Los Angeles Raiders."

The tired Cowboys worked against the Raiders for three days this past week then scrimmaged the Houston Oilers Thursday night.

"We've got over a dozen players with nicks and scrapes," Johnson said. "We won't be real rested or real healthy for the game."

The Cowboys lost backup tight end Alfredo Roberts with a broken foot and third-stringer Fallon Wacasey with a separated shoulder.

The Vikings, won the NFC Central last year but lost 24-7 to Washington in the first round of the playoffs, will be without running back Terry Allen. He's recovering from a knee injury.

Minnesota instead will get to showcase Robert Smith, the 21st player and third running back chosen in the draft. Smith left Ohio State with two years eligibility left.

Dallas also is using a makeshift backfield. Michael Beasley, if his groin injury heals, will start at running back in place of Emmitt Smith who is a contract holdout. Derrick Lassic of Alabama, a fourth round draft pick, will start if Beasley can't play.

But to Johnson, the final score of the Viking game doesn't really matter. He quit stressing the importance of exhibition games after the Cowboys followed a 3-1 preseason in 1989 with a 1-15 season.

Dallas went to 2-3 in the preseason last year, then posted a 13-3 regular season that led to their third Super Bowl title.

Kickoff is set for 7 p.m. and the temperature was expected to be close to 100 degrees.

Minnesota hasn't played Dallas in the preseason since 1975 when the Vikings beat the Cowboys 16-13.

The Cowboys rated field goal favorites. The Vikings lead the preseason series 3-2.

Braves beat Astros, win eighth of ten on road

McGriff gives team HR boost

HOUSTON (AP) — Atlanta Braves manager Bobby Cox is at a loss to explain why his team rarely loses at the Astrodome.

"It's a hard thing to explain," Cox said after the Braves beat the Astros for the 18th time in 20 games at the Dome. "We just seem to play good here."

"A lot of clubs never win here. They always seem to be tight games and we seem to get our share of breaks here."

Atlanta's Greg Maddux out-pitched Darryl Kile, extending his mastery over Houston as the Braves continued their torrid road trip with a 4-3 victory.

The Braves have won eight of 10 games on the trip and 10 of 12 since Fred McGriff — who homered along with Ron Gant — joined them after a trade from San Diego. McGriff, who also doubled in a 2-for-4 performance, is batting .422 (19-for-45) with seven homers and 12 RBIs as a Brave.

Maddux (12-8) allowed eight hits in eight innings, struck out four and walked one while raising his career record to 12-4 against Houston.

"It's a good place to pitch," Maddux said. "It's a good pitcher's park. It's consistent here. The wind is never blowing and it's never too hot or too cold. You know your ball is going to do the same thing here."

Mike Stanton pitched the ninth for his 27th save, allowing a two-out, pinch-hit homer by Chris James.

Kile (11-3) sustained his second straight defeat since the end of a nine-game winning streak. He gave up three runs — two earned — on five hits while striking out five and walking two in seven innings.

With the score tied 1-1, McGriff started the seventh with his 25th home run. Dave Justice walked, took second on an infield single by Damon Berryhill and went to third on the play when shortstop Andujar Cedeno committed a throwing error. Mark Lemke singled in Justice.

Houston made it 3-2 in the bottom of the inning when Eddie Taubensee doubled and scored on a single by Cedeno. Steve Finley ended the inning by flying out with the bases loaded.

The Braves took a 1-0 lead in the fourth on Gant's 25th home run — the first hit off Kile.

Cox was happy to see Gant homer off Kile.

"He's nasty, really nasty," Cox said of the Houston right-hander. "Gant's home run gave us the lead and really gave us a lift ..."

Kyle helped himself by singling to start the seventh and taking second on Craig Biggio's sacrifice bunt. Kile went to third on a grounder by Finley and scored on Jeff Bagwell's single.

Atlanta increased its lead to 4-2 in the eighth when Jeff Blauser led off with a single and moved to third on a double by McGriff. Terry Pendleton singled in Blauser.

Houston manager Art Howe wasn't happy with a lack of clutch hitting — the Astros stranded four runners at third base — but though Kyle pitched well.

"He did an excellent job," Howe said. "The two pitches they hit out weren't that bad, they're just good hitters but once again we've struggling to score runs though."

"Maddux did a heck of a job pitching out of jams, that's where they're maturity helps them out a lot."

Notes: The Braves have scored 89 runs in Maddux's first 24 starts. Only nine of those runs have come in his eight losses. ... Atlanta has 149 hits, 92 runs and 24 homers since acquiring McGriff. ... Houston is 36-24 against the National League East and 18-26 against the West. ... Greg Swindell will attempt to snap a five-game losing streak when he makes his first start since July 5th, against the Braves on Sunday.

Swindell was placed on the disabled list with a strained left shoulder on July 6th and reinstated on July 25th. The Astros are 10-6 on Sundays but 3-7 when playing on Mondays.

Step Ahead Summer Day Camp

It started with a glimmer in the eyes of two Pampa women — Alice Grays and Phyllis Briggs. Now it has blossomed into a reality.

In 1992, Grays and Briggs, who say they've known each other four years, had an idea. It was to start a volunteer-run day camp for children and hold it in Prairie Village Park. They called it Step Ahead Summer Day Camp and their goal was to help children learn to get along with one another better.

Children learned arts and crafts, heard stories, swam, sang and picnicked.

During the fall and winter of 1992 and 1993, the vision grew. The women procured a 30-by-16 foot wooden building which sits in the 500 block of West Crawford, just across the street from Marcus Sanders pool. It was partially paid for by a fundraising banquet and donations. The lot, they explain, was bought at a Sheriff's sale. The modest building is not quite finished but upon completion it will have a kitchen, restroom and activity area.

Grays and Briggs have big plans for the activity building — budget training for low income people, sewing lessons and a library to hold their many donated books. On the building site, they hope someday to have a garden.

Children have learned about horticulture, arts and crafts, and enjoyed a picnic lunch with Pampa police officers. Some campers come only in the afternoon, some skip a week to go to Bible school or take a vacation. Briggs emphasized that everything about Step Ahead is voluntary — including what time of day the children come. Volunteers help as they can. Teen helpers may miss the morning session so they can go to driver's education or take a week off to go their grandmother's house.

To Grays and Briggs, children are a "step ahead," when their hands and minds are busy.

Reliving youth may be risky business without spouse

DEAR ABBY: I know this subject has been discussed before, but it's that time of year again — high school reunions!

My husband recently received an invitation to his 35th class reunion. There will be a banquet for graduates and their spouses on Saturday night, but on Saturday afternoon there will be a pool party for graduates only at the home of a graduate. I think this is tacky.

I can think of only a couple of things old schoolmates would want to talk about without their spouses around, and I doubt that a pool party with drinking going on is a good situation to put these middle-aged schoolmates in. I don't care how innocent it may start out, when they start drinking, the old feelings associated with their carefree school days will cause people to say and do things they normally wouldn't — I think you get the picture.

I would like to know what other wives and husbands of graduates think about this. Sign me ...

MAD IN DECATUR, GA.

DEAR MAD: So would I. Readers?

DEAR ABBY: If my husband ever stopped looking at other women, I'd consider him either blind, sick or dead. We've been married for nearly 50 years, and I've yet to be embarrassed because he looked at another woman. It's OK with me, as long as he isn't touching or sampling. It's just the nature of the beast, and as harmless as looking at lingerie ads in a catalog.

Nearly 50 years of marriage has taught me a lot about men, especially mine. He may have more faults than an earthquake zone, but as long as he keeps me happy, he can flirt all he wants to. But if he ever starts chasing and sampling other merchandise, I'll be long gone.

Dear Abby

WINNIE IN WICHITA

DEAR WINNIE: The "Lady-like Lady" letter inspired varying responses. My favorite:

DEAR ABBY: Before my marriage, my wise Italian mother said, "If you want a happy marriage, always keep one eye closed."

WINKING IN ALBANY

DEAR ABBY: We have the following posted for houseguests. It's all in fun, but your readers might enjoy it.

MR. AND MRS. MAX SKIDMORE, EATON PARK, FLA.

CAUTION TO HOUSEGUESTS

1. Open all closet doors and drawers with caution.
2. Do not move any heavy furniture — there may be dirt.
3. Don't draw your finger across any picture frame. (We rarely dust.)
4. Do not open the box under the kitchen table. (That's where we keep Grandma's ashes.)
5. Don't be afraid to use a clean towel and washcloth. We have plenty (as you can see, we have traveled a lot).

6. If you take a book from the shelf, beware of moths and bookworms.

7. Don't bother looking under any bed — there's not room enough for a man.

8. Please sit down very carefully — the cat might be there.

9. If you should find a long hair, give it back to me; I need them all.

10. Feel free to help yourselves to anything you find in the fridge. It's always too full anyway.

11. Do not remove the toilet paper from the bathroom sink — it takes care of the leaky faucet.

12. Don't ask why the dragonflies fly only in the side yard. Nobody knows.

NITA SKIDMORE (daughter-in-law)

DEAR ABBY: The letter from "Outraged Mother," whose child came home from school with wet pants because his teacher wouldn't let him go to the restroom, brought back some memories my husband had 65 years ago.

He said when he was in first grade, he held up his hand, made faces and squirmed in his seat, but his teacher ignored him. He had a bad stomachache and couldn't hold it any longer, so he let go right in his seat. He made a terrible mess, so the teacher drove him home in her new car; in those days cars had running boards, so she made him stand on the running board.

When he got home, his mother soaked him in a tub of water for an hour. My husband said he has held a grudge against that teacher all his life.

HIS WIFE IN RAYMOND, WASH.

DEAR ABBY: Norman E. Savage of Hickory Ridge, Ark., asked why women stand and men are seated in portrait photographs. You said you didn't know, but pointed out that the wedding photographs taken during your great-grandparents' era showed the men seated and the women standing.

I speak only from my experience as a photographer. Most photographers like to have their husband-wife subjects as close together as possible. It makes for a more pleasing photograph — also a better enlargement. And since most men are taller than their wives, the photographer gets a better picture when the man is seated.

No mystery, no tradition. Pure practicality.

JIM CAIELLA, ASSOCIATE DIRECTOR OF PHOTOGRAPHY, TIMES-DISPATCH, RICHMOND, VA.

4-H'ers advance to state in recordbook competition

RECORDBOOK RESULTS

Thirty-six Gray County 4-H'ers turned in recordbooks for County judging and deserve a big pat on the back for their time and efforts. Recordbooks show a 4-H'ers involvement in projects through 4-H and the extent of the leadership and citizenship they provided not only this year but throughout their 4-H career.

A 4-H'er must place first in their project area to advance to district competition and then must place first in the 20 county district in order to advance to state. Senior 4-H'ers, ages 14-19, are the only ones eligible to advance to state. Thirty 4-H'ers from Gray County participated at district. Nine Gray County senior 4-H'ers advanced to state competition.

Gray County 4-H'ers who turned in recordbooks are: Juniors — Britteny Street, Mary Grace Fields, Thomas Davenport, Terra Hembree, Andrea Shank, Sean O'Neal, Nikki Hefley, Jessica Fish, Lori Stephens, Cody Reeves, and Heath Story; Intermediates — Colby Street, Sarah Fields, Nonnie James, Barry Brauchi, Tori Street, Adam Stephens, Angie Davenport, Jennifer Bliss, Jared Story, Lori Hefley, and Tracy Tucker; Seniors — Shelly Davenport, Mark Tucker, Jason Bliss, Shawn Dawes, and Nathan Dawes.

Time for tree maintenance

With August upon us and fall right around the corner it's time to start thinking about prevention and maintenance for your trees and lawns. Let's start with our trees, one of the major reasons we see freeze injury in this part of the country is because our trees don't have a chance to prepare for extreme cold. In other words, our temperatures go from extreme heat during the day to extreme cold at night. So, what can you do as a home owner to control temperatures in the Texas Panhandle? Probably nothing, it's hard enough to just predict what the weather is going to do and surely no way to influence it.

The one thing that we can do is control the vegetative growth of the tree by not watering and fertilizing late in the year. Our conditions are usually ideal for growth in the fall and by fertilizing the tree, we are telling it to grow instead of preparing it for what is to come. As a rule of thumb, August is the latest you would want to fertilize any trees or shrubs.

Another way of helping to prevent freeze injury to trees is by painting trunks a reflective color or wrapping the trunk. This reflects the hot sun during the day and keeps the trunk from warming up. This is usually why we see splitting of branches and trunks of trees after freeze injury because the trunk is not prepared or hardened for cold weather.

Lawns, particularly warm season grasses such as bermuda and buffalo, should be handled in a similar manner. Late season fertilization promotes growth of vegetation and increases chances of freeze injury.

The same rule of thumb applies to grasses.

SLIME MOLD

We've had several calls lately about a gray substance growing on the leaf blades of area grasses. This is called "Slime Mold" and usually is bluish gray or black in color. It is a fungi that feeds on decaying organic matter in the soil. When the powdery substance is heavy, it may damage the grass by shading the blades from sunlight. Slime molds occur on dichondra, turfgasses and weeds.

In most cases, control is not necessary. Although slime molds are unsightly, they do not permanently damage the lawn. Remove the mold from the grass by hosing with a strong stream of water, or sweeping with a broom.

Can't seem to lose weight no matter how hard you try? The concept of "Thermogenics" is the most exciting news to come out of weight management research in 50 years.

Thermogenics, like digestion, is a normal physiological process that burns calories. It serves two functions:

1. It prevents dietary fats from being stored as white fat, and
2. It converts white fat back into soluble lipids that may be burned off.

IT PREVENTS FAT AND REDUCES FAT IN HUMANS. IT INCREASES ENERGY AND SUPPRESSES YOUR APPETITE. 100% SATISFACTION GUARANTEED OR RETURN FOR A FULL REFUND.

Director Kaufman's portrayals potentially racist in 'Rising Sun'

By DOLORES BARCLAY
AP Arts Editor

Philip Kaufman can not be pigeonholed as a director because his work is so diverse, his style varied. From the poetic wrath of "The White Dawn" to the cinematic sweep of "The Right Stuff" to the playful sensuality of "The Unbearable Lightness of Being" and the dark sexuality of "Henry and June," Kaufman has distinguished himself as a filmmaker.

Now comes his interpretation of Michael Crichton's vitriolic best seller, "Rising Sun." He has toned down Crichton's cautionary tale of the impending threat of Japanese business on American industry, removed much of the novel's ethnic sting and expansive diatribe and produced a slick police drama, filled with surprises, thundering action and strong performances.

With Sean Connery and Wesley Snipes in the lead, the movie tracks the investigation of a slain prostitute, murdered in the U.S. headquarters of a Japanese conglomerate in Los Angeles. All is not what it seems. There are false leads, abandoned leads, surprises and electronic detective work.

Connery, who also was executive producer, portrays John Connor, a special LAPD liaison officer who is something of an authority on Japanese culture. Despised by fellow officers because of his close links (some fear conflict of interest) with Japanese business, Connor has been out of the loop for a while. He mysteriously is called in to assist Web Smith (Snipes), an up and coming liaison detective.

They form something of a special bond, that of mentor and protégé. There is much Smith is to learn from Connor. But the younger man can teach the old pro a thing or two as well.

Connery and Snipes are a perfect team, a good balance of worldly sophistication and classy urban smarts. The casting was inspired and part of what filmmaking should be all about: The character of Smith can be played by any actor, black or white.

Kaufman, however, undermines this creative casting by tossing in a gratuitously racist scene to remind us that Snipes is black and must be made to fit the stereotypical perception by white Hollywood that all American blacks live in filthy ghettos, are illiterate, listen to loud rap music and hang out on street corners waiting to menace good decent white people.

The scene in question (not in the book) supposedly serves as an action segment to help Connor and Smith escape the bad guys in a car chase. The duo land somewhere in the inner city, and Snipes suddenly loses his perfect diction so he can converse with street thugs and enlist their aid in thwarting the bad guys.

The scene does not help move along the action, but greatly harms the film's credibility by adding a typically unrealistic Hollywood clown antic. The larger question is, does the film industry realize how institutionally racist this sort of practice is?

Connery, as usual, is a delight. It's almost as if he's gone full circle, back to the Connery we first met in "Dr. No" and "From Russia With Love." He's an aging James Bond, still virile but more cerebral than physical. Snipes is fast emerging as one of the screen's most popular leading men in action movies. He finds the right balance of reserve and anger, violence and restraint.

And his flirting, though not Connery's sophisticated moves, is endearing.

Harvey Keitel gives good support as a racist cop who peppers his language with derogatory terms when referring to Japanese. There's also excellent work by Cary-Hiroyuki Tagawa, Mako and Tia Carrere.

Although "Rising Sun" lacks some of the more breathtaking cinematography of Kaufman's prior works, there's good photography by Michael Chapman. Toru Takemitsu's riveting score deserves a mention.

"Rising Sun" was produced by Peter Kaufman and is a Twentieth Century Fox release. The movie is rated R.

Beach Boys release inevitable CD set

(AP)—It seemed like everybody has had a boxed set of their compiled music out for years. It's about time the Beach Boys, who have outlasted just about all of their contemporaries, finally got around to releasing a retrospective of their greatest hits.

The Beach Boys have millions of fans, and they have sold millions of recordings. And while they have made dozens of hit songs that everybody recognizes, many of their albums were lacking. Except for the fabulous "Pet Sounds," most Beach Boys albums had a few great recordings, mixed in with forgettable also-rans that only die-hard fans would want to hear. They had no complete greatest hits, that is, until the recently released boxed set, "Good Vibrations." The collection contains everything from their first release, "Surfin'" in 1961, to their biggest hit "Kokomo" in 1988 and some later recordings.

It also contains an entire CD with alternate, demo and live versions as well as in-progress tracks, many of them requests by aficionados for previously unreleased material. Because few fans ever enter a recording studio, it gives a feeling of being there in the creative process listening to how songs such as "God Only Knows," the personal favorite of most band members, were put together. Those with multi-track CD changers can play other versions and the completed, polished product in sequence.

One of the more interesting groupings is various versions of "Heroes and Villains" all put together. There is a fresh, live "Good Vibrations," a home rehearsal of "Surfin' U.S.A.," and unreleased cuts — some of them hauntingly beautiful — from the groundbreaking 1966 "Smile" sessions which were never released.

This is a definitive five-hour, five-CD collection of 141 Beach Boys songs, all of them with the trademark harmony, that will satisfy occasional fans and fanatics.

The liner notes are useful, explaining when the songs were released, where they peaked and how long they remained on the charts.

Criminologists find worsening epidemic of teen homicides, violence

By FRED BAYLES
AP National Writer

Our count begins on a Sunday. It is an arbitrary starting point along an endless chain of young deaths.

Robert Lozano, 17, is shot in the chest at a neighborhood barbecue in Grand Prairie, Texas. The killing leaves his pregnant wife a widow at 16. His accused assailant: a 16-year-old boy angry at Lozano for sounding his car horn.

Lozano's brother, Jose, blames the gangs.

"They've shot at us about five times," he says with chilling matter-of-factness.

In North Philadelphia, Michael Douglas, 17, is shot in the back. Police arrest a 20-year-old neighbor, Michael Frazier. The two had fought earlier, with knife and stick, over a broken window.

Arthur Williams Jr. stands on a fifth-floor porch in a Chicago housing project when shots ring out. An aunt shouts to take cover, but the 13-year-old is killed by a high-powered rifle round. A 14-year-old boy is charged with the murder.

In the early hours of Monday, Ny-Aya Hill, 16, is stabbed to death, allegedly by an 18-year-old neighbor at her Brooklyn housing project. The reason: an argument over a boy.

What makes these deaths most shocking is that they have become commonplace.

In some cities, teen murders have become so frequent as to defy the definition of news. They are given scant public notice — a few paragraphs in the newspaper, brief words on the evening news.

But to criminologists and public health officials charged with taking society's pulse, the deaths of Robert and Michael, Arthur and Ny-Aya are markers of an epidemic that shows signs only of worsening.

According to Northeastern University criminologist James Alan

Fox, the rate of murder among those 14 to 17 more than doubled since 1986. In the inner city, increasing teen violence has accounted for a disproportionate share of the murder rate. Nationally, on average, six teens die violently each day.

Houston saw teen homicides double between 1988 and 1990 alone. The toll is rising in Detroit: 40 youths between the ages of 13-19 were killed in the first half of the year; 54 died in all of 1992.

The killing is not confined to big cities. In Wichita, Kan., nearly half of this year's murders involved either victims or assailants 18 or younger.

This grim body count is dwarfed by the number maimed and traumatized by violence. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention say that for every death, 100 are wounded.

"People often forget a lot of the violence is much more than what we see in the number of deaths," said William Wiist, a researcher with the Houston Health Department.

In the public mind, the violence is a crime problem, a reflection of growing lawlessness that calls for more cops and tougher courts.

But to Dr. Mark Rosenberg, an epidemiologist at the CDC, the steady rise in murdered and murdering teens points to a public health crisis.

"Epidemic is precisely the right word for it," said Rosenberg, the associate director at the CDC's National Center for Injury Prevention and Control. "When people think of violence and homicide, they think of someone caught in the cross fire of a robbery. But most of these homicides are not associated with a felony. They involve something else."

The homicide count for the week of July 11-17 ticks away.

Monday, in St. Louis, Antjuan Jones, 16, is found dead behind a vacant building not far from home. Witnesses see three men shooting guns; there is little else for police.

Dr. Mark Rosenberg points to the findings of a study he conducted on youth violence.

Jones becomes a statistic: the city's 131st homicide this year, the 37th involving a victim or assailant 18 or younger.

On Tuesday, a shotgun blast kills Rason Sanford as he sits in his BMW at a Cincinnati shopping mall. Police find a gun in the 18-year-old victim's hand. Because he was arrested for drugs, police call the murder drug-related.

But Sanford's brother, Michael, says the two 17-year-olds and a 16-year-old charged in the killing were feuding with their victim.

Tuesday becomes Wednesday. Mary Hughes, 17, and a 13-year-old friend set to ambush her father in the backyard of her Houston home. She wants to kill him, police say, because she was upset with parental rules.

But the two teens argue, and Mary is shot in the neck. Her father finds the body.

Health researchers try to crack an epidemic by looking at three distinct areas: host, environment and agent.

By studying who is susceptible, contributing factors in the surroundings and the characteristics of the disease itself, cures and preventions can be developed.

Young males bear the brunt of this epidemic, representing 73 percent of the victims, Fox said. While whites account for 53 percent, black males face a five times greater risk of dying violently.

The epidemic is more pronounced in cities of a quarter-million or larger. Growth in teen homicides is taking place everywhere, except in the South, where the rate of increase is slightly slower.

Not surprisingly, young males also are the likely cause of death. Boys kill 10 times more than girls; blacks kill six times more than whites.

Most of these homicides are intraracial. Ninety-three percent of whites kill whites; 92 percent of blacks kill blacks.

Slightly more than half kill a friend or acquaintance; 15 percent kill a family member. The remaining third choose their victims among strangers. No matter the victim, killer and circumstance, firearms are used in three-quarters of teen homicides, a figure triple what it was in the mid-1980s.

"Our data suggests it's not necessarily that kids are fighting more, but the fights are being done with guns," Rosenberg said. "A lot of times, the only thing that differentiates the victim from the perpetrator is who shot first or straighter."

The killing continues Wednesday.

Gary Rios gets into a fracas at a Redlands, Calif., gas station. A short time later, he is killed in a drive-by shooting while standing in his front yard. Police arrest 18-year-old Terrence Shane Turner and a 17-year-old, both of whom were involved in the gas station brawl.

That night, Trent Crane, 19, is locking up the Kansas City gas station where he works when he is abducted and forced to drive his customized pickup truck to a park, where he is shot repeatedly.

One of the accused shooters: a 13-year-old boy. The alleged reason: The killers wanted Crane's truck to impress their friends.

Thursday comes. Riding his bike down a Baton Rouge, La., street, Jacques Brown, 12, is confronted by a classmate he has fought with at school.

Brown tries to leave but the boy, joined by two friends, ages 15 and 16, beats and kicks him, police say. He dies from a blow to the head.

No one dies in the two-hour burst of mayhem that leaves six people injured in Boston this night. Two are boys, 16 and 12, hit by gunfire from a young bicyclist.

Witnesses said the victims returned fire in the gang dispute. It is the first night an extra 100 police are put on patrol to control the warfare.

Beyond hard statistics lie harder-to-measure questions: Is it the drugs? The proliferation of guns?

The numbing violence on television and in movies? Is it the breakdown of family and community?

Whatever the causes, those watching the epidemic spread agree the cure cannot be brought solely by more cops and jail cells.

"We're not trained to fix the ills of society, education, poverty rates and divorce rate," said Winston Brass, the retired police chief of Rochelle, Ill., who heads the juvenile justice committee for the International Association of Chiefs of Police.

Rosenberg believes a public health approach can stop the killing. He cites successes with traffic safety, drunken driving, antismoking campaigns.

"We looked at the patterns and developed interventions, testing them before we put them in place," he said.

The CDC is starting programs in several cities to teach teens how to resolve conflicts without violence. The programs will emphasize after-school activities and provide adult mentors.

"We're talking about a preventable epidemic," Rosenberg said. "It is hard, but doable."

But Fox is less optimistic.

"Delinquency prevention programs have long existed," he said. "You can sit there and tell a kid guns are bad, but if he's convinced he has to have as much weaponry as the next kid, he'll get it."

It is the weekend. The killing continues.

In Glendale, Ariz., a 16-year-old is shot, allegedly by two 18-year-old gang members. In Broward County, Fla., six people, including four teenagers, are arrested and accused of killing a former friend.

Fox looks at the figures and sees only more deaths as the number of teenagers continues to grow.

"It is very rare that you find a homicide rate double in half a decade," he says. "It is truly alarming. But the worst is yet to come."

Seeking a cure for teen violence

By FRED BAYLES
AP National Writer

If the rampant spread of teen homicide can be seen as an epidemic, is there some method of curing it?

Researchers at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention think there may be ways to prevent the carnage.

The CDC is funding projects in New York, Houston and Durham, N.C., this fall to determine if adult role models and lessons in nonviolence can act as a social vaccine.

"We have had experience with non-infectious epidemics," said Dr. Mark Rosenberg, associate director of the CDC's National Center for Injury Prevention and Control. "We've brought motor vehicle deaths down. We've gotten drunken drivers off the road and brought smoking down."

The first step is to find the patterns in teen violence, Rosenberg said. These, he said, have been identified — poverty, drugs, the spread of firearms, the glorification of violence, a lack of family structure.

A basic problem: the inability to solve differences without violence.

"There have been breakdowns in the usual structural mechanisms that teach how to deal with conflict," Rosenberg said. "In many cases, there are no intact families or stable environments where you have role models. We have a culture now that emphasizes acting out. It says, 'Give me a reason for violence because that would give me pleasure.'"

In Houston, children as young as 10 and 11 will be taught alternatives to that notion.

Potential leaders from that age group will be identified in three city schools, said William Wiist, a researcher with the Houston health department who heads the CDC project. They will be shown ways to resolve differences through negotiation and mediation.

"We'll take them through the steps of problem-solving, how to gather the facts about what is creating the problem, how to weigh the consequences," Wiist said. "We'll teach them how to use humor in resolving the tension."

There will be other lessons about career opportunities and cultural pride, and sessions for parents and neighbors.

"A lot of parents have lost those skills," Wiist said, "and are modeling violent ways."

In Durham, the program will emphasize the use of adult mentors.

"There aren't positive role models in their lives," said Bob Flewelling, a public health analyst with the non-profit Research Triangle Institute. "There are more difficulties in raising children when there's only a single parent involved. On average, kids need a lot of attention and they need a lot of guidance."

One of those providing the guidance is Harlee Ballard, a Durham community worker all too familiar with the problems in his neighborhoods.

Ballard, a mentor for the last three years, said many teens never had adults willing or able to set them on the right course.

"What's missing in this generation are concerned adults willing to take the risk to correct these kids," he said. "It's not easy to win them over. They have their own language and value system. You have to get them to see they have to have a value system that is the same as the larger community."

The greatest danger, said Ballard, is to give these teens the notion that no one cares.

"If we don't intervene," he said, "we're going to be the victims of these children."

New state law sets tighter rules for what may be labeled organic

AUSTIN — Beginning Sept. 1, consumers who seek organic produce and other organic goods will be guaranteed that these items are produced by organic methods following the passage of a law during the Texas Legislature's general session that requires all organic goods to be certified, Agriculture Commissioner Rick Perry said.

"Prior to our law change, consumers had to assume everything labeled organic was in fact organic," Perry said. "With these new requirements, producers claiming to be organic will have to meet our strict requirements of proof showing they did use organic production methods."

During this past legislative session, Perry, with the help of Sen. Teel Bivins, R-Amarillo, Sen. Eddie Lucio, D-Brownsville, and Rep. Debra Danburg, D-Houston, pushed for the successful passage of this law, which will strengthen TDA's organics program.

Under the law enacted, all producers, processors, distributors and retailers who sell organic products must be certified by TDA beginning Sept. 1. Currently, organic certification is voluntary.

Certification fees will be based on gross dollars earned through sales, processing or products handled. The program also will begin accrediting private third parties to conduct inspections and certify producers and businesses.

In addition, the legislation allows TDA to levy fines and penalties or stop sales for non-compliance with its Organic Standards and Certification Program.

With more consumers perhaps interested in organic foods following a recent National Academy of Sciences report on pesticides and children's diets, Perry also pointed out that Texas is not only at the forefront in conventional agricultural practices, but also in organic methods.

In fact, TDA is a recognized national and historic leader in assisting the state's farmers who choose to produce organic food and organic cotton, Perry said.

"When the federal government was looking for a model to base its new national organic standards on, they came to Texas," Perry said.

Whether people are seeking conventionally or organically grown food, Texas farmers and TDA are guaranteeing that consumers have plenty of access to both, the commissioner said.

"Organic farming and the consumption of organic foods is a matter of taste," Perry said. "We've got folks who want to consume organic produce and others who prefer traditionally grown produce. The bottom line is that our food, no matter what growing methods are used, is safe.

"The National Academy of Sciences report has given us another step in the right direction to determine what negligible effects minute pesticide residue levels might have on children. This report is not making the statement that our food supply is unsafe."

Perry pointed out that organic agriculture also uses chemicals, but chemicals that are naturally occurring, not synthetic. One example is pyrethrum, a chrysanthemum plant extract that is so effective that scientists developed a synthetic copy called pyrethroid. Pyrethroids are used in conventional agriculture.

"Certified organic doesn't mean Mother Nature, nature and sunshine," he said. "There are some chemicals that can still be used to control pests. Mother Nature's got a lot of her own chemicals."

Congress imperils biotechnology's fate

By DR. EDWARD A. HILER
Vice Chancellor
and Dean of Agriculture
Texas A&M University

Congress is once again about to shoot America in its agricultural foot. This time the target is one of the most promising scientific developments in years — biotechnology.

A rider on the omnibus budget reconciliation bill now in conference committee calls for a moratorium on a new biotechnology product called "bovine somatotropin." BST, which is awaiting approval from the Food and Drug Administration, is designed to increase the efficiency of a cow's milk production. If the one-year BST ban is passed, it would do much more than deny farmers' access to a new product. More importantly, it also would signal to U.S. biotechnology and agricultural companies that it is pointless to gain federal approval for a host of emerging biotechnology products that can help our farmers grow foods that are more nutritious, more abundant, more affordable and easier on the environment. For even if the product fully meets every regulatory standard, Congress can override the federal approving agency to cast a product out of existence.

For Texas farmers, and ultimately the consumer, such a precedent could stop development of a cotton variety bred through biotechnology to resist insects without the use of pesticides, or vegetables enhanced through biotechnology to contain natural cancer inhibitors, or possibly a genetic solution to annoying and destructive red imported fire ants. More than 20 Texas agricultural associations have joined to oppose legislation that would place a moratorium on new products and technologies. They believe doors to solving many challenges in human health — from hunger to disease — are only now beginning to open through biotechnology.

Perhaps a lack of understanding about basic science, with BST as an example, is at the heart of the proposed ban. BST is a protein hormone, produced naturally by cows, that enables them to give milk. Now, through biotechnology, four agricultural companies have developed supplemental BST that, when administered to cows, boosts the efficiency of milk production. They have applied to FDA for approval to market BST products. The FDA, the National Institutes of Health, World Health Organization, American Medical Association and several other health organizations have determined that milk and meat from BST-supplemented cows are safe for humans. In fact, milk from supplemented cows is the same as other milk in safety, composition, taste and nutrition.

What's most onerous about this legislation is not just the potential ban on a single product but the tremendous chill it would send through the U.S. agricultural biotechnology industry. Supplemental BST is one of its first major products, developed through years of research requiring literally hundreds of millions of dollars of investment. If this product can be arbitrarily struck down by Congress — even if it clears over federal regulatory requirement — it completely rewrites the rules of gaining new product approval. Be assured that business executives are not going to risk their companies' assets to a Washington version of Russian roulette. Indeed, the development of new product and technologies — especially biotechnology products — is totally dependent on American business acting with full confidence that the government's new product approval process is based on sound science, not politics, and that safe products approved by federal agencies will have an opportunity to compete in the marketplace.

In 1940, each American farmer fed about 19 people. Today, each farmer produces enough food to feed nearly 130 people at home and abroad. Technological innovation, well managed by American farmers, has been the driving force behind this agricultural success story. Today, biotechnology products are poised to further advance agricultural innovation in a manner that benefits farmers, food companies, and consumers alike. But their ultimate success or failure should be the result of whether farmers and consumers wish to adopt them as an acceptable part of the food supply, not on the whims of Congress.

The stakes are high. Over the next 50 years, the world's population will double, as will the demand for food. Already, 700 million people go to bed hungry each night. At the same time, the pressures to minimize the environmental impacts of farming will continue to rise. Agricultural biotechnology is well-suited to help U.S. farmers address both needs. Currently under development are foods with more healthful characteristics, such as vegetable oils with less saturated fats, leaner pork, and foods fortified with healthful nutrients. Other products include fruits, vegetables and grains rendered more resistant to disease, insect damage and drought, thus reducing the need for pesticides, fertilizers and irrigation.

But the chief issue here isn't whether or not farmers should use supplemental BST if approved. Like all new products and technologies, whether and when to use them is an individual farmer's choice. The issue is who should control that choice — the marketplace or politicians?

The second leg of the Corn/Sorghum insect tour will be held on Thursday, Aug. 5, at 5 p.m. We will meet at Wheeler Evans Elevator in White Deer and proceed to the field from there.

We will be looking for beneficial insects and predators to these crops, proper scouting techniques, economic thresholds, and ways of controlling these pests.

Dr. Carl Patrick, Extension entomologist, will lead the tour. Last week we toured the Gray County area for insects in corn and sorghum and realized that there's a real possibility of identifying new problems this week. Everyone is welcome to attend and private applicators will receive two CEU's for attending.

I hope you will be able to attend and I think this will help increase your awareness of insect problems associated with these crops.

This will also be an excellent opportunity to visit with Dr. Patrick about proper times to spray and what products are available to control pests.

See you in White Deer on Thursday!

Voters to have chance to decide ag funding

AUSTIN — Action by the Texas Legislature this general session will allow voters across the state on Nov. 2 to decide on increasing an agricultural finance program's funding authority from $25 million to $100 million, Agriculture Commissioner Rick Perry said.

"Of all the action taken by the Legislature regarding agriculture, this measure has the most potential for creating jobs and strengthening local economies throughout the state as we propel Texas agriculture into the 21st century," Perry said.

If approved by voters, constitutional Proposition 16 would allow the Texas Agricultural Finance Authority, or TAF, to raise additional funds by issuing commercial paper backed by the state's bonding authority. TAF was established by the Texas Legislature in 1987 to help ag processing and ag diversification companies start up or expand operations.

With $25 million in funding approved by voters in 1989, TAF has assisted 34 businesses across the state — including nurseries, fiber-related industries and food processors. These companies project to create 4,700 jobs directly or indirectly and to add $463 million to the gross state product.

Perry said, "It pays off by creating or retaining jobs and adding dollars to the gross state product."

TAF works through public-private partnerships that involve local banks or other private lending institutions cooperating with the finance authority to provide loans to ag processing or ag diversification businesses.

To qualify for TAF assistance, by Aug. 2, producers who have suffered a total-crop loss," Bennett said. "Anyone with a total crop failure or a prevented planting will have a window of opportunity this week."

Bennett said Aug. 2 should not be viewed as a firm deadline, since there will be other opportunities to sign up. Settlement of partial losses and quality losses from previous crop years will be addressed later. Additional legislation is pending in Congress that could further alter the program.

businesses must use their equipment and other assets as collateral. As a loan is repaid, the money goes back into the TAF fund and is used by the finance authority to help other ag business projects.

The program is funded by TAF, which uses the state's authority to issue commercial paper notes that partially fund and guarantee a portion of loans made to businesses.

In another ag finance measure, the Texas Legislature transferred the administration of a farm and ranch finance loan program to TDA. The program, which was formerly administered by the Veterans Land Board in the General Land Office, will finance up to $150,000 to any state resident wanting to buy farm or ranch land. Financing should be available by February 1994.

Texas disasters in the 1993 crop year include drought in some parts of the state and excessive rainfall in others, he said.

Tommy Klemcke, director of Commodity Activities for the Texas Farm Bureau, said producers should contact their county ASCS office to determine their eligibility for the disaster programs.

"Farming is a business," Klemcke said. "The Aug. 2 date will give producers a chance to get their disaster claims in the pipeline early."

Artist's character sketching habit doesn't stop with serving on jury

By JIM PRICE
San Antonio Express-News

SAN ANTONIO (AP) — At every opportunity, Frank Talavera draws character sketches of people around him.

"I do it all the time," the Kelly AFB logistics program manager said in an interview. "On toilet paper. Whatever (drawing surface) is available."

"I don't do it to be derogatory to anybody."

His latest series of character sketches came during the past three weeks of the influence-peddling trial of former U.S. Rep. Albert Bustamante and his wife, Rebecca.

Talavera drew sketches of U.S. Judge Ed Prado, U.S. Justice Department trial attorney Jackie Bennett Jr. and defense lawyers J.A. "Tony" Canales of Corpus Christi, Bernard Campion and A.L. Hernandez.

Talavera, who was selected jury foreman by other jurors, explained why he did the drawings, including more than one of some of his subjects.

"In this particular situation, sitting in the front row, I watched these characters. They inspired me."

"I wanted to put their characters on paper."

"I enjoyed the lawyers and their antics. I don't mean that derogatorily."

He said he did the drawings from memory during trial recesses. The trial ended last week with the jury finding Bustamante guilty of two of 10 charges and acquitting his wife of seven charges.

Referring to his sketch of Prado, Talavera said he was trying to capture the judge's "lifting of an eyebrow" during certain moments of the trial.

"My personal favorite is Jackie Bennett," Talavera said of the sketches.

"There was a certain expression a half smile, a little boy look. I wanted to catch that just right, and I did."

"I hope the lawyers, prosecutors and judge don't take any offense at" the sketches, he said.

A Puerto Rico native who was raised in New York, Talavera, 45, has been a San Antonio resident since 1971 "by way of the Air Force." Between 1967-68, he served on "Security Hill" at Kelly.

Also in 1968, he met his wife-to-be, Mary Lou, a San Antonio native. A tour of Vietnam followed before he got out of the service in 1971 to return to San Antonio, where he and Mary Lou were married in 1974.

The couple are the parents of Nicole Marie, a 15-year-old softball pitcher for the San Antonio Royals.

Talavera got his associate degree in commercial art from San Antonio College in 1976 and began work as an illustrator, first for Southwest Research Institute. Later, he worked at San Antonio State Hospital, Lackland Air Force Base, a private firm and Kelly.

"My goal always was to get in civil service as an illustrator," Talavera explained.

Since August 1980, he has worked at Kelly either as an illustrator or in the logistics inventory field.

He and David Cantua, now retired from civil service at Kelly, combined their efforts to do two large murals in 1987.

One, inside the main hall of Building 171 at Kelly, "is a history of materiel management from the Wright brothers to somewhere in the future at what might be managed at Kelly," Talavera said.

The second mural at Lackland portrays activities of that command, he said.

Ag support for NAFTA not certain

By ROBERT GREENE
AP Farm Writer

WASHINGTON (AP) — With the administration's deadline for a free trade agreement with Mexico just five months away, the argument over whether the pact hurts or helps American agriculture has heated up.

A newly formed group called Ag for NAFTA, with representatives from more than 100 food companies, farm organizations, banks, chemical companies and cooperatives, sent about 200 people to lobby Congress for the agreement last week.

"Our numbers are so small in agriculture that we really need to unite like this," said Randy Cruise, president of the National Corn Growers Association and a spokesman for the new group.

Speaking at a Capitol Hill news conference, Cruise said the group worries about the growing sentiment in Congress against the North American Free Trade Agreement. Agriculture Secretary Mike Espy, Trade Representative Mickey Kantor, Rep. Kika de la Garza of Texas, chairman of the House Agriculture Committee, and its top Republican, Rep. Pat Roberts of Kansas, have appeared with the group to lobby for NAFTA.

But the coalition has come under attack as representing corporate agricultural interests over family farmers. "They round up a bunch of food processors and call them agriculture," said Sen.

Byron Dorgan, D-N.D.

NAFTA opponents contend the agreement will drive packers and canners south in search of lower-paid workers and less stringent regulations, leaving U.S. growers of tomatoes, sugar beets and other foods without buyers.

Dorgan and members of the House anti-NAFTA caucus, eight of whom sit on the Agriculture Committee, have stepped up their attacks on the agreement with hearings, press conferences and speeches.

Opponents consist largely of growers of sugar beets, winter vegetables and citrus fruit who say they'll be subject to unfair competition; wheat and barley growers on the northern Plains who allege loopholes in a free trade agreement with Canada for a surge of subsidized imports; and farm groups that believe the government keeps domestic prices down to benefit grain traders at the expense of growers.

The stakes are large. Mexico has doubled imports of U.S. farm goods in less than a decade, becoming the third-largest single-country customer. U.S. farm exports to Mexico totaled $3.7 billion in 1992, the Commerce Department says.

Exports to Mexico will grow even more quickly with NAFTA, supporters say. They point to that country's rapid population expansion and increasing prosperity. The big winners will be the U.S. beef, pork and grain industries, supporters say. Plus, the agreement will make trade more predictable by removing licenses and other means that cut off imports, they add.

Under the agreement, Mexico and the United States would immediately end all non-tariff barriers to trade and ease out the tariffs in the next 10 to 15 years.

During the transition periods, quotas would be put in place. Only imports over those quotas would have tariffs.

Mexican tariffs reach 20 percent on some goods. The United States has erected tariff barriers as well, some on vegetables reaching 30 percent when U.S. supply reaches its peak. But supporters say Mexico has more barriers that would come down.

Mexico exported $2.4 billion worth of farm products to the United States in 1992, with tomatoes, vegetables, citrus and melons among the top commodities. That worries growers in California and Florida.

"There would be a difference in the competition, no doubt," said Heather Flower, spokeswoman for the Western Growers Association in Irvine, Calif. Her group complains that Mexico is governed by much looser pesticide regulations and overstates its concern with the safety of U.S. products to keep from importing them.

Rep. Tom Lewis, R-Fla., calls himself a critic rather than an opponent of NAFTA. But he said the agreement needs to protect citrus prices because of the volume surges not only from Mexico but also Brazil.

Discovery Center to host meteor observing

AMARILLO — The Don Harrington Discovery Center will be hosting a Perseid Meteor Shower observing session at 9 p.m. on Aug. 12, in the Discovery Center's parking lot.

The observing session is free to the public, and everyone is encouraged to attend this event.

Members of the Amarillo Astronomy Club will be on hand with telescopes that will enable participants to view the planets, stars, galaxies and nebulae. The most incredible sights, however, will be the meteors, or falling stars, for which a telescope will not be needed, Discovery Center representatives said.

The Perseid showers occur between Aug. 10-13, with maximum visibility on Aug. 11 and 12. The meteors are a result of the Earth passing through a region in space filled with tiny particles of dust, which burn up in the planet's atmosphere.

The particles, meteoroids, are debris from the Swift-Tuttle comet, which is slowly deteriorating as it revolves around the sun. The shower has long been known as the Tears of St. Lawrence in memory of the Saint who died on Aug. 10, 358 A.D.

Most meteor showers have only a few (15-60) meteors visible per hour. This year, however, some astronomers are predicting a heavier shower.

"This year's shower may prove to be a meteor storm," comments Christine Brunello, Planetarium coordinator at the Don Harrington Discovery Center. "During a meteor storm, thousands of meteors may be seen in an hour — it may appear as if the sky is falling."

There is no danger in a meteor storm, and the sight could be astounding, she added.

The first Perseid Meteor Shower was witnessed by Chinese observers on July 17, 36 A.D. The second sighting was noted in late July, 714 A.D. by Chinese, Japanese and other Asian observers. From 811 A.D. to 830 A.D., the meteor showers were noted by European observers. The Perseid Meteor Showers were named by Schaiparelli in 1866 — Perseid being the daughter of Perceus in mythology.

Don't miss the opportunity to view the planets, stars, galaxies and nebulae while participating in the Perseid Meteor Shower Observing Session on Aug. 12, at the Don Harrington Discovery Center, Brunello said.

Family leave law: Nice — if you can afford it

By LISA GENASCI
AP Business Writer

NEW YORK (AP) — Sandra Brownsey, a teacher in Greenwood Lake, N.Y., gave birth in May and dreaded the prospect of returning to work come September when the school year begins. She wanted more time off to nurse her newborn.

Now, under the Family and Medical Leave Act, Brownsey can take an additional 12 weeks unpaid leave, keep her health insurance and return to her old job.

"I don't have to spend the summer worrying about child care," Brownsey says. "This will allow me more time to enjoy my baby."

Without the extra time off, Brownsey says, she might have considered quitting.

Brownsey clearly is one of the beneficiaries of the new federal law, which takes effect Aug. 5. But the legislation doesn't just apply to women and doesn't just apply to the birth of a child.

It extends to all employees of companies with 50 or more workers, allowing them leave after an adoption, to care for a seriously ill family member, or if their own health condition makes them unable to perform their jobs.

Employers are required to continue paying health-care premiums during the leave and give the employee back the same job or an equivalent position.

That may sound good, but the legislation has drawn mixed reviews from people on all sides of the issue.

From the employee viewpoint, the act is flawed because it covers only about half the country's workers. About 40 percent of employees work in small businesses that don't fall under the law's guidelines.

For those who are covered, the big question is whether they can afford to take the unpaid leave, says Laurie Kane, a researcher with the Families and Work Institute, a New York-based group that studies work-place issues.

Marie Wilson, president of the Ms. Foundation, says the law divides people by class, helping those who can afford the three months without pay, and bypassing those who can't.

Besides the money, another concern for workers is the impact on their careers. Those who take advantage of work-place programs often aren't seen as serious about work.

This is one reason why men rarely reduce their working hours or take leave to help their families, says Marcia Kropf, director of research with Catalyst, a non-profit organization that seeks to promote work-place change for women.

"Family leave has often meant maternity leave and is seen as a women's thing," Kropf says.

Still, many workers don't have a choice when it comes to a family emergency. Just knowing they can't be fired for taking time is a benefit, says Heidi Hartmann, director of the Institute for Women's Policy Research, a Washington research group.

"Instead of being nervous about their employer's reaction, they'll just take the leave," Hartmann says.

Supporters say another benefit to the legislation, however imperfect, is the right to return to the same job. That theoretically can translate into seniority, better promotions and higher salary.

The law's most ardent detractors are the small-business entrepreneurs who fear they could lose the most. Many large companies already have some sort of formalized family leave policy.

Many smaller companies are frightened by the potential cost. It's expensive to granting 12-weekleaves with full benefits, as well as hiring and training a temporary employee, says Marty Cohen, director of policy studies with the Work In America Institute Inc., a nonprofit research group in Scarsdale, N.Y.

"In an era when cost containment is the key, the additional costs imposed by the law could be fatal," says Eamonn McGeady, president of Martin G. Imbach, Inc., a marine and heavy construction business with about 65 employees in Baltimore, Md.

Mary Reed, the legislative representative at the National Federation of Independent Business, puts the issue in stronger terms:

"It's an inflexible, impersonal one-size-fits-all government mandate that will hurt small business in the long run."

The legislation, she says, will hurt the very people it is intended to help.

"Small employers are going to be less likely to employ women of child-bearing years and more likely to cut the number of low-skilled jobs," Reed says.

But mostly, small business is upset at the government meddling.

"The beauty of working for a small business is that employers and employees can work out the benefits that work the best for both," Reed says. It's not that small businesses are abusing their workers, she says. Many already have some sort of informal leave program for employees.

'It's an inflexible, impersonal one-size-fits-all government mandate that will hurt small business in the long run.'
— Mary Reed

"A good employee who is productive is a valuable resource and we'll do anything to keep that employee," says Gerry Harkins, general manager of Southern Pan Services Co., a construction business in Atlanta.

Jim Herr, president of Herr's Foods Co. in Nottingham, Pa., says even among small businesses, those with the best benefits get the best employees. His company of about 1,000 workers has a leave policy used mostly by new mothers.

Defenders of government-enforced family leave point out that several states already have such laws. Despite gloomy predictions from businesses in those states, there have been few problems.

In addition, among the large companies that already have leave programs, some say they have achieved significant savings.

One such success story is Aetna Life & Casualty. In 1988 it began allowing employees up to six months of unpaid leave.

On average, employees take only 7 1/2 weeks off, says Aetna spokesman Mike Bazinet. Of the 44,000 workers, about 1,200 take advantage of the policy each year, Bazinet says. Most have been women.

The leave policy has saved money by helping to retain women who might have left the company once their maternity leave was up, Bazinet says. About 9 percent of women taking leave now choose not to return, vs. 24 percent before.

Spaceport seen as future of space travel, Southwest economy

By EDUARDO MONTES
Associated Press Writer

WHITE SANDS MISSILE RANGE, N.M. (AP) — The nighttime sky over this southern New Mexico missile range gleams with the billions of blazing pinpoints that make up the Milky Way.

The desert base itself is a stark contrast, enveloped as it is by nearly pitch-black darkness.

Yet the two can be linked by rockets riding columns of fire.

Some say such flights will become a regular occurrence in the next century if the vision of researchers, businessmen and politicians can become reality.

Their vision is called the Southwest Regional Spaceport. Despite a name that evokes Flash Gordon-esque images, it's already taking shape.

"The concept of the development of a commercial spaceport begins with White Sands (Missile Range) at its heart," said Gary R. Parker, program director for the project. "But it's not intended to be just a new mission for White Sands."

The spaceport is envisioned to operate with the regularity of an airport for launching and recovering spacecraft with such diverse purposes as carrying research experiments or transporting cargo.

The facility would be adjacent to the Army-run range and would be able to share some of the base's existing facilities — such as radar systems and landing strips.

Proponents are touting the spaceport as an economic boost not just for New Mexico, but also for Texas, Colorado and Arizona, which have been contacted about cooperating on the initiative.

They say a spaceport will attract customers and support industries and will have the potential to become the hub of a Southwest aerospace industry.

It also would thrust New Mexico full-force into the commercial space launch industry, which is growing after a hiatus that saw Europe take the lead from the United States.

Ironically, it was the advent of the space shuttle, the centerpiece of the U.S. space program, that put the country behind.

The shuttle initially carried all commercial payloads, cutting the demand for conventional multistage disposable rockets and prompting the major U.S. aerospace firms to reduce or stop production of such rockets.

But European countries were dissatisfied with the shuttle, which was not operating on the schedule projected, and began their own programs for commercial launches.

The 1986 Challenger explosion changed everything. The shuttle program was shut down for about 2 1/2 years and the government ordered all commercial payloads off the orbiter.

The disaster created a new demand for rockets, encouraging U.S. firms to begin full production again and prompting the development of an American commercial launch industry, which took off in 1989.

"Since then the field has been growing, but the U.S. companies do have less than half of the total international market, in large part because of those 2 1/2 years," said Chuck Kline, associate director for program affairs with the federal Office of Commercial Space Transportation. That office regulates commercial launches.

Kline said there have been 36 commercial launches, at a cost exceeding $2 billion, since 1989. There have been three this year. At least 15 are anticipated next year.

"There's no real firm consensus (on the future)," Kline said. "But there are a great many things on the horizon that could result in various scenarios as to what happens, most of which mean increased use of space."

There's a growing interest nationwide in developing commercial spaceports. Current efforts are scattered from Florida to Alaska to Hawaii, although Cape Canaveral, Fla., and Vandenberg Air Force Base, Calif., remain the hubs of the nation's space programs.

The Southwest Regional Spaceport is one of the furthest along, largely because of plans to locate it adjacent to or at White Sands Missile Range.

The range has conducted commercial launches and boasts much of the facilities needed. It also has the space necessary for spacecraft recovery, a good altitude for launches and facilities to test space equipment.

Combine that with a spaceport and "you have almost a one-stop shopping center," said Charlie Garcia, chief of space operations at White Sands.

Garcia is participating in a feasibility study focusing on the safety of launching spacecraft from the base.

The study was funded by a $450,000 grant from the U.S. Department of Defense.

Meantime, New Mexico State University's Physical Science Laboratory, under Parker's direction, is using a $950,000 grant from the National Aeronautics and Space Administration to conduct a technical analysis and to draft a business plan for the spaceport.

The state Legislature gave the project a boost this year by appropriating $250,000 to create an office of commercial space.
