Abortion pill approved

French activists quick to condemn new drug

PARIS (AP) — Doctors say the new abortion pill authorized for use in France is a simpler, safer alternative to traditional means of ending pregnancy, but opponents say it is just another way to kill the unborn.

Health Minister Claude Evin on Friday authorized the prescription and use of RU 486, or mifepristone, an anti-hormone chemical that interrupts pregnancy by blocking the implantation of a fertilized egg on the uterine wall.

RU 486, which must be used with another product, sulprostone, or prostaglandine E, also was approved Sept. 18 by China. The drug has proved 95 percent effective in tests, researchers say.

Abortion has been legal in France since 1975. Evin said authorization of RU 486, produced by the Roussel Uclaf pharmaceutical company of Paris, did not affect French law on abortions, which must be carried out under strict conditions.

RU 486 is not a do-it-yourself, morning-after pill that can be purchased at the supermarket and administered at home. The procedure must be carried out under the supervision of medical specialists and in hospitals designated by the government.

Still, French opponents of abortion used the announcement to repeat their longstanding positions.

"In this year of the 40th anniversary of the universal declaration of human rights, France dishonors itself by throwing onto the world market mifepristone ... because this toxic product is destined only to kill children," the Committee to Allow Children to Be Born said Saturday.

The Associations of Catholic Families called on "doctors, organizations and people of good will to refuse this policy of death."

But the French Family Planning Movement hailed RU 486 as a "real progress" that "opens new possibilities of choice for women who unfortunately find themselves faced with the failure of contraception."

From a medical point of view, tests show RU 486 has many advantages over standard surgical methods, or rather, it lacks the disadvantages of procedures such as aspiration or curettage.

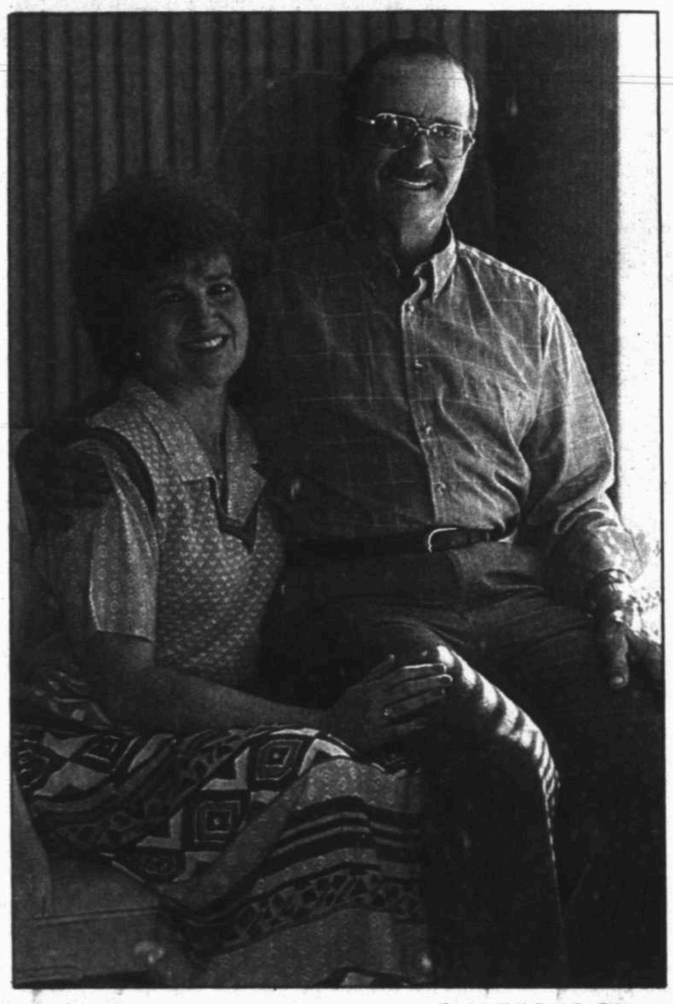

With the new pill, there is no surgical act. No anesthesia is needed and there is no risk of infection, sterility or of perforating the uterus, researchers say.

The pill's only drawback is a tendency to hemorrhage in 1 percent to 3 percent of the users, said Dr. Roger Henrion, a member of the government advisory commission. But even then, transfusion is not needed.

The method is carried out in three stages. First the woman takes 600 mg of mifepristone in the presence of a doctor, then goes home.

Thirty-six to 48 hours later, she returns to the hospital for the prostogladine, which is either injected or administered through the vagina. This product activates uterine contractions.

Being deaf is not a handicap to Dorothy and Max Floyd, but may be to those with hearing who don't understand the finer points of human communication.

Problems 'normal' in 'deaf' family

By JANE MARLER DEES
Staff Writer

A fixture on the living room wall at Max and Dorothy Floyd's southwest Midland home lights up when the kitchen phone rings.

On weeknights at 5:30 p.m., the two might be found reading the nightly network newscast as it runs across the bottom of the TV screen.

Both the Floyds are deaf, but the condition seems to frustrate greater Paul and Max Jr., their two sons.

"They'll close their eyes when you're trying to fight with them," says Paul, 15.

For if mom or dad don't see what Paul is trying to say during an argument — via sign language — he might as well be yelling at the wall, he explains.

Paul and Max Jr. have perfect hearing.

Their father, who turned 58 last Friday, lost his hearing when he was 3-years-old after a bout with diphtheria, he said through a sign-language interpreter.

Dorothy, 48, explained through the interpreter that she lost her hearing when she was 10-months-old and suffering with the flu and pneumonia.

Today at a booth in Midland Park Mall, deaf people and their friends and relatives will take part in an "awareness" campaign to educate people about what being deaf isn't.

Dorothy, for instance, has "residual" hearing. She isn't 100 percent deaf like Max. With the help of a hearing aid, she hears the smoke alarm blaring, a tea kettle whistling or the oven timer buzzing.

Like any mother of an outgoing teenage son — who has longer hair, an earring and likes surfing — she wages against him the constant battle of the stereo and car radio volume knob.

In fact, "I always worry about the neighbors" thinking the music is too loud, Dorothy says.

Another "normal" problem Dorothy has is that of the sound vibrations caused by her husband's snoring. "I fuss at him."

If Max Jr. or Paul lock themselves out of the house, Max sometimes too can feel the vibrations of their banging on the front door.

Uneducated people fear the deaf, the couple agreed. "They're afraid to try to communicate because they see it as a barrier," Dororthy maintains.

Paul and Max Jr. agreed that they knew something was "different" growing up with parents who couldn't hear or speak verbally.

"People just don't understand the deaf are normal people," the younger son maintains.

Bronze of rescue to be unveiled

From Staff Reports

Unveiling and dedication of a bronze relief depicting the dramatic rescue of Jessica McClure from an abandoned water well in Midland last year will be held Oct. 15, it was announced here Saturday.

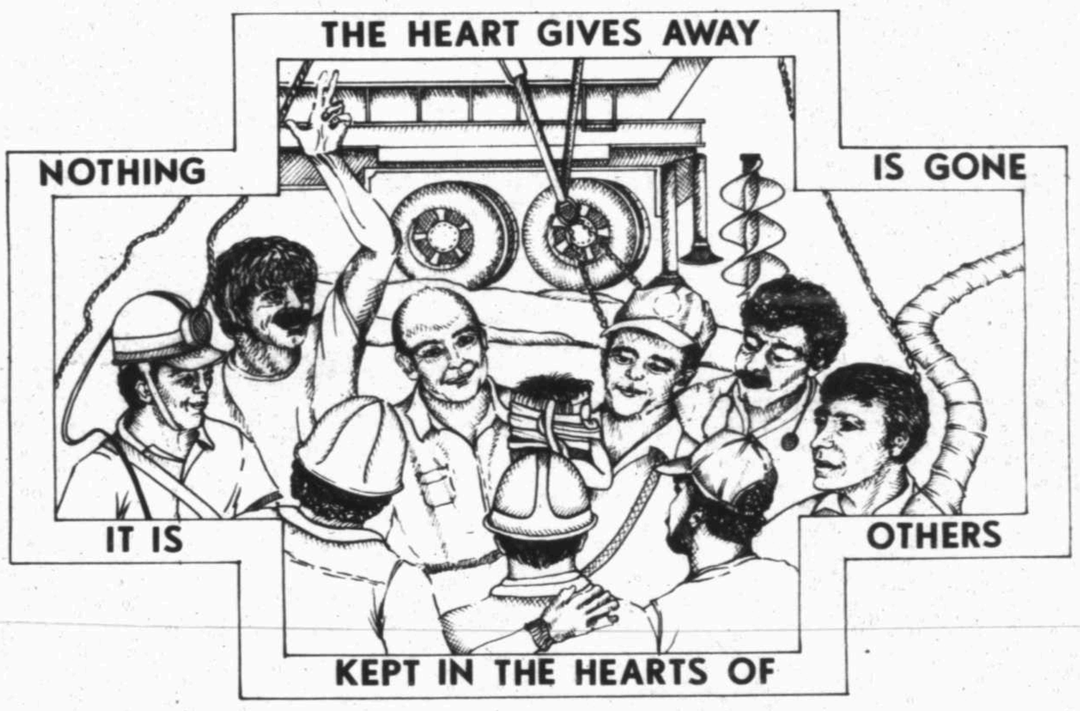

Ceremonies will begin at 11 a.m. on the south side of Midland Center, where the four-foot-by-six-foot piece will be permanently displayed, according to Darlene Gifford, chairman of the Midland Spirit Committee.

The bronze work of art, now nearing completion at a Santa Fe, N.M., foundry, "commemorates the spirit that led to the Oct. 16, 1987, rescue of Jessica — the spirit that was present and is always present not only in Midland but anywhere people respond to the needs of other people," Gifford said.

Idea for a permanent art piece to commemorate the rescue of Jessica and the spirit behind it came from a South Padre Island couple, Mr. and Mrs. Jim Cocke, who read about the dramatic event in a Time magazine article while on safari in Africa.

Cocke was quoted as saying the article "made such a tremendous impact on us that we agreed it (the rescue) needed to be perpetuated in some way." As a result they made an initial contribution of $5,000 toward cost of building a permanent memorial.

Longtime Midland philanthropist dies

From Staff Reports

Mrs. George T. Abell, longtime Midland resident, civic and cultural leader and philanthropist, died Saturday morning in her home after an extended illness.

Mrs. Abell, the former Gladys Hanger of Fort Worth, had resided here since 1939.

The daughter of a pioneer Tarrant County family, she graduated from Paschal High School in Fort Worth and attended Texas Christian University and the University of Texas at Austin.

Her husband, who preceded her in death in 1979, was a pioneer Midland independent oil operator and founder of the Permian Basin Petroleum Museum, Library and Hall of Fame.

Mr. and Mrs. Abell, personally and through the Abell-Hanger Foundation, contributed generously to many civic and philanthropic organizations in Midland and throughout Texas.

Locally, the Abell-Hanger Foundation was a major contributor to the creation of Midland Memorial Hospital and continues to be one of the hospital's major benefactors. The Abell-Hanger Foundation has also given more than 1,500 Midland and Greenwood Independent School District students scholarships to Midland College over the past three years.

The foundation has awarded nursing scholarships to students at Midland College, Baylor University and Texas Christian University, donated a library to Austin College in Sherman, supported Midland United Way and awarded general scholarships to graduating students in the Crane and Fort Stockton Independent School Districts.

The Abell-Hanger Science Faculty Building at Midland College is named after them, as well.

Mrs. Abell was serving as president of the Abell-Hanger Foundation at the time of her death.

The Abells received the West Texas Chamber of Commerce Cultural Achievement Award in 1973. They also were recognized by the Texas Historical Foundation for their interest in historical endeavors statewide. The Abells sponsored the first Texas State Historical Marker, which was erected at Camp Ford, near Tyler.

Mrs. Abell also was a member of the Board of Trustees of the Permian Basin Petroleum Museum, Library and Hall of Fame. She retired in 1985 as a member of the Board of Trustees of Midland Presbyterian Homes (Trinity Towers and Manor Park), and was a former member of the Board of Governors of Midland Memorial Hospital. She was a life member of the Midland Women's Club.

United Way campaign to begin

From Staff Reports

United Way of Midland will kick off its campaign 4:15 p.m. Wednesday at Centennial Plaza and the Midland County Courthouse.

This year's kick-off is scheduled to be the first United Way "Olympiad."

Employees of the 18 pilot campaign organizations will be competing against each other in four specialized and competitive races.

Free popcorn, seltzers and lemonade will be available to all of the United Way volunteers and supporters.

"Too many people see giving to United Way as an obligation," said Jerry King, United Way's communications chairman of the reason there will be no traditional kick-off luncheon this year.

"Giving to United Way can be an enthusiastic, sharing and enjoyable act. It doesn't have to be painful. We want Midlanders to come and enjoy and be a part of the campaign," King said. "Our kick-off will be a celebration and we invite everyone to come and be a part of it."

This year's campaign goal is $2.5 million and will fund 17 organizations.

Needs of the United Way agencies are up 15-20 percent, explained Cindy Ford, the organization's public relations director.

"I know that's a lot of money, but because of the very special people in Midland, I know we will make it," said Max Holman, campaign chairman.

Community and Senior Services is one of the 17 organizations that recently became affiliated with United Way this summer.

The other agencies to be funded this year are American Red Cross, Big Brothers/Big Sisters, Boy Scouts of America, Buffalo Trail Council, Boys' Club of Midland, Casa de Amigos, Council on Alcoholism/Drug Abuse, Family Services of Midland, Midland Need to Read, Inc., Midland-/Lee Youth Centers, Inc., and Midland Rape Crisis Center.

WEATHER SUMMARY

Fine weather anticipated

From Staff and Wire Reports

The remainder of the weekend should continue to be gorgeous, according to forecasters at the National Weather Service at Midland International Airport.

Today should be clear with a high near 90. Winds will blow in from the south at 10-15 mph.

Tonight and Monday will both be fair. The low tonight will be near 60, while the high on the first work day of the week should be in the upper 80s.

The record high temperature for Saturday was set 11 years ago when the mercury topped 101. The record low for today was set in 1984 when it dipped to 46.

STATE

A cold front stretched almost 600 miles across Texas on Saturday — from Shreveport to near San Antonio to south of Del Rio. Scattered showers and thunderstorms formed along and just ahead of the front in Southeast Texas and along the upper Texas coast.

Isolated thunderstorms occurred in the area between Del Rio, San Antonio and Cotulla.

A small funnel cloud barely touched ground in a field west of Marion, just east of San Antonio, but immediately went back up after picking up black dust, Guadalupe County sheriff's dispatcher Evelyn Irish said.

Although clouds lingered across much of Northeast, Southeast and South Texas, drier air moving in from the north produced clear skies over the rest of the state.

Because of the front and a surface ridge of high pressure in the high plains, winds were variable throughout the state.

South to southwest winds breezed across South and southeast Texas and the High Plains. North to northwest winds were common in North and Southwest Texas. Wind speed were generally in the 10 to 15 mph range statewide.

Temperatures were in the 70s and 80s in North and West Texas on Saturday afternoon, but in the 80s and lower 90s further south. Mid-afternoon readings ranged from 73 at Dalhart to 92 at Harlingen.

The National Weather Service said skies should be sunny on Sunday with highs in the 80s and 90s.

NATION

Hurricane Helene lost steam Saturday as it swirled northward over cooler Atlantic waters, a path that if continued will kill the storm, forecasters said.

Helene was demoted from a category 4 hurricane with winds of 140 mph to category 3 after its top sustained winds dropped to 115 mph, said Hal Gerrish of the National Hurricane Center.

At noon EDT, Helene was centered near latitude 18.0 north longitude 48.2 west, or about 890 miles east of Antigua. The storm was moving north-northwest at about 10 mph, and was expected to turn north after midnight.

"It's moving to the north over the open waters of the Atlantic. It's still in the tropics, but whenever they move north, they lose their strength," Gerrish said.

Hurricanes, strong winds revolving around warm cores of low pressure, are fueled in part by tropical waters over which they are spawned. Moving over cooler waters saps their strength.

It could take chilly waters a week or more to kill off the storm, Gerrish said.

Winds at the upper level make it appear unlikely the storm will strengthen or change course, he said.

"It's good that it looks like Helene won't hit land. With recent memories of Gilbert, there's been a lot of anxiety about Helene," he said.

The dwindling Helene posed no threat to shipping interests Saturday, because it was far south of normal traffic lanes, Gerrish said.

Formed early last week off the coast of Africa, Helene is the eighth named storm of the 1988 Atlantic hurricane season and the fourth to have winds that exceed the 74 mph strength that classifies them as hurricanes.

Of the season's three previous hurricanes, Gilbert swept across the Caribbean and Mexico, killing hundreds. Hurricanes Florence and Debby caused only minor damage in Mexico and the U.S. Gulf Coast.

BRONZE

Later, noted Midland artist Mary Griffith was commissioned to produce the bronze sculpture which will be unveiled Oct. 15.

A native of New York, Griffith moved to Texas in 1950 and is well known for both her portraits and sculpture, which appear in private and corporation collections throughout the Southwest.

She has been commissioned by the Scarsdale Country Club, Scarsdale, New York, the Dallas Crippled Children's Society and Trinity School in Midland, among others. Her bronze works include a broad range of forms, from wildlife to oil field scenes. The "Midland Spirit" piece illustrates the emergence of Jessica McClure from the abandoned water well surrounded by members of the rescue team. The event, and the days preceding it while rescue operations were underway, captured the attention of people throughout the world.

Words which frame the art work refer to the spirit that was evidenced by the rescue. They read: "Nothing the heart gives away is gone ... It is kept in the hearts of others."

Total cost of the project is approximately $10,000. According to Gifford, a number of local people have expressed an interest in contributing to it. "Those who would like to become a part of this tribute are welcome to do so," she said.

They should make checks out to "Midland Spirit" and send them to Midland Spirit, P.O. Box 1890, Midland, TX 79702.

Prior to casting, Midland artist Mary Griffith poses with the positive wax of her bronze relief which depicts the rescue of Jessica McClure. Unveiling and dedication of the piece, which will be permanently affixed to the south side of Midland Center, is set for Oct. 15.

Finally, between the eighth and the 12th day, she returns a last time so her doctor can verify the embryo has been completely expelled.

"This product, a scientific means to interrupt pregnancy, must be used under very precise conditions and is not a sort of next-day contraceptive," said Dr. Pierre Ambroise-Thomas, director of pharmacology and medicines at the Health Ministry.

French law allows abortions through the 10th week of pregnancy. Women must be informed of the risks and wait one week to think it over. However, RU 486 must be administered by the 49th day following the last menstrual period.

That does not allow much time to note the lateness of period, have a test, make an appointment, wait the required week and have the abortion.

U.S. firm reportedly wants to test drug

NEWARK, N.J. (AP) — A New Jersey company is considering seeking U.S. Food and Drug Administration permission to begin testing a French-made drug that induces abortions early in pregnancy, a scientist said.

Gynopharma Inc. of Somerville had been awaiting the results of French government tests before applying for permission to market the drug in the United States, Dr. Gary Hogden, an expert in reproductive medicine, told The New York Times.

Thousands maintain vigil as Hirohito's health fails

TOKYO (AP) — Thousands of Japanese waited in the rain outside the Imperial Palace Sunday to pray for Emperor Hirohito, but the health of the world's oldest monarch remained precarious.

Imperial officials said the 87-year-old emperor continued to hemorrhage and his condition remained serious, although his temperature declined Sunday from the dangerous level of Saturday.

"It appears that his internal bleeding is continuing," Imperial Household Agency spokesman Kenji Maeda told reporters Sunday. He said the emperor's temperature was at 98.3, compared to his normal body temperature of about 95.9. Thousands of people ignored a Sunday morning rain and waited outside the palace in central Tokyo to pray for the emperor's health and sign registries for well-wishers. More than 175,000 have signed.

On Saturday, relatives arrived in black sedans after the palace announced the monarch's temperature was rising rapidly. By midafternoon it hit 102.6 degrees, the highest since Hirohito vomited blood after an intestinal hemorrhage late Monday. The fever dropped to 100.2 Saturday evening.

Court physicians gave the emperor 1.28 pints of blood through the day after finding signs of further intestinal bleeding. They gave him 0.85 pints Friday, bringing the total since Monday to 4.68 pints.

Plans to administer high-calorie nutrients into Hirohito's chest were scrapped after doctors deemed the emperor too weak, reports said.

Aside from two small ice cubes Thursday, the emperor has been unable to take food and continued to receive intravenous treatment through a vein in his arm.

For the first time since the crisis began, palace officials acknowledged Hirohito's condition was serious.

Kyodo News Service and the Asahi Shimbun, Japan's second-largest newspaper, reported the emperor is suffering from cancer of the upper intestine, in the area where the duodenum and pancreas meet. Asahi said the cancer may have spread to the pancreas.

The agency lodged protests with Asahi and Kyodo for their reports, but issued no denials.

"The position of the Imperial Household Agency is not to allow such (speculation) while the emperor is still conscious and fighting his illness," Maeda said.

Crown Prince Akihito, who assumed the full roster of imperial duties Thursday, continued his daily shuttles Saturday to his father's Fukiage Palace from his nearby residence. Under the Constitution, the emperor has no real power but signs documents already approved by the government and serves as a symbol of Japan.

Akihito was joined by Prince Mikasa, Hirohito's younger brother; princesses Chichibu and Takamatsu, his widowed sisters-in-law, and Prince Hitachi, his second son.

Maeda said they spoke briefly with the emperor.

Prince Aya, Akihito's son, planned to interrupt his studies at Britain's Oxford University to return to Japan, the palace said.

Foreign Minister Sosuke Uno canceled plans to leave for New York Sunday to attend the U.N. General Assembly, the ministry said. Other Cabinet ministers also canceled plans to leave Tokyo.

News reports said organizers were postponing festivals, fireworks displays and moon-viewing gatherings out of deference to the emperor. It was an unusual trend not seen even when the emperor underwent surgery for the first time in September 1987.

Physicians have said the intestinal hemorrhaging was coming from the site of the surgery. Hirohito was diagnosed as having chronic pancreatitis and surgeons performed an intestinal bypass.

More than 50,000 visitors turned out in the rain Saturday to sign registries at the palace.

A restaurant owner recited a Buddhist prayer outside the palace and said: "Japan is not Japan without him. Japan's prosperity, peace and our spiritual well-being are owed to him to the greatest extent."

The Tokyo Stock Exchange's main index fell during Saturday's half-day trading session from concern over Hirohito, analysts said.

"There may be no clear logic to why stocks go down when the head of the state dies, but it creates a serious uncertainty," said Jeff Bahrenburg, an analyst at Merrill Lynch in Tokyo.

"Sometimes at school I'll tell my friends my parents are deaf and they'll say, 'Well how do they drive?' " But he adds sometimes he felt "special" at the attention his peers gave him because of his parents.

"A lot of hearing people take an interest in learning sign language" when they become friends with the Floyds, the wife says.

Dorothy and Max add that they don't have any close friends who don't know at least some deaf communication skills.

They had no trouble communicating when they met at a Southern Baptist Convention for the Deaf 23 years ago in New Orleans, one of the noisiest towns around.

They learned they'd gone to the same school, the Texas School for the Deaf in Austin.

Today, the tidbits of grease under Max's fingernails represent his successful career as an auto mechanic. Dorothy, with the help of an interpreter, landed a job as a data entry operator at a local insurance firm.

Her associates took a sign language course to better communicate with her, she says.

The Floyds are active members of First Baptist Church here — she in the "Hallelujah Hands" choir for the deaf and he as a Sunday school teacher for the deaf.

People with hearing "just assume you can read lips," Max said. "They don't realize that just a slight turn of the face" can botch the communication altogether. "I get curious about the things that are being said."

Dorothy runs into trouble when shopping.

"At the store, they'll say, 'Can I help you?' but don't realize you're deaf," she explains. "They should just write down what they want to say."

And for that small act of consideration, Dorothy would touch her finger tips to her chin and then point them toward the person.

"Thank you," she'd be saying.

Dorothy would feel it, others would hear it and it is hoped ... finally see.

Bush called harmful to labor movement

By LAURA TOLLEY

HOUSTON (AP) — AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland blasted Republican presidential nominee George Bush on Saturday, saying the vice president's interests were with the privileged and not the working people.

Kirkland, speaking to about 250 people attending an AFL-CIO regional conference, said the Reagan administration's policies had hurt the labor movement and that Bush would only cause more harm if elected.

He praised Democratic presidential nominee Michael Dukakis and his running mate, U.S. Sen. Lloyd Bentsen of Texas as men who are public servants, not servants to the privileged.

The AFL-CIO general board voted last month to endorse the Dukakis-Bentsen ticket, he said, and now it was time to start working to get them elected.

"Over the past eight years, working Americans have put up with more than they ought to have to bear. Now, it is time to say 'enough is enough,'" he said, referring to the Republican administration.

"George Bush and Dan Quayle are not on their (working Americans) side, they are on the other side — the side that means to keep working people down in this country. Believe me, they will never forget the side they're on, so don't you either."

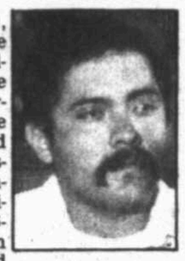

Kirkland said when Bush claimed there would be some 30 million jobs created in eight years under his administration, "he stepped in some deep economic voodoo."

Bush, he said, did not say where those jobs would be created.

"Yes, he would create jobs — jobs in Japan, or in Taiwan, or south of the border, down Mexico way," he said. "And who will own America and call the tunes that we dance to when he's through?"

House Speaker Jim Wright also addressed the group on Saturday as did one of Bentsen's sons, Lloyd Bentsen III and Texas Rep. Mickey Leland, D-Texas. Trade unionists from Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Missouri, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Texas and Wyoming attended the regional conference in Houston this weekend.

Hysteria noted morning after rape

Garza

SAN DIEGO, Texas (AP) — The husband of an alleged gang rape victim said Saturday his wife limped home and fell in bed hysterical the morning after the incident, but a 16-year-old youth said that he did not believe the woman was raped.

The teen-ager said he spent more than one hour watching a group of men having sex with the woman on the hood of a car, but it "looked like she was enjoying it."

The youth, testifying in the sexual assault trial of Orlando Garza, said he did not remember who any of the men were.

Garza, 23, is the first of 10 men to face trial in the case. A woman reported being kidnapped and sexually assaulted by as many as 23 men the night of March 26-27. The trial is scheduled to resume Monday.

The husband testified that when his wife returned home, "She was just laying in bed and just stared up...then she would look down and start crying."

"She told me that Orlando and the other guys had raped her and that Orlando was the first one that raped her," the husband said before a packed courtroom with a standing-room-only crowd of about 150 people.

The husband said some of the men indicted in the case were friends of his before the incident.

One of the suspects yet to be tried in the case, Ruben Vela Jr., drove up to him and taunted him March 27, he said. He quoted Vela as saying, "We got this girl over there and a lot of guys were doing it to her."

At that point in his testimony, the husband started sobbing and said he needed to take a break.

While he was looking for his missing wife early that morning, some of the the accused harassed and threatened him, the husband said. "It was like the world had turned against you at the very time you needed help."

After the state rested its case late Friday, defense attorney Albert Pena opened the defense by telling the jury that he would show that the woman consented to have sex with Garza and was not kidnapped.

In a surprise move, Pena called the husband to the stand as a witness for the defense.

Asked by Pena if he "beat up" his wife that morning, the gaunt husband said, "I slapped her because she was hysterical."

Assistant district attorney Gutierrez said he didn't call the husband to the witness stand because he thought the defense would object to heresay evidence. But he added, the defense "opened the door to that."

Gutierrez cross-examined the teenager and asked, "They were (having sex) two at a time and you don't remember who they were?"

"There were a lot of them," the youth said. The teen-ager also denied that some of the accused told him to say the woman appeared to be enjoying herself.

The youth testified that after the incident, the men "picked her up off the hood."

The woman testified Thursday that she was abducted while walking a short distance home from a relative's house that Saturday night. The husband said the last time he saw her that night was when she left the relative's house.

The woman said she was first raped by a crowd of men at a ranch where an illegal cockfight was being held, and later assaulted at two other locations.

She said Garza raped her at the ranch first, then the men took turns raping and sodomizing her on the hood of a car. Garza also had raped her three days before the March 26 incident, she testified Thursday.

The husband said his wife initially would not tell him what happened when she returned home March 27. He said she waited until they were alone, after his cousin, Roel Solis, who helped him search for her before dawn, and a sheriff's deputy, summoned after she arrived home, left.

He said he asked her why she did not tell him of the incident until the deputy and cousin left the house. Her answer was "I was afraid that you and (Solis) were going to go fight them and I didn't want you to get hurt," the husband said.

Firm stalls plans for Austin plant

AUSTIN (AP) — Apple Computer Co., the personal computer manufacturer that reportedly was considering building a manufacturing plant in Austin, may have tabled those plans indefinitely, a newspaper reported Saturday.

In the company's secretive nationwide site search, Apple executives were wooed by the Austin Chamber of Commerce on several trips to the capital city.

The company was so intent on remaining anonymous, it was given the code name "Sparrowhawk" by Fantus Co., the industrial location consultant that assisted Apple with its search, the Austin American-Statesman reported Saturday.

Austin became a finalist for the manufacturing site, but this month, Apple executives told chamber officials that it had indefinitely postponed its expansion, following a corporate reorganization.

Chamber of Commerce officials had little to say about the Apple project.

"We don't talk about our prospects unless we have been authorized by the company," said David Rogers, an economic development officer for the chamber.

However, three Austin business sources with knowledge of the recruiting effort confirmed that "Sparrowhawk" was Apple Computer, a pioneer in personal computer manufacturing based in Cupertino, Calif.

An Apple spokeswoman said the company has been looking for a U.S. manufacturing plant site, but its search is in the early stages.

"At this time, no decision have been made on where the plant will be located or when the plant actually will be developed," said Carleen LeVasseur, an Apple public relations representative.

Apple Chief Executive John Sculley told industry analysts last spring that Apple is in need of more manufacturing capacity to meet growing demand, principally the Macintosh models, which are made in the company's main factory in Fremont, Calif.

But a corporate reorganization announced in August may have stalled immediate expansion plans. Sculley said the company would be split into four divisions, each to be headed by a division president.

Jean-Louis Gassee was named president of Apple Products division, which oversees product marketing, worldwide manufacturing and research and development.

Medical branch fires 24, suspends 23 after hurricane flap

GALVESTON, Texas (AP) — The University of Texas Medical Branch fired 24 people and suspended 23 others without pay because they either failed to report for emergency duty during Hurricane Gilbert or didn't return to work after the storm threat passed, officials said.

As Gilbert advanced across the Gulf of Mexico a week ago, UTMB officials in Galveston put the emergency phase of its hurricane plan into effect from 7 a.m. on Sept. 15 to 7 a.m. Sept. 17.

Thousands of Galveston residents left the island as early as Sept. 14 fearing Gilbert would strike. The storm, however, hit the northern Mexico coast during the afternoon of Sept. 16.

Although UTMB closes many of its services during emergencies, it maintains a staff of "essential personnel."

Nine of those fired were on the "essential personnel" list of employees needed at UTMB's seven hospitals during hurricane threats, said Kathy Shingleton, director of human resources. Others fired failed to show up for regular shifts beginning at 7 a.m. Sept. 17, the Houston Chronicle reported Saturday.

People hired for the 1,500 essential job slots sign statements promising to report to work during emergencies, Ms. Shingleton said. Non-essential employees were told when the emergency was declared that they should return to regular shifts starting at 7 a.m. Saturday.

Those fired included two registered nurses, one nurse assistant, two UTMB policemen, one public information writer, two supply technicians, one stores clerk, a worker who draws blood from patients, one laundry worker and 13 housekeeping workers.

Employees suspended for several days included an admissions worker, two supply technicians, five stores clerks and 15 housekeeping workers.

"Those suspended were people who were late returning or who had some kind of extenuating circumstance where they were unable to come back the first day but maybe came back the second day," Ms. Shingleton said.

"We dealt with every employee and talked about circumstances, why they did or didn't come," she said. "We talked about what they did or didn't understand.

Essential employees signed new emergency work agreements during the last year as revisions in UTMB's hurricane plan were adopted, she said.

Gilbert good fortune for Gulf coast couple

CORPUS CHRISTI, Texas (AP) — Call it a windfall — from Hurricane Gilbert winds, and waves.

H.L. and Margaret Kerbow have found 1,164 coins (mostly pennies); six rings, including a diamond wedding ring, and a religious medal since the hurricane kicked things up around the Texas coast last week.

"This wedding band makes my 47th solid-gold ring since we've started — and a lot of them have diamonds," Margaret Kerbow said.

The Kerbows sift through the damp beach sand with metal detectors, shovels and trowels, looking for unseen riches.

A county park ranger said that there were a dozen metal-detecting enthusiasts on area beaches last weekend and that more should arrive for the weekend.

"We see quite a few people after a storm," the ranger said. "I'm expecting a good number this weekend."

The Kerbows are among the approximately 50-member Corpus Christi Exploration and Metal Detecting Society. The group organized in 1963 to research and find the Rock Pins treasure, a famous Texas prize, said club president John Worsham Jr.

From there, it developed into a full-fledged exploration club. Membership includes bottle diggers, rock hounds and archaeologists, but the majority are metal-detecting enthusiasts, Worsham told the Corpus-Christi Caller-Times.

Buried treasure is off-limits to metal detectors under the state antiquities code, which prevents treasure-hunting at shipwrecks dating before 1900. The Shipwreck Act, passed by the U.S. Congress in April, gives coastal states control over submerged historic shipwrecks and protects archaeological artifacts.

State wanted as co-defendant in lawsuit

AUSTIN (AP) — Lawyers representing Travis County officials want the state made a co-defendant in a 16-year-old jail reform lawsuit — the first attempt to bring Texas officials into litigation involving crowding in county jails.

In a separate motion, the county requested premission to sue the state for compensation for keeping state prisoners in the county facilities.

The motions were filed at the close of a week-long contempt of court hearing on jail crowding before U.S. Magistrate Stephen Capelle.

The magistrate said Friday he would rule on the contempt motion in early October and set a hearing on the two county motions in late October or early November.

In presenting the motions, Travis County Attorney Ken Oden told Capelle the action is being taken with reluctance. "But truthfully, we are not facing the problem head-on unless we get everybody in the same room," Oden said.

"The governor's approach has been to hide his prisoners from Judge Justice and to hide them in our jail," Oden said, referring to U.S. District Judge William Wayne Justice, who ordered broad reforms in the Texas Department of Corrections.

Inmate attorneys Bobby Taylor and Pat Hazel said during the hearing that Travis County officials were violating terms of federal court orders governing operation of the jail.

Responding to plaintiff complaints, Travis County commissioners and Sheriff Doyne Bailey said that the presence of felons awaiting transfer to the state prison negates their efforts to correct jail crowding.

Arguments Friday placed the number of inmates awaiting transfer to the state prison system at 328. Testimony presented during the hearing estimated that the number of felons in county jails statewide is more than 5,000.

The felon backlog exists because of population limits Justice imposed on state prisons. As a result, convicts are warehoused in county jails until there is room for them in TDC.

Thursday, Hazel and Taylor filed a motion asking that Capelle order the removal of state prisoners from the Travis County Jail. In response, the county asked Friday that Capelle permit making Gov. Bill Clements, TDC Director J.A. Lynaugh and the state corrections board co-defendants.

Falwell helping raise funds for Bishop College

DALLAS (AP) — Bishop College supporters called on the Rev. Jerry Falwell to help their effort to raise funds to resurrect the bankrupt school, which faces an auction of its assets next month to repay millions of dollars in debt.

Falwell met with the chairman of the Committee to Revive Bishop College, the Rev. E.V. Hill of Los Angeles, at the Bishop campus this week, The Dallas Morning News reported Saturday.

In an hourlong meeting on Wednesday, Falwell introduced Hill, a longtime friend, to a group of investment bankers from Amarillo.

U.S. Bankruptcy Trustee Duke Salisbury scheduled a series of auctions to begin at 11 a.m. Oct. 8 in which office equipment, furniture and other property on the campus will be sold to pay creditors, said Bob Morten, an attorney for the trustee. Money raised in the auctions — also scheduled Oct. 24, 25, 27 and 28 — will be used to retire Bishop's estimated $18 million to $20 million debt.

Bishop once was the largest predominantly black college in the United States and had a national reputation for producing Baptist ministers. It was Dallas' only black college.

Hill declined to name the potential lenders, but he said they discussed the possibility of a loan of $3 million to $5 million.

"Rev. Falwell's ony role was to make this introduction," said Mark DeMoss, spokesman for the Virginia minister. "He is not trying to raise any money or give any money in any way. It's up to these parties to see whether Bishop College can be rescued."

The 108-year-old school was officially closed Aug. 15 after school officials failed to meet a $1.8 million fund-raising deadline. Bishop College attorneys consented to the Chapter 7 liquidation of assets but reserved the right to move it back to Chapter 11 reorganization with the possibility of reopening if about $2 million can be raised.

"Rev. Falwell shares the position of E.V. Hill in his hope the college can be restored to what it was in its better days," DeMoss said.

Hill said $80,000 has been raised since the school closed, but those efforts proved slow and difficult.

"Offers for donations are coming in almost hourly, but they don't always check out," Hill said. "They have ranged from the ridiculous to the serious."

Settlements in lawsuit against priest unsealed

SAN ANTONIO (AP) — Bexar County judges voted to end the sealing of civil lawsuit settlements related to pending criminal charges following the controversial dismissal last week of child molesting charges against a Roman Catholic priest.

County courts-at-law and criminal and civil district court judges cast the vote Friday, stopping a long-running practice of sealing civil lawsuit settlements on the request of parties in the case.

"I don't think we ought to seal anything under any circumstances...What happens in the courtroom is public property," said Administrative Judge James Barlow, a long-time critic of sealing out-of-court civil settlements.

The action comes at the end of a week filled with controversy and criticism over the dismissal of two felony indictments charging the Rev. Federico Fernandez, former parish priest of St. Clare's Catholic Church, with indecency with a child.

Fernandez was accused of fondling two brothers — ages 10 and 16 — in July 1987. But on Monday, State District Judge Susan Reed refused to approve a plea bargain that would have placed the cleric on a 10-year probated sentence.

Her refusal prompted Assistant District Attorney Juan Chavira to have the charges dismissed. He argued that a psychologist warned the two boys would be traumatized if they had to testify.

Ms. Reed, however, said the sealed settlement of a multimillion dollar lawsuit the family filed against the church may have influenced the victims not to go along with a criminal prosecution.

The judges vote also would restrict the types of cases that could be sealed, the San Antonio Light reported.

The judges who voted to change the sealing policy said they believed some judges were takng advantage of a virtually unlimited power to close court records upon the request of attorneys and to promote the final disoposition of cases.

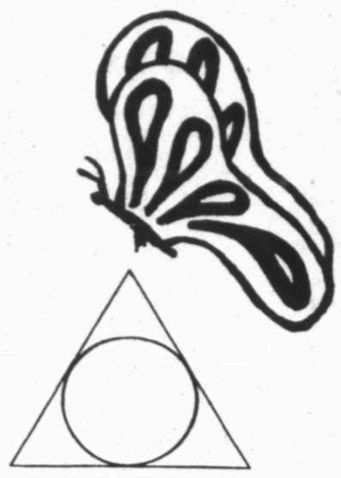

On a motion by District Judge John Cornyn, the jurists elected to make all records of civil settlements open to the public unless attorneys can show they should be sealed under U.S. and Texas constitutional provisions.

Cornyn faced opposition from some civil court judges who feared their judicial discretion might be hampered. They expressed concern about the protection of corporate trade secrets, for example.

But Cornyn said the new rules will protect such cases.

"The need for the rule occurred when it became common practice in this courthouse for judges to automatically, without question, sign orders sealing settlements just because the two lawyers in the case asked him to," Cornyn said.

Candidates ready for tonight's debate

Democrat Michael Dukakis remained closeted with debate coaches Saturday while Republican George Bush came outside briefly and poked fun at his own verbal pratfalls as the two presidential candidates crammed in their final hours before their first televised encounter.

"Who would have thought we would be debating on Christmas night, Sept. 25?" Bush quipped to reporters on the lawn of the vice president's home in Washington.

Bush was joking about a Sept. 7 speech when he mistakenly referred to the day as the anniversary of the Dec. 7, 1941 attack on Pearl Harbor.

Representatives of the Dukakis and Bush campaigns met Saturday morning to work out the final details of the debate, including the choreography involved in getting the two presidential rivals on the same stage. The two will enter from opposite sides and shake hands before stepping to their respective lecterns.

"I think it's going to go all right," Bush said as he took a break in his debate practice to collect the endorsement of the Veterans of Foreign Wars Political Action Committee. "I feel comfortable at this point."

Dukakis, meanwhile, was in a downtown Boston hotel, where he and his aides staged one mock debate on Friday night and were planning one more Saturday evening, said Dayton Duncan, the Massachusetts governor's campaign press secretary.

Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton, met with Dukakis on Saturday and said: "I think he'll do fine."

"I think he should stay on the balls of his feet and be upbeat and aggressive," Clinton said. "I think this is Mike Dukakis' first real chance to stand up there head to head before a national audience as the only other possible alternative as president of the United States."

Bush told reporters that he wants to demonstrate competence and point out ideological differences with Dukakis during the 90-minute debate.

"I think both are important," Bush said. "But be positive, positive."

However, Clinton said he thought Bush would use the opposite approach. Asked if he thought the vice president would launch a negative attack on Dukakis, Clinton replied: "Sure, he has all along. His advisers are good at it."

AP

Tonight's hour and a half of national television time has drawn a predictable crowd of reporters, spectators and demonstrators to the campus of Wake Forest University in Winston-Salem, N.C., where the debate will be held.

It is scheduled to begin at 8 p.m. EDT and be covered live on ABC, CBS, NBC, CNN and C-SPAN. National Public Radio, AP Radio, ABC, CBS and NBC radio networks will provide live coverage of the debate, but local stations have the option not to air the broadcast.

Nine groups of demonstrators were getting permits to assemble on the soccer field, which is well out of shouting distance of Wait Chapel, the building where the debate will be held, said campus security director Bob Prince.

Both candidates were heading to North Carolina today, with Bush arriving first at the airport in Greensboro, while Dukakis would land later at Winston-Salem.

They each were to attend rallies after the debate. Dukakis was speaking at a post-debate gathering at the convention center before going to a fund-raiser, while Bush planned to address a crowd of 1,200 supporters at the old Winston-Salem fairgrounds.

Meanwhile, pollsters warned that an effort to measure the candidates' performance by setting up a 900-number call-in for viewers could produce unreliable results.

The instant telephone survey was organized by political consultants and Feedback America. The National Council on Public Polls said that the system is open to manipulation by the presidential campaigns.

While awaiting trial, North raises millions for GOP

WASHINGTON (AP) — While awaiting trial, ex-Marine Oliver North has become a hired gun for conservative Republican congressional candidates — raising millions for them and a lot for himself to pay his lawyers' bills.

The fired White House aide, whose rigid self-defense in appearances before congressional committees investigating the Iran-Contra affair in 1987 set off a wave of "Olliemania," has spoken in nine states so far on behalf of Republican candidates.

He's signed on to make at least 50 paid appearances by next May, at least 20 of them distinctly political, according to his booking agents.

North gets paid more for making a speech than the average American earns in a year.

Usually, he gets $25,000 an appearance — far more than former President Gerald Ford or former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger command on the lecture circuit. That means North could pull down well over $1 million before he goes on trial next year for defrauding the government and obstructing justice — charges that could send him to prison for up to 85 years.

It is unusual but not unprecedented for candidates for office to pay someone to come into their district to endorse them.

"The one who set the model was Gerry Ford," says Republican political consultant Ed Maye, who has no connection with the North appearances. "For years, you could not get Gerry Ford in your district (for a political event) until you've committed in advance to his library. A lot of us were offended by that."

Another Republican consultant, Roger Stone, says Kissinger also makes political appearances for a fee.

As a business deal, North usually raises more for the candidate than he costs.

In back-to-back fund-raisers in southern California, North reportedly brought in about $100,000 each for two friends from his White House days: Dana Rohrabacher, a senior speechwriter, and Christopher Cox, former senior associate counsel to President Reagan, both seeking seats in Congress.

North's appearances were responsible for putting both over the top in their crowded primary fields, according to Ed Coel, president of the conservative Free Congress Political Action Committee. Coel says North gets far more requests for appearances than he accepts.

The Washington Speakers Bureau gets a share of his fees, and the rest is going to help pay North's legal defense expenses arising out of the Iran-Contra affair, reportedly totaling more than $1 million.

North, who does not give interviews, is facing federal trial on charges that he conspired with former national security adviser John Poindexter to divert money from U.S. arms sales to Iran to the U.S.-backed Contra rebels in Nicaragua at a time when such assistance was banned by Congress.

North has been on the for-pay speaking circuit since shortly after he retired from the Marines last April 30. About a dozen of his appearances since then have been for conservative Republicans, most of them seeking House seats.

U.S.-Soviet talks end with mixed results

WASHINGTON (AP) — The United States and the Soviet Union ended two days of high-level talks with both sides reporting progress in some areas, stalemate in others and a determination to keep negotiating during the waning months of President Reagan's term.

There was a mixed outcome on arms control, forward movement on human rights and continuing disagreement over two contentious regional issues: Afghanistan and Nicaragua.

Summing up the positive aspects of the discussions at an evening news conference Friday, Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze said, "Many practical results will continue to be felt in the remaining months of the administration."

Secretary of State George P. Shultz told reporters earlier at the White House there was a mutual commitment to "keep this process moving...and determination to resolve problems insofar as we possibly can."

And Reagan, asked whether there was sufficient time remaining in his administration to strike another arms-control deal with the Soviets, replied, "I've got four months to go. I'm not going to sit around. I'm going to stay busy."

But Shultz said it was "quite improbable" a new treaty to reduce strategic nuclear weapons by the mutually agreed 50 percent target could be wrapped up before Reagan's term ends in January.

Shevardnadze was somewhat more upbeat, saying the two sides had instructed their delegations to try to work out an interim agreement to place ceilings on U.S. and Soviet long-range nuclear warheads.

"This may be possible," he said through an interpreter. "It will require work, but one cannot be definite now."

Shultz and Shevardnadze agreed that there was little reason to suggest another Soviet-American summit may be held before Reagan's term ends. Shevardnadze said the subject didn't even arise.

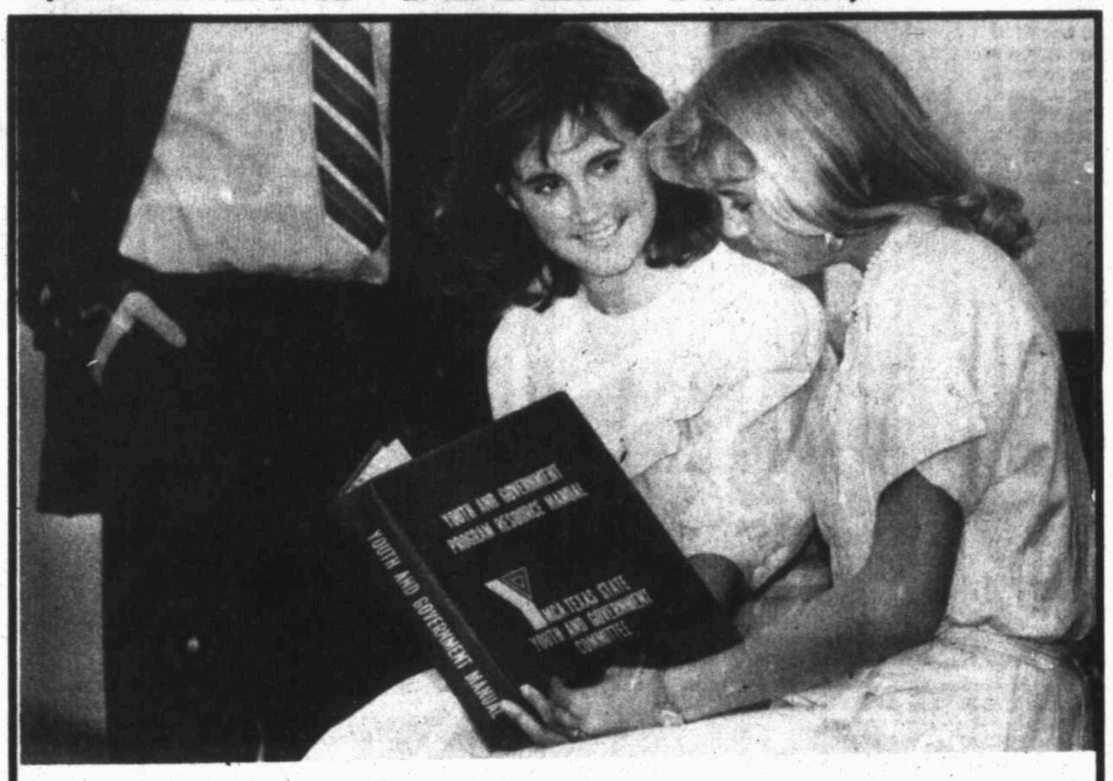

Shultz was upbeat about the prospects of opening East-West negotiations to reduce troops, tanks and other mobile weapons in Europe.

Both diplomats agreed there was progress on procedures to monitor compliance with 1974 and 1976 treaties, both unratified, that limit underground nuclear tests to 150 kilotons. Shultz said Reagan may be able to submit those accords to the Senate for ratification before Jan. 20.

Shevardnadze took the U.S. side to task for refusing Soviet proposals for on-site inspections of naval vessels carrying cruise missiles.

He said the Americans "do not even want to hear talk" about such inspections.

Shevardnadze also indicated there was no progress in resolving a dispute over a Soviet radar facility in south-central Asia. The United States has demanded that the Soviets dismantle the facility, contending that it violates the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty.

After two years of hearings, House passes AIDS policy act

WASHINGTON (AP) — Hard-line conservatives suffered a string of defeats on the way to House approval of a bill that expands voluntary AIDS testing and counseling without forcing states to test large groups of people to get federal money.

The House passed the AIDS Federal Policy Act 367-13 on Friday in much the same form as it emerged from nearly two years of hearings and negotiations.

The act is built on a $400 million-a-year testing and counseling grant program. It also would protect the confidentiality of test results and speed up research into acquired immune deficiency syndrome and the virus that causes it.

States would have to comply with a number of conditions to get the federal funds.

The outcome represents "a decisive rejection of the agenda of the conservative right on the AIDS epidemic," said Nan D. Hunter, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's AIDS project.

With some fancy parliamentary footwork, House sponsors of the measure managed to send their bill straight into a conference to be reconciled with a Senate AIDS education and research bill to which it bears little resemblance.

The maneuver enables supporters to bypass, for now, what would surely be a lengthy and acrimonious Senate floor debate on testing, confidentiality and AIDS in general. But senators eventually will be asked to approve a conference report and some may balk because they never had a chance to debate the testing elements.

The AIDS virus that causes the fatal disease most often is spread through close contact with contaminated blood, blood products or semen; its principal victims have been homosexuals and intravenous drug users.

The House bill, sponsored by Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., represented months of work reconciling the vastly differing approaches of liberals and conservatives to the AIDS epidemic.

Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee, said the bill addresses "gaping holes" in the federal response to AIDS.

"It is good policy stripped of controversial provisions that might divide members," he said. "While people get sick and die, we can debate whether this legislation is perfect or we can act to fight an epidemic that is ravaging our people."

Conservatives had some impact on the final product, chiefly in forcing sponsors to drop a section outlawing discrimination against people with the AIDS virus and AIDS-related medical problems. But hard-liners lost a number of floor battles in a big way.

Attempts to make states test all prison inmates, most hospital patients and many marriage license applicants lost by large margins, as did a requirement that states collect identifying information on AIDS virus carriers.

And just before passing the bill Friday, House members soundly defeated 279-105 an attempt to require doctors to make "a reasonable effort" to notify spouses of carriers.

The bill as passed would give states $200 million for each of the next three years for testing programs; the remaining $200 million a year would go directly to health care facilities serving high-risk populations.

Testing would have to be voluntary and accompanied by counseling. Anonymous testing and the use of pseudonyms would have to be permitted to the extent possible under state laws.

All persons convicted of prostitution or crimes related to sexual assault or intravenous drug abuse would have to be tested. States also would have to collect demographic information about those who test positive and establish civil and criminal penalties for violations of confidentiality standards outlined in the bill.

Health professionals or others who violated the standards, whether intentionally or not, could be fined up to $10,000 for each offense. An intentional violation could result in up to a year in prison; a person harmed by improper disclosure could sue for at least $2,000.

The bill permits disclosure of positive test results under certain circumstances, including to sexual partners and needle-sharing contacts unlikely to be notified by the infected individual.

Total cost of the research section is estimated at $285 million in fiscal 1989.

Textile veto called hard to override

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Reagan's threatened veto of tighter curbs on textile, apparel and shoe imports would be hard to override, say lawmakers who nonetheless are hoping to make the bill law.

"It will be tough, but I think we have a good chance," Rep. Butler Derrick, D-S.C., said Friday after the House approved the bill 248-150, enough to send the bill to Reagan's desk but far short of a veto-proof margin.

The bill, designed to protect U.S. textile, apparel and shoe manufacturers from foreign competition, would freeze this year's imports at 1987 levels.

In the future, growth in the foreign share of the U.S. textile and apparel markets would be limited to 1 percent a year. No increases would be permitted in the level of foreign-made nonrubber footwear imports.

The bill would impose the restraints through import quotas on 180 types of textile goods and 30 varieties of footwear, a system that would be reexamined in 10 years. Countries increasing purchases of U.S. farm goods would be guaranteed larger quotas than otherwise.

The measure would establish a one-year pilot program under which the government would auction off import licenses. It also would establish a special quota on imported silk neckties.

White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater set the stage for Thursday's House debate when he told reporters Reagan "wouldn't veto it until next week." The exact timing of Reagan's action on the bill is not certain.

An override of a presidential veto in either house requires support from two thirds of the lawmakers present for the roll call and actually voting. Textile forces thus fell about 40 votes short of what they need in the 435-member House, which has three vacant seats.

They also fell short Sept. 15 when the Senate approved the measure 59-36.

"That doesn't bode well for an override count but it's conceivable," House Speaker Jim Wright, D-Texas, told reporters Friday.

The textile industry and unions representing its employees along with their supporters in Congress say the bill is needed to save jobs in the face of a wave of imports flooding store shelves. They point to more than 400,000 textile and apparel jobs lost in the 1980s.

"If we are to stop the total destruction of basic industries in this country, at some point this House...must act," said Rep. Ed Jenkins, D-Ga., who sometimes is described as occupying the "textile seat" on the House Ways and Means Committee.

The claim, however, gets a cool reception from the critics, including the Reagan administration, importers, retailers and industries worried the restraints will set off retaliation against products they export.

They say textile companies are flourishing as a result of a substantial amount of trade protection already in place as well as a wave of automation designed largely to keep pace with low-wage competition abroad.

"It's a simple case to the greed of an industry that can never get enough," said Rep. William Frenzel, R-Minn.

He said consumers already pay a hefty price for textile tariffs and quotas but "this fun-loving, neighborhood industry wants to nail us for another $25 billion...that's the level playing field the textile industry is asking us for."

Textile forces countered that the issue was America's future because mushrooming imports are driving U.S. goods off of store shelves.

"I'd like to take this opportunity to remind you that half of the flags we are pledging allegience to were made in Asian rim countries — that is about the amount of textiles and apparels we have lost," Derrick told the House.

Ways and Means Chairman Dan Rostenkowski, D-Ill., told the lawmakers, however, that the textile bill ran directly counter to the omnibus trade bill approved earlier this summer.

"Unfortunately we find ourselves now voting to repudiate the very principles of the omnibus trade bill, just one month after it was signed into law," Rostenkowski said.

He said the farm provision of the bill "merely attempts to buy off the opposition of farm groups" who are fearful of retaliation from Korea and other major Asian textile-producing countries that also are among the largest buyers of American agricultural goods.

Instructor given 90 days for drowning

PENSACOLA, Fla. (AP) — A Navy rescue-swimming instructor was convicted of negligent homicide and sentenced to 90 days in jail in the drowning of a panic-stricken recruit whom he forced under water while other recruits sang the national anthem.

A five-officer panel on Friday sentenced Petty Officer 2nd Class Michael Combe, 28, of Tempe, Ariz., after finding him guilty of the lesser charge of negligent homicide and conspiracy to commit battery in the March 2 death of Airman Recruit Lee Mirecki.

Combe also was reduced one rank to petty officer third class and reprimanded.

He could have been sentenced to up to 18 months of confinement, loss of all pay and benefits and a bad-conduct discharge.

The panel reduced one of the charges from involuntary manslaughter, punishable by up to a three-year sentence and dishonorable discharge, to negligent homicide, which has a one-year maximum.

The 19-year-old victim's family in Appleton, Wis., criticized the Navy's sentencing, which also included punishing four other instructors with rank reductions and fines.

Deaver faces paying fine

WASHINGTON (AP) — Former presidential aide Michael K. Deaver, his lobbying business in financial ruin, now faces the difficulty of paying a $100,000 fine for lying under oath to Congress and a grand jury.

Deaver "has lost most of what he had earned during his brief, but lucrative, period in the private sector and he has little chance of any immediate dramatic improvement in the future," said a pre-sentence report released Friday after the former presidential aide received a three-year suspended sentence for perjury.

"Consequently, he is left without his reputation, with limited economic opportunities," the report said. "This is a man whose career has gone from top to the bottom with almost no chance of redemption."

The report said that Deaver has a monthly income of $5,914 versus monthly expenses of $10,997. Those expenses include a $6,329 monthly mortgage payment on a house that the report suggests could be sold to pay the fine.

The sentence and fine was imposed as a condition of probation by U.S. District Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson, who said he didn't think imprisonment was an appropriate punishment for Deaver, a recovering alcoholic.

Wright disputes probe

WASHINGTON (AP) — House Speaker Jim Wright, under fire for disclosing a purported CIA covert operation in Nicaragua, said Congress should investigate the CIA instead of him.

The House ethics committee on Friday took up a complaint against Wright for his disclosure but failed to reach any conclusion on how to treat the matter.

Wright said it was not his fault that the government's secret efforts to undermine the Sandinista regime by promoting civil unrest had become public.

In a luncheon with reporters, Wright said the State Department apparently chose to make the matter public by encouraging leaders of the Contra rebels to leak his comments in a private meeting last week to a newspaper. But the speaker continued to refuse to specify the source of his information.

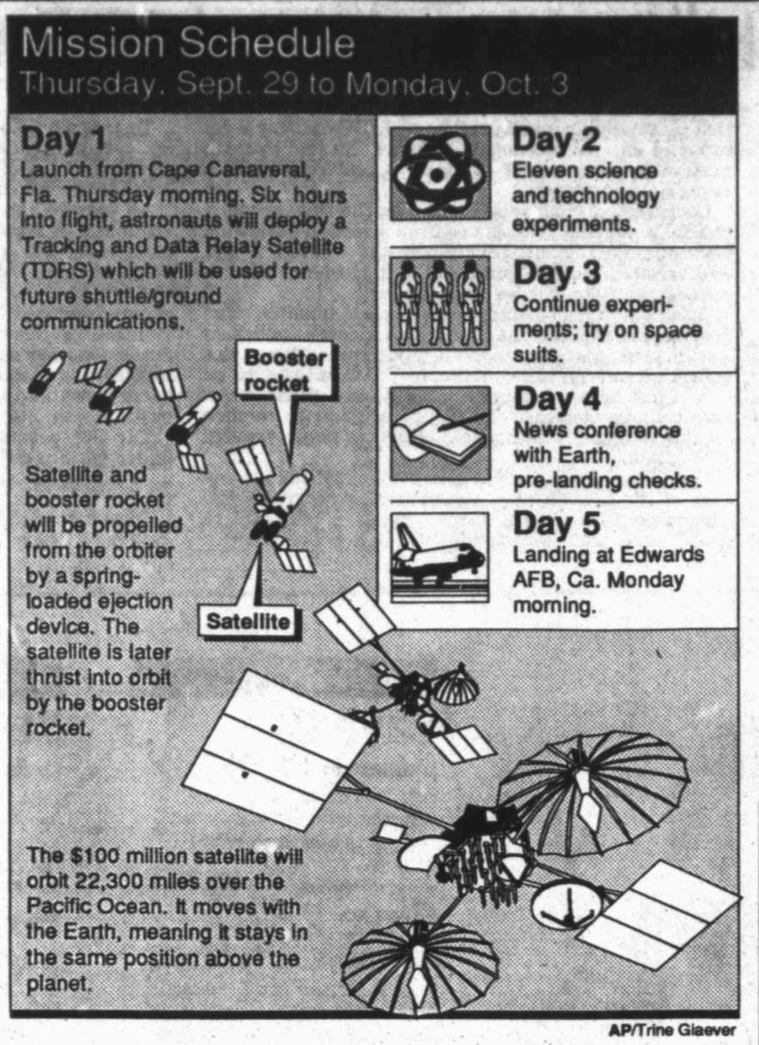

He said that rather than investigating him, Congress should look into the CIA's activities.

Rep. John T. Myers of Indiana, the senior Republican on the ethics panel, said it probably would take at least one more meeting of the committee before decisions could be reached on how to handle the complaint against Wright.

Woman found innocent

HOUSTON, Miss. (AP) — A woman charged with manslaughter for shooting herself in the stomach and killing her 7-month-old fetus has been found innocent.

Jurdine Pulliam, supported by her previously estranged husband, Gary, said she was grateful to the six-man, six-woman Chickasaw County jury for the verdict it returned Friday after about an hour of deliberations.

Launch pad workers prepare for countdown

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. (AP) — Launch pad crews worked through a checklist of final activities Saturday as NASA prepared to begin its first countdown in nearly three years for sending a manned spaceship into orbit.

There was nothing on the horizon, mechanically or weatherwise, to give the space agency any concern about launching the space shuttle Discovery at 9:59 a.m. EDT Thursday, a spokeswoman said.

The countdown was set to begin at 12:01 a.m. Monday, with an extra 24 hours built in to take care of what shuttle boss Richard Truly called last-minute "hiccups."

"Right now it is looking good," said Lisa Malone, spokeswoman for the Kennedy Space Center.

The launch pad was relatively deserted Saturday as a skeleton crew of 58 armed the explosive devices needed to get Discovery's principal cargo — a $100 million Tracking and Data Relay Satellite — to its duty station 22,300 miles above Earth.

All that remained was replacing panels on Discovery and removing work platforms.

Launch officials, keeping a close watch on Hurricane Helene in the Atlantic, believed the storm's course would not affect the shuttle plans.

"The direction and speed of the hurricane pose no threat to the launch," said Air Force Lt. Col. Ron Rand.

The Discovery's seaside pad was last occupied by the space shuttle Challenger, which exploded 73 seconds after liftoff on Jan. 28, 1986, with the loss of seven lives.

The pad, 39-B, had never been used before that ill-fated launch.

The shuttle is flanked by two solid-fuel booster rockets of a new design, incorporated after it was determined that a leak of hot flame from a joint was the cause of the Challenger tragedy.

A number of official committees, including one from the prestigious National Research Council, monitored the booster redesign and testing at the Utah plant of manufacturer Morton Thiokol. All the reviews cleared the new version for flight.

But a CBS News "West 57th" show aired Saturday night reported that three safety engineers hired by Thiokol to analyze the redesign, found "potential catastrophic problems."

"I would never ride a space shuttle...that had a Morton Thiokol booster strapped on it," said one of the engineers, Steven Agee, on the broadcast. "I don't even want to be around when they assemble the boosters and stack them prior to launch. I think that the entire system is very unsafe."

Agee, of Renton, Wash., filed suit in federal court in Chicago earlier this month, alleging he wrote 221 "catastrophic hazard analyses" — ways that the rocket could fail— but that Thiokol failed to forward them to NASA. Agee, hired as a safety consultant, worked at the booster plant in Utah from November 1986 to March 1987.

"We are confident about the boosters we have on the pad and about the test program and redesign those booster have undergone," Ms. Malone said.

There was no answer Saturday at the home of Thiokol spokesman Rocky Raab.

In the 32 months since the Challenger accident, no American has gone into space and the space program has gone a complete reshuffling. Under President Reagan's orders, most commercial satellite deliveries will be made by a private launch industry that has emerged since the accident.

The five-man Discovery crew is commanded by Frederick H. Hauck, a two-flight veteran. The crew had the weekend free and is scheduled to fly to this launch site on Monday.

Radon warnings trigger worried responses

BOSTON (AP) — Federal warnings that cancer-causing radon is seeping into houses across the nation triggered thousands of phone calls to health officials and radon-testing firms from people worried their homes harbored the dangerous gas.

Officials cheered the vigorous response, but had another warning: Beware of fly-by-night contractors who might try to prey on the newly raised fears.

The Environmental Protection Agency sounded the alarm Sept. 12 with the announcement that the gas was more widespread than earlier believed, according to a new survey of seven states that found nearly one-third of homes tested had levels of radon gas above the guideline of 4 picocuries per liter of air.

The colorless, odorless gas is produced by the decay of uranium found in soil. The EPA has estimated that radon inhalation could account for 20,000 of the nation's 130,000 annual lung cancer deaths.

About 10,000 calls were logged at the Massachusetts Department of Public Health, and radon-testing companies reported a boom in inquiries a week after the report that one in every four of the state's 2.2 million homes may have dangerous levels of radon gas.

"I don't think we've ever seen a response like this to anything," said John Stobierski of the Massachusetts health department. "It involved people in their homes. It involved radiation. And it involved cancer. It touched a lot of nerves."

From Wyoming, where the state's chief of radiological services said he and his part-time secretary fielded 30 calls a day, to North Carolina, where five phone lines stayed busy for about a week, health department officials nationwide reported strong response to the EPA's recommendation that all homes be tested.

"It's really a breakthrough in public awareness of the radon effort," said Chris Rice, an EPA spokesman in Washington.

In Pennsylvania, where 37 percent of homes surveyed were above the guidelines, a hotline was jammed with 700 calls a day. And the radon news is affecting real estate sales in Nebraska, said participants at a seminar conducted by the state health department.

"This is the new asbestos," said Mark Dickhute, an attorney for CBS Real Estate Co., referring to EPA regulations that required removal of deteriorating asbestos insulation from public buildings.

Reaction was mild in states not among the 10 surveyed last year or the seven this year, and where no broad areas of radon contamination are believed to exist, such as Texas.

Meanwhile, in states where concern about radon was high even before the report, officials warn there already are cases of people trying to capitalize on the threat.

In North Dakota, where 63 percent of homes surveyed were above guidelines, state prosecutors are investigating a case in which an out-of-state company claimed its $297 shower head would reduce the dangers of radon gas, said Terry Lindsey of the state health department.

In New Jersey, where officials said calls increased 10-fold to a state radon hotline after the survey was announced, the state Department of Environmental Protection said complaints about testers range from reports that air samples were taken in mayonnaise jars to people claiming to measure radon levels with Geiger counters.

Christian, Moslem governments dispute sole power of Lebanon

WORLD

BEIRUT, Lebanon (AP) — Rival Moslem and Christian governments each insisted Saturday that they have sole legitimate power, pushing the already fractured country closer than ever to formal partition.

The U.S. Embassy said it evacuated 22 junior employees, all Americans, reflecting Washington's unease at the political crisis, the worst in Lebanon's 45 years of independence.

The dispute threatened to reignite the 13-year civil war, which has killed about 150,000 people and left no government with real power in Lebanon.

The Syrian-backed government under acting Prime Minister Salim Hoss, a Sunni Moslem, told its defense minister to order army commander Gen. Michel Aoun, a Maronite Catholic, to quit the rival Cabinet.

President Amin Gemayel appointed Aoun prime minister on Thursday, five minutes before Gemayel's six-year term ended at midnight. The appointment violated an unwritten covenant specifying that the president be a Christian, the prime minister a Sunni Moslem and the Parliament speaker a Shiite Moslem.

Aoun rejected the Moslem government's order Saturday and issued his six-man Cabinet's first directive to civil servants.

It told them to "abide only by the instructions of the legal government headed by Gen. Aoun as far as administrative, financial and diplomatic affairs are concerned."

"You are also requested to refrain from taking orders from the former (Hoss) government, whose resignation had been accepted and thus lost its legitimacy.

"Otherwise, you will face legal and disciplinary prosecution," said the directive, broadcast by Christian-run radio stations.

The Hoss government said in a statement after a 2½-hour session: "Defense Minister Adel Osseiran has been authorized to send a note to the army commander, asking him to stay out of politics or face disciplinary measures."

Aoun replied: "The Hoss Cabinet has no legal status." He spoke at a packed news conference held at the presidential palace in Baabda, in the Christian heartland.

"This is not so," Hoss said at a separate news conference in west Beirut. "The presidential powers have passed to my Cabinet because Gemayel had no constitutional right to form another government before he left."

Aoun and Hoss both maintained they were working for the unity of Lebanon and for convening Parliament in an electoral session to choose a successor for Gemayel, who left office Friday.

Three Moslem officers Gemayel named to serve in Aoun's interim military Cabinet have refused to take up their posts.

Hoss became acting prime minister after Sunni Moslem Prime Minister Rashid Karami was assassinated in an explosion June 1, 1987, aboard an army helicopter.

Hoss said Interior Minister Abdullah Rassi, the only Christian in his government, is deputy prime minister. Rassi, a Greek Orthodox, is backed by Syria, which the right-wing Christians regard as their main enemy.

Aoun met Saturday with envoys of four of the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council to seeking recognition of his Cabinet.

The only envoy not to respond to the invitation was Soviet Ambassador Vassili Kolotocha, indicating Soviet disapproval of his government.

But Kolotocha and the envoys of the United States, China, France and Britain held separate meetings Friday with Hoss in west Beirut.

Despite Gulf truce, killing continues

NICOSIA, Cyprus (AP) — An uneasy cease-fire in the Iran-Iraq war has held for more than a month despite daily claims of violations by both sides.

Although the guns have fallen silent after one of the longest conventional wars this century, both sides remain on a war footing and the bloodshed continues as they turn on internal opponents to settle old scores.

Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini told his countrymen Aug. 30 that "we must take it that we are still at war," and urged them to man the frontlines against "constant plots...by our enemies."

Diplomats say Iraqi President Saddam Hussein, who used the war to consolidate his power and eliminate any challenges, will have to keep the lid on tight to curb any dissent that might emerge.

He has already taken advantage of the Aug. 20 cease-fire to turn his army toward the long-rebellious Kurdish guerrillas who fought on Iran's side.

The autonomy-seeking Kurds say the Iraqis have killed at least 4,300 civilians in poison gas attacks in a major offensive in northern Iraq. The guerrillas say it is aimed at wiping out Kurdish resistance.

Iran's sudden acceptance on July 18 of the U.N. cease-fire has intensified political friction between rival factions in Tehran.

That is part of a power struggle that has been building up over who will take power when Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, 88 and reported ailing, dies.

Not all Iranian leaders, particularly hard-line radicals, wanted to end the war. Many Iranians were bewildered by Tehran's sudden turnaround after eight years of sacrifice, destruction and more than 1 million casualties.

Khomeini, who said that endorsing the cease-fire was "more deadly than poison," clearly sought to head off a political backlash by defending government leaders.

"They enjoy my confidence," he said. "Do not blame them for the decision which they have adopted. For them, too, such a suggestion has been difficult and unpalatable."

Philip Robbins, an Iran specialist with London's Royal Institute for International Affairs, said that with the cease-fire, unity in Iran "is likely to disappear."

15 Palestinians wounded; Girl dies in clash

DHEISHE, Occupied West Bank (AP) — Fifteen Palestinians were wounded by Israeli army gunfire Saturday and a 13-year-old Arab girl died of wounds suffered in an earlier clash, Arab hospital officials said.

Dozens of Israeli leftists visited towns and refugee camps in the occupied West Bank and Gaza Strip to express support for the families of 25 Palestinian activists ordered deported by Israel.

"Of all the crimes committed against Palestinians, deportation is the worst," said Elnathan Weissert, one of 10 Israelis who toured the Dheishe refugee camp south of Jerusalem.

Also Saturday, an Israeli navy gunboat on patrol off south Lebanon sank a rubber dinghy, killing three Palestinian guerrillas aboard, the army said.

The guerrilla squad was en route to attack Israeli targets and belonged to the PLO's Fatah faction, a military source said. It was the third reported infiltration attempt by sea this year.

Nahil Tokheh, 13, died at Jerusalem's Mukassed Hospital on Saturday, a week after being shot in the head during a clash in the Ammari refugee camp north of Jerusalem, hospital officials said. The army confirmed the report.

Her death brought to 271 the number of Palestinians killed since the Dec. 8 start of the uprising against Israeli occupation. Six Israelis also have died.

Fifteen Palestinians were wounded by army gunfire in clashes Saturday, including eight in the Gaza Strip and seven in the West Bank, hospital officials said. Army officials confirmed six wounded.

Two were wounded in the northern West Bank town of Tulkarem when troops opened fire on Palestinian youths who stoned an Israeli bank and a tax office, Arab reports said.

Anti-government protesters in Rangoon, Burma, armed with metal darts and other primitive weapons, demonstrate in front of the government's telecommunications office earlier in the week. Scores of people were shot in the demonstration.

Daily life constant struggle in Rangoon

RANGOON, Burma (AP) — The pro-democracy campaign has made daily life a constant struggle in the capital, where residents try to cope with trigger-happy soldiers and the spiraling price of the staple food, rice.

"I lived in Rangoon before (World War II), during the war and after the war up to now. This is the worst period in my life," said Aye Maung, about 65. "Life in Rangoon is now like hell."

Residents have heard gunfire nearly every night — presumably soldiers fighting protesters — since military commander Gen. Saw Maung seized power one week ago.

The government said 263 people, including 238 civilians, have been killed since Sunday's coup. Western diplomats put the death toll as high as 400.

With soldiers, looters and others roaming the lawless streets, residents have been cordoning off their homes, and few dare violate the 8 p.m. to 4 a.m. curfew.

Even in daytime, "people are afraid to go out for strolls," said one resident who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Rangoon has not been Asia's most comfortable capital since Gen. Ne Win ended Burmese democracy in a 1962 coup and began a ruinous 26-year path along the "Burmese Way to Socialism."

Graceful buildings from the British colonial era have decayed from neglect, the primitive transportation system was overtaxed and only a thriving black market kept the economy afloat. A U.N. report has described Rangoon as Asia's most rat-infested city.

Ne Win resigned on July 23 after a wave of pro-democracy demonstrations, and a quick succession of three new leaders long associated with him has failed to quell the anti-government sentiment.

A general strike since Aug. 8 has closed most businesses and paralyzed the government as civil servants symphathetic to the protesters stayed off the job.

Residents who have gone weeks without a paycheck are preoccupied with scraping together enough money for rice.

The price of a kilogram (2.2 pounds) of rice has tripled since July to $2.50, forcing perhaps more than half of Rangoon population's to eat rice porridge or sweet potatoes instead of rice.

Gasoline prices have shot up as refineries closed and military and government departments stock up. Virtually the only way to get gasoline is through the black market. A gallon costs about $21, five times the price in August.

Ironically, the capital's supply of electricity has become less erratic because government factories that are major users have been shut by the general strike.

All banks have been closed, so even the rich have problems getting by. Hawkers of black market goods, who previously ran thriving businesses, have trouble getting customers even with big discounts. Other businessmen, such as small manufacturers and repairmen, also find they no longer have a market for non-essential goods and services.

"People don't come to repair their cars, there's no gasoline," said Chein, an automobile mechanic. "I had to terminate the services of my four assistants. I tried to sell my car at any price because I need money, but nobody is buying. The car is now useless."

Only small roadside foodstalls seem to be doing some business.

But some people say they will put up with the hardships in the struggle for democracy.

Sein Aye, who works at the government port authority, said he last drew his $50 monthly salary in August. He says he will defy the new government's orders to return to work by Oct. 3 — on threat of dismissal.

Priest killed by firing squad to be beatified

MEXICO CITY (AP) — Sixty years ago, at the height of conflict between the country's Roman Catholic Church and its anti-clerical government, a young Jesuit priest shouted "Christ the King Lives" and fell before a police firing squad.

On Sunday, the church will beatify that clergyman, the Rev. Miguel Agustin Pro. It will thus officially recognize him as a martyr killed for his beliefs.

The beatification, a blessing one step away from sainthood, implies condemnation of his executioner, a regime that started after the Revolution and still governs Mexico.

The government still clings to its anti-clerical laws which make it illegal for religious leaders to vote or for the church to own property. But the government in fact lets the church do what it likes within certain bounds.

More than 90 percent of Mexico's 80 million inhabitants are baptized Roman Catholic.

The church agreed to a government request last year to postpone the beatification until after this summer's presidential election, which was won by Carlos Salinas de Gortari of the Institutional Revolutionary Party.

The party was founded in 1929, shortly after the end of the Cristero Uprising against anti-religious laws, and it considers itself heir to the Mexican Revolution of 1910.

Pro was shot on a cold November morning with his brother Humberto and two friends, Juan Tirado and Luis Segura Vilchis. All were arrested following a failed attempt on the life of Mexican strongman Gen. Alvaro Obregon.

Segura Vilchis, 24, admitted he masterminded the plot to kill Obregon by throwing a bomb at his car. Tirado was arrested right after the attempt.

The Pro brothers denied participating in the plot, although a car used in the attempt had been sold days before by Humberto.

There was no trial. Their execution was ordered by President Plutarco Elias Calles, who is considered by the Catholic Church the most anti-clerical of Mexican presidents.

Obregon was assassinated a few months later by another Catholic, Jose Leon Peralta.

Most historians view Pro as a victim of the conflict between the church and state. The revolutionary leaders identified the church with conservative forces and persecuted it. The government closed churches, stripped priests of their nationality and exiled them, and shut down seminaries.

The bishops, for their part, ordered suspension of religious services and supported armed groups that fought the government.

The Mexican Catholic Church has long considered Pro a martyr and pushed for his canonization as a saint.

The government made a public show of his execution. There are photographs of him kneeling in prayer before his execution, standing with his arms open before the firing squad holding a rosary and a crucifix, and lying on the ground receiving the coup de grace from a police officer.

Pictures of the somber-looking priest with the strong sense of humor are very popular among Catholics in Mexico.

Some believe Pro was killed not because of any participation in the plot against Obregon, but because of his clandestine work among labor unions and other working class groups in Mexico.

WORLD IN BRIEF

Leaders vow to slow inflation, help poor

BERLIN (AP) — Finance leaders of the world's seven key industrial powers Saturday agreed to maintain stable financial markets, try to slow inflation and help heavily indebted poor countries.

U.S. Treasury Secretary Nicholas Brady and other finance officials ended day-long talks on the outskirts of Berlin with a statement emphasizing "their continued interest in stable exchange rates among their currencies."

The leaders, it said, "reaffirmed their commitments to pursue policies that will maintain exchange rate stability and to continue to cooperate closely on exchange markets."

No specific mention was made of the U.S. dollar, which has been gaining strength in recent months.

"It is a clear statement of the desirability of the status quo," said a senior U.S. Treasury official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

In addition to the United States, finance chiefs from Britain, Canada, Italy, Japan, France and West Germany took part in the talks at the Villa Borsig, site of the German Development Foundation.

Cease-fire stumps Iraqis

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — Iraq claims it won the Persian Gulf war with Iran, but officials increasingly suspect they are losing the peace.

A string of Iraqi battlefield victories this year devastated Iran's war machine and apparently forced the Islamic Republic to accept a U.N. cease-fire it had rejected for nearly a year.

But Iraq's demand for a permanent settlement of the 8-year-old conflict is stalled in U.N.-mediated peace talks. International condemnation of Iraq's alleged use of outlawed chemical weapons against Kurdish rebels has put the oountry on the diplomatic defensive.

"The present situation is in Iran's favor, not Iraq's," Defense Minister Adnan Khairallah complained last week during a news conference with foreign reporters last week. Diplomats agree.

Iraq claims Iran does not want peace, just a breathing space to rebuild its army before resuming efforts to spread its Islamic revolution.

Hostage freed in raid

LONDON (AP) — Police said they raided a house in north London Friday night and freed a kidnapped millionaire Kuwaiti businessman.

Chief Constable David O'Dowd, head of Northamptonshire police in the English Midlands where businessman Walleed al Humaidh lives, said a man and a woman were arrested in the raid, but that another male suspect was believed to be on the run somewhere abroad.

Humaidh, 38, was kidnapped Monday from the house he shared with an English woman friend in the Northamptonshire village of Brixworth.

O'Dowd said the kidnappers telephoned a ransom demand to Humaidh's wealthy family for 1 million pounds ($1.6 million) for his release, but no ransom was paid.

News media throughout Britain complied with a police request for a total news blackout following his abduction because his life was reported to be in danger when a ransom payment deadline passed without the demand being met.

Police said Humaidh was taken to a hospital for treatment but that his condition was not serious. They did not specify the medical treatment received. O'Dowd said Humaidh was found during a joint operation by Northamptonshire police and Scotland Yard after a tip-off to police.

Midland naturalist Faye Beery holds a disabled red-tailed hawk that was wounded in the wing by gunfire. Observing the bird of prey at the Sibley Environmental Learning Center are 3-year-old Kiri Anne Ulmschneider and her friend, research-geologist Michael Queen.

Center wants to teach youth value of nature

By ED TODD
Staff Writer

Today's deeds shape tomorrow's world.

The volunteer-naturalists at the Sibley Environmental Learning Center in Midland are exposing children to nature's ways in hopes that decisions those children make years hence will be good ones for Earth's sake and their own.

"What kids need to know is concepts — the fact that things are all interrelated," said Emily "Emmy" Ulmschneider, a Sibley Center volunteer-naturalist who is director of education for Sibley's support group — Friends of the Nature Center.

The Sibley Center, which is owned and operated by the Midland Soil and Water Conservation District, is on the edge of a 49-acre site designated for environmental conservation and nature study. A primitive trail in Midland's Hogan Park in the northeast sector of town winds about a pond and into a quasi-wilderness area on the center's grounds.

The concept behind the Friends of the Nature Center's fall classes for children is to bring nature and its fauna and flora closer to the children.

"People protect what they love," said Faye Beery, a Sibley volunteer-naturalist.

Today from 1 p.m. to 4 p.m., the Sibley Center is holding an open house for children and adults who may "learn about edible and poisonous plants that surround us, native plants, reptiles, birds, weaving, insects, crafts, natural dyes and much, much more," said Mrs. Beery.

Parents interested in enrolling their children in the nature classes may telephone the center at 684-6827 or Mrs. Beery at 689-7906. Classes will be held Oct. 8, 13, and 31; Nov. 10, 12, 19 and 24, and Dec. 3, 8 and 10. Seminars and "happenings" for adults are held in the center on the second Monday of each month.

Aside from exposing Midlanders to the Sibley aspects that lean toward the wonders of nature, the open house is to encourage parents to register their children for Sibley's 10 days of classes in October, November and December. Classes will include "Babies and Beasties" in introducing children to "the exciting world of nature" by way of live animals and artifacts and "EarthWatch" to help children learn more about the world and the relationships of plants and animals.

Animals "on stage" in the classes will include birds of prey, such as eagles, hawks and owls, and other birds, including blue jays, quails, night hawks, roadrunners, and blackbirds. The animals are provided by Midland bird rehabilitator Midge Erskine. She is federally-licensed to care for protected wildlife, such as eagles, hawks, owls and turkey vultures, which are orphaned, sick or injured.

Recently, four of Mrs. Erskine's critters visited Sibley Center: a red-tailed hawk named Ute; a burrowing owl called Rascal; a great-horned owl named Bubo, and a ferret called Bucky.

"He (the ferret) would be food for some of those birds," quipped Mrs. Beery.

But the birds don't get around much anymore. And the ferret freely hopped, jumped and weaseled his way about the Sibley Center while the birds watched without flight.

The red-tailed hawk, wounded in the wing by gunfire, can no longer fly.

"She was starving to death (in the wild)," said Mrs. Beery. "And she saved herself by running onto a highway and in front of a car, and someone stopped and picked her up."

Mrs. Erskine is the hawk's caretaker.

"When they can't fly, they can't hunt and they can't survive too long," Mrs. Beery said. The hawk had been living off of road-kills, she surmised.

In telling children about the value of wildlife in nature's balance, the volunteer-naturalists also tell them how birds get injured or sick and often die because of man's recklessness and carelessness.

"We tell them that the (injured) bird is theirs," Mrs. Ulmschneider said. "It's as if somebody threw a brick through their window at home."

The children are alarmed by the analogy and by the hurt of thinking about somebody tossing bricks through their windows.

" 'That's how you should feel about these birds,' " Mrs. Ulmschneider said she tells the children, " 'because each one of them belongs to you.' "

The burrowing owl has been nerve-damaged by insecticides — "never to be released," said Mrs. Ulmschneider. "He's here for the duration. He can fly," she said. "But," added Mrs. Beery, "he's not coordinated enough to catch his own food."

The burrowing owl, which feeds on grasshoppers and other insects, suffered nerved damage after he ate poisoned grasshoppers — locusts.

"It affects everything up the food chain," Mrs. Ulmschneider said of the poisoned grasshoppers.

"As you kill off some of the burrowing owls," observed visiting research-geologist Michael Queen, "there are more grasshoppers, and if you have more grasshoppers, the more insecticides are used. And you get progressively out of balance."

The great-horned owl, Bubo, was taken from his nest when he was young, was fed an improper diet, and his bones became malformed. Like the hawk, the owl is flightless.

"The owl was taken from his nest when he was little," Mrs. Beery said, and was fed a diet of hamburger meat. "As a result, he has rickets.

"He can hop and flap his wings," Mrs. Beery said, "but he can't fly."

The malnourished owl developed a bowed leg and a drooping wing.

"They (raptors) have a high need for calcium, which can only be satisfied if they eat the whole prey," Mrs. Ulmschneider said. "Some people (who illegally capture and possess birds) feed them dog food. Dog food is fine for dogs. But it won't cut it for birds."

Mrs. Ulmschneider noted the value of teaching children about the environment — the living Earth — and the roles they play and can play in it.

"Our future lies with the children," she said. Today's children need to be given the "means to make the proper and responsible decisions for the fate of our planet."

The Sibley Center classes are to enable children to be more observant. "Kids in this generation don't know how to observe," she said. The "most successful" Sibley nature classes are those in which 2-, 3-, and 4-year-old boys and girls are enrolled. Many older children don't seem to have the fascination for nature.

"We have to learn that we are not the only ones living on this planet," Mrs. Ulmschneider said. "And it is not for our destructive use and exploitation."

Mrs. Beery agreed and noted that Americans "are slowly becoming more aware of the destructions we are causing.

"The future is not something you step into," Mrs. Beery said. "The future is something that we are creating this very minute — something we are creating by the things we do. We want to educate the public on nature, so that we can make informed and responsible decisions."

'Bull dog' tenacity earns officer honor

By PATRICK CRIMMINS
Staff Writer

For a quarter-century, B.G. Johnson has been one of the good guys, a white hat, a stocky police officer with a toothy grin, a quick step and a seemingly endless reserve of investigative energy.

But if you are on the other side, if you are a bad guy and rape, kidnap and kill or rob, his colleagues on the force say he is a stubborn, hard-as-nails professional whose dogged persistence helped solve the most intense probe in this department's history.

Johnson, 53, this week was named the 1988 Police Officer of the Year by the Midland Kiwanis Club, the second time in three years he has received the honor.

"He is very dedicated," said District Attorney Al Schorre. "He is a hard-working officer, and when he gets hold of a case he is like a bulldog until he gets it solved."

"He's got the same burning desire a rookie has," observed Billy Ray, the chief of the investigative services division, where Johnson has worked since his transfer from patrol in 1980. "When B.G. gets a case, he won't let go."

Johnson was born in Toyah, grew up there and gradüated from the high school. He met Linda Gorman while in Odessa, and the two were married in 1956. She now works for the city as a police dispatcher.

B.G. Johnson

After an eight-year stint in the Air Force, Johnson returned to West Texas, and helped run a flying service in Pecos for three years.

One day, he picked up a copy of the Pecos newspaper.

"The Dallas Police Department was advertising for officers, and I thought that would be a challenge."

After he took the civil service test, he was told by Dallas authorities there would be an eight-month wait.

As is characteristic, Johnson decided he wouldn't wait — for Dallas or any other agency. He joined the Odessa Police Department at a salary of $340 a month.

After four years there, and stints with sheriffs in Ector and Midland counties, B.G. in 1971 decided he wanted to be a cop for the city of Midland.

"At that time, Midland was the tops in police departments in West Texas," he said through puffs of smoke from an ever-present cigarette. "They had education pay, and better benefits than Odessa. And it was a progressive department."

B.G. was assigned to the streets, and as a patrol officer he prospered. He also continued his love affair with police work, until a pair of aching legs convinced him to ask for a transfer.

"I loved working as a patrolman," he said. "But I finally got to the point, to the age, that I got into a chase one night. Afterward, it was 10 minutes before I had enough breath to talk into the radio mike."

In 1980, his transfer into detectives was approved, and he took off the uniform.

Money helps library help its new readers

By JULIE HILLRICHS
Staff Writer

A friend in need is a friend indeed.

That's apparently how the U.S. government viewed the Midland County Library last year in granting $20,539 worth of federal funding to help 7,000 Midlanders learn to read.

Now that the money's been spent, Midland County Librarian John Deats is wondering whether it was worth the effort.

His answer is an unequivocal "Yes."

Because of the federal donation, Deats can boast of having a new inventory that consists of 543 new books to aid adults with learning difficulties, 16 sets of flash cards and games, three videos cassettes, a slide-cassette module and a poster depicting famous people with dyslexia.

Illiteracy is a "significant problem," he said, referring to the estimated 7,000 Midlanders who never get beyond an eighth grade education and 20 percent of the state's population, which is categorized as functionally illiterate.

The Library Literacy Program, Title VI, of the Library Services and Construction Act grant — now in its third year — is the largest federal program under which state and local libraries compete for literacy awards through the U.S. Department of Education.

In applying for the federal grant, Deats sought to accomplish five goals to supplement services provided by Midland Need to Read, a local group established to combat illiteracy.

The goals were to refine training for Midland Need to Read volunteers and include special techniques to help students with learning difficulties; to improve the quality of literacy materials available in the county; to increase public awareness of the literacy program offered by Midland Need to Read; to attract new students to Midland Need to Read; and to expand the volunteer force who participate in local literacy programs.

"We decided it was not our place, since none of us were psychologists or medical doctors, to take one of these poor students who our tutor suspected might have dyslexia and say, 'We really feel you have a problem,' " Deats said.

Instead, adjunct librarian Martha Powell, who was responsible for administering the grant, focused on acquiring materials to aid adults with learning disabilities and developing training techniques for volunteer tutors.

About 90 student-tutor pairs currently are at work in the Midland Need to Read program, said Deats, who is a member of the organization's board of directors. This represents a net increase of 11 pairs since the project began in October 1987.

With the federal grant, the library referred another nine prospective students to the Midland Need to Read office and obtained the names of 17 prospective tutors.

Of those, nine went through training and were assigned students. In addition, three children offered to help with the literacy program and another constructed flash cards and various instructional aids.

"Often, the literacy student's only source of books in a library is the children's department and they may avoid that area for fear of humiliation," Deats observed.

So, the library built a separate area apart from the children's department to house new materials purchased especially for this group of readers.

"New Readers," is located within a high-traffic area of the library and offers books utilized not only by Midland Need to Read literacy students, but by adult basic education students and other patrons seeking high interest, low readability materials.

In addition, the library bought materials specifically for volunteer tutors. These include handbooks, manuals, workbooks, flash cards, games, textbooks and videos.

With the exception of the flash-cards and games, the books and videos are cataloged in the library's regular collection, Deats said.

MHMR finds funds area's biggest crisis

By CHRIS VAN WAGENEN
Staff Writer

It is a two-tier system — one serves the haves, the other serves the have-nots.

Clyde McLean knows about the have-nots. As exeuctive director of the Permian Basin Centers for Mental Health and Mental Retardation, McLean finds shame in the fact America has abandoned those most in need.

While presidential candidates wage a war on drug traffic, they have all but forgotton those at the lower end of the scale who live in a splintered world of drugs and alcohol. McLean would like to see those funds restored.

"If you have money or insurance, you're in good shape in Midland, Ector and Pecos counties ... there's some very fine programs available," McLean remarked, "But the people we respond too just can't afford it."

In his opinion, drying out in the 1980s has become a horror throwback of the 1940s. "People are doing it in private homes or in jail. There was just no money being spent in this area" for detoxification.

Local MHMR programs, which are heavily subsidized by state funding, were hammered by Texas' energy downturn.

Substance abuse care that used to be offered to low income individuals and families, is virtually non-existent today, according to McLean.

Young Americans want MTV — and Republican president

Ott

It had to come to this. With politics in the news on a daily basis, and a new presidential poll being released more frequently than Tammy Faye Bakker applies a fresh coat of eye shadow, it only follows that MTV would have to get into the act.

And it has.

Surely, you have heard of MTV. It's that channel on cable television that features vampire-like creatures jumping up and down on stage and playing weird music that can be understood only by young people wearing green hair and safety pins in their ears. The actual name of this form of entertainment is "rock video." That's what MTV specializes in. Music videos.

Until now, that is.

Suddenly, MTV has entered the world of presidential politics.

It has taken a poll of 800 registered voters between the ages of 18 and 34, who apparently enjoy watching vampire-like creatures jump up and down on stage.

The results were somewhat surprising.

Fifty percent favored George Bush, the Republican, for president while only 40 percent sided with his Democratic opponent, Michael Dukakis. The other 10 percent said, "Like, wow, man, I don't know." Roughly translated, that means "undecided."

Frankly, the results surprised me.

When I was growing up, young people who sat around in a dark room listening to rock music never admitted favoring a Republican candidate for any office, much less the presidency. That distinction was left to business majors who wore a coat and tie to class and talked a great deal about their economic futures.

The rest of us thought they were just going through a strange phase in their lives and eventually would see the light.

We were wrong.

They, the weird looking business majors, were the trend-setters. Today, young people make up the biggest single bloc of voters in the Republican camp.

My, how times have changed.

But there was more to the recent MTV poll. A variety of questions were asked and results were most revealing.

For example, 42 percent of those polled said Dukakis would be the "most fun on a cross-country road trip." Only 27 percent said they would rather travel with Bush. The others were either undecided or didn't want to be stuck in a bus with either candidate.

Asked who "would throw the best parties," 37 percent picked Dukakis while 36 percent chose Bush.

But, according to the poll, Bush could count on more people showing up at his house for dinner. Forty-three percent said they would like most to have dinner at Bush's home, while 36 percent would like to dine with Dukakis.

Now right off the bat, you might be saying, "So what? That's no way to choose a president."

Under normal circumstances I would agree with you. But since the candidates have absolutely refused to discuss the issues in a serious manner, a potential voter has to get his information wherever he can — even if it means judging their party-giving abilities.

Personally, I've been doing that for years.

That's why I voted for Jimmy Carter for re-election in 1980. During his term in office, he once threw a giant gala on the White House lawn. All of the invitees were southern race car drivers, good old boys like Richard Petty. Barbeque and beer were served. On the program, under enetertainment, the wording simply read: "Selections by Willie Nelson."

Hey, who cares about the Panama Canal when a guy throws a party like that?

Cisneros' terms 'high-profile'

By DAVID SEDENO

SAN ANTONIO (AP) — When four-term San Antonio Mayor Henry Cisneros leaves office next spring, it will close a chapter on one of the most productive, high-profile administrations ever seen by his native city.

The popular Hispanic mayor bridged a gap between rich, white businessmen and poor Hispanics and almost overnight became a national political figure. Ivy League educated, he also helped attract numerous high-tech industries to a city where the Alamo and the River Walk continue to attract millions of visitors and billions of dollars each year.

Retired Gen. Robert F. McDermott, chief executive officer of United Services Automobile Administration and one of the city's top business leaders, said Cisneros was able to lead the city because of extraordinary talents.

"Nobody contemplated that a mayor of San Antonio would do what he has done and he's done it by the sheer force of his commitment to getting things done through his intellect, his charisma, his leadership and his salesmanship," McDermott said.

"I think Henry has given us all enough to do. I think we will continue in that direction and complete those projects, such as developing tourism and developing the research park and getting ourselves involved in manufacturing because that's where the jobs are," McDermott said.

Most civic leaders agree that Cisneros' departure signals a continuation, not the end, of growth for the nation's ninth-largest city. Some also say Cisneros — interviewed as a possible running mate by Walter Mondale in 1984 — is sure to return to politics soon.

Cisneros' own comments about his decision to leave the mayoral job for an as yet unknown private venture seem to support that prediction.

"It is now time for me to undertake the disciplines of reading, reflecting and writing, the most effective ways to bring precision to concepts, to originate new and better ways to build the future," he said in a recent interview.

"I am at heart a public service-oriented person, and I want that service to be based on solidly-formed ideas for a new time and on what I can contribute that is unique and creative," he said.

The 41-year-old mayor also wants to spend more time with his young son, who suffers from abdominal disorders, and provide for his teen-age daughters' future education needs.

The mayor's job pays $5,000 a year.

Cisneros will leave behind a community now debating a proposed $160 million domed multi-use stadium, a regional water plan, a proposed reservoir that opponents say will provide inferior drinking water to poor residents and a public-private education plan that encourages high school students to stay in school so they can receive scholarships and jobs.

Cisneros is praised by business and city leaders, who say he used charm and tough tactics to push through the projects he wanted. Some predict the next mayor may not have it as easy.

"During the Cisneros years, we were on an upclimb on economic growth and property values, but now we're on a devaluation of property values and the revenues are not coming in, so it's going to require us to tighten the reins of city government," says Councilman Nelson Wolff, who plans to seek the mayor's post.

"But I think his greatest contribution was bringing together the very diverse interests in San Antonio and formulating a vision of the community that provided for growth and quality of life issues," Wolff says.

In 1975 at age 27, Cisneros was elected to the city commission with support from a now-defunct political organization run by influential businessmen. At the time, the city was experiencing growth after 1968's HemisFair exposition, but still trying to find its niche in a state dominated by Dallas and Houston.

Cisneros served six years as a councilman, gaining support from a constituency that included poor, under-educated Hispanics and upwardly mobile whites whose businesses were located in the downtown district.

Cisneros' background — raised in a mostly Hispanic neighborhood and educated at Harvard and Georgetown universities — helped him soothe tensions between the business owners and Hispanic residents.

In 1981, Cisneros easily won his first mayoral election after the incumbent chose not to run.

The next year, he wrote his famed "Orange Book" detailing his vision for San Antonio. He then organized task forces to deal with those issues, many of them still at work as he leaves office.

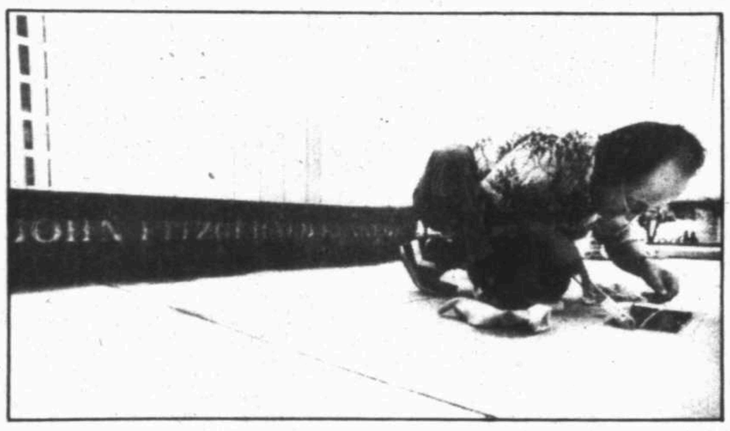

Hispanic politicians and Democrats — who traditionally have enjoyed the support of Hispanic voters — wonder if there is another Hispanic to fill the vacuum created by Cisneros' departure.

"We, in the Hispanic community, helped place him on a pedestal because he is the most articulate, the most widely quoted Hispanic official in America," said Ruben Bonilla, a Corpus Christi attorney and past president of the League of United Latin Ameican Citizens.

John Koohyun Kim uses a tape-wrapped spatula to clean a drain at the Kennedy Memorial in Dallas. Hearing that the site needed sprucing up, Kim took on the job as a tribute to the man he admired.

South Korean native takes on cleaning of Kennedy monument

DALLAS (AP) — As John Koohyun Kim explained it, his labor of love for a fallen President whose ideals and country he had embraced could not wait.

So Kim got down on his knees Friday, not waiting for city officials to give their permission, and began a thorough cleaning job of the Kennedy Memorial in downtown Dallas.

Kim said he had listened to John F. Kennedy's inaugural speech as a youth in South Korea and was "impressed with his celebration of democracy." He later memorized the speech for a high school class and he credits it with helping him learn English.

"I loved him," Kim told The Dallas Morning News.

Upon learning through a newspaper column that the white concrete and marble monument was in dire need of sprucing up, Kim decided to tackle the job himself.

"He was a good man," said Kim, who studies political science and education at the University of North Texas as well as operating a dry cleaning and laundry operation in Dallas.

"I thank God for giving me this change to clean up the memorial. I feel real excited because this thing is good."

Kim, who is in this country on a visa, had asked some city officials if he could volunteer to clean the memorial built in 1970 by architect Philip Johnson. But when told it would take some time to get permission, he decided to get started anyway.

He arrived Friday with cleaning supplies in hand — five brushes, distilled water, rags, cleaning fluid and a broom.

City officials don't mind help from the private sector in helping maintain the monument, said Ralph Mendez, a supervisor with the Parks and Recreation Department. But he added that he would like volunteers to check through the city to clear what chemicals might be used to make sure the solvents don't harm the surface.

Mendez said city and county officials plan to meet Monday to work out arrangements on keeping the site clean.

Kim said he will return every weekend until he is satisfied that the memorial for the slain president is a fitting tribute to the man he cared so deeply about.

"It is my project and I will not charge for this," Kim said. "I am going to try and be a countryman like John F. Kennedy was."

Hospital regains little of money

DENTON (AP) — A lawyer who collected approximately $850,000 in past-due bills for a city-county hospital from 1979 through 1985 paid less than $100,000 to the now-closed facility, a newspaper reported.

In June 1985, collections by attorney Terry Lewis of Denton for Flow Memorial Hospital had totaled $567,000, but Lewis had paid less than $6,000 to the facility, the Dallas Morning News reported Saturday.

In 1985, board members questioned the small amount the hospital was receiving and ordered a special audit of Lewis' accounts for Flow, officials said.

The hospital board turned over collection of past-due accounts to a credit agency in 1986, but members of the hospital board said they remember no other action prompted by the 1985 audit nor details of the agreement with Lewis.

Lewis has paid the hospital $96,571.52 from delinquent bills he recovered, hospital officials said Thursday. Most of that was paid after a professional management team was hired in mid-1986 to manage the hospital.

A former associate of Lewis' told the News, on condition of anonymity, that the attorney collected more than $850,000 for Flow by the end of 1985.

OFFICER

Forty murder investigations later, he is a sergeant who supervises the four detectives who investigate crimes against persons. The work never stops, but from time to time it does become more interesting.

"Any police officer enjoys a case that is challenging," he said, pointing to a stack of file folders. "When you have a big case it is always challenging. You can test your ability when you have nothing to go on."

That ability was tested as never before on Nov. 8, 1986, and for the 19 months that followed. After 9 p.m. on that night, Johnson was called out on a just-reported missing person case. The night was clear and cool, and he remembers the first thoughts he had of the June Gilkerson disappearance.

"My first thought was this is not just a girl out partying — this is serious," he said.

The investigation — which was carefully directed by Johnson's supervisor at the time, Lt. Ron Aaron — focused on a 20-year-old probationer from Michigan, David Alderink. After rumors of an affair between Ms. Gilkerson and Alderink were confirmed, he became the prime suspect. Months later, he was indicted for her kidnapping and pleaded guilty in exchange for a 20-year state prison sentence.

The second figure in the case, 41-year-old Kenneth Wayne Parker of Midland, was more elusive. But after enough evidence had been gathered, the investigators turned to the U.S. Attorney's office, and in June a federal court jury convicted Parker of conspiracy to commit kidnapping for Ms. Gilkerson's disappearance and the attempt to abduct another Midland woman.

U.S. District Judge Lucius Bunton sentenced Parker to two consecutive life terms.

Ms. Gilkerson's body was never found, but evidence in Parker's trial indicated she may have been killed then cremated.

These days, Johnson talks easily about the case, the biggest of a long career.

"David wanted to keep himself out of it," he said. "He wanted to be the innocent person — but he wasn't. We always felt we would get the full story out of Alderink."

"That was one of the more intensive investigations the Midland police have conducted in recent times," Schorre recalled. "It took excellent coordination by B.G. to get the case wrapped up."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Wayne Speck of San Antonio, who prosecuted Parker, had this to say in a letter to Johnson: "In the 25 years that I have been prosecuting criminals in federal court, the Parker case has to rank high among the best investigated cases that I have tried. I was honored to be your lawyer."

Johnson has gained a reputation among colleagues and criminals for his colorful language and sometimes inflexible attitudes. Some would say — smilingly — that what some of the cops say about him is worse.

"He's gruff, there's no doubt about that," Ray said.

"B.G. is very, very honest," according to Lt. Jerry Compton, his immediate supervisor who has known B.G. since 1980. "To B.G., everything is black and white. He says it just like he feels it — he's not a politician. He will not compliment you unless it's exactly what he feels. He's straightforward."

Schorre describes Johnson as "persistent," and says he "is very adamant about the positions he takes."

Sheriff Gary Painter says with a laugh that some descriptions of B.G.'s personality "can't be put into print ... B.G. is a cop. He will treat people with respect as long as he is treated with respect. He is out to do a job and does it."

Painter, who was a Midland police officer when he met Johnson, said the detective is at his best when most officers are at their worst: on the witness stand.

"The attitude he displays in the courtroom is just something else," Painter said. "He's a professional, and he's always got his business together."

Until his retirement — which Ray, Compton and others worry may be years away — Johnson will likely stay in his corner office at the police building, supervising cases and questioning suspects. At the top of the current agenda is the east side rapist, who has attacked four women and burglarized more than a dozen homes.

"We're still at a brick wall," he says of the case. "The evidence has led us to a lot of people, but no one can identify him. But we will get him."

On retirement, he says little.

"This is a great place to work. I hope to stay here until I retire," he says, lighting a new cigarette. "I don't know a sing'e place in law enforcement I would rather be than where I am."

MHMR

"It's not like our board doesn't recognize the problem, we just don't have the resources ... this is something the state and federal government is going to have to address," he says.

But even if those funds were available, MHMR has another immediate problem at hand, namely keeping its low-paid personnel from latching on to better paying jobs.

MHMR used to have two full-time psychiatrists. For nearly a year now, the centers have had to make due with just one. "We've been recruiting since last November, but we've only been able to get two people to even come out here and look at us."

Pay has been the major drawback. While the starting pay has increased from $73,000 to $103,000 per year, McLean said the rate isn't competitive by industry standards.

While he understands that hospitals such as Clearview and Glenwood are in the Permian Basin to make a proift, it hasn't been easy watching MHMR's patient load increase, while resources and personnel have dwindled.

In fiscal year 1988, MHMR reported a 100 percent turnover rate among its 122 full-time employees — employees, he says, that haven't had a raise since 1985. It is, as he described, a discouraging situation.

"We're not competitive (moneywise) anywhere on staff. As a general rule if Clearview or Glenwood want them (employees), they can usually take them," he said, although some workers find the job more important than the money.

Because the Texas Department of Mental Health and Mental Retardation operates on a job class system, McLean says there are certain salary levels that just can't be exceeded.

While the state returned $416,000 to programs, which in turn was matched by local government entities, McClean says even there, MHMR had few choices as to where the money could be spent.

For fiscal year 1989, MHMR has earmarked those funds specifically for in-home and family care, medication clinics and case management.

Under in-home and family care, caseworkers will be assigned to specific clients and/or families to help them cope with mental or physical illnesses. Other monies will go toward providing low-cost medication to indigent patients on an income-based slide scale.

MHMR has just 25 caseworkers — some of which are assigned to 30 or 40 speicific clients, while others work with as many as 200. "We can only serve so many people. ... The tighter things get, the more stricter services are going to become," he said. "The problem is not everyone is being served."

Council to consider contracts

This week, Midland City Council is expected to approve two contracts — with a combined value of nearly $1 million — on the hiring of a management consultant and purchase of computer hardware as well as other applicative software.

The contracts — which are being made as part of a new centralized communication center — are part of a $4.3 million bond package approved by voters on Sept. 17.

Among those bidding on the equipment package are McDonnell-Douglas, IBM, NCR Corp., Digital and Unisys. Total costs has been estimated beteen $600,000 and $800,000.

The city also has received bids ranging from $138,000 to $148,000 from three private consultants, who the city wants to manage and implement the computerized dispatch system, electronic file records and 911 emergency dispatch.

In other business, the council is expected to consider:

- a resolution authorizing an FAA grant agreement that will provide funds to upgrade runway lighting at Midland International Airport.
- extending leases to those airlines serving the city's airport.
- authorizing final payment on a fleet services office building that was constructed near the intersection of South and Carver streets.
- changing the speed zone along Midland Drive.
- approving stop signs at Sunshine Parkway and at Idlewilde Drive.
- an ordinance changing the time for parking to two hours on the northside of Texas Avenue between and A and B streets.
- possible funding for a new traffic signal at Air Park and Big Spring.
- a resolution approving a new damage schedule for oil and gas operators at its T-Bar Ranch property located between Winkler and Loving counties.

County Commissioners

Midland County Commissioners will meet at 9 a.m. Monday in the commissioners' courtroom, located on the second floor of the courthouse.

Commissioners are expected to:

- Approve resquests for the County Exhibit Building.
- Hear a report from County Road and Bridge Superindent Albert Stewart.
- Open bids on automobiles for the County Sheriff's Department.
- Discuss the change-over between Midland County and the Midland County Housing Board.
- Discuss the courthouse bat problem, including air quality.

MISD Trustees

Midland Independent School District trustees will consider on second reading Tuesday night the "uniform training rules" that deal with extra-curricular students' use of tobacco, drugs or alcohol.

The regular MISD school board meeting will be held Tuesday, Sept. 27, at 4 p.m. and at 7:15 p.m. at the administration building at 702 North N St.

At the earlier meeting, trustees will authorize the hiring of new teachers to ease overcrowding at Parker, Santa Rita and Scharbauer elementaries.

Federal grant awarded to Odessa

From Staff Reports

U.S. Sen. Phil Gramm, R-Texas, has announced that the Department of Housing and Urban Development has awarded the city of Odessa a Community Development Block grant of $1,090,000.

The senator said the award for the city will provide funding for improvements to the Ector County Association of Retarded Citizens and the Girl Scouts buildings, Little League fields, construction of a small business development center and for a comprehensive planning effort entitled, "Twenty-Twenty Foresight."

"I am pleased that some of the tax dollars sent by Texans to Washington are being returned to benefit area citizens by financing improvements to the areas where we work and live every day," Gramm said in making the announcement.

The Community Development Block Grant program, one of HUD's largest, is designed to assist communities in carrying out a wide range of development activities aimed at neighborhood revitalization, economic development and improved community facilities and services.

Give five.

What you get back is immeasurable.

Just five hours a week. Just 5% of your income. It's not much to give, to the causes you really care about. But that small investment could change somebody's life. And it's hard to imagine a better return than that.

More than 'show' needed in debates

American educator and intellectual history pioneer James Harvey Robinson once noted that "political campaigns are designedly made into emotional orgies which endeavor to distract from the real issues involved, and they actually paralyze what slight powers of cerebration man can normally muster." With less than two months remaining before the decision is made about who will lead the nation into the 1990s, it's doubtful many voters would argue with Robinson's assertion.

It may have always been this way in campaigns, to a degree, but there's little doubt the situation is worsening. Campaigns traditionally trivialize the importance of issues facing the nation. At one time, it was not uncommon for people to attend political rallies and campaign appearances to hear the candidates and to question them — personally. Even in those days, there was a need to weigh what the candidates were saying carefully.

In recent decades, however, the development of television and, particularly, the use of polls have pushed candidates toward the instantaneous reply and an exaggerated importance on show rather than substance. The unavoidable conclusion is "look good and get elected; look bad and forget it."

Even in presidential debating, made famous by the Lincoln-Douglas debates of 1858 and the Nixon-Kennedy debates slightly more than a century later, the tendency has been more on how a candidate performs than the actual answers he gives to questions or what those answers could mean to the future course of the nation.

The presidency of Ronald Reagan exacerbated the tendency toward show over substance largely because of his background as an actor and his undeniable mastery of the television cameras. While television holds great possibilities for communicating a message to millions of viewers, it also presents the dilemma of emphasizing visual performance — Does the candidate look good? Is he at ease? Does he stumble over words or make errors? — at the expense of what the candidates actually are saying.

In our fast-paced society, it's understandable, perhaps, that candidates must play to the medium — and in the formats — that reach the most people in the quickest time. That fact, however, places an extraordinary burden on voters to determine what is "show business" and what is "substance." Today's televised presidential debate, to be aired from 7 to 9 p.m., will present those watching with the challenge of doing exactly that.

It's important to watch the debates in order to be as informed as possible about the candidates. But watch the performance in the full knowledge that what you are seeing is partly invaluable information about how Michael Dukakis or George Bush each would lead the nation — and part is snake oil dispensed by "spin control" specialists and candidate salesmen.

Watch, but be wise.

Woman battling polygamists in Utah

WASHINGTON — Progress has bypassed a remote spot just north of the Grand Canyon called Short Creek. There are all the signs of civilization — electricity, television, new cars, big houses. But behind the doors is a society so bizarre that an Oregon woman has filed a custody case to get her nieces and nephews out of the town.

Jack Anderson

The tiny community straddles the Arizona-Utah border. On the map, the town has two names — Hildale, Utah, and Colorado City, Ariz. — but the locals call both Short Creek. The distinguishing feature of Short Creek is polygamy. Most of the men have more than one wife, some have three, eight, even 17.

This community is the legacy of a Mormon church policy that once condoned polygamy. The Mormons now renounce it and excommunicate those who cling to the practice. The polygamists formed their own churches based on a belief that God rewards men for the number of wives and children they accumulate.

For the most part, the outside world leaves polygamists alone. The police leave them alone, too, as long as they don't disturb the peace. (The law against multiple spouses is not considered by most police agencies to be worth the trouble of enforcing.)

But is this any place to raise children? Janet Johanson of Salem, Ore. thinks not. Her suit to get custody of her nieces and nephews may force Utah authorities to come face to face with an embarrassing problem that they would rather ignore.

Janet's half sister, Brenda Johanson Thornton, died of cancer Aug. 18, 1987, in Short Creek. Before she died, she signed over custody of her seven children to a polygamist family there — Vaughn Fischer and his wife Sharane. In the five-minute custody hearing, no mention was made that Fischer had a second wife, Katrina, and no mention was made that he had taken Brenda Johanson as his third wife three hours after he met her.

Before Brenda's death, Janet Johanson claims her sister verbally recanted her decision to leave her children to the Fischers. Now Johanson is determined to get the children out of Short Creek. "I can't leave them there. It would break my heart the rest of my life," she told our associate, Daryl Gibson.

The seven children, ages 5 to 18, are the product of a polygamist marriage. Brenda's mother married Phil Thornton, and when Brenda was 17, she became Thornton's wife, too. After 17 years, Brenda took her children and left her stepfather-husband and the polygamist cult. But when she learned she had cancer, she fled back to the arms of the cult. Johanson thinks her sister was worried about what would happen to her children after her death, and feared that she might come face-to-face with God and find out that the polygamists were right.

Cult patriarch, Rulon Jeffs, took Brenda back into the fold, and, according to Johanson, ordered her to marry Vaughn Fischer.

Johanson believes the Fischer home is unfit, and not simply because of an extra wife. She worries about a cult which seemingly treats women as property.

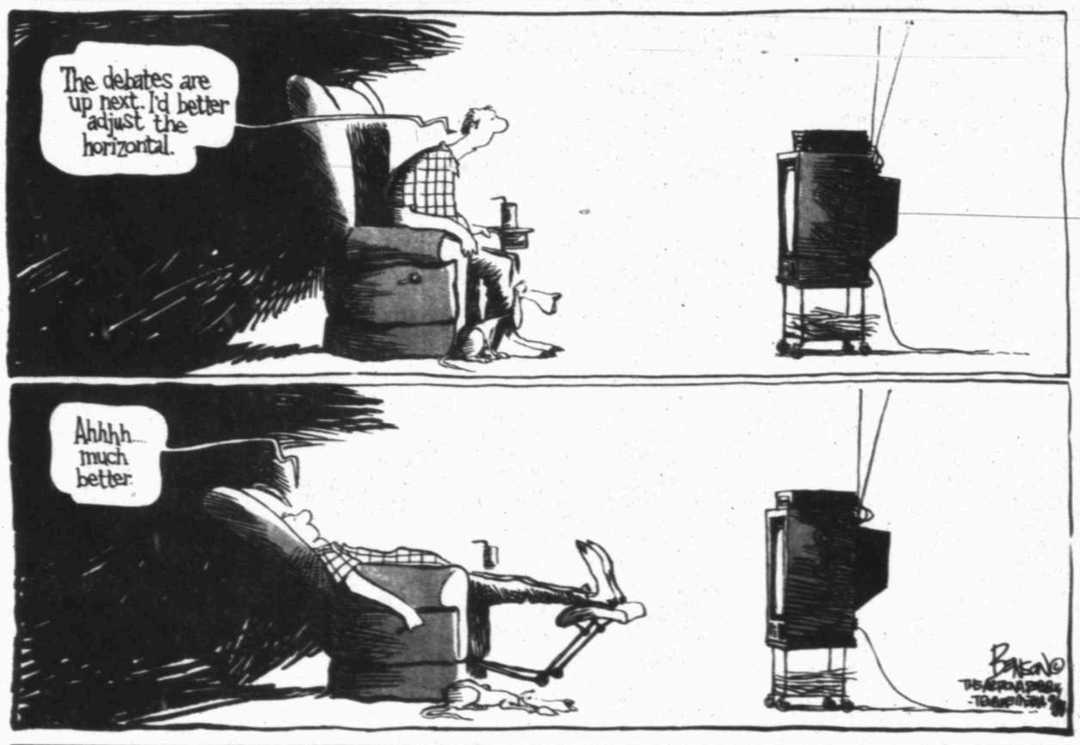

Carl Fischer, 22, of Phoenix, will buttress Johanson's case. He was adopted into the Vaughn Fischer family when he was 12 and fled from Short Creek when he was 18. In a deposition filed in the custody case, Carl Fischer says he was taught at the knee of Vaughn and Sharane Fischer: marriage should be arranged by the "prophet" of the cult; medical help is a last resort after home health remedies and religious blessings; girls do not need a high school education because their duty is to bear children and obey their husbands; personal suffering is rewarded in heaven so women should go without the necessities of life; girls who are caught flirting with young men are immediately ordered to marry older men; Jews, Blacks, Hispanics and Indians are inferior.

Carl Fischer also says in his deposition that "the practice in the community of stepfathers taking their own stepdaughters as plural wives is not uncommon."

Since Short Creek residents are discouraged from fraternizing with the outside world, "The children are, in effect, confined within an informational vacuum. The polygamist leaders refer to it as 'raising calves in a stall,'" Carl Fischer said.

A judge in Utah will decide in a hearing in December whether Janet Johanson is right about Short Creek being no place for her sister's children to grow up.

Debate scorecard counteracts 'spin control'

WASHINGTON — Reams of copy offering sage advice on debating technique will be directed at both candidates before they climb into the arena in Winston-Salem this Sunday.

William Safire

Not in this space.

The individual viewer, however, yearns for criteria by which to judge the contest and resist the "spin control" of partisan opinion-manipulators. In the light of that need, this pundit shall not flag or fail.

Neither of the participants is likely to score a knockout, but one might win on points, just as Walter Mondale did in 1984's opener (and a lot of good it did him).

Here is a handy-dandy debate scorecard designed to transform the most cottage-fried couch potato into an eyes-narrowed participant in the democratic process.

1. Stage presence. A would-be leader of the free world should not appear uncomfortable standing in front of his constituency. We do not elect presidents to transmit what FDR called "fear itself." A slight nervousness at the start is permissible, even becomingly human, but after the first round any verbal gaffes or outbreaks of sweat on the upper lip are a sign of crucible cave-in. For the contestant better able to put us at our ease and instill confidence, score one point.

2. Willingness to focus on the topic. If the question is about advice to the president about ransom payments and the answer ringingly affirms the need for confidentiality of advice (or includes the words "indivisible, under God"), the other guy gets the point; same if the question is about immediate modernization of our vulnerable missiles and the answer slips into consultation with Congress or money for star schools.

3. Ability to pounce on a mistake. In the one-minute rebuttals to the two-minute answers, the tendency will be to repeat often-made attacks on the general subject. Watch for the rebutter able to listen to the other man's answer, select something specific and use that as a springboard for a quick tirade. Riposte-manship must be alert and not seem canned.

4. Omnidirectional answering. The best answers will (a) respond directly to the reporter, then (b) reach out to the viewers with a key campaign theme and (c) include a challenge or must-be-defended shot at the rebutter that will take time away from his counterattack. The most adept "panel debater," like the best pool player, leaves his opponent with a difficult shot.

5. Trap-setting. Mondale's handlers adeptly set up Reagan for a prepared rebuttal, which showed sophisticated planning. Under the restrictions of panel debating, this requires holding a counterblast until the end of your two-minute response, thereby demonstrating a long attention span as well as an ability to carry a grudge, both useful in the Oval Office.

6. Lead-stealing. Which man has the wit to depart from the tried-and-true despite demands from his nervous handlers to play everything safe? A new position, a fresh (but good-humored) attack or a slam-bang locution growing out of the occasion provides a sight-bite that would influence the second wave of "influential" reaction.

7. Using the gracious stiletto or the boomeranging bludgeon. Subtract a point for any candidate who oversteps the line of forced civility. Mr. Nice Guy loses on the campaign trail but Mr. Wise Guy loses in the TV studio: "There he goes again" is the outer limit of imputing deliberate falsification. The candidate who questions the other's "judgment, not patriotism" in the other's presence invites an incensed reaction that will draw sympathy to the victim (unless he seems to be whining, in which case give the point to the slugger). Score one point for aggressiveness, deduct two for excessiveness.

8. Subliminal trigger-pulling. Count the times Dukakis uses the words "tough" and "strong," versus the number of mentions Bush gives "liberal" and "leadership." Award a point to the man who resists programming and uses fewer obvious advertising triggers.

9. Trust. Set aside the tricks, the looks, the footwork, the catch phrases; score five points for the one who makes you feel more comfortable with his thumb on the button.

Coolness, grace, character; intelligence, gravitas, originality; experience, charisma, ideology; all these count, but no computer can fathom the mystery that goes into the bonding between the leader and the led.

For undecided millions, that bond will begin to take hold on Sunday night; clip out this scorecard and be part of it.

Attacking Dukakis' ACLU support risky

AUSTIN — As the 1988 presidential campaign continues to degenerate into a battle of broad generalities and flag-waving, tank-driving symbolism, it's time to tackle what Texas Republicans see as a major issue: Mike Dukakis' membership in the ACLU.

Levine

Tom Loeffler, co-chairman of George Bush's campaign in Texas, brands Democrat Dukakis' "card-carrying" status in the American Civil Liberties Union as just one more reason Texans should reject the "ultra-liberal" from Massachusetts.

Two points warrant some discussion here. First, the ACLU isn't quite as "liberal" as Loeffler suggests. Secondly, when — and precisely because — it adopts its unpopular positions, the group is protecting us all from what Lord Acton called "the one pervading evil of democracy, — the tyranny of the majority."

In a recent press release, Loeffler discusses some of the ACLU's unpopular stands: that our First Amendment freedoms protect child pornography and other smut, that churches and synagogues should lose their tax-exempt status, that prostitution should be legal, that the words "under God" don't belong in the Pledge of Allegiance and that all but the worst criminals should serve probated sentences in their hometowns.

Granted that's some pretty liberal stuff that could sway some Texans' votes. Loeffler asks Dukakis to turn in his ACLU card or disavow those positions.

But what about these other statements, taken from various ACLU handbooks:

- That a woman has a right to demand that another female be present when a male gynecologist is performing a pelvic examination;
- That crime victims "have the right to be free from threats of intimidation and retaliation by persons who want to prevent them from reporting a crime or testifying in a criminal trial;"
- That the mentally retarded have the right to receive an education;
- That the elderly who contributed to the system have the right to receive Social Security benefits;
- That the Constitution protects parents "from unreasonable or unnecessary intrusion by the state into family life;" and
- That men and women injured in uniformed service to their country have a right to treatment and compensation.

Now are we to believe that Bush, not a member of the ACLU, disagrees with those positions? Should the Democrats demand that Bush either join the union or issue public statements of support?

Obviously not. The "ACLU issue" is just one more example — like the Pledge of Allegiance issue — of the Republicans' strategy of indictment by over-generalization.

But even beyond the specific issues, beyond the campaign, comes the true purpose of the American CIVIL LIBERTIES Union. Making points similar to Loeffler's, conservative columnist and former Ronald Reagan speechwriter Pat Buchanan compares Dukakis' ACLU membership with some Republicans' links to the John Birch Society in the 1960s. If it was fair to demand that Richard Nixon repudiate any Republican associated with the Birchers, Buchanan asks, why is it "McCarthyite" to ask the same of Dukakis and the ACLU.

The difference, of course, lies in the groups' foundations. The Birch Society is anti-communist at all costs; a legitimate though extreme political position, but a political position nonetheless. The ACLU is pro-Constitution at all costs, a far more fundamental position.

The ACLU comes under attack when it defends the basic constitutional rights of unpopular groups of people, usually minorities. I don't know that it's happened, but there's no reason to believe the ACLU wouldn't defend the Birchers' rights to free speech.

The union also gathers arrows because it opposes what many Americans believe is a bedrock of our society: majority rules. In a reverse-elitist manner, the ACLU recognizes that the Constitution, particularly the Bill of Rights, protects minorities from the abuses of majority rule.

As Abraham Lincoln said on a cold March afternoon 117 years ago: "If by the mere force of numbers a majority should deprive a minority of any clearly written constitutional right, it might, in a moral point of view, justify revolution — certainly would if such a right were a vital one."

Questions could make candidates shrivel

WASHINGTON — Some questions that could cause Sunday night's debaters to shrivel up like salted snails:

For Dukakis: You campaigned in the streets of Cambridge with Helen Caldicott, the Australian extremist, in favor of a "nuclear freeze." Yet you adore the INF agreement which was made possible by deployments of Pershings and cruise missiles that you and people like her opposed. In early August, you said you still favored a freeze (although later your staff told you that you no longer did). Do you not owe the nation an explanation and an apology? And while you are explaining things: Two weeks after you promised to spend billions on SDI, you mailed a fund-raising letter promising to "put an end to the dangerous Star Wars fantasy." Say what?

George F. Will

For Bush: Talk about debates, the Reagan-Bush administration is having a dandy debate with itself. It embraces the Scowcroft Commission endorsement of mobile missiles as a response to the vulnerability of our land-based deterrent. It favors the mobile Midgetman and a mobile basing mode for MX. But the administration has proposed a ban on mobile missiles, because mobility complicates verification and thus interferes with the fetish of arms control. Do you know which side of the debate you are on tonight?

For Dukakis: You are the only governor who opposed his state's participation in the GWEN (Ground Wave Emergency Network) project to provide the President with command-and-control communications capable of surviving a Soviet first strike. A spokesman for you still says what you said in your 1986 letter to the Air Force, that such a system would make nuclear war more likely. But how can there be deterrence if the enemy knows the United States lacks the capability to conduct a counterattack?

For Bush: Gorbachev wants a more efficient communism. Do you? If so, why? If not, will you link Soviet access to U.S. and multi-national economic institutions to changes in Soviet behavior, specifically to an end to arms shipments to Nicaragua?

For Dukakis: You opposed not only the liberation of Grenada but also the use of U.S. forces to plant democracy in the Dominican Republic in 1965. Is it a Dukakis Doctrine that two more dictatorships in this hemisphere would not matter?

For Bush: Your solution to the budget deficit is a "flexible freeze" of spending. Isn't that an oxymoron, the adjective nullifying the noun? To dispel the suspicion that flexibility would be used to appease every clamorous constituency, name the big-ticket programs you would not be flexible about.

For Dukakis: Congress howled when Attorney General Meese, acting on the "sauce for the gander" principle, ended Congress' immunity to special prosecutors. Was Meese right? Or do you think the Democratic-controlled Congress should be exempt from the rules it writes for others?

For Bush: Assuming that business cycles have not been banished, there will be recession. How far will the dollar collapse and how high will interest rates soar when the next recession turns the annual Reagan-Bush budget deficit of $150 billion into a $300 billion Bush-Quayle deficit?

For Dukakis: You support the Supreme Court's 1973 abortion ruling that a fetus is at no point a person with rights. But intra-uterine medicine now makes possible surgery and other therapy on fetuses. Can a fetus be a patient but not a person? Should the Hypocratic Oath — "First, do no harm" — protect fetuses at least in the second and third trimesters?

For Bush: Before the Republican National Convention you said, "Watch my vice-presidential decision. That will tell all." All?

For Dukakis: Campaigning in Iowa, you boasted of being a "card-carrying member" of the American Civil Liberties Union. The official ACLU policy guide says, among many other things: there should be no tax-exempt status for churches and synagogues; the words "In God We Trust" should be taken off the currency and "Under God" should be stricken from the Pledge of Allegiance; drug use and prostitution — including street solicitation — should be legalized; homosexuals should have a right to marry and be foster parents; all prisoners, regardless of their offenses, should be released from prison and allowed to return to their last place of residence to vote. Why are you carrying that card? And on a related matter: The next President will reshape the Supreme Court. You and other opponents of Robert Bork stressed concern about "privacy" rights. Consider an issue currently being litigated: Do people who engage in homosexual acts have a constitutional privacy right to serve in the military?

For Bush: If during your presidency anyone proposes a plan as cockeyed as giving arms to the Ayatollah, do you expect Vice President Quayle to respond as you did, or do you expect him to object vigorously?

BILL MODISETT

'Last Temptation' question of faith or question of rights?

The battleground defined by the movie "The Last Temptation of Christ" renewed age-old questions, many based in Christianity, and put Christians in the awkward position of having to accept a movie challenging their ecumenical sensibilities or choosing to support censorship, an entangling and dastardly web in a democratic society. The answers to what to do about the movie, however, aren't quick in coming nor will they be acceptable to many who object to the film.

Modisett

The concern of Christians in the debate over whether the movie should be allowed public consumption is understandable. Many believe the body of their faith is being attacked by the movie. Many want to strike back with their Christian righteousness.

But those who assert that the movie is merely a creative examination of the life of Christ, as based on a novel, and as such is fully deserving of First Amendment protections also have a valid point.

It must be noted here that I haven't seen the movie, but would love to — and not, as you might presume, because of the scandalous nature of it. I'm a Christian; that's my faith, and as such is extremely personal. But I'm employed as a newsman and when a question is raised about the propriety of any creative work, I want to see it for myself to make my own determination of its merits.

There are particular points that can be addressed, however, even if one has not seen the movie. Was the subject matter suitable for presentation to the public? Is it "right" to object to the film on a religious basis? Should the film be permitted protection on First Amendment grounds? Is the constitutional right of freedom of speech exceeded by this movie?

First of all, director Martin Scorsese's movie, from what I have read, is not an attempt to depict the spiritual Christ but rather to express the dilemma posed by the duality of Jesus as he struggled with his roles of God and man. In that regard, Nikos Kazantzakis' novel raises some questions that must be weighed by the viewer not as truth but as possibility. What would have happened if ...? A good example of that is the much-discussed sexual sequence in the movie.

While the Bible teaches that Christ was God, His undeniable duality underscored in Scriptures indicates that He did confront human desires, human sexuality presumably among them. Viewers obviously must be the only ones to determine whether the movie deals with that question in proper fashion or is blasphemous, defined as irreverence toward God.

But is it irreverent toward God to question the humanness of Christ when the Christian religion asserts that followers accept Christ as God in the form of man.

I'm not a Biblical scholar and confess that I don't have the answers to all the questions about this movie from a religious standpoint. But there is an angle to it I do understand a little better: the First Amendment concerns.

When I get the opportunity to see the movie, I will see it for the reason cited earlier. It's because of the First Amendment that I can make that choice. So can you.

That right should be cherished because in many countries people are told what they can hear, and what they will accept. That stifles the search for truth, and the truth is one thing Christianity supports without fail.

Our form of government, which is based to large extent on individual responsibility, is not unlike the Christian religion, which is also based on individual acceptance of Jesus Christ as the Savior. Each person has the choice of either accepting or rejecting Jesus Christ.

This country's forefathers stressed education so that everyone could learn to read the Bible and make the decision posed by Christianity, along with other concerns.

Isn't it logical, then, that each of us should have the opportunity to see this movie, if we so choose, but also to decline if we don't want to see it. That's the responsibility portion of our freedom of speech. One can't have a freedom devoid of responsibility.

Some might argue that there also is a need for individual responsibility in the realm of the topics artists will undertake. But on that point it must be noted that artistic creativity must have virtually unlimited status in order to be fully effective. Otherwise, society gets into the dangerous position of determining what is right for all people. Certainly there is room for guidelines where social mores are concerned; that's what we operate with now. But determining where the line of acceptability is in regard to any topic, for all of society, is the question that must be resolved in each case.

Then there are probably the most important questions about this movie: Does it serve Christianity or was it even intended to? Is it blasphemous?

A lot of Christians opposed to the movie will tell you no in no uncertain terms to the question of whether it serves Christianity. They contend the movie is blasphemous and deserves to be banned. But in this society based on tolerance, that isn't the only point of view.

At least one interpretation of the movie holds that in Jesus being tempted with the possibility of leading a "normal" life but rejecting it, He overcame a very definite temptation — the last temptation. That interpretation definitely is pro-Christian. I believe it probably is the accurate interpretation of the movie, as was intended.

But opinions about the movie will vary. They always do. People are given a choice about whether to accept the teachings of Christianity. Americans, because of the U.S. Constitution, are given the choice of whether or not they want to see or read any specific film, book or other creative endeavor. They're given the ultimate responsibility of determining whether the books or movies being offered for public consumption are suitable for the young or even for adults.

Tolerance isn't always the easy way around a dilemma — either for people in a free society or for Christians. But in this instance, and a thousand more still to come it is the only acceptable way.

LETTERS

Controversial letter had its place, too

The greatest blessing in my life is being born an American. America is a democratic land where all have not only the rights but also the obligations of participating in the governing of our country. We do this by voting and expressing our ideas in other ways. However, the apathy of most leaves the rules being made by a minority. I find it difficult to accept apathy, allowing manipulation of the many by a few.

Granted, we elect officials in whom we place the trust to do what is best for us, but how can they know our feelings if they are not expressed?

A recent letter of mine generated a great deal of controversy and expression for which I am grateful. Perhaps debates, where both sides of the issue are fully discussed, are the answer to ridding our community of the apathy that now exists.

I voted and will again. Hopefully you did, too. When we, as Americans, are given the opportunity to express our voices, we must. If we don't vote, our rights may eventually be taken away and we will be ruled by a dictatorship government rather than the democratic government that our forefathers established, and many have died for.

Thank God for the freedoms we all enjoy and for having the good fortune to be Americans.

City should replace Lamesa soccer fields

As a soccer player in Midland I feel that the city and state should replace the fields taken away by the widening of Lamesa Road. This will have a negative impact on my teammates and me.

I have learned teamwork and sportsmanship, and made many, many friends playing soccer.

Repression doesn't work, history says

I am responding to a letter (Sept.13) supporting the censorship of "The Last Temptation of Christ." I am concerned because the letter reminds me that censorship has been and is justified in countries other than our own.

I am sure that the leaders of Fascist Italy and Nazi Germany could justify censorship in the 1930s and 1940s. I know that censorship is a common occurrence in the Soviet Union in the 1980s. I oppose censorship in Midland because in a democracy the right to decide what to read or what to watch is what makes our country great.

If our local censors looked to their own historical past they would realize that repression doesn't work. Didn't the Romans fail when they tried to censor the early Christians?

It's not the farmer who names the price

In response to the published letter to the editor of Sept. 8, I have a rebuttal.

First, the American farmer has no control over the price received for crops grown. These prices are set, believe it or not, by the very basic forces of supply and demand.

Secondly, any increase seen in the supermarket or grocery store price paid by the average consumer is not the result of manipulations of the "...drought-stricken farmers gouging food prices" as stated by the obviously ill-informed Ms. Elinore Chase of Midland. The increases in food prices seen recently are the result of profit-taking by the corporate middlemen; the farmers are not reaping any benefit from the drought. If you don't believe this, ask a farmer, a person whom Ms. Chase has probably never met.

Finally, before Ms. Chase and others feel it necessary to comment on subjects such as this, it might behoove them to learn a bit more about the problem. It would be nice if the situation were as simple as Ms. Chase thinks. If you don't believe this, ask a farmer.

Readers' views on: Bond issue

Police employee offers his thanks

In regard to the recent bond election, I am an employee of the city of Midland's police department and I am writing to express my personal thanks to those people who showed their support for us by voting "yes" on Proposition 4 for public safety.

Though some citizens were not aware, this particular bond proposal was crucial for the Midland Police Department. Crucial not only for the improvement, but for the maintaining of equipment needed to provide the continued service expected by the citizens of our community. This equipment will not only benefit the officers in the performance of their duties, but will also be passed along to you, the citizen.

It has been a morale uplift for myself and others at the department, knowing that our citizens are not ones to make unfair expectations of their police officers by requiring a sustained level of service with antiquated equipment. Understanding that support requires support, you, as citizens, have shown yours by providing the the necessary equipment needed so the police officers can, in return, provide the best level of service for you.

City fathers don't get the message

Our city fathers are not keeping in touch with the feelings and wishes of people in Midland. When the voters said "no, no, no" to the proposed bond issues, our city manager responded with: "Maybe we just didn't do a good job selling it" (Sunday, Sept. 18). They are now planning to have more spending issues brought before Midlanders in the near future. Same spending plans in new packages.

With few exceptions everyone I heard discussing the issues, before Saturday's election, was against spending. No new taxes. No unnecessary spending. No, no, no. That's what they were trying to say at the polls.

Perhaps we Midlanders should do a better job of getting our message across. Write letters to our city council members and school board members (our most uncontrolled spenders), and let them know that we are going to continue to say no to any spending proposition, until our economy is more stable.

Electorate decides it will run the show

Well, the voters of Midland have decided not to put the foxes in charge of guarding the henhouse.

I refer, of course, to the defeat of most of the bond issue proposals.

Since the mayor and city council are so inept at handling the taxpayers' money, the electorate has decided that they would be no better at handling much more of our money.

In voting a tax increase, instead of cutting expenses, the mayor and the council have proved that they are on a "tax and spend" kick, and are not deserving of wasting more of the taxpayers' money.

SPEAKING OUT

Assembly changes name, but not role

By JOANIE HOLT

Joanie Holt is president of the Arts Assembly of Midland.

The formation of an arts council was one of the goals of the Objectives for Midland for the Eighties, and it was this that the Midland Arts Assembly (now Arts Assembly of Midland) was formed in December 1981 to serve as a clearinghouse — a promotional and public relations vehicle to promote the arts and stimulate community participation as audiences, as members, as leaders, and as donors to the arts; a referral agency and an educational resource, and the organizers of an annual arts festival. The board of trustees was elected in 1982 and the city of Midland provided $20,000 from hotel/motel tax revenues as a financial starting base.

In June 1983 the Arts Assembly officed and worked closely with the chamber of commerce, and is still working and cooperating with the chamber. We now have offices in the Texas American Bank Tower, thanks to TAB, which donates this office space free of charge to the Arts Assembly. Staff has increased to two fulltime employees and a coordinator for the Celebration of the Arts who works from December through May each year.

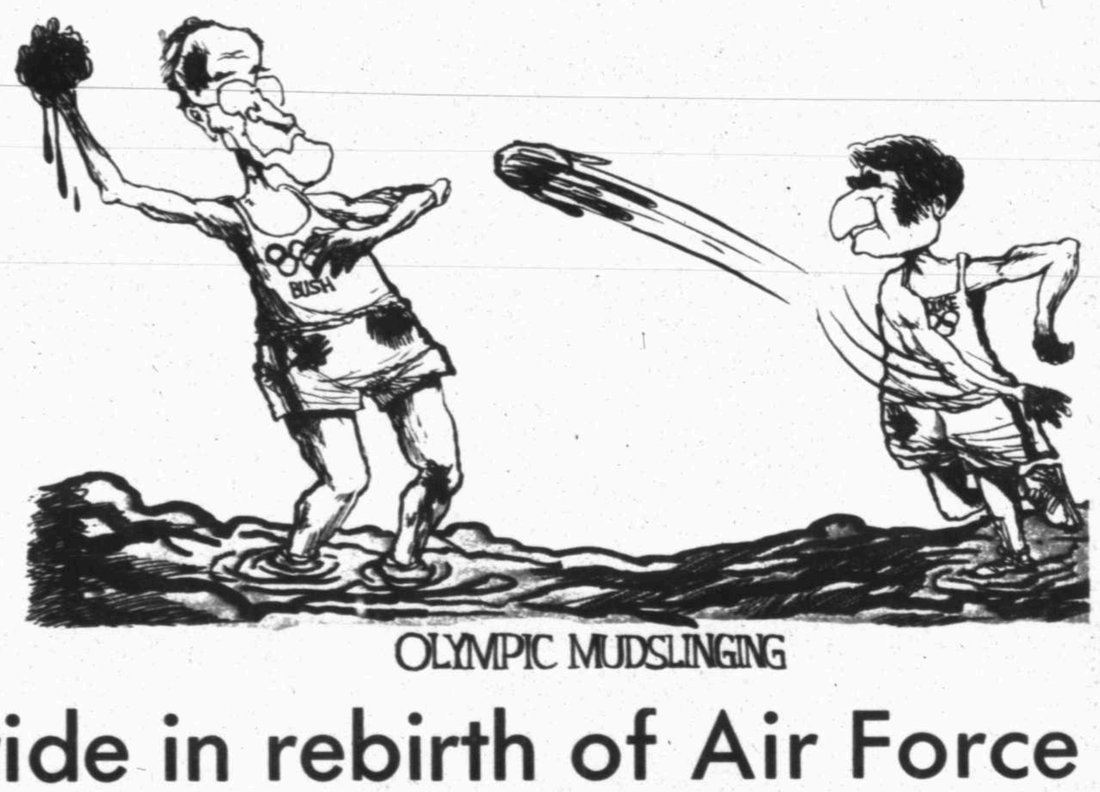

In addition to the Celebration of the Arts, programs include the Gallery of Midland Arts, KidsArts & Company, Midland Marquee published in each Sunday's edition of the Midland Reporter-Telegram, an annual Calendar of Events, Cityline (682-ARTS), the Directory of Midland Visual and Performing Artists and Arts Organizations, a quarterly newsletter sent to all members, and the Volunteers for Arts annual awards meeting.

The assembly relies on support from membership, grants, fundraising and a small percentage of the city's hotel/motel tax revenues. It currently has 300 Individual members, 19 Organizational members, and 12 Corporate members.

As president of the Arts Assembly of Midland, I'm concerned with the financial future of all of our Midland arts organizations, because I assume that each one of these organizations is having a difficult time, as is the Arts Assembly. Since the economy of Midland is down, not as many individuals are able to donate, and donations are not as much as in previous years. In addition, the city is not able to give as much from its hotel/motel tax revenues as was given two years ago.

I hope that you who are reading this article will give serious consideration to supporting all of the arts in our community. We are very lucky to live in such a unique city which has so much to offer for everyone. We all need your help.

OLYMPIC MUDSLINGING

Americans should take pride in rebirth of Air Force

By WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST JR.
Editor in Chief, The Hearst Newspapers

NEW YORK — One of President Reagan's most commendable and important achievements during his eight years in the White House has been his restoration of the efficient combat capability of the United States Air Force.

Hearst

When the president assumed leadership of our country and the free world in 1981, only half of our modern fighters and bombers were mission ready. The rest were grounded for maintenance or missing parts. Most of our Air Force weapons systems were outdated. Many of our most qualified pilots and best crewmen and maintenance workers were quitting the Air Force.

That our Air Force has recovered from the shameful and dangerous combat readiness decline it suffered for nearly a decade in the 1970s was the good news Air Force Secretary Edward C. Aldridge gave the Air Force Association's national convention in Washington a few days ago.

In a speech that received little or no attention in most of the television and print media, Secretary Aldridge said the combat capability of the Air Force was restored "with the leadership of President Reagan, the support of the American people and with a lot of help from groups like AFA," a 230,000-member organization composed of active and former Air Force servicemen and women with 300 chapters across the nation.

"We are," the secretary added, "fielding a new generation of (weapons) systems which will underwrite our nation's deterrent strategy across the spectrum of potential conflict and we have provided the necessary training and equipment for our personnel to achieve an all-time high in the combat readiness of the Air Force."

However, Secretary Aldridge cautioned against complacency concerning the future of our Air Force. He was critical of Congress for funding "pet projects," such as unnecessary bases, instead of providing better financial incentives to encourage "quality people" to remain in the Air Force. "Weapons systems don't win wars," he warned, "people do."

Attending the AFA's 42nd annual anniversary lunch was an inspiring experience for me because it was marked by awards for outstanding service to currently serving men and women — from generals on down to master sergeants and cadets. Among the award winners were the Strategic Air Command Alert Force, Offutt Air Force Base, Neb., under command of Gen. John T. Chain, "for the extraordinary diligence, professionalism and patriotism of the men and women" of that force which "puts them on the front lines of deterrence 24 hours a day, 365 days a year."

Senior Master Sgt. Robert L. Gilbert, HQ 21st Air Force, McGuire AFB, N.J., received a citation of honor for designing, developing and building equipment to transfer fuel from fixed wing aircraft into helicopters. It is expected to greatly improve combat efficiency and to have far-reaching military and civilian applications. Among five women who received awards was 1st Lt. Laurie J. McMullan, 13th AF Medical Center, Clark AB, the Philippines, for "excellence" and "intense dedication to duty."

We should all be proud of these wonderful men and women for the brilliant service they render us and for their willingness to risk their lives at a moment's notice to defend our country.

I was deeply touched and highly honored to be included among the award winners for my long-time editorial support of a strong air force, dating back before my service as a war correspondent with the 9th Air Force in World War II. It was particularly gratifying to me because my father was a crusading advocate of a strong air force throughout his journalistic career. As far back as December 1924, he instructed the editor of his New York American to urge public support for "adequate protective flying forces." In a signed editorial, Sept. 9, 1925, he called for establishment of a separate unified air force. Ten years later, Gen. Douglas MacArthur, then Army chief of staff, urged a separate air force. It was finally established in 1947.

In 1938, Pop predicted the next war would be fought and won in the air. Within five years he was proved right. On May 2, 1940, nearly two years before Pearl Harbor, he wrote that war in the Far East could happen "almost anytime," adding that "oriental nations, very courteous in most matters, are not exactly polite in war. Sometimes they are so brusque and ill-bred as not to declare war. ... They blow up your cities and tell you about it afterward. You have to be ready."

That advice holds good today, despite all the speculation about peace breaking out all over the world.

Attendance encouraged

Once again, Midland Independent School District and Ector County Independent School District are joining forces to get students to "be in school, stay in school."

During the month of October, a concentrated effort is made to encourage regular attendance by students.

October is chosen for this campaign for three reasons:

- enrollment has stabilized by this point in the year;
- it is early enough in the school year to instill good attendance habits for the school year;
- funding for the school year is established by the average daily attendance (ADA) of students during this month.

High attendance in October can translate to significant amounts of money for a district's maintenance and operating funds.

The attendance campaigns are sponsored by Midland-Odessa merchants, most notable KNFM Radio and American Airlines.

Wednesday evening is special for the Al G. Langford Chaparral Center, which celebrates its 10th anniversary with a concert by Michael Martin Murphey. Starting time is 7:30 p.m. In cooperatiion with KNFM Radio, the concert admission is just one can of food. Proceeds go to the Permian Basin Food Bank and the High Sky Children's Ranch.

Murphey started his music career in Southern California and was one of the early country music pioneers in Austin in the 1970s. Some of his hits include "Wildfire," "Carolina in the Pines," "What's Forever For" and "You're Talking to the Wrong Man."

Chap Center has become an important part of the community as a setting for sports, music, cultural, and religious events. We hope you can attend the concert Wednesday to join in the celebration.

If you've kept up with educational concerns in Texas, you may be familiar with the Texas Academic Skills Program (TASP), which was created by the 70th Legislature. The purpose was to identify students who need additional academic skills development in reading, writing and mathematics to be able to do college work.

Midland College is co-hosting a conference Thursday and Friday at the Midland Hilton with the Texas Higher Education Coordinating Board to acquaint college and university administrators with TASP. This is one of just four such conference being held this fall regarding TASP, the others being in Austin, Dallas and San Antonio.

The test program goes into effect in 1989, with all students entering college at that time being tested and, if necessary, placed in remediation programs. High schools also will be notified as to how their graduates did in the TASP exams.

Chaparral tennis teams get their first official action of the fall semester next weekend in Abilene, when they participate in the West Texas Open. The tournaments run Friday and Saturday.

Coach Joe Williams has a powerful group of men, but is short on women right now. He has only five women players, including returning NJCAA All-Americans Raquel Colvin and Gabi Csorba. Williams is spending a lot of time on the phone trying to locate at least two more top-notch women for the spring semester.

A survey by the American Council on Education shows that the cost of a college education can be quite inexpensive ... or very expensive, depending upon the institution attended.

Cost of attending an independent four-year university averages $12,526 per year, while a public four-year university will cost about $5,823. The survey shows a public two-year community college will cost about $4,111. However, some of the costs included might seem high to those of us living in West Texas. The survey shows tuition and fees at a community college average $767, with books and supplies $391, transportation $781, board only $1,313, and other expenses $859.

Since most community college students live at home, the board costs likely are high.

Regardless, your community college is an educational bargain.

Seven courses starting this week through Continuing Education offer a variety of opportunities. For example, you can take Basic Mountaineering! But there aren't any mountains in Midland, you say. Right, but residents do travel and some want to learn climbing skills.

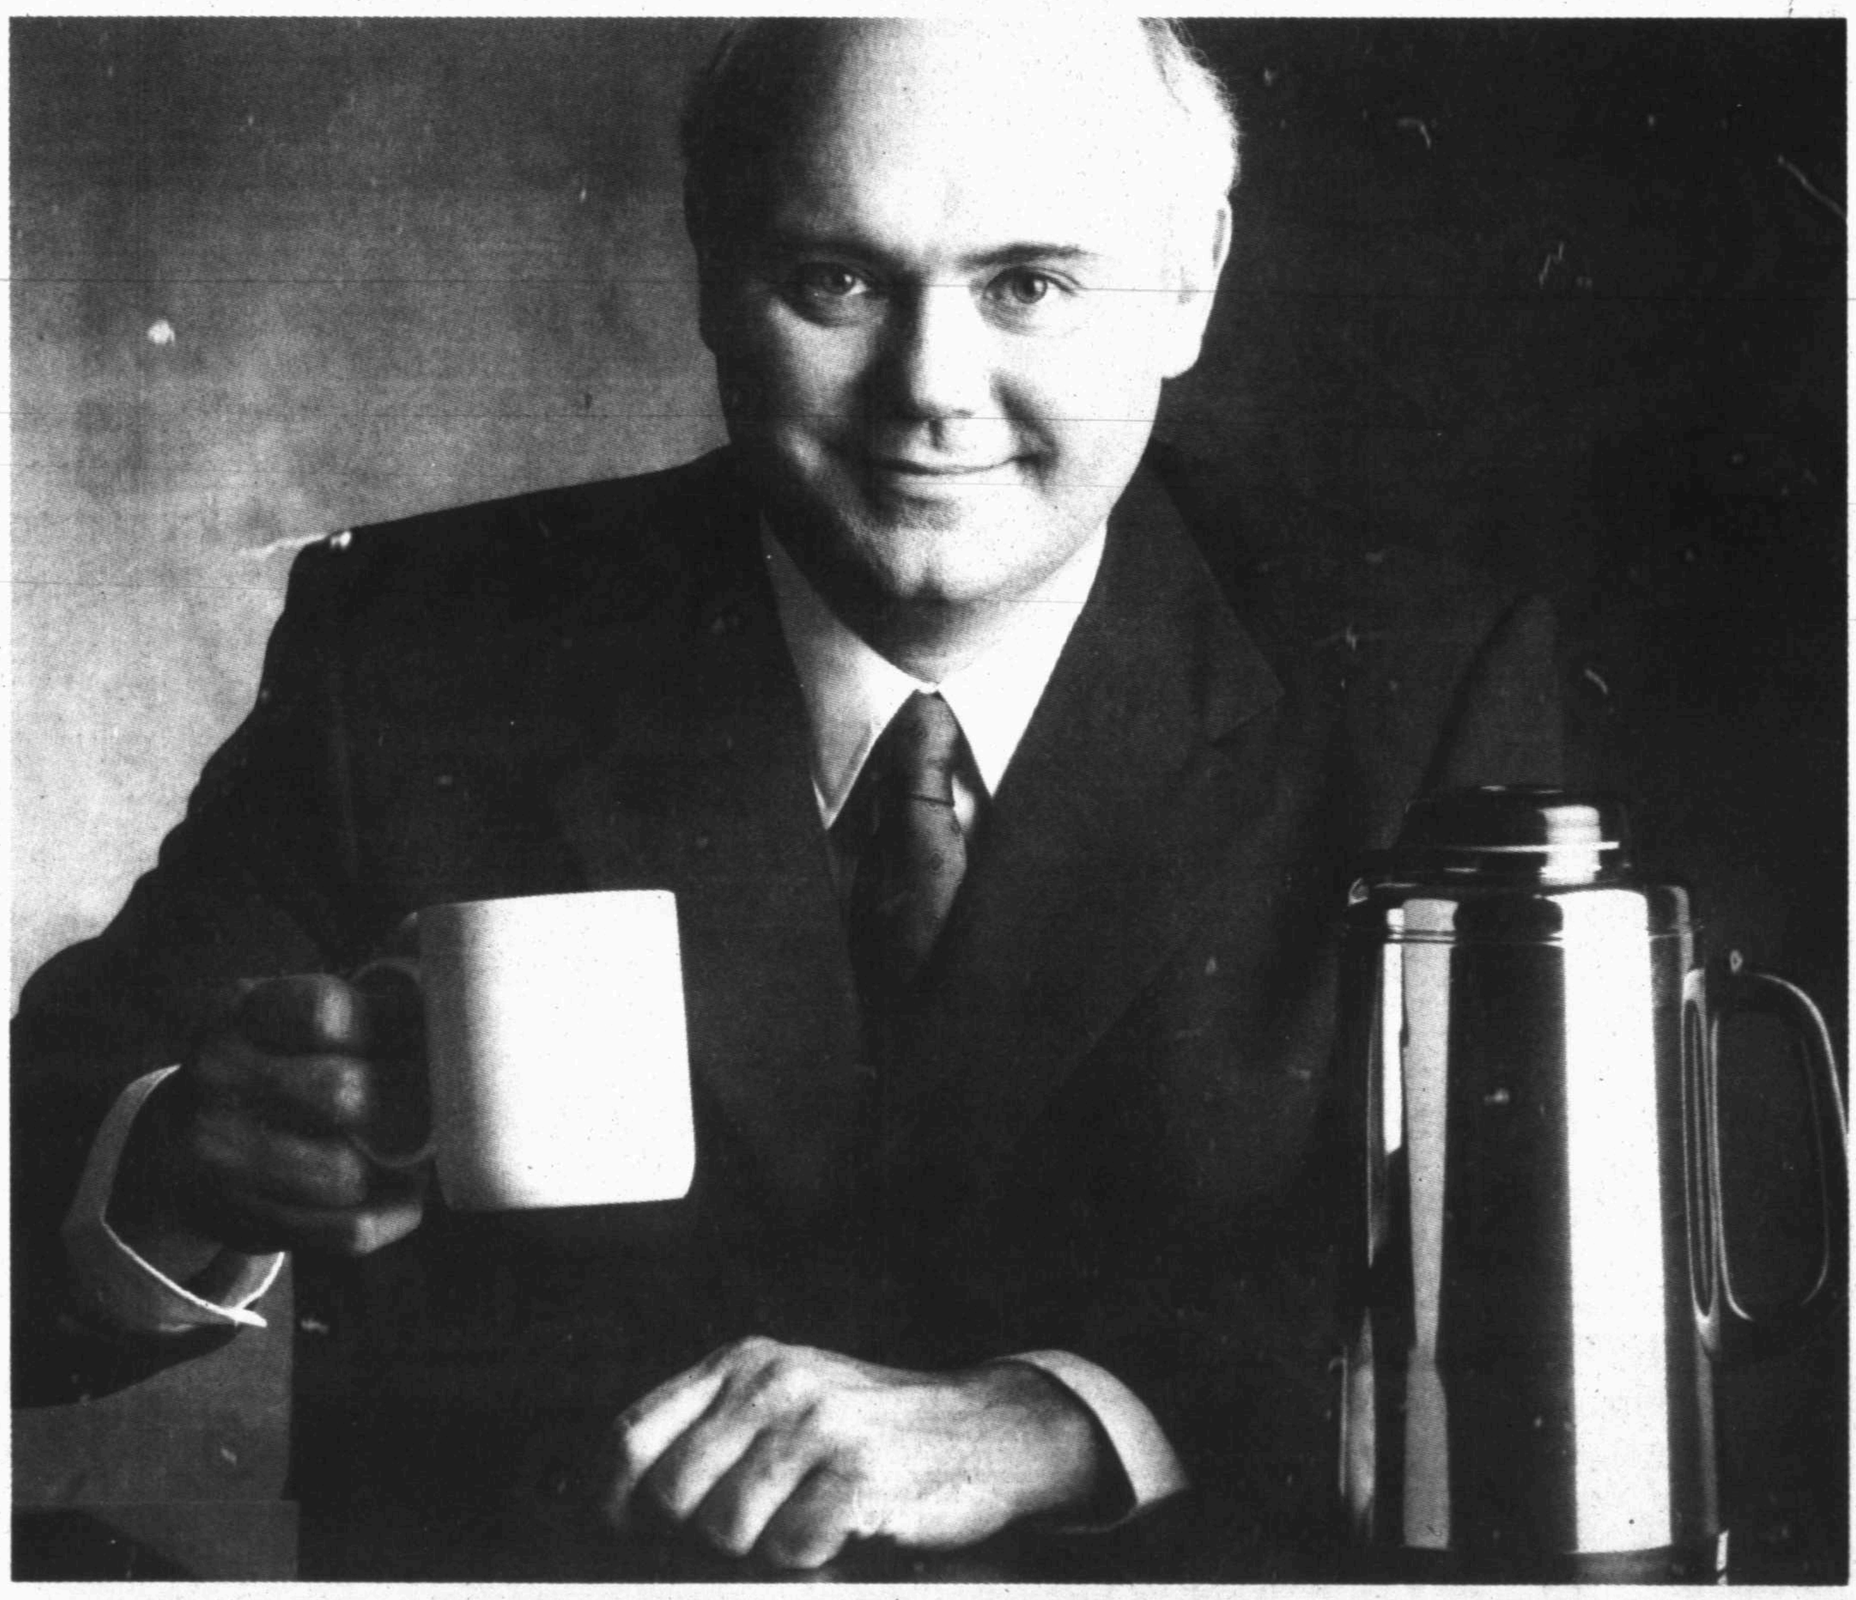

There are two Speed Reading Clinics, each lasting three hours. One is being taught in the afternoon and the other in the evening.

Or you could take Stained Glass I, Hunter Safety, a Notary Public Seminar, Figure Drawing, or the Certified Professional Secretaries' workshop on Business Law and Accounting.

To enroll in any of these, just visit the Continuing Education Office in the Administration Building. You can call 685-4518 to obtain more details.

Buddy Kemp,
Chairman, NCNB Texas

The coffee cup represents a philosophy at NCNB Texas. A way of doing business. It says to every customer of this bank — to every prospect — our doors are open to you, come in, sit down and let's talk. This neighborly feel is the way we approach business at NCNB Texas. It's helping people. One on one.

Now we've tossed around a lot of statistics about ourselves, like the fact that we manage over $50 billion in assets, that we're among the top 10 banks in America, that we have more than 700 locations and serve more than four million customers. But what hasn't been said is that we do this one customer at a time.

So no problem — or as you call it in Texas — opportunity — is too small or too big for us to handle. We want to know what we can do to serve you. From car loans to investment vehicles. From corporate finance to the family business — we're here to help. That's why we came to Texas.

But don't take this to mean you'll be dealing with "out-of-towners" or strangers. In fact, nothing could be further from the truth. There are 15,000 loyal NCNB Texas employees who are ready, willing and able to sit down and help you right now. People you've dealt with before. Familiar faces.

And these long-time friends of yours have a strong, stable, secure institution backing them — helping them give you the best products and best service possible.

In fact, that's my pledge to you. NCNB Texas will offer our new home state the kind of service it truly deserves — Texas-style, first-class service.

You see, at NCNB Texas we think this whole banking business is pretty simple. You've got dreams and goals and desires that you want to fulfill — and we want to help. Plus, we've got a lot to prove to you. So we say, coffee's on. Come on by and let's talk.

The Army considers itself to be the force of the future when it comes to training young men and women in the high-tech skills of tomorrow.

To keep in the forefront of technological advances, the Army is constantly training young people in a broad range of high-tech skills.

"The Army provides young people with an edge on life," says Lt. Col. Allen D. Gibbs, recruiting commander for New Mexico and West Texas. "We can train young people in everything from avionics, computers and electronics to telecommunications, digital communications and satellite microwave transmissions. Anyone who is interested in math or science will feel right at home with Army technology."

On the ground, Army tank crewmen use laser range-finders and thermal-image night sights for target acquisition. And Field artillerymen operate computers to fire multiple-launch rocket systems.

The Army is technologically active in the air, too. The Apache, Cobra and Black Hawk helicopters represent the Army's state-of-the-art aircraft that are manned, maintained and repaired by Army-trained specialists with top training in avionics, electronics and helicopter repair.

In the medical field, Army lab technicians and other skilled specialists can practice sophisticated hands-on medicine using the advanced radiological scanning system (CAT scan) which allows X-ray technicians to see body tissue as well as bone structure.

"The Army also offers young people a way to finance a college education," added Gibbs. "The Montgomery GI Bill Plus the Army College Fund allows qualified prospects to earn up to $25,200 for college or approved vocational training after completing active duty."

The Army is one of the few organizations which guarantees training in a chosen skill. After advanced testing to determine qualifications, the Army will provide a young man or woman with the skill training he or she desires, and the Army guarantees it in writing. The Army's Delayed Entry Program allows a person up to 365 days to enter training.

New Doctors Discovery

Weight Loss Pill Approved for U.S.Gov't. Patent

'Lazy Way' to Lose Weight Already Sweeping U.S.

BEVERLY HILLS, CA (Special)—An exclusive hard-to-get U.S. government approval for a patent has just been given to two prominent doctors, who after years of research, have developed and perfected an amazing new weight loss pill process at a world famous hospital in Los Angeles that reportedly "guarantees" that you can lose unhealthy fat and reduce calories by simply taking their tested and proven new pill.

You Can "Eat Normally"

Best of all, "you can continue to eat your favorite foods and you don't have to change your normal eating habits or exercise. You can start losing fat and reduce calories from the very first day, until you achieve the ideal weight you desire".

Gov't. Approves Patent Claims

The doctors newly approved claims for a U.S. government patent confirms that "there has never been anything like it before." It's a major scientific breakthrough for weight loss.

Flushes Fat Out of Body

The new pill is appropriately called the "fat-magnet" pill because it breaks into thousand of particles, each acting like a tiny magnet, "attracting" and trapping many times its size in undigested fat particles and calories from food that you have just eaten. Then, all the trapped fat and calories are naturally "flushed" right out of your body because they cannot be absorbed.

Within 2 days you should notice a change in the color of your stool, caused by the fat particles being eliminated.

"Automatically" Lose Fat

According to one of the inventors, Dr. William Shell, heart specialist and associate professor of medicine at UCLA medical school, the new fat-bonding process is a "lazy way" to lose weight because the pills alone "automatically" reduce calories by eliminating dietary fat. It is 100% safe and not a drug."

The fat-magnet pills are already sweeping the country with glowing reports of weight loss from formerly overweight people in all walks of life who are now slimmer, trimmer and more attractive again.

Now Available to the Public

If you are trying to lose 20, 50, 100 pounds or more, you can order your supply of these "no-risk" highly successful fat-magnet pills directly from the doctors' exclusive manufacturer only (includes optional calorie-reduction plan for even better results). Send $20 for a 90 pill supply (+$3 handling), or $35 for a 180 pill supply (+$3 handling), to: Fat-Magnet, 9086 Wilshire Blvd., Dept. W841, Beverly Hills, CA 90211. (Unconditional money-back guarantee if not 100% satisfied.) Visa, MasterCard and American Express OK. (Send card number, expire date, and signature.) For fastest service for credit card orders ONLY call anytime 24 hours, toll free 1(800) 527-9700, ext. W841.

The Army considers itself to be the force of the future when it comes to training young men and women in the high-tech skills of tomorrow.

To keep in the forefront of technological advances, the Army is constantly training young people in a broad range of high-tech skills.

"The Army provides young people with an edge on life," says Lt. Col. Allen D. Gibbs, recruiting commander for New Mexico and West Texas. "We can train young people in everything from avionics, computers and electronics to telecommunications, digital communications and satellite microwave transmissions. Anyone who is interested in math or science will feel right at home with Army technology."

On the ground, Army tank crewmen use laser range-finders and thermal-image night sights for target acquisition. And Field artillerymen operate computers to fire multiple-launch rocket systems.

The Army is technologically active in the air, too. The Apache, Cobra and Black Hawk helicopters represent the Army's state-of-the-art aircraft that are manned, maintained and repaired by Army-trained specialists with top training in avionics, electronics and helicopter repair.

In the medical field, Army lab technicians and other skilled specialists can practice sophisticated hands-on medicine using the advanced radiological scanning system (CAT scan) which allows X-ray technicians to see body tissue as well as bone structure.

"The Army also offers young people a way to finance a college education," added Gibbs. "The Montgomery GI Bill Plus the Army College Fund allows qualified prospects to earn up to $25,200 for college or approved vocational training after completing active duty."

The Army is one of the few organizations which guarantees training in a chosen skill. After advanced testing to determine qualifications, the Army will provide a young man or woman with the skill training he or she desires, and the Army guarantees it in writing. The Army's Delayed Entry Program allows a person up to 365 days to enter training.

New Doctors Discovery

Weight Loss Pill Approved for U.S.Gov't. Patent

'Lazy Way' to Lose Weight Already Sweeping U.S.

BEVERLY HILLS, CA (Special)—An exclusive hard-to-get U.S. government approval for a patent has just been given to two prominent doctors, who after years of research, have developed and perfected an amazing new weight loss pill process at a world famous hospital in Los Angeles that reportedly "guarantees" that you can lose unhealthy fat and reduce calories by simply taking their tested and proven new pill.

You Can "Eat Normally"

Best of all, "you can continue to eat your favorite foods and you don't have to change your normal eating habits or exercise. You can start losing fat and reduce calories from the very first day, until you achieve the ideal weight you desire".

Gov't. Approves Patent Claims

The doctors newly approved claims for a U.S. government patent confirms that "there has never been anything like it before." It's a major scientific breakthrough for weight loss.

Flushes Fat Out of Body

The new pill is appropriately called the "fat-magnet" pill because it breaks into thousand of particles, each acting like a tiny magnet, "attracting" and trapping many times its size in undigested fat particles and calories from food that you have just eaten. Then, all the trapped fat and calories are naturally "flushed" right out of your body because they cannot be absorbed.

Within 2 days you should notice a change in the color of your stool, caused by the fat particles being eliminated.

"Automatically" Lose Fat

According to one of the inventors, Dr. William Shell, heart specialist and associate professor of medicine at UCLA medical school, the new fat-bonding process is a "lazy way" to lose weight because the pills alone "automatically" reduce calories by eliminating dietary fat. It is 100% safe and not a drug."

The fat-magnet pills are already sweeping the country with glowing reports of weight loss from formerly overweight people in all walks of life who are now slimmer, trimmer and more attractive again.

Now Available to the Public

If you are trying to lose 20, 50, 100 pounds or more, you can order your supply of these "no-risk" highly successful fat-magnet pills directly from the doctors' exclusive manufacturer only (includes optional calorie-reduction plan for even better results). Send $20 for a 90 pill supply (+$3 handling), or $35 for a 180 pill supply (+$3 handling), to: Fat-Magnet, 9016 Wilshire Blvd., Dept. W841, Beverly Hills, CA 90211. Maureen carries message

MAPUTO, Mozambique (AP) — President Reagan's daughter, Maureen, delivered a message from her father to President Joaquim Chissano on Saturday and described her meeting as "extremely important."

Ms. Reagan said she was returning to Washington with a reply from Chissano to Ronald Reagan. She spoke at an airport news conference before departing after a 24-hour visit at the head of a presidential commission on refugees,

She visited a center for children captured by Mozambique National Resistance guerrillas, a center for people displaced by the 12-year-old civil war, and a women's agricultural cooperative.

Afterward, Ms. Reagan said she and her delegation would bring information back "so that the United States can be more helpful than we already are with Mozambique's development."

Radziwill

NEW YORK (AP) — With her sister, Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis, and ballet star Rudolf Nureyev present, Lee Bouvier Radziwill married film director Herbert Ross at her Manhattan home.

Nureyev, who directs the Paris Opera Ballet, and John Taras, associate director of American Ballet Theater, attended the couple. The ceremony was performed Friday by Justice E. Leo Milonas of the Appellate Division of state Supreme Court

Ms. Onassis gave a dinner party at her home for the couple after the ceremony.

Mrs. Ross is director of special events for designer Giorgio Armani in New York. She has been married twice before. Her marriage to Prince Stanislas Radziwill ended in divorce. Her first marriage, to Michael Temple Canfield, was annulled.

Ross' most recent film, "Steel Magnolias," will be released next year. His other works include "Play It Again, Sam," "The Sunshine Boys," "The Goodbye Girl" and "The Turning Point."

His first wife, ballerina Nora Kaye, died last year.

Carlson

ATLANTIC CITY, N.J. (AP) — It's not easy being Miss America. The 1989 winner, Gretchen Carlson, says she's already been the target of a practical joke.

The blonde Miss Carlson, who won her crown Sept. 10, acknowledged during a news conference Friday at an Atlantic City casino that she was the victim of a hoax perpetrated by "Bloopers and Practical Jokes," on NBC-TV.

The 22-year-old said she was in Denver when pageant announcer Gary Collins and his wife, Mary Ann Mobley, invited her to appear on a live television show examining a new type of radio transmitter.

The show was supposedly being broadcast to a convention featuring thousands of engineers, but before it began, Collins was summoned to take a phone call and Ms. Mobley moved off stage to replace what she said was a broken microphone, Miss Carlson said.

The reigning Miss Minnesota found herself having to improvise an explanation of the new radio system on the air at the insistence of the stage director.

"First there were no cue cards and then they were upside down and then the man holding them dropped them all," she said. "It was a good practical joke for me because if it's one thing I hate, it's looking stupid."

Retton

SEOUL, South Korea (AP) — Mary Lou Retton, who vaulted to the top of the gymnastics world in the 1984 Olympics, says she's like a lot of other 20-year-olds, possessed by the question: What next?

Easily one of the biggest celebrities to emerge from the Olympics in Los Angeles, the then-16-year-old Retton defeated Romania's Ecateriza Szabo for the all-around gold medal, winning with a perfect vault in her final routine.

But since then Retton has been searching for an appropriate encore.

"I guess I'm a lot like most other 20-year-olds in America," she said. "I'm not yet sure what I want to do with the rest of my life."

Retton enrolled at the University of Texas, but the fact she remains in constant demand for product endorsements and public appearances has played havoc with her academic efforts.

She has spent the past month in Seoul as part of the NBC crew, helping analyze the intricate routines by this year's Olympic headliners.

Pena

DENVER (AP) — Cleaner air for citizens of Denver and Albuquerque will be te payoff as both cities battle their brown clouds this winter, but now the mayors of the two towns have added fiery green chiles and Denver Broncos tickets to the stake.

Denver Mayor Federico Pena and Albuquerque Mayor Ken Schultz have upped the ante in a wager about whose city will have cleaner air during the high-pollution winter season.

If Denver's anti-pollution efforts make more progress than Albuquerque's, Pena gets a bushel of New Mexico chilies. If Albuquerque's beefed-up pollution fight produces better results than Denver's, Schultz will receive tickets to a Broncos football game and to a Denver Nuggets basketball game.

Schultz made the challenge after hearing criticism of his city on a television show in which Pena touted Denver's success in battling its brown cloud.

Twiggy

LONDON (AP) — Actress Twiggy, one of the world's top models in the 1960s, has married her boyfriend Leigh Lawson in a surprise ceremony in New York, her manager announced.

Lawson, an actor, arranged Friday's ceremony at the home of stage designer Tony Walton on the eastern end of Long Island without Twiggy's knowledge, said manager Neville Shulman.

"It was an intimate, small and private ceremony with only 10 close friends present who had flown in secretly, arranged by the bridegroom to surprise the bride," Shulman said.

The couple flew to the Caribbean for a short honeymoon, he said. They have lived together for several years in the Kensington area of west London.

Twiggy, born Lesley Hornby in London, gained her nickname because of the stick-thin figure for which she became famous. Now 39, she has a 9-year-old daughter from her previous marriage to the late actor Michael Whitney, who died in 1983.

NEW YORK (AP) — Clint Eastwood says one of the nice things about just directing a movie and not appearing in it as well is that he can pad around behind the scenes and "look like a slob."

"It's much more relaxing not to have to do both jobs," Eastwood said Friday after a showing of his new movie, "Bird," at the New York Film Festival. The film is about the late jazz saxophonist Charlie Parker, nicknamed Bird.

"Usually, when you're acting in a film and directing it, if you're giving directions, the wardrobe person is straightening your collar and the property guy is taking your watch off to make it match the previous part of the scene. It becomes a little complicated.

"This way you don't have to 'suit up.' You can dress as you like," he said.

Kandu, a performing killer whale at Sea World in San Diego, pokes its nose out of the water as its newborn calf swims nearby. The calf was born Friday.

Baby killer whale born during show

SAN DIEGO (AP) — The unexpected birth of a baby killer whale stopped the show at Sea World.

Kandu the whale went into labor moments before Friday's 4:30 p.m. show and delivered the baby as a crowd of 3,000, caught up in the rare event, encouraged the 14-year-old mother with chants of "push, push!"

"It was incredible," Sea World spokeswoman Rocio Valdez said. "They were clapping. They were cheering. They were even crying. You name it. They were just doing everything."

The birth of "Baby Shamu" was only the third of a killer whale in the 25-year history of the San Diego marine park, said spokesman Dan LeBlanc. One of the previous babies was stillborn and the other died shortly after birth of a congenital illness.

The only captive-born killer whale to survive an extended period is at Sea World's park in Orlando, Fla., and will be 3 years old Monday.

The father of the whale born Friday is Orky, who has been at San Diego Sea World nearly two years.

Sea World officials knew Kandu was pregnant but hadn't announced it. LeBlanc said killer whales normally have a 17-month gestation period and the baby arrived about a month sooner than expected.

LeBlanc said trainers suspended the show when they noticed the baby emerging, flukes first, as Kandu swam into the 5-million-gallon tank normally used for the popular killer whale performances.

"We said the show is canceled. You're invited to watch Mother Nature at work," he said. "Nobody left."

"It was very quick, very natural," LeBlanc said of the birth. The baby was delivered at 5:21 p.m.

The sex of the calf won't be determined for a few days.

Mike Scarpuzzi, the park's director of training, said the baby appears strong and Kandu has been affectionate and protective of her calf, teaching it to swim in circles and avoid the tank walls.

He cautioned that the next few days would be critical but said park officials were encouraged by the early behavior of the mother and baby.

"She's showing real good motherly instincts. She's been really, really gentle with the baby," Scarpuzzi said.

The baby and mother will be separated from the other whales at the park during the weekend to allow the two to bond. If all goes well, they gradually will be reintroduced to the others, including the father, said Scarpuzzi.

The baby was the product of the park's captive-breeding program. Park officials are hoping to breed killer whales in captivity because opposition by environmentalists halted plans to capture more whales for use in the shows.

Ed Asper, Sea World's corporate curator, said more killer whale babies are on the way. He said killer whale births are expected within a month at the Sea Worlds in San Antonio, Texas, and Orlando.

STATE IN BRIEF

Nine still hospitalized after bus collision

McALLEN (AP) — Nine people remained hospitalized with minor injuries Saturday after three buses collided while taking high school band and drill team members to a football game.

Eight people were admitted to two McAllen hospitals and one was in a Mission hospital following the Friday night accident. Forty-five people suffered injuries in the wreck.

The buses were carrying Edinburg High School band and drill team members to a football game in Rio Grande City. The accident occurred when three buses in an 11-bus caravan on U.S. Highway 83 entered an area of construction that had stopped traffic on the road.

Highway patrolman Joe Rios of Hidalgo County was leading the convoy in a patrol car and said he tried to slow the caravan from 45 mph as it suddenly encountered stalled traffic.

The Edinburg football team played the game, as scheduled and won, 21-0.

Gang members monitored

DALLAS (AP) — Representatives of a Los Angeles street gang are in Dallas, say police officers who are concerned about the possibility of conflicts between the group and Jamaican drug dealers.

Officers say they've seen the gang's name — the Bloods — written in graffitti in South Dallas and heard about the gang from juvenile probationers, but have not encountered any members of the group.

The police first heard of the arrival of the Bloods two weeks ago, but do not know how many gang members have come to Dallas, said Faddie Tillmon, a Dallas County juvenile probation field supervisor.

Another Los Angeles gang — the Crips — had been in Fort Worth for six months and set up a distribution system for crack before intelligence officers became aware of them, an undercover officer who asked not to be identified told the Dallas Morning News.

The officer said police were able to break up the gang's drug distribution network last winter. He characterized the Crips as "profit motivated, not territorial."

Singlaub blasts Wright

EL PASO (AP) — Retired Maj. Gen. John K. Singlaub, who emerged as a key figure in the Iran-Contra scandal, blamed House Speaker Jim Wright for difficulties in getting humanitarian aid to the Nicaraguan resistance.

Singlaub said Friday he returned two weeks ago from a two-week trip to Contra camps along the Honduran-Nicaraguan border.

"None of the supplies have been delivered inside (Nicaragua)," said Singlaub, who contended Wright is such a hero to Nicaragua's governing inner circle that they call him "Comandante Wright."

Wright spokesman Wilson Morris replied that the non-lethal aid package passed with Republican and Reagan administration support.

"If they have failed to get the aid there, this is a failure of the administration, not of Congress," Morris said.

Tech goes Bear-hunting for upset victory

By TERRY WILLIAMSON
Assistant Sports Editor

LUBBOCK - There seems to be a persistent feeling going around that the Southwest Conference is weaker than skim milk, but at least Texas Tech's 36-6 upset victory over unbeaten Baylor here Saturday night at Jones Stadium proved that conference play can at least be unpredictable.

After all, this was a battle of the undefeated against the all-defeated. Baylor owned the No. 1 defense in the nation and Tech was No. 7 - in the SWC.

And when the hot arm of Tech quarterback Billy Joe Toliver finally cooled down, the positions were reversed. The all-defeated (Tech) became the lone unbeaten in the SWC race and the undefeated (Baylor) became the all-defeated. It was the first SWC contest of the year.

It was a red letter day for Toliver, who threw four TD passes on his way to becoming Tech's all-time leading passer. Toliver threw for 286 yards, passing Ron Reeves on the all-time Tech arm list. Toliver needed 248 yards in the game and had it by the end of the third period. Toliver now has 4,732 career passing yards as a Raider. Reeves' old mark was 4,688 yards.

"Records are nice, but the victory is even greater," said Toliver. "We knew we weren't as bad as we must have looked in those first two games. This game just proves we have some dedication."

Tech head coach Spike Dykes, the former Midland Lee mentor, was jubilant after the victory, but cautious.

"I'm real proud of our kids, but we still have a long way to go. Our program is in a position right now that we can't just win one or two games. We have to keep winning to get to where we want to be," noted Dykes. "This week was just a whole lot better than what it was two weeks ago. It was a very long two weeks. It's tough losing two games and then having an open date to think about it."

Texas Tech scored on four of its first five possessions in the first half to stake claim to a shocking 23-0 margin over the Bears, who fell victim to the arm Toliver.

Toliver rained three touchdown passes on Baylor in the first half, including two of 35 and 39 yards to running back James Gray, who always seemed to win the isolation battle with Bear middle linebacker Gary Joe Kinne. Toliver also hit back Ervin Farris for a 16-yard TD in the first half.

Scott Segrist added a 42-yard field goal in the first half that was set up by a sack from Crane's Jim Vasquez on Baylor quarterback Ricky Vestal, who fumbled at his own 30-yard line.

Then Tech faithful held its collective breath for the second half to begin with vivid memories of vanished first half leads against North Texas and Arizona when the Tech defense fizzled.

But the Homecoming crowd of 45,385, the second largest Homecoming gathering in Tech history behind the 50,148 that attended the 1985 A&M game, sensed victory in this one because Baylor looked somewhat inept offensively with starting quarterback Brad Goebel on the bench with an injury suffered last week.

Baylor hit the field against Tech using both Ed Lovell and Ricky Vestal at quarterback and neither had much success against an inspired Tech defense.

In fact, Baylor's only real threat in the first half was a 49-yard field goal try by Abilene Cooper freshman Jeff Ireland, who just missed early in the second quarter.

Second half fears were quickly put to rest when Ireland missed another 33-yard field goal try in the third period and the Tech defense followed by putting six points on the boards in the fourth quarter when Greg Burden caused Baylor's Vestal to fumble in the end zone and Tech's Tom Mathiasmeier recovered for a 29-0 margin.

That was the game even though Vestal threw an ugly 11-yard ricochet TD off Tech lineman Desmond Royal to John Simpson for the Bears' only score of the night. Toliver answered, however, with a seven-yard TD pass, his fourth of the night, to Farris for the final margin.

With Goebel out of the lineup, Baylor was in trouble offensively. Lowell and Vestal combined for 254 passing yards, but threw four interceptions and the Baylor rushing game was non-existent with only two positive yards on the night.

For Baylor head coach Grant Teaff, it was a frustrationg evening. He was seeking his 100th victory at Baylor, but that will have to wait.

Even if the conference is weak, each Saturday outing should be a major trip into the unknown.

Moses hands over reins in 400 hurdles

By BOB BAUM

SEOUL, South Korea (AP) — Edwin Moses yielded his aging crown as the world's premier hurdler Sunday as American teammate Andre Phillips captured the Olympic gold medal with a stunning upset in the 400 meters.

Moses, trying to become the first man to win three Olympic golds in the same running event, finished a distant third behind Phillips and Amadou Dia Ba of Senegal.

Phillips, 29, broke from the blocks strong and sped to an Olympic record 47.19 seconds, eclipsing the mark of 47.64 set by Moses in 1976 at Montreal. It was also the fifth-fastest 400 hurdles ever.

Moses, who also won the gold at Los Angeles in 1984, owns the four fastest hurdles, including the world record of 47.02 set in 1983 in West Germany.

Phillips, the 1981 NCAA champion from UCLA, was in command throughout as he beat Moses for the first time in his career.

The 33-year-old Moses lost for the third time since seeing his 10-year, 122-race winning streak end in 1987. He never led, finishing in 47.56.

Dia Ba, who turned 30 three days ago, won the silver in 47.23.

Moses walked solemnly to the edge of the track, while an elated Phillips grabbed an American flag and motioned to fourth-place finisher Kevin Young of the United States to join him in a victory celebration in front of the cheering Olympic Stadium crowd.

SEOUL, South Korea (AP) — Florence Griffith Joyner of the United States won the gold medal in the women's 100-meter dash Sunday, finishing in a wind-aided 10.54 seconds.

U.S. teammate Evelyn Ashford won the silver in 10.83, edging Heike Drechsler of East Germany who finished third in 10.85.

It was the first gold medal for America's glamour runner.

"I had a good start," Griffith Joyner said. "In the middle I didn't see anyone, so I relaxed and started concentrating on what I had to do, and when I knew they weren't going to catch me, I was just following (through) right through til the race was over."

Aaron Justus regularly practices his Karting at Hogan Park.

Bringing Justus to Karting

By TED BATTLES
Sports Editor

Aaron Justus won his third national Karting championship in four years last month and has been invited to New Zealand and Australia in February for 30 days of competition as a member of the United States Karting team.

There are a few hitches. For one thing, financing the trip. For another, getting Aaron out of school for a month.

The national champion of the sport from which the young Sullivans, Andrettis, Unsers and Rahals emerged and the sport to which Paul Newman returns two or three times a year when he wants to get back to basics, is a 14-year-old student at Midland Freshman school.

Lest you confuse your Karting, this sport is not what most of the uninitiated think of when the term is used.

This is not Go-Karting. Karters drive souped vehicles that run from $3,000 to $5,000 to modify.

AS MARVIN Justus, Aaron's father, put its, "The difference in the technology of Kart racing and Go Karting is the difference between a Volkswagen Bug and a Ferrari."

"Go Karts are for day-to-day use. They are for fun. A Kart has a half inch clearance and is not allowed on streets. Getting caught on the streets can bring a driver a lengthy suspension from the International Kart Federation.

Justus says the Kart is a highly technical machine and designed for racing situations.

When the Justus' want to test their vehicle or try out new equipment, it means a trip to Lubbock, location of the closest track and where, incidentally, Aaron won his national title last month.

"That may sound like a long way," says Marvin, chief engineer at Sargents in Odessa, "But it's a cakewalk compared to where we go to race ... Daytona Beach, Watkins Glen, Riverside, Illinois, Ohio ..."

THERE ARE two types of Karting. The sprint Karts compete on a mile oval and reach speeds of 50 to 70 mph hour in three 10-mile heats after establishing starting position with qualifying trials.

Longhorns win in final seconds against UNT

AUSTIN, Texas (AP) — Texas wide receiver Keith Cash made a diving catch as he sailed out of the corner of the end zone with 45 seconds left in the game Saturday night to rally Texas to a 27-24 victory over North Texas, No. 1 among Division I-AA schools.

North Texas, using Coach Corky Nelson's little-bit-of-everything offense, had led from the opening drive but fell to 2-1. Texas, a two-touchdown favorite raised its record to 2-1.

North Texas split end Marcus Camper caught two scoring passes of 10 yards each and had 11 receptions for 224 yards.

North Texas held Texas tailback Eric Metcalf — who scored three touchdowns last week — to one score on a 1-yard dive with just under four minutes left in the third period.

Trailing 21-20 after Deon Cockrell's 5-yard scoring run, Texas went for a 2-point conversion with 3:36 left in the game, but linebacker Byron Gross stopped Metcalf at the 5.

An onside kick failed at midfield, and North Texas' Keith Chapman kicked a 34-yard field goal with 1:38 remaining to clinch an apparent victory for the Eagles.

Texas quarterback Shannon Kelley quickly passed the Longhorns from their 37 to the North Texas 10. And with only 45 seconds remaining he lofted a pass to Cash, who dived behind defensive back Jerome Cooper to catch the ball as the official signalled a touchdown, touching off a protest by North Texas players that Cash was out of bounds.

Texas yielded 419 yards passing as North Texas quarterback Scott Davis completed 19 of 28 passes for three touchdowns with one interception.

Kelley was 14 of 21 for 169 yards, no interceptions and two touchdowns. Texas' first passing touchdown also was to Cash, early in the second quarter, for 7 yards on a play almost identical to the winning touchdown.

Mental errors hurt the Midland High varsity girls in a 15-8, 15-4 loss to Abilene Cooper, the Bulldogs' first District 4-5A loss of the season.

"We were geared more to winning than performing," said Bulldogs Head Coach Sonja Pittman. "Cooper is an exceptional team and I wish that we could have played a better game."

Cooper was clearly dominant in both games of the match, despite an early lead by the Bulldogs in the first game. After ten minutes of play and two Midland time-outs, the Cougars took an 8-1 lead and went on to win the set.

The Cougars went on to take the match in a second set which all four Midland points were earned on Cooper penalties.

Offensively, the Cougars were right on the mark, particularly due to strong scoring efforts by Kelly Huff, Holly McMillon and Paula Scott, although the entire Cooper team seemed geared up for the win.

Effie Freeman and Cindy Robertson both gave good offensive contributions to the Bulldogs, but numerous net violations and erratic setting prevented the Midland team from

Three top teams stunned in another wild weekend

COLUMBUS, Ohio — Greg Frey passed 20 yards to Bobby Olive for the game-winning touchdown with 38 seconds remaining as Ohio State upset No.7 Louisiana State.

Frey completed 24 of 37 passes for 281 yards and two touchdowns as Ohio State, 2-1, came back from a 13-point deficit with less than two minutes left.

LSU, also 2-1, went ahead 33-20 with 4:29 remaining when a pass from Tommy Hodson to Tony Moss was tipped into the hands of teammate Alvin Lee, who completed a 55-yard touchdown play.

But the Buckeyes came back on a 5-yard touchdown run by Carlos Snow with 1:56 left, then held LSU on downs. LSU elected to take a safety with 1:34 remaining, cutting the lead to 33-29.

The Tigers punted on the ensuing free kick, with Olive returning the kick 32 yards to the LSU 38.

Frey completed two passes for 18 yards. On third-and-7, the sophomore quarterback hit Olive over the middle and he dove into the end zone.

The defeat put an end to LSU's string of 14 straight road victories.

S. Carolina 23, No. 6 Georgia 10

COLUMBIA, S.C. — Todd Ellis threw for more than 300 yards for the ninth time in his 27-game career, leading No. 14 South Carolina past sixth-ranked Georgia.

Ellis completed 28 of 43 for 321 yards — the third time in as many games he has surpassed the 300-yard mark against the Bulldogs. The junior also threw one touchdown and suffered his first interception in 117 attempts this year.

South Carolina, which had lost seven of its last eight games to the Bulldogs, is 4-0. Georgia fell to 3-1.

After exchanging field goals in the opening quarter, the Gamecocks took command in the second quarter on a pair of long drives before 74,800 — the fourth-largest crowd ever at Williams-Brice Stadium.

Fullback Keith Bing capped an 80-yard drive with a 4-yard run that gave the Gamecocks a 10-3 lead with 8:09 to go.

Ellis keyed the drive. He hit Hardin Brown with a 25-yard pass on the drive's second play and hooked up with Carl Platt for 21 yards to the Georgia 3-yard line.

Ellis hit eight straight passes on the Gamecocks' next possession, including a 36-yard TD to freshman Robert Brooks to cap an eight-play, 81-yard drive. Brooks made a one-handed catch in the front corner of the end zone to give the Gamecocks a 17-3 lead with 1:48 left.

The game did not start as if it would be a runaway for the Gamecocks, who have won 12 straight at home.

Georgia took the opening kickoff and drove from its 25 to the South Carolina 7 before settling for a 27-yard field goal by Steve Crumley.

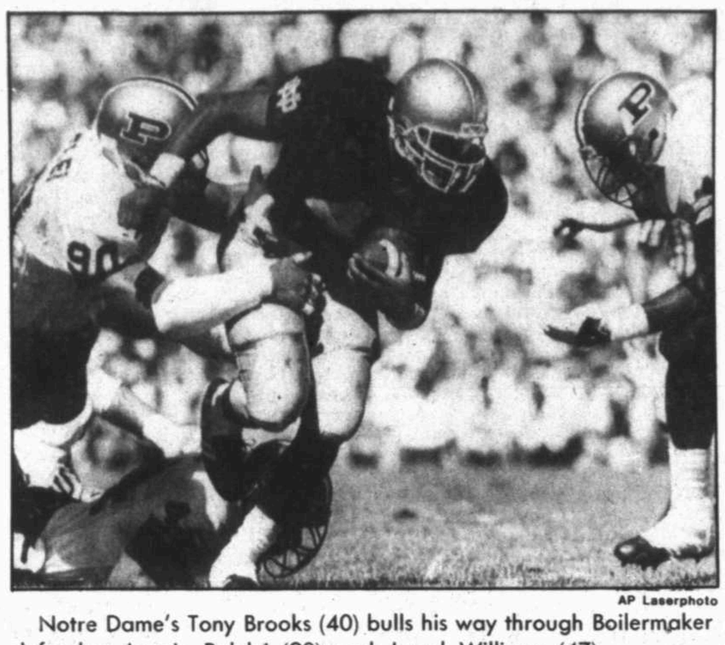

After being held to three yards on its first possession, South Carolina tied it on Collin Mackie's 23-yard field goal. The field goal was the 14th straight for Mackie, a sophomore, breaking the school record of 13 straight set by Eddie Leonard.

Scouts from six bowls, including the Sugar, Gator and Citrus — were on hand for the game, which was nationally televised.

Georgia finished with 241 yards total offense, while the Gamecocks had 397 yards.

No. 5 Southern Cal 23
No. 3 Oklahoma 7

LOS ANGELES — Tailback Aaron Emanuel scored twice, quarterback Rodney Peete became Southern Cal's total offense leader and the fifth-ranked Trojans capitalized on three early Oklahoma turnovers to beat the third-ranked Sooners.

AP Laserphoto

Notre Dame's Tony Brooks (40) bulls his way through Boilermaker defenders Lonnie Palelei (90) and Jerrol Williams (47).

Peete's Oklahoma counterpart, Jamelle Holieway, a native of Southern California, lost the ball three times, helping the Trojans to a 20-0 halftime lead.

Charles Thompson, Holieway's backup, didn't fare much better. He was intercepted twice by Chris Hale and once by Cleveland Colter late in the game. Hale's second interception, which he returned 44 yards, set up Quin Rodriguez's third field goal, from 25 yards.

Peete, who holds 13 school records, gained 238 total yards to push his career total to 6,462, surpassing Charles White's mark of 6,240 from 1976-79. Peete completed 16 of 34 passes for 198 yards with one interception, and rushed for 40 yards.

Southern Cal, 3-0, leads the series against the Sooners 4-2-1. Oklahoma fell to 2-1, losing in the regular season for the first time since Miami of Florida beat the Sooners 28-16 in the third game of the 1986 season.

The Sooners couldn't move the ball across the 50-yard line in the first half, making it only to their 43. The Trojans held Oklahoma running backs to 75 yards and just four first downs in the half.

However, Oklahoma took the second-half kickoff and drove 80 yards in four plays. Holieway threw 26 yards to Carl Cabbiness, getting Oklahoma to the 50, and 48 yards to Eric Bross. Leon Perry scored from two yards out.

No. 1 Miami, Fla. 23, Wisconsin 3

MIAMI — Carlos Huerta kicked three field goals and linebacker Bernard Clark returned a fumble 55 yards for a touchdown Saturday, helping the top-ranked Miami Hurricanes overcome six turnovers to beat winless Wisconsin.

Miami's Steve Walsh threw for 225 yards and one score. The Hurricanes never managed a touchdown drive but still improved to 3-0 and have won 35 straight regular-season games.

Wisconsin, 0-3, had five turnovers and has 15 in three games. Miami tackled Wisconsin runners for losses 11 times.

No. 4 Auburn 38, Tennessee 6

AUBURN, Ala. — Reggie Slack passed for 220 yards and two touchdowns and scored another as fourth-ranked Auburn buried Tennessee.

Auburn's defense helped turn the game into a rout, forcing and recovering three third-quarter fumbles that set up touchdown drives of 27, 5 and 43 yards.

The victory lifted Auburn to 3-0 overall and 2-0 in the SEC. Tennessee has now matched its worst start in 26 years with an 0-4 record, three of those losses in conference play.

Slack, who completed 12 passes in a row during one stretch, connected with Alexander Wright on a 75-yard scoring play in the first quarter and hit Freddy Weygand on a 4-yarder in the third.

No. 8 Notre Dame 52, Purdue 7

SOUTH BEND, Ind. — Tony Rice passed for two touchdowns and ran for another and Ricky Watters returned a punt 66 yards for another score Saturday, leading eighth-ranked Notre Dame over Purdue.

It was one of the worst defeats suffered by Purdue in this series, which dates back to 1886. The worst loss was 48-0 in 1970.

The Irish, 3-0, exploded for 28 points in the second period before Coach Lou Holtz cleared his bench. Holtze used three quarterbacks in the second quarter and four during the game.

No. 9 Florida St. 30, Michigan St. 7

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. — LeRoy Butler, the hero of Florida State's "punt-rooskie" play a week earlier, broke open a close game in the fourth quarter Saturday by returning an interception 26 yards for a touchdown as the Seminoles defeated Michigan State.

Butler, who ran a fake punt 78 yards last Saturday to set up ninth-ranked Florida State's winning field goal in a 24-21 victory over Clemson, scored on the third play of the fourth quarter.

No. 10 Nebraska 47, Arizona St. 16

LINCOLN, Neb. — Quarterback Steve Taylor rushed for 116 yards and one touchdown and threw for another touchdown, leading 10th-ranked Nebraska over Arizona State Saturday night.

Ken Clark also had 122 yards rushing and a touchdown for Nebraska, 3-1. Arizona State suffered its first loss in three games.

Nebraska took the opening kickoff and marched 49 yards to Chris Drennan's 40-yard field goal. Taylor quickly added an 11-yard touchdown run following an interception by Huskers free safety Tim Jackson

Rutgers breaks skid

STATE COLLEGE, Pa. — Rutgers broke a 15-game losing streak against Penn State as Mike Botti ran 11 and 57 yards for third-period touchdowns in a 21-16 upset of the 15th-ranked Nittany Lions Saturday.

Rutgers held Penn State on four downs at its 2 with less than a minute left to preserve the victory.

The Scarlet Knights, 2-1, trailed 10-7 in the third period when fullback Botti capped a two-play, 37-yard drive with an 11-yard run for a 14-10 lead.

Penn State, 2-1, punted after the next series and Rutgers drove 70 yards in four plays, with Botti covering the last 57 on a draw play.

Penn State freshman Tony Sacca, who replaced Tom Bill after the starting quarterback was injured late in the third quarter, took the Lions 70 yards on nine plays to cut the lead to 21-16 with nine minutes left in the game. Sacca completed passes of 18 and 17 yards and benefitted from a 15-yard pass interference penalty in the drive, which was capped by Gary Brown's 4-yard touchdown run.

A Lions desperation drive started at the Penn State 10 and moved to a first down at the Rutgers 3 with 47 seconds left. But Rutgers held two running plays to one yard and a pair of passes fell incomplete in the end zone. Sacca completed passes of 29, 27, 14 and 15 yards in the drive.

Rutgers won the first game of this eastern rivalry in 1918 and had lost ever other meeting with the Nittany Lions.

No. 11 W. Virginia 31
Pittsburgh 10

PITTSBURGH — Anthony Brown, a former Pitt running back, ran for 110 yards and a touchdown and quarterback Major Harris' running set up two scores as 11th-ranked West Virginia beat 16th-rated Pittsburgh.

Harris, who grew up five minutes from Pitt Stadium, hit Reggie Rembert on a 33-yard first-quarter touchdown pass and reserve Undra Johnson scored on a 20-yard run in the fourth period as the Mountaineers, 4-0, beat Pitt for the first time since 1984.

Pitt, 2-1, held West Virginia 23 points under its nation's-leading 54-point average, but the Mountaineers limited Adam Walker — averaging 165 yards a game — to a season-low 39 yards on 17 carries.

Harris, who turned down a Pitt scholarship offer because the Panthers wanted him to play defense, scrambled 38 yards on a second-and-25 bootleg on West Virginia's third possession. Four players later, Harris hit a wide-open Rembert for a 7-0 lead after cornerback Troy Washington slipped in the end zone.

West Virginia outrushed the Panthers by a nearly 3-to-1 margin and defeated Pitt for only the fourth time in their last 14 meetings. Their 21-point margin of victory was its biggest against Pitt since the Mountaineers' 38-15 win in 1968.

No. 12 Clemson 31
Georgia Tech 13

ATLANTA — Clemson linebacker Doug Brewster returned an interception 68 yards for a third-quarter touchdown to stop a Georgia Tech drive as the 12th-ranked Tigers defeated the miscue-prone Yellow Jackets.

Tech, 1-2, a two-touchdown underdog, was trailing 17-10 and marching when Brewster snatched a pass from quarterback Todd Rampley off the chest of Jerry Mays, Tech's third turnover of the period. The linebacker raced untouched into the end zone with 4:46 left in the third period for a 24-10 lead for the Tigers, 3-1, 1-0 in the Atlantic Coast Conference.

Tech is 0-2 in the ACC and winless in 11 consecutive games against a Division 1-A school.

No. 13 Alabama 44
Vanderbilt 10

TUSCALOOSA, Ala. — Bobby Humphrey ran for 101 yards and two touchdowns and Gene Jelks returned a punt 37 yards for another score as No. 13 Alabama handed Vanderbilt its first loss.

Humphrey scored on runs of seven and one yards and Philip Doyle kicked three field goals as the Crimson Tide moved to 2-0 and dropped Vanderbilt to 2-1.

Vandy scored on a 43-yard field goal by Johnny Clark and a 79-yard pass play from Eric Jones to Rodney Barrett. Both those scores came in the first half. But Alabama built a 20-10 halftime lead and added 24 second-half points on a Humphrey run, a field goal by Doyle, a 3-yard pass from Jeff Dunn to Howard Cross after a fumble recovery, and a 26-yard run by Murry Hill.

Alabama now is 1-0 in SEC play while Vandy is 1-1.

The game, played before 70,123 fans in expanded Bryant-Denny Stadium, was the 900th in Alabama's football history, dating back to 1892. The Tide's overall record is 634-223-43.

No. 17 Washington 35
San Jose St. 31

SEATTLE — The 17th-ranked Huskies are 3-0 after coming from behind to beat San Jose State.

It took a last-gasp touchdown drive for the Huskies, who went into the game as prohibitive favorites, to beat the Spartans in the rain.

Tony Covington, a senior tailback hadn't carried the ball in Washington's first two games while recovering from an injury, scored the winning touchdown on a 2-yard run around left end with 1:31 left. The Spartans had overcome a 28-0 deficit to go ahead by a field goal with 4:08 to go.

No. 19 Michigan 19
Wake Forest 9

ANN ARBOR, Mich — Tony Boles rushed for 213 yards and two touchdowns Saturday, leading No. 19 Michigan over Wake Forest.

It was the first victory for Michigan after losses to Notre Dame and top-ranked Miami. Wake Forest is 2-2.

Boles scored on runs of 14 and 29 yards in a 3:23 span of the second quarter as the Wolverines took a 14-3 halftime lead.

No. 20 Florida 17
Mississippi St. 0

GAINESVILLE, Fla. — Emmitt Smith rushed for two touchdowns, one on a school-record 96-yard run, and 20th-ranked Florida posted its third shutout of the season with a 17-0 Southeastern Conference football victory over Mississippi State on Saturday.

Smith, who had 164 yards in 13 carries, has gained over 100 yards in seven consecutive games and 12 of 14 games in his career.

Florida, 4-0, improved to 2-0 in the SEC. Mississippi State dropped to 0-3 in the league and 1-3 overall.

JUSTUS

The good thing about the sprint racing, according to Aaron, who won his national title in that category, "is that the good drivers are all up front and it reduces the element of danger." The pole position, he points out, is all important.

In Enduro racing, the other classification, all of the drivers start on a grid from a dead stop and race for 45 minutes. Speeds up to 110 mph are recorded.

The tracks are something else.

At the nationals, four days were devoted to adjusting the low-slung vehicles to the track.

They are so sticky that someone walking across the track in sneaks would pulls his feet right out of his shoes. "it takes two men to pry the tires from the track after stopping," notes Marvin.

DANGER? SURE there is. These things don't even have roll bars or seat belts. It's safer to be thrown from the car in the event of a mishap. Special suits are worn that will enable the driver to slide across an asphalt track at 60 miles an hour without suffering bruises or burns ... a broken bone, maybe ... The helmets are the same as those worn by A.J. Foyt, Mario Andretti, Bobby Rahal, Al Unser, Johnny Rutherford and the rest in the Indy 500.

FOR THE Justus', who moved to Midland from Houston four years ago, Kart racing is a family team project.

Mother Vicki keeps the records and data on past races and performances, invaluable aides in preparing for a race. Sister Jaime drives and won a national championship two years ago, took a year off for gymnastics and now is back on the track.

The "team" covers an estimated 20,000 miles, from Florida to California, a year to compete. The big expense is lodging and meals.

The key to racing success is keeping a steady steering wheel. The slightest movement can be costly. Aaron's championships came in '85, '86, and '88, but he showed early promise, winning the Charlie West award as a nine-year-old, the first time it was ever won by a junior.

"The first year was the best year," says Dad. "I raced right along with Aaron, but that was the only year. I can't keep up with him anymore."

AARON HAS played soccer, is a three-time Pony League baseball all-star and is out for football, but perhaps most important for the trip Down Under is his grades. He's a top student.

"If he can study ahead and make up work when he gets back...." says Marvin Justus.

Although New Zealand will pay part of the way for the month-long competition, the Justus' need a cash sponsorship for the rest of the trip.

The third obstacle, says Marvin, "is whether I can get the time off, but that isn't critical. Aaron can compete without me."

For Aaron and the U.S. pit crew that was selected for the trip, there would be four races ... Auckland, Christ Church, Adelaide and Melbourne. All the U. S. team would take would be personal gear. The Kiwi factory would provide the vehicles.

But that's just the immediate future. With his success thus far, Aaron is looking forward to a future in racing, possibly NASCAR or Indy tupe car.

He plans to take engineering and dynamics in college, possibly at Texas A&M, and continue to compete.

"I've already promised to prep his cars and fly him to races while he is in college," says Marvin.

Next year, as a senior, Aaron's racing horizons broaden. He can run in three different classifications.

And down the road, "I'd like to race in the Indy 500," he admits, which is what you'd call "being the best you can be."

JOYNER

Griffith Joyner's time of 10.54 was five one-hundredths off her own world mark. It was under the Olympic mark of 10.62 she set Saturday in qualifying, although it won't count because it was wind-aided.

"I wasn't chasing the time. I was chasing the win, the gold medal," she said.

In Sunday's semifinal heat, Griffith Joyner was called back to the blocks after a false start and came out slowly on the next gun. She made up for lost time, however, finishing with a 10.70.

Griffith Joyner's celebrity on and off the track is relatively new.

She began to compete in the 100 meters in earnest only last year and became an immediate hit with a world record time and a high-fashion image.

She went into July's U.S. Olympic trials in the shadow of sister-in-law Jackie Joyner-Kersee, Valerie Brisco, Ashford and other members of the U.S. team.

When she left Indianapolis she had the three fastest times in the 100 meters and the attention of the media.

She also broke the American record in the 200 meters with a 21.77, just a hair under the world record pace of 21.71. She will run in the 200 meters and the 400 meter relay later this week.

Griffith Joyner also has attracted attention because of her style. She designed and wore her own "athletic negligee," colorful, one-legged suits with bikini briefs. She wore her nails long and colorful.

Evert upset

SEOUL, South Korea (AP) — Chris Evert's chance to crown one of tennis' most glorious careers with Olympic glory was blown away in the wind Sunday.

The 33-year-old Evert, holder of 18 Grand Slam singles titles among more than 150 victories and second seed in the first medal-awarding Olympic tennis tournament since 1924, was beaten at her own baseline game and lost 2-6, 6-4, 6-1 in the third round to Italy's Raffaella Reggi.

Evert was on track to meet Grand Slam queen Steffi Graf in the final, but her medal hopes evaporated in an hour and 54 minutes on a packed, noisy Court No. 1 at Seoul's Olympic Park.

Evert decided only two months ago to come to the Olympics and was added to the U.S. squad in place of Elise Burgin a few days before the July 31 deadline for entries.

After receiving a first-round bye, she beat Italy's Anna Maria Cecchini in the second round in straight sets, but Reggi was a far tougher opponent.

Evert looked at ease at the start, moving out quickly to a 3-1 lead and taking the opening set with her third service break.

But she lost her concentration in the second set, letting Reggi back in the match, and she never recovered, netting two simple forehands in a row for the final points of the match.

Reggi surged to a 4-1 lead and evened the match at a set apiece when Evert netted a forehand.

Olympic Glance

New York Times News Service

TRACK AND FIELD

Everything else had been broken — the world record, the Olympic mark, the American standard — so Ben Johnson completed the amazing collection of physical performances by cracking something really surprising: a smile. Johnson, the superb sprinter from Canada, left Carl Lewis in his tailwind and his world record in the past when he won the men's 100-meter dash in a breathtaking 9.79 seconds. Then Johnson, a man who goes about the business of rewriting track history with a grim seriousness, allowed himself the smallest trace of a smile. Lewis's disappointment was considerably more obvious. Lewis was left in the blocks at the start and then only to stare at Johnson's back. In taking the silver in 9.92, Lewis had to console himself with a new American record. Jackie Joyner-Kersee buried her competition in the women's heptathlon and thereby erased any lingering pain from 1984. Joyner-Kersee, who missed the gold medal in the 1984 women's heptathlon by just five points after suffering a hamstring injury, set a world record by totaling 7,291 points over the seven events.

SWIMMING

The rich got richer — or at least more deeply golden — as the Americans Matt Biondi and Janet Evans and an East German, Kristin Otto, all added to their considerable stockpiles of gold. Biondi captured his fourth gold medal, and sixth medal over-all, when he won the 50-meter men's freestyle in a world record time of 22.14 seconds. Evans, the California high school senior, was again at the head of the class and above the rest of the competition when she claimed her third gold medal with the women's 800-meter freestyle title. Finally, Otto carted off her fifth gold after she contributed the backstroke leg to East Germany's 400-meter medley relay effort.

GYMNASTICS

Dmitri Bilozerchev, whose career has endured both personal tragedy and political disputes, finally enjoyed both physical success and inspired diplomacy when he won a pair of gold medals in the men's individual event finals. Bilozerchev, the world champion who suffered through one boycott and a car accident, was mobbed by adoring South Korean youngsters after taking the gold in the pommel horse and rings. The Soviets captured outright or shared medals in five of the six finals.

WEIGHT LIFTING

The Bulgarians, who appeared untouchable in their domination of this sport earlier in the week, are now not alone in disgrace. Weight lifters from Spain and Hungary tested positive for drugs and were suspended from the Games. The development came just hours after the Bulgarians, who have had two gold medalists stripped of their awards and suspended, announced they would pull out the rest of their weight lifting team and head home in embarrassment.

Montreal's Perez throws no-hitter*

Dodgers clinch tie for West crown

PHILADELPHIA (AP) — Pascual Perez pitched a five-inning no-hitter against the Philadelphia Phillies Saturday night as the Montreal Expos won 1-0 in a rain-shortened game.

David Palmer, also of the Expos, pitched the last rain-shortened no-hitter, beating St. Louis 4-0 in a five-inning perfect game on April 21, 1984.

Perez, a 31-year-old right-hander who has battled back from a drug-related suspension, pitched the second no-hitter in nine days.

Tom Browning of the Cincinnati Reds pitched the 14th perfect game in major league history Sept. 16, beating the Los Angeles Dodgers 1-0. That was the first no-hitter since Juan Nieves of the Milwaukee Brewers beat the Baltimore Orioles 7-0 on April 15, 1987.

Saturday's game was called by crew chief Harry Wendelstedt after a 90-minute rain delay.

Perez, 12-7, allowed three runners. Von Hayes walked on a 3-2 pitch to open the second. Juan Samuel reached on a fielder's choice groundout before Perez struck out Lance Parrish and Chris James. An error by third baseman Graig Nettles allowed James to reach in the fifth.

Perez struck out eight in his second shutout and fourth complete game.

Montreal scored in the fourth when Otis Nixon led off with a double, Dave Martinez singled and Andres Galarraga grounded into a run-scoring fielder's choice.

Alfredo Griffin's squeeze bunt scored the go-ahead run in a five-run, fifth-inning rally for the Dodgers,s 7-3 Saturday, clinching a tie for the National League West title.

A loss by Cincinnati Saturday night would give Los Angeles its first NL West crown since 1985.

Trevor Wilson, 0-2 held Los Angeles hitless and led 2-0 before Jeff Hamilton and Rick Dempsey hit consecutive doubles to start the fifth. Mike Devereaux walked and pinch-hitter Mike Sharperson's run-scoring single tied the score.

Padres 3, Astros 0

Jeff Heathcock, 0-4, made his first start after 15 relief appearances. He replaced Nolan Ryan, who aggravated his hamstring injury while warming up. Joaquin Andujar pitched two innings of one-hit relief in his first appearance since Sept. 6.

Houston has not scored in 18 innings.

Mets 14, Cardinals 1

Dave West won his major-league debut and went 2-for-2, and Kevin McReynolds and Mookie Wilson each drove in four runs for the Mets.

The Mets, who clinched the NL East crown on Thursday, have won nine of their last 10 games and 24 of their last 30.

West, whose Triple-A contract was purchased by the Mets Sept. 1, replaced the injured Bob Ojeda in the rotation. Ojeda nearly severed his left middle finger in a gardening accident on Wednesday.

West allowed five hits in five innings, striking out three and walking one. He also singled and scored in the second inning and doubled in the fourth.

Cubs 2, Pirates 1

Vance Law snapped a tie with an eighth-inning sacrficie fly Saturday night, giving the Chicago Cubs a 2-1 victory over the Pittsburgh Pirates.

Mark Grace led off with a double against Dave Rucker, 0-2. Pinch-runner Rolando Roomes took third on Andre Dawson's grounder and scored when Law flied to medium center against Jeff Robinson.

Rich Gossage, 4-3, pitched two innings of one-hit relief and Frank DiPino pitched a hitless ninth for his sixth save.

Reds 2, Braves 1

Danny Jackson pitched a four-hitter and became the first Cincinnati pitcher to win 23 games since 1963.

By winning, the Red prevented the Los Angeles Dodgers from clinching the National League West. Los Angeles beat San Francisco 7-3 Saturday afternoon to clinch a tie.

Jackson, 23-7, struck out three and walked none in his 15th complete game and his 13th victory in 15 decisions. He is the first Red to win 23 games since Jim Maloney.

Atlanta lost its fifth straight and 101st overall, matching the 1977 Braves for the most losses since the franchise moved from Milwaukee in 1966.

Ron Gant hit his 18th home run of the season on the second pitch of the game.

Boston's Jody Reed reflects the feelings' of the Sox after the Beantown Bunch dropped another to the Yanks in the stretch.

Reed bobble opens gate for New York

NEW YORK (AP) — Boston shortstop Jody Reed misplayed Willie Randolph's bases-loaded grounder with two outs in the ninth inning as the New York Yankees rallied for two runs and beat the Red Sox 5-4 Saturday to close within 4½ games of the American League East leaders.

The Yankees, who fell behind 4-3 in the top of the ninth when Jim Rice got an RBI grounder while pinch hitting for major-league batting leader Wade Boggs, came back against relief ace Lee Smith.

New York's victory kept Boston's magic number for clinching at five, and came a day after the Red Sox rallied for three runs in the ninth to stun the Yankees, 10-9.

Smith, who had saves in his previous nine opportunities, walked Rickey Henderson to start the ninth. Henderson then stole his 87th base, and continued to third on Smith's wild pitch. Claudell Washington followed with a double that tied the score.

Don Mattingly was intentionally walked, and Dave Winfield's long fly out moved the runners to second and third. After Jack Clark was intentionally walked and pinch hitter Ken Phelps struck out, Randolph hit a routine grounder to Reed, but the ball skipped off his glove for his 10th error of the season as Washington scored. Smith fell to 4-5 and Lee Guetterman, 1-1, got the victory. Five Yankees pitchers held Boston to just four hits.

The Yankees, shut out for six innings by Mike Boddicker, scored three times in the seventh for a 3-3 tie. Henderson led off with a solid single to center and Boston manager Joe Morgan quickly hooked Boddicker, who gave up eight hits. Washington met reliever Tom Bolton with a single and Mattingly blooped a ground-rule double down the third-base line that made it 3-1 and brought on Bob Stanley.

Winfield hit an RBI grounder to the right side that moved Mattingly to third base and Stanley threw a wild pitch that allowed the tying run to score.

Yankees starter Richard Dotson gave up just three hits in 6 2-3 innings, but got into trouble with seven walks. Boggs, hampered by a sore foot, walked to start the game and later scored on Todd Benzinger's groundout with the bases loaded.

Ellis Burks walked to open the seventh, advanced on a sacrifice and scored on Rich Gedman's single. Winfield, in right field, apparently caught his spikes playing the ball and fell to the ground, but stayed in the game.

Dotson walked the next two batters and left and reliever Steve Shields walked Dwight Evans with the bases loaded, putting Boston ahead 3-0. Dotson has walked 20 batters to lead off innings this season, and eight have scored.

The crowd of 51,392 included several thousand Boston rooters. A few fights erupted in the stands as rival fans became overly involved.

Athletics 5, Brewers 2

Dave Stewart allowed seven hits in eight-plus innings Saturday to reach 20 victories for the second straight season for the Athletics, all but ending the Brewers' chances in the American League East.

Stewart, 7-0 lifetime against the Brewers, improved his record to 20-12 with a season-high 11-strikeout performance. The 6-foot-2 right-hander, who will pitch the opener of the American League playoffs, has won five of his last six starts. Rick Honeycutt got two outs in the ninth and Dennis Eckersley finished for his major-league leading 44th save.

Stewart is only the second pitcher in Athletics' history to win 20 games in consecutive seasons. Jim "Catfish" Hunter won 20 or more games for four straight seasons from 1971-74.

Milwaukee began the day five games behind Boston after losing 9-8 in 14 innings to the Athletics on Friday. The Brewers have six games left.

The Athletics got a run in the first off Bill Wegman, 13-12, when Luis Polonia reached on Paul Molitor's error, went to third on Dave Henderson's single and scored on Jose Canseco's double-play grounder.

Mark McGwire lined his 30th homer to right center in the fourth and Henderson singled in Polonia, who had singled and stolen second, with the Athletics' third run in the fifth.

Royals 6, White Sox 2

Danny Tartabull, Frank White and Brad Wellman had run-scoring singles during a four-run fourth inning for the Royals.

Royals' starter Floyd Bannister, 12-13, gave up one run on six hits and struck out four in 5 2-3 innings. Rookies relievers Tom Gordon and Mark Lee permitted one run and four hits over the final 3 1-3 innings.

White Sox rookie Adam Peterson, 0-1, making his first start since Sept. 19, 1987, and only the second of his career, gave up only three hits in 3 2-3 innings but allowed four runs.

Blue Jays 1, Indians 0

Dave Stieb, one out away from the first no-hitter in the 12-year history of the Toronto Blue Jays, lost it on a bad-hop single by Julio Franco in the ninth and finished with a one-hit victory.

It was the seventh no-hitter broken up in the ninth inning this season in the major leagues.

Only minutes before Stieb completed his one-hitter, Montreal's Pascual Perez pitched a rain-shortened 1-0 no-hitter against the Phillies at Philadelphia.

Just nine days ago, Cincinnati's Tom Browning pitched a perfect game in a 1-0 victory over the Los Angeles Dodgers.

Stieb allowed only three base runners, two on walks and one hit batsman, before giving up Franco's spoiling hit up the middle with two out in the ninth. Franco had fouled off several pitches on a 2-2 count before his routine grounder hopped over second base into center.

The Blue Jays entered the American League in 1977 and had seven previous one-hitters, including one by Stieb against Milwaukee, a 9-0 victory last May 31.

Mariners 3, Rangers 0

Mark Langston pitched a one-hitter and extended his scoreless inning streak to a club-record 26 innings for the Mariners.

Langston, 14-11, struck out six and walked seven, giving up only a single to Jeff Kunkel with two out in the fifth.

Seattle scored in the third off Rangers starter Jeff Russell, 10-8, but a baserunning blunder cost the Mariners a second run.

Mickey Brantley's single drove in Jay Buhner, who led off the inning with a walk and moved to third on Rey Quinones' double. After Buhner scored on Brantley's hit and Quinones went to third, Quinones tagged up and apparently scored on Harold Reynolds' flyout to left. But the Rangers appealed and third base umpire Larry Young ruled Quinones left the bag too soon.

Townhouse perfect for golf loving couple

If you are in the market for an elegant, low-maintenance townhouse that is suitable for a single person, or an older couple with grown children, then this week's featured home will interest you. And, if you like to play golf, then all the owner of this two bedroom and two bath home must do is walk out the back terrace and tee up a ball. Yes, this townhouse is located at Green Tree Country Club on green number nine.

The inviting stucco exterior of this home is very Southwestern and has well-manicured flower beds that feature shrubs of every variety imaginable that thrive in West Texas. The low-maintenance yard allows the homeowner more time for golf. A private courtyard leads to an aqua front door which opens into an exquisite foyer with a tile floor which leads to the many different living areas.

The gallery opens onto the living room, which is decorated in peach walls. A half-vaulted ceiling adds a dramatic effect to this room, which focuses on a marble fireplace. Atrium doors, with plantation shutters that fold back for access to the back terrace, are located on both sides of the fireplace. This room is spacious enough to accommodate a baby grand piano at one end, a sitting area by the fireplace and a study area at the other end.

The formal dining room is to the right of the front door. Pale blue and white adorn the walls of this room and is brightened by many windows. This room also has a marble server for formal buffet dinners.

One of the features that makes this townhouse unique can be found by opening three shuttered doors that are situated along the gallery across from the living area.

The first doors open to reveal a wet bar, which is conveniently located to the living and dining rooms. The bar has a refrigerator and mirrored walls reflect the crystal bar glasses.

A quaint breakfast bar is found behind the second set of doors. This arrangement is very appealing because it allows for the kitchen to be closed off from the living area when desired. But when the doors are opened, the breakfast bar becomes a place for friends to visit.

The third set of doors were designed to hide an entertainment system. Shelves are made for the storage of record albums, tapes and equipment.

Traffic flows through the kitchen from the formal dining room and at the end of the gallery. The tan kitchen has a Hotpoint microwave and self-cleaning range. The other appliances include a General Electric dishwasher and a Compactall trash compactor. The kitchen sink overlooks the breakfast bar into the main living room. The other amenities of the kitchen include lighting under the cabinets, specially designed cabinets and a skylight.

The master bedroom is situated off the end of the gallery, across from the kitchen. In one area of the bedroom a desk is placed in front of a built-in bookcase with cabinets. As a person catches up on office work or writes an over-due letter, the atrium door and many larger windows have a spectacular view of the golf course.

Two walk-in closets are located in a small hall which flows into the master bath. The arrangement of this bath is very unusual, but very functional. One part of the bath is a large dressing room. A marble vanity with a make-up area is situated along the left wall. Another vanity with a sink is located on the adjacent wall, but a door to the bathing area (with a marble floor and a shower/tub) separates these walls. A linen closet is found on the right wall.

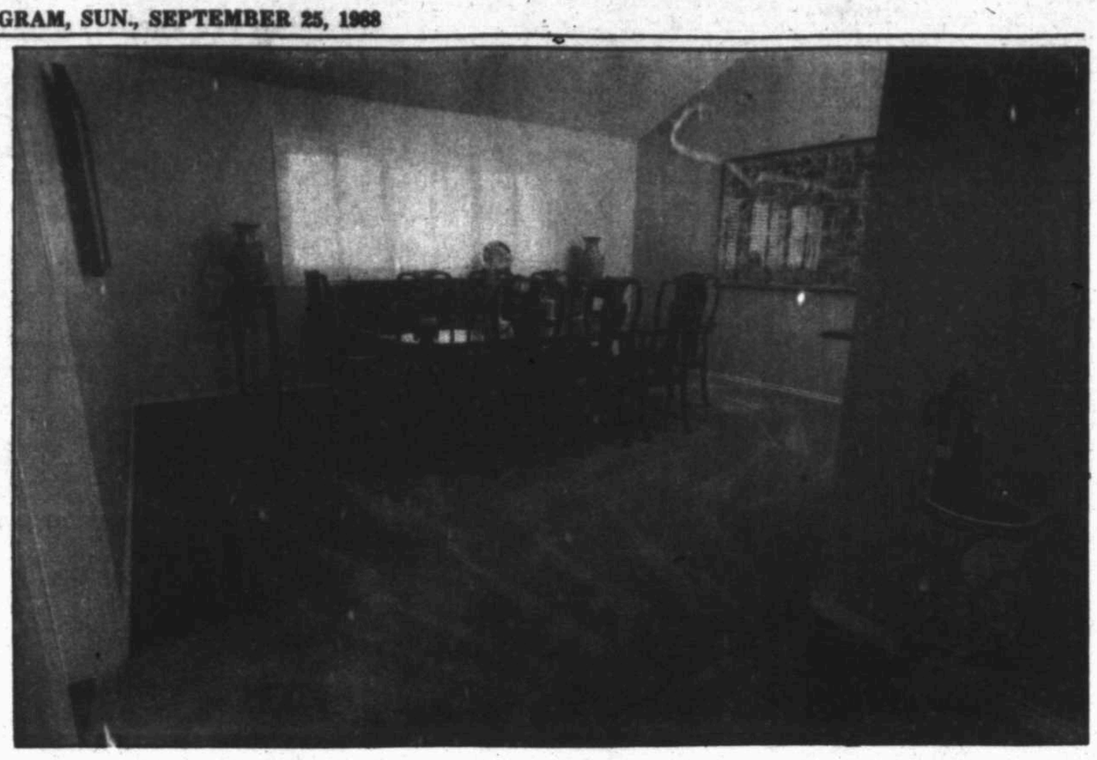

A second door in the bath leads to another bathroom that was planned as an elegant guest bath–which is adjoined to the guest bedroom–or as a second bath for the homewoner when not having guests.

This bath has a marble floor and vanity, as well as a built-in shower.

The guest bedroom has pale peach walls and a large walk-in closet. Any friend or relative would feel right at home in this room.

The other amenities of this six year old home include a large utility room, lots of closets, a sprinkler system and a three car garage with automatic door openers.

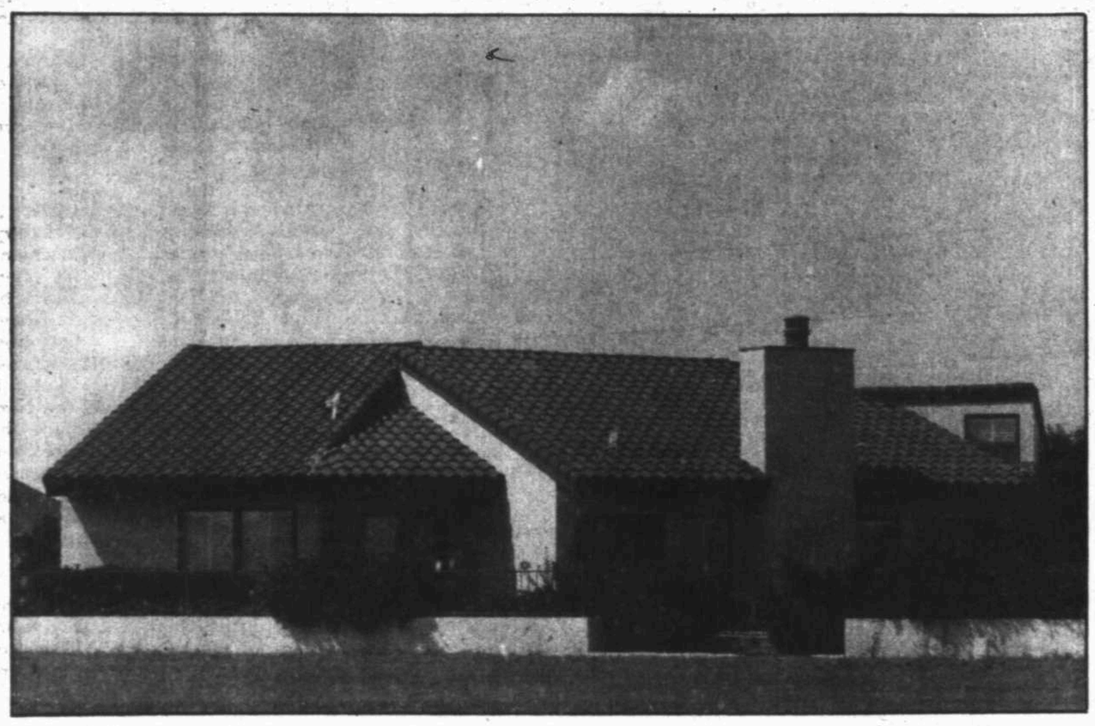

Re/Max of Midland is offering this "peachy townhouse" for $149,000.

To the right of the entrance, the formal dining room is situated. Many windows brighten the room which is ideal for a buffet dinner. Pale blue walls with white trim also highlight the room.

The master bedroom has space for a desk by a door which opens to the backyard terrace. The uniquely designed master bath makes this home very adaptable to a couple's individual needs.

The back of the house opens onto the terrace that features Mexican tile and a panoramic view of the golf course at Green Tree Country Club.

The terrace was made for enjoying a morning cup of coffee or a West Texas sunset.

Antique restorer explains new profession

By TED GRIGGS
Houma (La.) Daily Courier

Mike Willis sits on the empty plastic bucket that serves as his work stool and tries to explain just how be became a full-time restorer of antiques.

"A lot of people think I'm a little strange," he says.

Those are his friends.

After Willis was laid off from a job selling construction equipment about 18 months ago, he "hung up the silk ties and white shirts of sales management to come out here and sweat and get nasty all day."

Out here is Mike's Antique Restoration, an unairconditioned, wooden building in Houma.

Clots of cars and trucks flow past the shop, tires thrumming the asphalt. Two window fans, set on the shop floor, hum a white noise lullaby.

The sound, if not their breeze, is soothing. The temperature inside is 96, according to a wall thermometer.

A pile of broken-down chairs squats to the right of the shop entrance.

Left of the door, Willis has pasted a thank you note from a grateful customer, a postcard from 1943 and a grocery receipt from the same era (loaf of bread, 11 cents; half-pound of bacon, 26 cents).

Samples of wood stains and brass finishes along with notes Willis has written to himself complete the shop's decor.

"There's not a lot of glamor in this business," Willis says.

Not a lot of money, either.

But Willis does it because of the feeling he gets from taking what appears to be an old, wrecked piece of trash and bringing out its beauty.

"More times than not an antique has some sentiment for people," Willis says.

"I kind of feel honored that people would trust me with that heirloom. It's not worth all the money in the world, but it's irreplaceable to them."

The main things one needs in this business are patience and imagination, Willis explains. Elbow grease, sandpaper, steel wool and the right touch also help.

"You just have to like this stuff," he says.

Most people look at a moldy, cobweb-covered chair and see just that. Willis sees a beautiful piece of craftsmanship waiting to be discovered.

"A lot of it is in the touch," he explains.

"You develop a feel for when the piece is right."

Willis likes to lose himself in a wood grain's currents, feeling the texture and tone of a sanded surface and knowing the smoothness that marks perfection.

A properly sanded piece feels "like a little baby's behind over every square inch," he says.

One woman came to him with a broken chair that had been in her family for three generations.

Her son, a small giant, had sat in it.

After Willis fixed it, "she broke out into tears when she saw it."

That kind of reward cannot be bought, he says.

"Certainly I like having a few bucks in my pocket to take the wife out for ice cream, but this is not a career that you're ever going to get rich at.

"In every little town somewhere there's an old guy stuck in a hole a wall with all the work he can handle.

"That's what I want to be."

Don Harvey associate discusses transferees

"Well, here I go again...the company has asked me to relocate!" Sound familiar?

This and similar proclamations will continue to be heard in the halls of the nation's large business enterprises, according to research conducted by Homequity, Inc. of Wilton, Connecticut, the nation's oldest and largest relocation management company.

Kim Young, Corporate Vice President of Relocation with Don Harvey, Realtors, said, "Homequity's research confirms that a typical transferee – a corporate individual who is being transferred a company request – can expect one job-related move every two to five years." Don Harvey, Realtors is a member of Homequity Relocation Centers (HRC), a national network of leading, independently-owned real estate firms.

"For many of today's working Americans, career employment that continues for 20 years or more with a major corporation remains the norm. These achievers look to the corporation to provide them with lifework and its rewards – satisfying pay, job security and personal prestige." said Ms. Young.

"Also expected is a potpourri of the latest in fringe benefits," said Ms. Young. "A comprehensive relocation program is always considered a key ingredient in any benefits package because corporate-sponsored assistance focuses on the successful sale of the former home at the departure location and the effective search for the right community and new home in the destination area."

Kim Young

Stephen A. Fragapane, President of Homequity, Inc., said that it is common for career-oriented employees who work for large client organizations to experience one job-related move every three years. "With time, we find that Homequity and HRC relocation professionals work more and more with repeat customers, those employees and families that frequently utilize our departure and destination services," he said.

"The corporate citizen who maintains lifelong employment with a corporation might transfer as many as 14 times," said Ms. Young. "Such a careeri is likely to purchase and sell no fewer than 14 homes in 14 different communities!

"Homequity and the HRC member firms will mutually provide more than 76,000 relocation services to mobile Americans in 1988," said Ms. Young.

The key to an effective transfer, whether buying or selling a home, lies in having an effective working relationship with your real estate agent. The more resources your agent has for you to draw from, the better your chances for successfully buying or selling your home.

As members of the nation's leading broker-to-broker network, Don Harvey, Realtors works with a large number of qualified buyers moving into our area. This provides sellers a greater number of prospective buyers for their home.

Individuality is expressed throughout homes today

By LEATRICE EISEMAN
Copley News Service

Remember when home decor conformed to "the" look, and people scrambled to redecorate to stay in style?

Now consider some of today's moods and trends: The comfortable country look of Ralph Lauren. The splendors of the Southwest a la Georgia O'Keefe. The drama of chrome and mirrors. The soft shimmer of a Monet watercolor.

People now are proud to express their individuality through their homes. In doing so, they are aided by the rich and diverse array of available moods, fabrics, and textures. The result is often a highly personalized atmosphere that looks lived-in and homey — regardless of style. In fact, a single home can successfully combine several decorating moods; if the rooms are unified by linking the color palette throughout the home, this eclectic approach works beautifully.

To be sure, economics are having an impact on home decor; fewer people are refurnishing, while more are redoing. Slipcovers have made a comeback as a practical way to achieve an instant change without a huge expense. And fresh coats of paint are providing many rooms with a much-needed lift at comparatively little cost. The vast choices in fabrics and paints make even such limited changes great fun to effect.

Color this spring is dominated by pastels — not the washed-out, blah variety, but tones that are at once vibrant and gentle.

Take your cue from Monet's watercolors, for instance. Monet used soft yellows, setting them off with a splash of lavender here and a splash of pink azalea there. Or he set off those lavenders and pinks with strokes of bright, citrusy greens.

People are trusting the artist's inspiration in combining certain colors they might not otherwise have considered. They're saying, quite rightly, "If it's wonderful in that painting, it will work well in my living room, too."

The Monet watercolor mood is being carried out most successfully by using fabrics of polished cotton and other materials with shimmer and iridescence.

Paint manufacturers have made an all-out effort in recent years to make the sheen that has long been considered suitable for woodwork and trim also accepted for walls.

Finishes that are called eggshell or pearlescent are actually a low-level enamel, with a patina that's perfect with the watercolor motif. The image is that of looking into the still, lovely surface of a clear lake. Of course, not all the surfaces are shimmery; matte finishes provide a contrast that enriches the total effect.

Even within a particular home-fashion trend these days there are wide variations.

The country look, now undergoing a revival after having been lost in the art deco shuffle, is favored by many for its warmth. But country can be as strong as Ralph Lauren or as delicate as Laura Ashley. It can range from sophisticated English country to folk art Americana.

Pastels are notable in the country look, too, but they're accented by crisp periwinkle blues and buttery yellows — with splashes of fun cast in here and there by bright reds.

Another home-fashion trend centers on the use of neutral shades, which have been used less often in the past several years.

Neutrals are considered safe in times of economic uncertainty; they blend well with everything and are never offensive. And the popularity of neutral-color leathers has spawned a new spectrum of neutral tones, such as palomino leather, ivory, ecru and bisque. Leather upholstery, it's worth noting, is more practical than you might think; it's quite durable and easy to clean.

Drama and elegance are also favored home environments. The dramatic look features strong clean lines, geometric patterns, and lots of chrome and mirrored surfaces.

Langston Realtors Talk About...

Corporate or third party properties

What does it mean when my Realtor refers to a house as a third party or corporate listing?

Muldrow

A. Let us first establish what a third party is. Employee Relocation companies, commonly referred to as a third party, are firms which are retained by corporations to assist in the transferring of employees from one location to another. Some of the larger Employee Relocation firms are Travelers , Merrill Lynch and Homequity.

A "third party or corporate" property is the home of a transferred employee which is purchased by the relocation company in order to free up the employee's equity and responsibility for that property enabling him to purchase a home in his new location. This is essential to a corporation; the process enables a transferee to be on the job, when and where needed, with the family unit intact, resulting for a more effective employee.

Once the acquisition of the home has taken place, the relocation firm acts as a third party between the transferee and a purchaser on behalf of the employee's corporation.

Total costs to a company for transferring an employee are in the range or $35,000 to $40,000, so it is not a process initiated without definite need and purpose, and must be accomplished as smoothly and timely as possible.

Q. Are there advantages to buying one of these properties?

A. There are advantages to purchasing a third party listing. First, these properties are usually conditioned for a quick sale because the longer they are in the inventory of the relocation company, the greater the cost to the corporation. All major systems including heat, air and kitchen appliances should be in working order, the property should be clean, the yard maintained, and often painting and recarpeting are done if necessary to put the home in quick resalable condition.

More importantly the property should be competitively priced because the figure paid the transferee for this home has generally been determined by two appraisals and a Broker's Price Opinion from a local broker. The home is nearly always marketed at this price or within very close range.

There are also disadvantages to purchasing a third party property. First, in a transaction of this type there is no personal contact with the seller so the buyer has little opportunity to learn of special features or amenities a home may have. Second, the purchaser will be negotiation with a company having no emotional involvement in the property, but rather operating within set formulas based on acquisition costs, time in inventory, repair costs, etc.

Q. How do third party listings differ from REO properties?

A. The primary distinction between third party listings and REO Properties, meaning real estate owned, is who has title to the property. Third party listings are owned by employee relocation firms, REO Properties are generally owned by mortgage companies, banks, and mortgage insurance companies such as Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac and the FDIC.

These firms obtain title to properties through foreclosure, and at times are reluctant to spend additional money to recondition and prepare these properties for resale. Consequently, many of these properties are being sold on an as-is basis.

Q. How does Langston Realtors obtain third party listings?

A. Langston Realtors is a member of the prestigious Travelers Realty Network, a sister company to the Traveler Location Company, both owned by the Travelers Companies of Hartford, Connecticut. Therefore, Langston assists Travelers Relocation with Broker Price Opinions and the marketing of Midland Properties in their inventory. Travelers Relocation Company serves over 400 corporations with many being among the Fortune 500.

To be a member of the Travelers Realty Network, Langston has to meet and maintain stringent requirements of performance on sending and servicing referrals, on professionalism in relocation services, and on dedication to the real estate industry. It also had to attain a major share of the MLS market.

To secure the Travelers Relocation Company listings, Langston had to meet equally stringent standards for maintenance and marketing the properties, Langston has also been selected by numerous other relocation companies to list their properties in Midland.

Muldrow is the Corporate Department Director for Langston Realtors. His duties include the management and marketing of "third party" and REO listings.

The Super Handyman

By Al Carrell

A friend made a great holder for pot and pan lids in his kitchen cabinets. I may adapt this idea to help keep my shop better organized, too.

Here's the trick. Drive a couple of nails into the wall or cabinet a little wider than the items you're trying to hold. Set the lids, sandpaper, pamphlets or whatever in place against the wall between the nails and stretch a rubber band across both nails. This idea is guaranteed to help you organize different areas around the homestead ... and the price is certainly right.

Dear Super:

Whenever I find a tiny scratch on my car, I grab one of the kids' crayons that matches and color over the scratch with it. Not only does this hide the scratch, but it does a great job of protecting it from rust until I can do the real patchwork. The important thing is to get the metal covered up quickly. — W.E.

A SUPER HINT — Instead of throwing out old keys, use your grinder to turn them into things like screwdrivers, knives, bottle openers, etc. Put them back on your key ring and you'll have a tiny tool chest wherever you go. Be sure and wear safety goggles when using a grinder.

Dear Al:

Here's a tip I learned and would like to share with your readers. I always coil my hose for storage while the water is still running through it. The water keeps it rigid so it coils easily and without the kinks it sometimes gets when it's empty. It works, so try it. — D.E.

Dear D.E.: I did and gave myself a nice bath. Think it'll get better with practice?

Q: During your radio show you said to wait a while before painting a new pressure-treated deck. Why and how long should we wait?

A: Most pressure-treated lumber has a tendency to be damp because it holds the chemicals used in the treatment. Paint and stain will not readily adhere to a wet surface. Usually, a couple of months after the deck has been completed, Mother Nature will have taken care of this problem.

On the other hand, a water repellent treatment is often a good idea for a deck as soon as it's finished.

Dear Al:

I used a chemical stripper to remove the paint from an old piece of furniture and I didn't get all the stripper off. When I tried to repaint, the paint didn't stick in several places. I learned a valuable lesson. Maybe my error will alert others to be more careful. — W.R.

SHOP TALK — Dimmer switches are great! Honeywell has one that automatically adjusts itself to the amount of light in the room. As the sun goes down in the evening, the dimmer slowly turns up your lamp. You preselect the final level. The dimmer also works in reverse so that it will lower and then cut your lights off automatically as the sun rises. It is a handy gadget to have around in case you aren't home, too. This multifunction dimmer switch is called the Automatic Dimmer and should soon be available wherever you find other Honeywell switches and timers.

Q: I have recently acquired an older period home with a terrible rot problem on the front columns and railings. What is the best way to patch this up?

A: Patching is easy; cleaning away the old rot can be difficult. Even the best patch in the world won't do any good if the adjoining wood is weak. Remove all of the rot and cut into the good wood and inch or so. This can be done with a chisel or a saw. Brush away all loose debris and apply a wood preservative to the area. There are also some good wood hardeners that can be applied after the preservative has dried.

For patching, I would use a two-part resin filler (there are several brand-name types). Mix it up and apply with a putty knife. Most mixes set up quickly so don't mix it until you are ready to apply it and don't mix up more than you can use in a short time. Fill in the holes and cracks and build it up a little higher than the surrounding wood. You'll sand it down after it sets and hardens.

When repainting, be sure to prime all the spots where bare wood is exposed and then use an exterior paint.

The rot was caused by moisture, so you'd do well to figure out how the moisture got to the columns in the past.

Q: I am enclosing my patio which has a plain raised wooden deck floor. It is vented underneath but nothing has been added as far as moisture control or insulation. What must be done to cover the deck with flooring, carpet or linoleum?

A: It would take more space than we have to give all the possibilities for this type of project. Here are some basics. The deck would support a plywood subfloor. Make sure the deck is level. Seal it and put a vapor barrier over it. If you wanted to insulate the floor, you could put insulation between the joists under the deck or use rigid foam. If you wish to explore rigid foam, contact one of the manufacturers of this material for literature on how to use it for floors.

• • •

Q: This past summer, I taped a sign to the aluminum siding on my garage with masking tape. I can't get the residue off. What can I use?

A: There are several things to try. A laundry prewash will often work, or smear the area with cold cream. A spray lubricant such as WD-40 will often remove such adhesive.

Mildew is a year-round problem in just about every part of the country. Sometimes it attacks your basement; other times, the roof. Most often, though, it's in the bathroom. It can be a real problem if not treated. I have put together some facts about how mildew gets started and included some super tips on getting rid of it. If you would like a copy of my pamphlet, "Fighting Mildew Around the House," send a self-addressed, stamped envelope plus $1 (check or money order) for postage and handling to The Super Handyman here at the paper. I'll make sure you get a copy for yourself.

About Real Estate

With Don Campbell

Communications — it's the heartline of everything we do and, when the wires get crossed, all you have is confusion.

DEAR MR. CAMPBELL: We read with more than passing interest your column a few weeks ago where you talked about the difference between how the Federal Housing Administration and the Veterans Administration handle "deficiency judgments" when a buyer assumes an existing mortgage and then defaults on it.

Right now, the VA is trying to collect $25,000 from us because the buyer who assumed our mortgage a few years ago let the house go into foreclosure and it resulted in a loss to the VA. The man you quoted with the VA in Washington said that it would be possible to get a "release of liability" retroactively if the buyer who took over our mortgage would have been approved by the VA at that time. If, at that time, we had gotten this release of liability — which, in retrospect, is certainly what we SHOULD have done — we wouldn't be in this mess to begin with.

The person we talked to at the local VA office said that "there's no such thing" and that you (or the man in Washington) are dead wrong. He did say, though, that it might be possible to get a "waiver of the debt," which you also mentioned as a possibility, although the waiver would probably have some tax consequences. So, who's right and who's wrong, here? Mrs. C.E., Denver, Colo.

ANSWER: I had calls and letters from several of you who got essentially the same reaction from your local VA offices. Because it WAS an important question I had gone to the man in the best position to know the answer and that was George Moerman, the VA's director of loan policy, in Washington.

He finds it "disturbing" that some VA offices are denying that the procedure is available, because it's been on the books "for, I would guess, about 10 years." Nor is the procedure simply a VA regulation that might have gotten overlooked. It was passed by Congress and it's known as Title 38 of the U.S. Code, Section 1817 (b). And it says, unequivocally, that if the veteran (that's your husband) would have been eligible for the release of liability at the time the buyer assumed your mortgage (because his credit checked out) then you are STILL entitled to the release.

Now, neither Moerman nor I said anything about this being easy. It can get complicated going back several years and trying to track your buyer down, but with a little detective work it can usually be done.

"In many cases," Moerman added, "the mere fact that the buyer assumed the mortgage, held it for two or three years and kept current on his payments, can be accepted as evidence that his income and credit rating at the time of the assumption would have qualified the veteran for the release of liability." But the key feature here is that, regardless of what the local VA told you, the procedure IS authorized.

Two heads are better than one, and there's strength in unity. A couple of old, perhaps trite observations, but still very valid.

DEAR MR. CAMPBELL: I've been renting my current home from my uncle for the past five years. I'm ready to buy the home now, and as this will be my first purchase, I'd appreciate any information regarding buying on contract. My uncle said he would like to, but that it's up to me. What kind of tax break does this offer him? We've agreed on the price at $60,000. I can put 10 percent down — is this the normal amount when buying on contract?

I will need to replace my roof (new shingles only) and plan on doing cosmetic repairs on the interior. I haven't received any estimates yet, but should I use them as a determining factor for how much I should finance? I obviously would like to use as little of "my own money" as possible in purchasing this home.

Is buying on contract a wise idea with a relative? He has been a great landlord. I will be getting married next July and I anticipate we will make approximately $38,000-$42,000 between us. Mr. N.M., Indianapolis, Ind.

ANSWER: That's a great relationship you have with your uncle and there's no way in the world that a deal between you can't be struck to both of your advantages. But I don't think that buying the home from him on contract is the answer — not that it isn't workable, but because there's a better alternative open to you.

Why not enter into a shared-equity arrangement with your uncle? Under this arrangement — which is an impressively flexible device — you and your uncle can share in the ownership of the property, both of you can realize the tax advantages and, when you ultimately sell it (or, at a specified time, refinance it), you'll split the equity.

Suppose, for instance, you split the down payment — you put up $5,000 and your uncle puts up the other $5,000 (in other words, forgoes it) and you split the closing costs. From this point on the shared equity concept can go any of several different ways. You have become the resident and your uncle has become the investor.

Here's one way: You and your uncle split the mortgage payments, but then you give him a monthly check representing "rent" for half the house which, while counted as taxable income for him, also permits him to take depreciation for his half of the house. Or, more simply, you make all of the payments, take all of the deductions and your uncle, at settlement time, takes a lesser share of the equity.

It's not nearly as complicated as it sounds, but you ARE going to have to enlist the services of a real estate broker or a lawyer with experience in the field because the Internal Revenue Service, even though it has given its blessing to such arrangements, frowns on any "sweetheart" deals between the partners.

• • •

DEAR MR. CAMPBELL: I am a first-time home buyer with no idea of interest rates or how points are calculated. Also can you advise me on FHA loans or what a good loan would be for a first-time home buyer? Ms. C.F., St. Charles, Mo.

ANSWER: Baffling, isn't it? Happily, the complexities are largely superficial and the whole procedure isn't nearly as bad as it looks from the outside looking in.

I'd advise you, first, to inquire among your friends who have already gone this route and get from them the name of a good, reliable, real estate broker — he (or she, of course) can be invaluable to you because his primary function isn't merely to show you what's available on the market, it's to lead you through the financial maze.

He'll know which lenders are offering what kind of rates and what the point spread is. ("Points," or "origination fees," will vary according to the money market on any particular day, but one point equals 1 percent of the amount you borrow. Thus, if you are shopping for a $50,000 mortgage and the current point structure is two points, then the lender will advance you $49,000 in hard cash — the other $1,000 representing the points involved.)

Figure out, first, how much house you can afford: Total housing costs (exclusive of taxes, insurance and maintenance) shouldn't exceed 25 percent of your gross monthly income if you're making the conventional 20 percent down payment or about 20 percent if you're making a smaller down payment.

Yes, a Federal Housing Administration (FHA) loan is an excellent way for a first-time home buyer to go and usually calls for a down payment of only about 3 percent or 5 percent of the selling price. Don't overlook VA loans either, however. While you have to be a veteran to qualify for a VA loan on a new property, you DON'T have to be vet to buy such a home on the resale market as long as you intend to use it as your principal residence.

1. Help your reader visualize the item you have for sale. You will sell your merchandise much more quickly if you include a very specific and accurate description of the item in the ad copy. You should include all of the essential details of an effective one-column ad—age, condition, size, brand name and price.

2. Let your reader know when and where to contact you. There is nothing more frustrating then trying to make a call only to receive no answer. Don't make it difficult for potential buyers to contact you! Be sure to include in your ad the hours you will be home to answer inquiries about the items you have to sell. Remember, a potential customer probably will not call twice!

3. Don't use abbreviations. Nvr. frust. a pot. cust. w. abb. You want to make the process of reading your ad easy for your potential customer. Most readers will not take the time to try to decipher confusing ad copy. Limit your use of abbreviations to the following ten: approx. (approximately), ave. (avenue), blvd. (boulevard), bldg. (building), condo (condominium), rec. room (recreation room), refrig. (refrigerator), rd. (road), sq. ft. (square foot), st. (street).

4. Choose a consistent ad schedule. To insure great results, plan to run your ad for several days. Sticking with Winners

EDITOR'S NOTE: Palmer Drug Abuse Program is a 12-step self-help support program based on the 12 steps of Alcoholics Anonymous. The only requirement for membership in PDAP a desire to seek a solution to a substance abuse problem.

While membership is not limited by age, most members of PDAP are teen-agers or younger. Because PDAP is an anonymous program, the following story is true, but the member's name and that of her counselor are fictious.

This is the second in a four-part series on 12-step support groups.

Text by LINDA ANDERSON

Paige is 17.

Bright, pretty, articulate and a recent high school graduate, Paige is what every parent wishes for in a daughter.

Paige also has a history of drug and alcohol abuse.

When she was younger, "I started using (drugs) on a regular basis with some of my friends," Paige said. "On a daily basis."

Alcohol and pot were her drugs of choice, she said, but "alcohol was the one I always went back to."

But Paige was luckier than most. About three years ago, unknown to her, her life began to change. She was introduced to Palmer Drug Abuse Program.

"One friend got in trouble with running away ... and her parents sent her to PDAP," Paige said. "She asked me if I wanted to come and I said, 'Why not?' "

PDAP is "a fellowship of young people and parents who share their experience, love and understanding that they may solve their common problems and help others to recover from the effects of mind-changing chemicals," according to program literature. "PDAP is non-sectarian and the primary requirement for membersip is a desire to live a chemical-free life.

"Our primary purpose is to carry our love and understanding to others and to practice the princfples of love and honesty in our daily lives, with the help of God, as we understand Him."

Paige and her friends were not alone in their addiction. Drug abuse among teenagers and children even younger is one of the most serious problems the United States faces — a problem that exists even in Midland.

"We have little 10-year-olds coming in with severe problems," said Anne, a local PDAP counselor. "By the time they're caught, their drug abuse has been going on a couple of years — maybe since they were 7 or 8 (years old). A lot of them are introduced (to drugs) through older brothers and sisters or some big kid on the block. In the majority of cases, an older teenager has got them going."

SINCE THE goal of PDAP is to help young people live clean and sober lives, the participation of their parents is vital to their recovery. In fact, chemical or alcohol abuse affects everyone in the family, just as all are affected by the recovery process.

PDAP stresses parental participation in a letter to parents: "It is most important to attend as many parent meetings as possible in order to establish a more positive line of communication with your young person. During these meetings you will gain a great deal of insight into the problems created by chemical abuse and start moving into the solution.

"The young person who ceases the use of chemicals is on the first step to recovery. The parent meetings will help you to understand and realize how important your participation is in the overall family recovery process ... This is a program for the FAMILY."

Please see PDAP, Page 2E

TWELVE STEPS OF PDAP

1. We admitted that mind-changing chemicals had caused at least part of our lives to become unmanageable.

2. We found it necessary to "Stick with Winners" in order to grow.

3. We realized that a Higher Power, expressed through our love for each other, can help restore us to sanity.

4. We made a decision to turn our will and our lives over to the care of God, as we understand Him.

5. We made a searching and fearless moral inventory of ourselves.

6. We admitted to God, to ourselves, and to another human being the exact nature of our wrongs.

7. We became willing to allow our Higher Power, through the love of the group, to help change our way of life and humbly asked Him to help us change.

8. We made a list of all persons we had harmed and became willing to make amends to them all.

9. We made direct amends to such people, whenever possible, except when to do so would injure them, others or ourselves.

10. We have continued to look at ourselves and when wrong, promptly admitted it.

11. We have sought through prayer and meditation to improve our conscious contact with our Higher Power, that we have chosen to call God, praying only for knowledge of His will for us and the courage to carry that out.

12. We, having had spiritual awakening as a result of these steps, try to carry our love and understanding to others, and to practice these principles in our daily lives.

PDAP

Paige didn't understand any of this when she first began attending PDAP meetings. "It was more of a social thing at first," she said.

For about 1½ years she attended meetings without recognizing the extent of her own addiction. "I didn't know I had a problem at all," Paige said. "I don't know why I kept coming back because I kept going out and getting high with my friends."

With her problem becoming more and more obvious, Paige eventually was sent to an alcohol abuse treatment hospital for two months. "I went (to the hospital) because I thought it would 'fix' me," Paige said. "I got out and got high again."

IT WAS for the last time. "The last time I got high was when it (the extent of her addiction) hit me, because I couldn't sit up or walk or talk or anything. It just hit me, 'God, I do have a problem.'"

This time, Paige knew PDAP's program was a lifeline, not just a social network. Although she had been introduced to Alcoholics Anonymous (AA) during her two months in the hospital, she preferred to work toward recovery through PDAP, in part because it is designed for young people. "I'd never even heard of AA before I was in (the hospital)," she said. "I'd already made good friends in PDAP."

PDAP basically is a recovery program for young abusers, but "we don't turn anyone down, either," Anne, the PDAP counselor, said. The program is divided into three age groups: 10-14 years old, 15-17, and 18 and older.

TWELVE TRADITIONS OF PDAP

1. Our common welfare should come first. Personal recovery depends upon PDAP unity.

2. The primary requirement for membership in PDAP is a desire to seek a solution to a substance abuse problem.

3. PDAP has but one primary purpose, to carry the message of love and understanding to the substance abuser and family.

4. At the group level, the right to personal anonymity must be respected.

5. The symbol of abstinence from mind-changing chemicals shall be the monkey's fist. The symbol of parent participation shall be the heart.

6. PDAP is non-sectarian and will not be denied to any person due to race, color, creed or national origin.

7. PDAP ought never endorse or oppose any causes, finance or lend its name to any enterprise.

8. For the purpose of continuity, PDAP is a structured program administered by a salaried staff operating under the authority of the Board of Trustees.

9. Each affiliate should operate independently and autonomously, except in matters which affect PDAP as a whole.

10. Policies will be established by the National Board of Trustees and implemented by a salaried staff.

11. PDAP should remain forever a non-profit organization dedicated to self-help through love and understanding.

12. The love of the group and help to others in the spiritual foundation of our Traditions, ever reminding us to place principles before personalities.

Like AA, PDAP uses a 12-step recovery program. In fact, PDAP's 12 steps are based on the 12 steps of AA, but with some differences. "AA doesn't have our second step, which is 'sticking with winners,'" Paige said. "It's in the Big Book, though," referring to the book Alcoholics Anonymous, which nearly all 12-step recovery programs use as their cornerstone.

To recover from substance abuse, a person must be "willing to go to any lengths" for sobriety. To maintain hers, Paige has been willing to make major changes in her life. "The friend that brought me here (to PDAP) started using again. I had to tell her that unless she straightened up, I couldn't hang out with her.

"A lot of my friends were calling me a 'narc' and making fun of me, but I was OK with that. I was never going to see them again, I was changing schools and making new friends."

But, she said, "I didn't put them down for getting high — it was like I just forgot about them. They didn't really have a place in my life to begin with — some of them, at least."

THOUGH SOME of her relationships ended because of her steps toward recovery, she gained new attitudes and new friends. "I changed my attitude toward school and toward relationships" with some members of her family, Paige said.

But most important, "I found a relationship with God ... He took people out of my life and He put new people into my life. He made it — somehow — OK for me to stay sober whether or not my friends and family got sober."

One drug helpful, one harmful

Copley News Service

An antidepressant drug, desipramine, is proving effective in breaking the cocaine addict's binge cycle, leaving him more open to psychological treatment, according to Dr. Frank Gawin, a Yale researcher.

Gawin conducted an eight-week study of 72 cocaine abusers. He reported that subjects on high doses of desipramine substantially reduced their cocaine use, compared with controls taking placebos. Cocaine snorting, smoking or injecting dropped to less than 6 percent of baseline use in patients taking desipramine, compared with 46 percent in the placebo group.

More important, according to Gawin, is that desipramine induced longer periods of abstinence, breaking the binge cycle of recurrent cocaine use.

Desipramine also substantially relieved the craving for cocaine, compared with placebo.

Thus Gawin believes desipramine can induce a "window of abstinence," giving the addict a chance to recognize the problems caused by addictions and to seek psychological treatments.

On the streets now there's a new designer drug being sold that's 36 times more powerful than pure heroin.

Fresh from the lab, just the fumes that rise up into the air from it are enough to kill a human.

The substance is called Pepap, and 1 pound of it makes billions of individual doses. And thousands of small-time consumers are mistaking the stuff for real heroin.

Pepap is an analog compound derived from the basic formula for the analgesic known as meperdine, said to cause disorientation, visual illusions, auditory hallucinations, blurring of vision and a euphoria much like true heroin and PCP mixed together.

According to Federal Drug Enforcement Agency officials, Pepap also kills numerous brain cells and can cause neuro-degenerative diseases similar to Parkinson's disease.

Addiction to steroids reported

BOSTON (AP) — Athletes who take high doses of steroids may risk addiction similar to narcotic abuse, doctors warn.

In a letter in a recent New England Journal of Medicine, doctors report a case of steroid dependence in a man who regularly took four kinds of steroids.

The 23-year-old body-builder told doctors he could not stop taking anabolic steroids without experiencing withdrawal symptoms, depression and disabling fatigue. He said he sometimes felt uncontrollably violent, paranoid and suicidal.

After a week off steroids, he told doctors that he couldn't bear his depression, fatigue and drug craving and intended to resume taking the drugs.

"Some of the clinical features of this patient resemble those frequently observed in cases of opioid dependence," the doctors wrote.

The letter was written by Drs. Forest Tennant of Community Health Projects Medical Group in West Covina, Calif., David L. Black of Vanderbilt Child and Adolescent Psychiatric Hospital in Nashville and Robert O. Voy of the U.S. Olympic Committee.

Other researchers have also pointed out that people who abuse steroids may suffer hallucinations, delusions, manic episodes and other temporary mental illness.

According to one estimate, as many as 1 million athletes in the United States may be using steroids to build up their muscles. The drugs retard the tendency of muscle to break down.

Steroids can also cause a variety of other side effects, including liver damage, sterility and testicular shrinking.

Teenage drug, alcohol abusers can find help

Associated Press

Although many adults chuckle over their first experiments with alcohol, youthful drinking is no joke.

Because of their physical immaturity, it takes adolescent abusers only a year to reach the advanced stages of alcoholism. Adults may take 30 years to get to that point. Consider these facts as reported in Better Homes and Gardens Magazine:

- The average age for beginning to drink is 12.
- Nearly half of all teens who commit suicide are intoxicated at the time.
- Although 93 percent of children in grades 4-6 say that cocaine is a drug, only 21 percent think wine coolers are drugs.

It's not easy to distinguish between alcoholism and the mood swings of normal adolescence, according to Dr. Fulton Caldwell, public health adviser at the National Institute of Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism. However, alcoholism may be at the root of these problems:

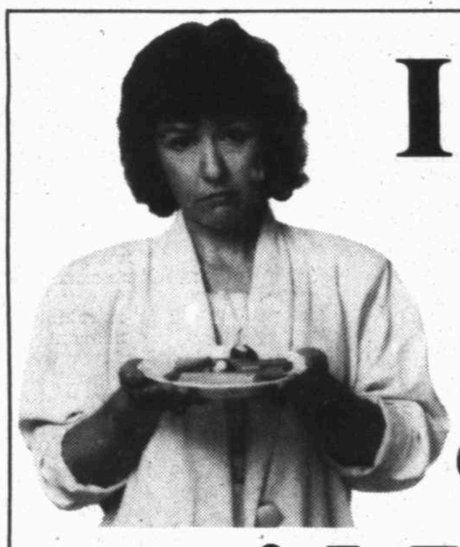

- Perpetual conflict. Alcohol abusers constantly argue with parents, friends, and teachers.
- Withdrawal. Teen abusers won't participate in family, school or social activities. They spend a lot of time alone in their rooms and won't let others get close to them in any way.
- Depression. Watch for fatigue, lack of energy and poor appetite. Alcohol abusers may feel worthless, act grandiose to cover that feeling or complain of being bored.
- Impulsive behavior. Young drinkers act first and think later. They make choices that mystify their parents.
- Poor school performance. As drinking becomes a full-time affair, teens cut class and drop out of extracurricular activities. Grades plummet.
- Change in friends. If your child suddenly starts hanging out with a new, tough crowd, pay attention. Teen drinkers seek out other drinkers.
- Injuries. Serious falls, burns and accidents occur while the child is under the influence. Fights lead to other injuries. Consider any unexplained injuries to be red flags.

Treatment for alcohol abusers ranges from self-help group to inpatient therapy. No one approach is right for everyone, says Cheryl Rugg, author of "Adolescents, Alcohol, and Drugs: A Practical Guide for Those Who Work with Young People." Many adolescents find relief with these services:

- Student Assistance Programs. SAPs are school-sponsored programs that refer students to support groups, outpatient clinics or inpatient treatment. Most students enter SAPs at the urging of a friend or teacher. After observing the student, a SAP counselor tells the student where to seek help.
- Self-help groups. These groups help teens maintain sobriety through regular meetings with a supportive, sober group of friends. Self-help groups also offer young alcohol abusers the consolation that they are not alone. Some support groups, like the teen chapters of Alcoholics Anonymous, follow prescribed steps toward recovery. Others are structured more loosely. Most alcoholism counselors say self-help groups are essential to control drinking outside the hospital setting.
- Outpatient treatment. Typical outpatient programs include alcohol education, group therapy sessions and family therapy. Teens who abuse alcohol but have no physical impairments may be advised to try these programs. Outpatient treatment also provides support for teens released from inpatient stays. Insurance payments for outpatient therapy may be limited to a maximum number of sessions.
- Inpatient treatment. Most inpatient programs use a very structured schedule of organized recreation, group therapy, alcohol education, support groups, family therapy and high school classes. Recommended when the adolescent's life seems out of control, inpatient treatment aims to change the youngster's environment completely.

Inpatient treatment typically lasts 30 days. Programs range from $70 to $350 per day. Not all insurance plans cover treatment and most plans that do limit the length of treatment.

- Family support. These support groups teach members how an entire family reacts to one person's alcoholism. Families discover they didn't cause the child's alcoholism and can't control it. In addition to family therapy, most communities offer such self-help groups as Al-Anon and Alateen for anyone affected by a loved one's alcoholism.

Alcohol abuse among teenagers increasing

New York Times News Service

Standing in front of his seventh-grade class, his Hawaiian shirt a burst of color against the chalkboard, Willy straightened his aviator glasses, shifted his weight from foot to foot and held out a 12-ounce can marked "beer."

"Want some?" he asked the teacher, his voice part bravado, part nervousness.

"No, I don't think so," the teacher said.

"Sure?" asked Willy.

"I told you," the teacher thundered, his voice suddenly angry, "I don't want any."

Willy and 25 middle-school students in suburban Baltimore are learning about drinking.

Specifically, by acting out situations that could arise in everyday life, they are learning how not to drink.

But this class is different from their other classes. The teacher is a police sergeant with a .38-caliber Smith & Wesson revolver at his hip.

The students seemed not to notice the gun. Nor did they notice that the can that Willy offered Sgt. James Allender was actually an empty can of diet cola covered with a hand-made label that says "beer."

But they paid close attention to Allender's explanation of how people use assertiveness, passivity and aggression to pressure friends into having a drink.

As the hourlong session continued, the students tried different ways of offering Allender a beer. Some were polite, some half-hearted, some overbearing.

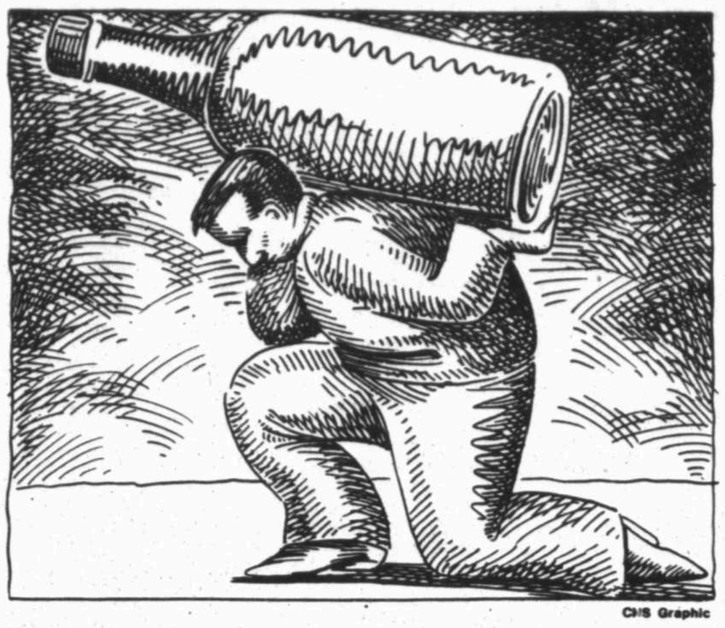

Allender declined them all. Later, the class talked about which of his refusals had been the most effective. "The time he offered me the beer and I said, 'No, thanks, I don't like the taste,' now that was a good one," Allender said.

"Would it have worked if I'd said it's because it's going to give me liver disease? Is one beer going to give me liver disease? It's like smoking and cancer: All those excuses that are far in the future are not all that good."

WHETHER THAT comes to mind the next time someone hands Willy a beer is an open question.

For despite tougher law enforcement, widespread publicity and sweeping educational campaigns, alcohol is still the drug of choice among teen-agers.

At least 100,000 elementary school children report getting drunk on a weekly basis, according to the American Council for Drug Education, a nonprofit group that organizes conferences and promotes and publishes research.

CHS Graphic

The result is increasing alcohol abuse among teen-agers at a time when other forms of substance abuse appear to be decreasing.

To counter the trend, schools are increasingly turning to psychologists, peer-group counselors and law-enforcement officers like Allender. He supervises Project DARE, a joint program of the Baltimore County Police Department and the local school board, which the drug education council considers one of the most promising programs.

The evidence suggests that teachers have a long way to go before they change students' minds on when to start drinking.

In New York State, 16 percent of the students in a recent statewide survey reported that they had tasted liquor before their ninth birthday, and the pressure to drink increases with adolescence.

A University of Michigan study found that 92 percent of seniors had tasted alcohol; two-thirds had had a drink in the month before the survey and more than a third had been drunk in the preceding two weeks.

A study in Amherst, N.Y., a Buffalo suburb, found that older teen-agers drink more: seniors drink three times as much as freshmen and almost twice as much as sophomores.

"Not only are young people drinking with regularity," said Joseph E. Bachovchin, director of the Amherst Youth Board, which helped coordinate the survey, "they don't perceive it as a problem. In a sense, that is even more important because it makes the alcohol abuse much more difficult to deal with."

STATISTICS FROM the Amherst survey confirm Bachovchin's view: on a scale of 1 to 10, with 10 being the most serious problem, parents gave getting drunk a 9.1, while students gave it a 5.8, only slightly more serious than skipping school.

In the Michigan study, only 26 percent felt that a drink a day posed a threat to personal health or safety, despite much evidence that alcohol is a factor in thousands of automobile accidents and suicides involving teen-agers.

For those who are lucky enough to escape such incidents, what are the long-term consequences of drinking? A recent study by scientists at the University of California at Los Angeles found that teen-agers who become heavy users of alcohol and drugs in high school were likely to have problems in adulthood.

But that represents only a small number of students. The study found that the vast majority of teen-agers who occasionally drink or use drugs at social gatherings suffered no lasting negative effects.

For years, schools told teens how alcohol affects their bodies, what their limits were and why they should not drink and drive. This "responsible drinking" approach was straightforward, but for the most part it did little to reduce alcohol abuse among teen-agers.

"The strategy," according to a New York State report titled Alcohol: The Gateway Drug, prepared jointly by the Education Department and the Division of Alcoholism and Alcohol Abuse, "... implies that 'responsible use' is a way to prevent alcohol problems: 'responsible,' suggesting that some 'irresponsibility' is at the root of alcohol problems; and 'use,' suggesting that non-use, the only certain way to prevent alcohol problems, is not a way to prevent alcohol problems.

In the application of this strategy, the legitimacy of the choice of abstinence may be ignored, or, as more recently addressed in the message 'It's O.K. to say no,' that alcohol use is the norm and non-use is merely an acceptable deviation."

INSTEAD, MORE and more schools, taking a hard line, are discouraging the use of alcohol entirely. This parallels a federal "zero tolerance" program, which has distributed more than $200 million this year to school drug-prevention programs.

But while schools are writing new and tough language into their lesson plans, many parents hesitate when it comes to imposing stern measures.

Some parents hope that drunken teen-agers will call home for a ride or allow a sober friend to take the car keys away before they get behind the wheel.

But Lee I. Dogoloff, the executive director of the American Council for Drug Education, argues that that is not enough.

"It's wonderful to suggest that schools can teach information, but parents need to reinforce it and interject values," Dogoloff said. "What you find is, many school systems feel they're swimming upstream against kids who are having unchaperoned, unsupervised parties and parents who are confused about underage drinking. That's undermining what the schools do."

On the front lines of the battle against teen-age drinking, James Bowerman, the principal of Perry Hall High School in Baltimore County, is clearly uncomfortable when parents rent limousines and rooms in local hotels for students.

"That's saying it's all right to get drunk on that one big night, but the rest of the year it's not. That's confusing because it's contradictory.

"And until we get our act straight, it will continue to be a problem."

Drug treatment center aids 53,000

NEW YORK (AP) — "Daytop," the first drug treatment program in the Eastern United States, founded in New York in 1963, has treated more than 53,000 substance abusers. Nearly 1,800 people are in treatment on a daily basis and some stay as long as 18 months.

A five year follow-up study claims that 92 percent of Daytop's graduates have remained drug free, crime free and are employed on in school.

Weddings abroad are pleasure, paperwork

New York Times News Service

NEW YORK — Some couples go to great lengths to get their wedding plans just right, but how many will go great distances, say to Europe or the Caribbean? Quite a few, according to the State Department, which receives hundreds of inquiries each year from American couples eager to tie the knot abroad.

The reasons to marry abroad are as varied as the individuals who decide to do it: romance, convenience or a desire to avoid family conflicts and even to cut costs. The couples who decide on distant weddings seem to care less about wedding gowns and big receptions than where they are.

It was for the romance — and to keep peace within the family — that Joe and Jean Smith of San Francisco chose a wedding in Venice two years ago. Not wanting to offend either of their families, who are scattered on the East and West coasts, by choosing one coast over the other, they decided to do it alone, via cruise ship to the Mediterranean.

"There was no way we could get our families together, so what's the choice if you're not going to get married in a church?" asked Smith, a 35-year-old sales manager for a telecommunications company.

"There's Reno or Las Vegas, but that's not romantic," he said. Neither he nor his wife, a 37-year-old manager for a telephone company, had been to Venice before but were planning to be there on a company trip at the time they wanted to be married.

Like other couples who marry abroad without relatives or friends, they had plans for a small ceremony followed by a quiet dinner for two. They found that in Italy, a wedding is often a cause for public celebration. Some of the Italians at City Hall turned their celebration into an impromptu party.

"They opened up their arms and kissed us," said Smith, with a big grin, "they gave us gifts and brought Jean a bouquet. They make a big to-do about it."

The number of Americans who get married abroad is not known since records of such marriages are not kept separate from statistics on marriages among the country's general population. Of all the hundreds of couples who call the State Department for advice only the most determined follow through with their plans.

Wanting to do it is the easy part. Getting the paperwork done is the challenge.

"They find an enormous amount of redtape," said Ruth van Heuven, a spokeswoman for the Bureau of Consular Affairs, "and with the expense of traveling, that makes them change their plans."

Generally, to plan a wedding abroad, one needs a passport or a birth cerificate and if applicable, a divorce decree from a previous marriage. Some countries ask for medical documents, while some don't even require a blood test.

While callers to the State Department usually ask about weddings in politically stable sections of Europe, there have also been inquiries about countries where there is political unrest. The State Department issues a travel advisory for Americans to proceed with caution in such countries.

Vail Jimenez-Dutto, a friend of the Smiths in San Francisco, had been so impressed with the Smiths' warm reception in Italy that she and her husband, Robert Dutto, a 27-year-old tennis pro, decided to be married in the same spot last August.

They too were showered with gifts from the staff at the city hall. And they found they weren't the only ones in wedding whites stepping out of gondolas.

"When we pulled up in our launch, there was someone else leaving," said Mrs. Jimenez-Dutto, a 26-year-old sales representative with a telemarketing company.

Families sometimes join the overseas party. Eleven of the Dutto's relatives, including their parents, attended the wedding, which the couple estimated cost about $8,000 for air travel, accommodations, a post-wedding dinner and trousseaus; they spent an additional $5,000 on their honeymoon through Italy and France.

"With most weddings in the states costing about $15,000, it was a bargain," said Mrs. Jimenez-Dutto.

A reader survey compiled two years ago by Bride's magazine seemed to confirm this figure. Readers nationwide said they paid an average of $10,371 for their weddings in this country, which included everything from the bride's headpiece to the reception. A honeymoon added another $2,314.00, according to the survey based on 1,469 responses to questionnaires mailed to 3,500 readers.

Some couples agreed that the money saved can be put to other uses.

Mimi Bernhard, a 32-year-old advertising executive from Yorktown Heights, N.Y. who chose a wedding in Paris over one in Newport, R.I. two years ago said, "The tens of thousands of dollars that we would have spent on a wedding here was the whole down-payment on our house."

The Bernhards were also able to solve the thorny question of who to invite or not invite, and their families seemed to take it in stride.

"No one in our families had any hard feelings," said Bernhard, a 29-year-old circulation manager for a weekly magazine. "Many of them were relieved that they didn't have to go to such expense."

While some parents may object to traveling across the ocean for a wedding, others are more accepting.

Vittorina Dutto, who attended her son's wedding in Venice with her husband, Edward, said she was delighted that her son and daughter-in-law wanted to combine their wedding with travel.

"If you have a big wedding here, you can't afford to travel," said Mrs. Dutto.

Unlike the Smiths and Duttos, who were married in civil ceremonies, the Bernhards chose to have a Protestant service in Paris, which required even more work.

Some countries, like France, require a civil ceremony in addition to a religious one. Rather than run into residency problems for their civil ceremony, they decided to have it in the United States.

Researchers say jealousy may be positive if kept in check

By LARRY ROSENTHAL

NEW HAVEN, Conn. (AP) — Getting in touch with your feelings and thinking positively about yourself are fine, but the best way to stave off the pangs of jealousy are to just get on with your life, two psychologists say.

A positive attitude about yourself, or self-bolstering, seems to be the best way to prevent the depression that could follow jealousy, but doesn't do much to much to keep away envy or jealousy itself, the researchers say.

"We like to think getting in touch with your feelings is a good thing, that exploring how you feel will make you feel better," said Peter Salovey, a Yale University assistant professor of psychology. "But we found that strategy actually made you feel worse in jealousy-producing situations."

Those who are jealous of others' success may long to curl up with a bowl of ice cream while recalling every word of praise ever uttered by family, friends and acquaintances, but that doesn't help, said Salovey, who has studied jealousy for five years with Yale professor Judith Rodin.

"Ignoring your feelings and getting on with your daily work and striving even harder ... for what you want works better," Salovey said.

A third coping strategy, selective ignoring, works in the short run by invoking the attitude, "it's not so important to me anymore," he said. "But I suppose there is a limit to how many times you can do that. Nothing is going to be important to you ... if you employ it all the time."

Salovey and Rodin asked 95 Yale undergraduates in 1986-87 to rate the frequency of jealousy-provoking situations involving school, family, friends and romance, how jealous they felt and how they coped. Their research will be published in the fall issue of the Journal of Social and Clinical Psychology.

Jealousy is the worry that something you have will be lost to someone, and envy is wanting something someone else has.

"To the extent they do not run your life, they may be healthy and helpful," Salovey said.

"They are negative in what people is often a lot of anger, sadness and occasionally fear. But in the sense they can also help enrich our lives by letting us now what is important to us, that's not so negative."

Survey: Cost-of-living information vital

WILTON, Conn. (AP) — A survey of people recently involved in a company move shows three-quarters of them wanted to know beforehand the cost-of-living in the destination area.

According to a survey made by PHH Homequity Inc. of 1,000 employes recently involved in a group move, 75 percent of them strongly preferred getting local cost-of-living information on items such as food and housing before deciding to move.

Of the respondents who did get cost-of-living information, 43 percent indicated a high value for this service.

Lifelike mannequin designed to fool criminals

Copley News Service

If you can't find a man to protect you, get a mannequin instead.

That's the advice of an entrepreneur who has designed a lightweight, lifelike dummy that he claims can fool a criminal into believing that you are not alone.

According to Steve Bennett, his Gregory mannequin is perfect for shut-ins, single women or anyone who works a late shift.

Gregory is 6-foot-2, has a 42-inch chest and wears size 32 pants — but he has no legs.

That's so he can be tossed into a car with ease.

Aside from the mannequin's anti-crime powers, Bennett says Gregory is better than a store mannequin because he has flexible limbs, which makes him appear more lifelike.

Gregory sells for $275 instead of the $1,000 most store mannequins go for.

MIDLAND, Texas (AP) — Clayton W. Williams Jr., a rancher with interests in oil, gas, banks, real estate and cattle, decided to start a long distance telecommunications company in 1984.

In honor of his wife, Modesta, Williams named the firm Clay-Desta Communications. It was the first digital fiber optics and microwave network in Texas and its annual revenues rose from $200,000 to $50 million in four years.

Former drug addict writes book on keeping children off of drugs

By VIVIENNE HEINES
Hearst News Service

Ken Barun has written a book that his father wishes had been available 16 years ago. It's called "How to Keep the Children You Love Off Drugs," and Sam Barun, an antiques dealer in Houston, has read it three times so far.

If he'd had it when Ken was in the throes of heroin addiction, Sam Barun might not have collapsed emotionally.

"When Ken became drug-addicted, I floundered so badly," said Sam Barun. "We tried very hard to get help.

"I was so frustrated and so angry and so full of stress that I had a nervous breakdown," Barun said. "I think that would not have happened if I'd had Ken's book."

It may be the saddest endorsement an author has ever received, but it's also one of the most sincere.

Ken Barun, 40, wrote the book from his experiences as a heroin junkie, a recovered addict, a drug counselor and a national expert on youth and substance abuse.

Despite Barun's disclaimers, he is a crusader.

Having survived the drug war, he has written a book that will serve as a field manual for other parents.

The father of four, he hopes to spare his children the pain he went through as an addict, and he wants to avoid the pain that his own parents suffered.

"I'm just a parent, but I want people to realize drug use can happen to them. And I don't want it to. The parents are going to feel the pain. The kids are anesthetized — they won't feel it," Barun said.

In 1972, a lank and unkempt Ken Barun panhandled on the streets of Houston, scrounging for money to buy a fix of heroin.

HE LIVED in squalor and had abandoned his wife and baby daughter. He had been thrown out of his parents' home; he was physically and emotionally debilitated.

Today Barun is the epitome of health. He looks like the successful businessman that he is — he eventually headed Cenikor, the drug rehabilitation program that treated his addiction.

Cenikor is a two-year educational/vocational rehabilitation program for drug and alcohol abuse; its top managers are all ex-addicts.

Barun's work attracted the attention of first lady Nancy Reagan; in 1984, she made him director of her anti-drug campaign.

After two years, he resigned to take a job as vice president and executive direcor of Ronald McDonald Children's Charities.

He was recently appointed to the National White House Conference for a Drug Free America.

The book, co-authored with Philip Bashe, begins with Ken's personal tale of a one-time athlete and military-school cadet who became a junkie.

Barun blames peer pressure and insecurity for his addiction, which started with smoking pot and progressed to pill-popping and injecting heroin.

He contracted hepatitis from shared needles — today, he wrote, he would surely have had AIDS. As soon as he was well, he was shooting up again, wasting his health and future on drugs.

He moved from city to city, selling drugs and finally marrying a woman who hoped to "cure" him.

HIS DECLINING health forced him into a hospital and into a divorce, his parents kicked him out of the house, and he wound up living "in squalor beneath a bridge, heating tins of beans over a Sterno can and looking like a vagrant."

His parents were shocked when he told them he was an addict.

Elaine Barun, administrator of the Gulf Coast chapter of the American Society of Interior Designers, said she and her husband truly hadn't realized that their son was addicted to drugs.

"We were really in the dark," she said. "This was 1971, 1972, and it was all very new. The only thing around that we had ever heard of was marijuana. But we found out more."

Eddie Fresquez, who assumed the presidency of Cenikor Foundation when Barun went to the White House, recalled meeting Barun in 1972.

Barun then weighed about 120 pounds and was battling dependencies on both heroin and methadone (methadone maintenance is used to wean addicts off heroin.)

"That was not the same Ken that you see now. The guy was a miserable guy. He was a throwback from the beatnik era — he had a long beard, sandals and a robe on," Fresquez said.

Barun spent two years in Cenikor's facility in Denver, then returned to Houston to run the facility there.

During his tenure at the White House, Barun traveled throughout the country, visiting drug treatment facilities.

HIS BOOK details what he saw in clear, easy-to-digest facts and figures about the drug problem, how to prevent it, how to deal with it and where to go for help. His personal insight into the scene — and insights by other addicts — lend credibilty to the weighty research and references in the book.

Barun lives today in Chicago with his wife, Maria, and three young sons. His first wife and teenage daughter Dawn live in Dallas.

His drug days are gone but not forgotten. Barun doesn't drink or smoke, and he practices what he preaches in the book; anti-drug education at home, building up his children's self-esteem, spending quality time with his sons.

Although he cringes at being described as an ex-addict, Baun realizes that his experiences are a valuable tool for educating his children and others.

"It's embarrassing to talk about my drug days. I'm ashamed of that. I don't like being referred to as an ex-addict. When you look at me now, I'm sure I don't look like a guy who lived under a bridge and stuck needles into my arms. That's not me now."

At some points, Barun's book seems to be more about parenting than about drugs.

He chides today's parents to educate themselves about drugs, to be honest and open with their children, to be empathetic about their youngsters' problems and to provide a stable, safe, loving home environment. Those things, he said, will help give your children the self-esteem, confidence and conscience to resist offers of illicit drugs.

ALTHOUGH HE believes that his own parents were ignorant about drugs, he doesn't let today's parents off the hook so easily.

He said that media coverage and firsthand experience makes it impossible for today's adults to profess ignorance.

"There are no excuses now. Drugs are on the front page of the paper, they affect all of us, they're in the forefront of society," he said. "It is of epidemic proportions. And there is no quick fix."

According to the National Institute on Drug Abuse, the average age for first-time drug use is 13. More than half of the nation's high school seniors have tried an illicit drug. Nearly one in six seniors has tried cocaine or its derivative, crack.

The drug-susceptible years begin at age 8, Barun said. Eventually, eight in 10 young people will experiment with drugs and one in 10 will develop a substance dependency.

"Don't cheat your kids out of a healthy future," Barun said. "Because if you don't pay attention to this now, that's what you're doing."

"How to Keep the Children You Love Off Drugs," is available from Atlantic Monthly Press for $12.95.

Program forces addicts to get help

'Intervention' designed to break down resistance to treatment

By DAVID BARRY
Hearst News Service

Though drug and alcohol addiction routinely ravages millions of lives, shatters families, ruins careers and ultimately kills its victims, few sufferers seek medical help on their own.

Nevertheless, the disease is treatable.

"A majority of people with alcohol or drug dependency just won't stop and go for treatment," says Ed Storti, a counselor in drug addiction and alcoholism.

Storti says he has helped get more than 1,000 chemically dependent people into treatment programs through a technique he calls "crisis intervention."

Intervention, pioneered by Dr. Vernon Johnson in Minnesota in the 1960s, is a surprise confrontation in which family, friends and even sometimes employers confront the chemically dependent person with irrefutable proof of the suffering his or her addiction is causing.

The intervention process received wide publicity through the recovery from drug and alcohol dependency of former first lady Betty Ford, who has become a spokeswoman for recovery techniques.

The process usually begins with a call from a family member who can no longer cope with the drinking or drug problem of a child or parent.

"It's usually initiated by family members in despair," says Storti, coauthor with Janet Keller of a new book, "Crisis Intervention: Acting Against Addiction" (Crown), "because they feel they are going to lose a loved one without help."

That initial phone call is a hard one for most people to make because of the resistance most alcoholic and drug-dependent people have to admitting the extent of their problem. Intervention is designed to break down that resistance, first surprising subjects and then keeping them emotionally off-balance until they agree to undergo immediate treatment.

Family members have been coached to precisely detail their complaints during the intervention; generalities won't do.

"It's very important to be specific with dates and times," says Samantha Marshall, a substance-abuse counselor at a Van Nuys, Calif., treatment facility called High Road.

"A daughter will say to her father: 'You got drunk and passed out at my high school graduation,'" says Marshall, who has conducted numerous interventions. "That's something that can't be denied."

Because procrastination is a typical behavior pattern among people who are drug and alcohol dependent, it is vital to have treatment arranged in advance so the person can go directly from the intervention to a treatment center.

"Alcoholics and addicts are very obsessive in their behavior," says Storti. "Part of that behavior is a reluctance to act or change anything, even though most addicts and alcoholics would genuinely like to be helped."

Despite their resistance to treatment, alcoholics and addicts confronted by family members in interventions almost always break down and take the help that is offered.

Storti cites a study of 396 interventions that shows a success rate of 94 percent. Of the 94 percent who went directly into treatment facilities, he says, 95 percent successfully followed the treatment program.

Tom Kenny, director of the Motion Picture and TV Fund Substance Abuse Program, agrees that intervention can usually overcome even the most stubborn resistance.

"The concept of having a group of people confront the person is very powerful," says Kenny. "An alcoholic can usually defend against one person with his lies. But not against a group."

Storti says the real power of intervention comes from the love expressed by the family members as they work to break through the selfishness and destructiveness of the sufferer.

"When you hear a daughter telling her dad that she loves him, and doesn't want him to die, and begs him to accept treatment so he can stay alive for her, it's very moving. And it usually does the trick."

Storti says most interventions are successfully completed in less than an hour. But he cautions that not every situation calls for intervention.

Kenny likewise says intervention is not always the answer.

"In some cases it could be more destructive than helpful," says Kenny. "Some people could get very crazed, and might take it out on the family. Or a suicidal type might not be able to handle seeing too much right away."

Kenny says he has heard of cases in which people reacted to confrontation by committing suicide.

"But, again, if you don't stop the person somewhere along the line, he's gonna die of the disease."

Institute says typical child may experiment with drugs

Hearst News Service

It is not only possible but probable that your children will have been offered drugs before they become teens, said Ken Barun, author of "How to Keep the Children You Love Off Drugs."

According to the National Institute of Drug Abuse, the typical child experiments with alcohol at age 12 and with drugs at age 13. Barun's book offers this timetable as an estimate of what drugs children might confront and when.

The average grade level for first use of drugs is:

- Seventh and eighth grade: inhalants.
- Ninth grade: tobacco, alcohol, marijuana, stimulants, sedatives, barbituates and methaqualone.
- 10th grade: tranquilizers and heroin.
- 11th grade: amyl and butyl nitrate, LSD and other hallucinogens, PCP and opium.
- 12th grade: cocaine.

Parents who suspect their children are using drugs should watch for the following warning signs:

- Changes in friends and hangouts.
- Unexplained mood swings.
- Physical signs, including listlessness, decreased appetite, pallid skin tone and dilated pupils.
- Lack of attention to dress and personal hygiene.
- Lack of ambition and decline in academic performance.
- Sudden, unexplained availability of money.
- Recurring absences from school, work or family occasions.

Barun said crisis intervention programs which place the individual in a tightly controlled environment under the supervision of former drug abusers and professional specialists may be the best answer for addicted children.

Midland Cruise Night planned to inspire relaxing vacation ideas

"Cruising is one of the most relaxing and enjoyable ways of travel and to see many exciting places," according to Dorothy Agnew, Cruise Specialist for Midland Travel Agency.

Citing rave reviews from many clients after their first cruise, Agnew stressed that cruise vacations provide a wide range of opportunities which are very appealing to those taking their first cruise.

A number of the world's leading cruise lines will be represented at Midland Travel's "Cruise Night" from 5:30 to 7 p.m. Tuesday, September 27th at the Midland Center.

Admission tickets are free when picked up at Midland Travel, Robbie Casey's, Jenkins Jewelry or Pages and Prints according to Lelia Seal, Tour Director at Midland Travel and hosts for the event; otherwise admission is $1.00.

"Many persons are apprehensive about taking their first cruise," said Mary Olssen, Midland Travel Cruise Specialist, "and for this reason cruise line representatives will be on hand to respond to questions and to present the program provided by each."

It has been pointed out that a cruise ship is a sea-going hotel resort which features the finest food, entertainment and shopping opportunities along with periodic stops at Ports-of-call in interesting and unusual places.

In addition to the regular cruises there are many specialty cruises, according to Agnew. These include jazz, sports, golf and lecture types.

One of the biggest misconceptions about cruising is that it is "too confining." However, Agnew pointed to the fact that the itineraries of most cruises calls for stops and sight-seeing in many different ports. This provides the benefit of visiting many areas without the hassle of packing and unpacking each night.

If one has ever thought about taking a cruise, the events scheduled for "Cruise Night" will answer most questions, said Agnew.

Carnival extends active program for children

Carnival Cruise Lines has extended its supervised, on board activities program for children from seasonal to year 'round.

"Traditionally, children sailed with us primarily during the summer and holiday periods," said Bob Dickinson, senior vice president of sales and marketing. "However, as more and more families discover that cruising provides a fun, hassle-free and inexpensive vacation alternative, we're finding kids on virtually all sailings," he explained.

The kids' program includes a variety of activities. The "Junior" schedule, geared toward ages 4-12, might include a scavenger hunt, drawing contest and a "cocktail" party with the captain. A "teen" schedule, for ages 13-18, might feature a name that tune contest, a treasure hunt and throwing bottled messages overboard.

All on board facilities, including discos, game rooms and children's pools, are available to the younger passengers, in addition to a playroom which serves as their own gathering place.

"The kids get especially excited over kite flying off the fantail, ping pong matches and video competitions in the arcade," said Jane Gooder, child coordinator for Carnival's "Fun Ship" Carnivale. "We find that a lot of times the kids like participating in our programs more than any other aspect of the cruise, and quite often, prefer to stay on board with us rather than disembark at the various ports of call," Gooder added.

She points out that cruising is not just games and entertainment, however. "With the opportunity to learn about different cultures and meet new people, a cruise can be a rewarding and educational experience, as well," said Gooder. "We even offer kids Italian lessons!"

Children who join in the various activities throughout the cruise receive participation certificates at the end of the voyage. "These serve as very special mementos of all the fund they had and new friends they made," said Gooder.

The personnel who work with children are experienced professionals, most with college degrees, according to Les Royle, an operations supervisor who hires the coordinators and counselors. "We look for people with a solid background in dealing with children, especially at the pre-school level," said Royle. "Substantial experience is a must."

Gooder, who specialized in child studies at the University of Western Toronto and spent several years working at summer camps and nursery schools, says she receives excellent feedback from parents regarding the "Fun Ship" program.

Carnival employs nine permanent child coordinators on its seven ships. They are able to move around and double up on various sailings according to the number of kids aboard. Depending on the time of year, there are also several temporary counselors as well. According to Royle there is a significant increase in the number of families on board during holidays and summer breaks. "Quite often, during these periods, we hire school teachers on vacation to work as temporary counselors," said Royle.

For families with infants, the "Fun Ships" are equipped with cribs and highchairs. Babysitting is available at a nominal charge and done by the coordinators and counselors.

Do It Yourself Foundation fold-out discusses co-alcholism

Copley News Service

There's a joke circulated among members of Al-Anon, the self-help group for people with an alcoholic in their lives, that tells of a woman who sees her husband about to crash his car, and his life flashes before her eyes.

To understand the humor in that joke — dark though it may be — one needs to understand the nature of co-alcoholism.

Living with an alcoholic often forces the non-drinking spouse to assume many of the drinker's day-to-day responsibilities, which can sometimes leave an unclear picture of who is living whose life.

Co-alcoholics, The Partner Paradox, takes a peek inside this world of confusion and pain.

The eight-panel fold-out from the Do It Now Foundation discusses alcoholism as a family disease, the "alcoholic accomplice," love and recovery, and steps for the co-alcoholic to take and avoid.

Following these suggested steps can make a world of difference in how a co-alcoholic deals with her partner's disease.

But before any steps can be taken, one has to honestly admit that he or she is co-alcoholic.

If you are not sure, this pamphlet's 10-question test will help guide you to the next step.

To get a free copy of the fold-out, send a long self-addressed, stamped envelope to D.I.N. Publications, P.O. Box 21126, Phoenix, Ariz., 85036. Ask for Co-alcoholics: The Partner Paradox.

IT'S YOUR LIFE

'Aging' not just a physical process

By STEVE EDWARDS

Edwards

In our youth-oriented society, the question of when a person is old remains unanswered. What is considered youthful today may have been regarded as old in ancient times, when life expectancy was 35.

For several reasons, age 65 seems to be the beginning of old age in modern times. Franklin Roosevelt's decision on retirement eligibility for social security, and Germany's Old Age and Survivors Pension Act, established in 1916, set 65 as the age of retirement and the beginning of these benefits.

However, in reality, aging is a lifelong process. It's an uneven process — many older persons have both youthful and elderly areas in their lives. Their bodies may look aged, but their spirits and minds by creative, vital and youthful.

The aging process is not a process fixed by dates; it is, instead, a changeable, dynamic process, subject to social and behavorial interventions.

Even the word, "senility," illustrates society's skewed view of aging. Both "senility" and "senate," have the same root, which is the Latin word "senex," meaning "old" or "old man."

A person who is said to have senility suffers mental confusion and disorientation, has dizzy spells, shows lack of self care, is forgetful and cannot carry out simple everyday tasks.

A diagnosis of senility implies hopelessness, futility and irreversibility. Unfortunately, many believe that senility is an inevitable part of aging.

However, many different conditions can cause the symptoms associated with senility, and a few diseases produce the mental deterioration implied by "senility."

Virus infections, inadequate blood flow to the brain or even heart attacks have been thought of as senility by some people. Because misdiagnoses is a problem, medical experts have begun to focus more attention on the difference between senility and other problems.

Many of these medical concerns are treatable and the patient can return to an active, normal life.

The body may change, wrinkles may develop; but the quality of life at any age is determined by a person's state of mind. Age in itself is not a factor. Aging actually is a privilege. Those who understand and accept this basic concept do not just survive, they live.

Swimsuit competitions demeaning

By ERMA BOMBECK

Bombeck

Officials of the Miss America Pageant chickened out. They had their chance to bring the pageant into the 21st century sans bathing suits, and they blew it.

They continued to cultivate an entire generation of young girls who think they have to parade in front of the registrar's office in a bathing suit and five-inch heels to qualify for student aid.

Hey, I've got nothing against bathing suits. But for years, the women who enter the competition have sent out messages of contradiction that say, "We're not bimbos. Just because we're pretty doesn't mean we aren't talented or smart enough to cut up our own meat. We want to be taken seriously."

If the contestants really wanted to be taken seriously, they would compete like the rest of us ... with their clothes on. Do entrants in the Pillsbury Bake-Off worry about cellulite? What I'm saying is, if you have brains, you don't have to hold in your stomach for three hours at a time.

Frankly, the competition is not playing to the same audience it played to 67 years ago, or even five years ago. I'd like to think we've come some distance since comedian Fannie Flagg, who was Miss Alabama, said, "I'd have won, but I sat on a wicker chair in the bathing suit competition."

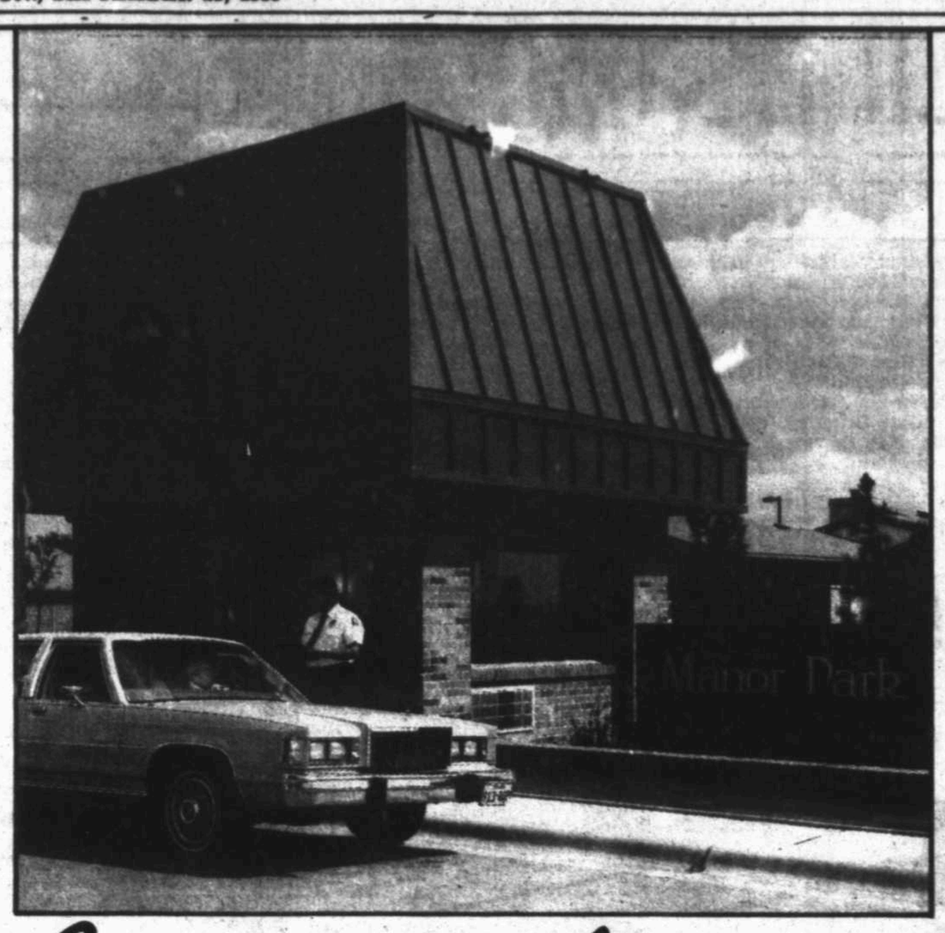

Little isolated puffs of decorum and modesty are blowing across the land like a fresh breeze just before the snow flies. Playboy clubs closed their doors this year, ending an era. Calvin Klein's advertising approach has gone from last year's nude, obscure parts of the body that you're afraid to identify to (brace yourselves) a family fully clothed. I still don't know what they're selling.

And just recently, the very mention that Sen. Dan Quayle was great for the Republican ticket because he looked like Robert Redford and would get the women's vote brought a chorus of groans from women all over the country.

Women have gone to a lot of trouble to distance themselves from the doll-on-the-bed image. We've had a lifetime of whistles (the same ones used to summon dogs that are into the garbage). We've been subjected to an army of macho Neanderthals we have never met who yell to us on crowded streets their plans for us when we're alone. We've endured unsolicited pinches in crowded lobbies and at the bottom of swimming pools.

What feminists are talking about actually is the same thing Miss America contestants are talking about. There's more to us than watching us breathe.

Rising beyond a lush front lawn (left), the Biltmore House resembles an elaborate gingerbread castle reflected in the estate's largest of many fountains. In fact, it is a Beaux Arts adaptation of a French chateau, designed by the dean of late 19th century architects, Richard Morris Hunt, and completed in the late 1890s for George Washington Vanderbilt.

Statuary and architectural details abound inside and outside the 250-room house and its rambling and varied gardens. A pair of limestone lions (above) guard the front door, while characters of many expressions (below) accent its numerous buttresses.

Any city which names its baseball team the Tourists obviously knows where its bread is buttered.

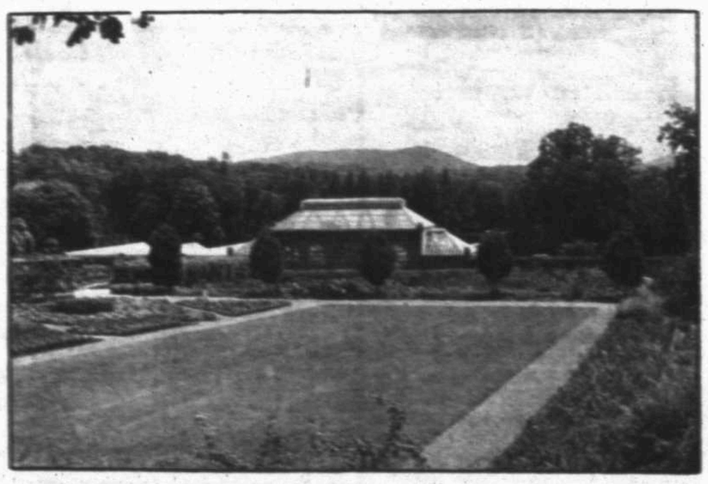

Tucked away in the foothills of the Great Smoky Mountains of western North Carolina, Asheville is a haven for travelers looking for any type of vacation.

Fishing and camping beckon in the Great Smoky National Park and the Pisgah National Forest; world-class canoeing and kayaking await the brave-hearted in the Nantahala Gorge west of the city; shopping for antiques and native Appalachian crafts in Black Mountain and other mountain villages which surround the city with a population of 53,000.

The city also is a gateway to the scenic Blue Ridge Parkway which extends up the Appalachian chain into Virginia and offers insights to American history at the nearby Cherokee Indian Reservation.

But the crown jewel of Western North Carolina tourism is the 8,000-acre estate known as Biltmore.

BILTMORE

Formally opened on Christmas Eve 1895, the magnificent 16th century-style 250-room chateau of George Washington Vanderbilt is a remarkable reminder of the leisurely lifestyles of the idle rich at the turn of the century.

Renowned architect Richard Morris Hunt, designer of the base of the Statue of Liberty, as well as many palatial homes in Newport, R.I., and New York City used the Francis I style to fashion an American palace in the tradition of the Loire Valley in France for Vanderbilt.

Not content with just planning a spectacular home, the grandson of railroad magnate "Commodore" Cornelius Vanderbilt commissioned landscape master Frederick Law Olmsted — who designed the park systems of Chicago, Boston, Montreal and New York City and landscaped the campuses of Stanford and Cornell among other universities — to lay out the gardens and parks surrounding the house.

For five years, hundreds of workers toiled to make the three men's vision a reality.

A three-mile spur rail line was built-in to the estate to carry materials, including Indiana limestone blocks weighing up to three tons, to the hillside site. Brick-making kilns and woodworking mills also were established on-site to satisfy the immense demand for materials.

Technology also was in demand. State-of-the-art 1890s appointments — central heating, complete plumbing, refrigeration and elevators and dumbwaiters — were installed and the house was fully electrified, incorporating some of Edison's first filament bulbs.

The workmen's efforts, now on view for thousands of visitors a month year-round, paid off handsomely.

The Biltmore Estate was granted National Historic Landmark status and is operated by a private company. It continues to be a working farm and forest preserve as it was in Vanderbilt's day. The house alone utilized a staff of 80 servants.

Visitors pay a single admission fee ($17.50 for adults) to enter the grounds, which entitles them to the self-guided tours of the house, gardens, stable, winery and the remainder of the estate.

The two- to three-hour tour of the house offers something for everyone.

Art aficionados will enjoy the European-influenced artworks including British and Flemish tapestries, German porcelains, Viennese sculpture and important Spanish and Venetian paintings. Other collectors will admire the blue jasperware Wedgwood mantle, Spode china and Baccarat crystal in the leather-walled breakfast room.

Bibliophiles will be in awe of the 20,000 volumes housed in the ornately appointed two-story library. In the banquet hall, an immense pipe organ dominates a music-lover's attention.

The furnishings, many works of art in their own right, are a mixture of several styles — Jacobean, Old English, Chippendale and Sheraton.

"Below stairs," sportsmen will look with interest at one of America's first indoor swimming pools, now drained, and a maple and pine two-lane bowling alley which the installer Brunswick says is the oldest in existence.

Homemakers may appreciate the sophisticated household amenities, including electric and manual dumbwaiters connecting the upper four floors with six separate pantries; two laundry rooms, plus an ironing room and a drying room with electric coils and pull-out racks; and three kitchens — a main kitchen, one for pastries and the third equipped with an electric rotisserie.

On the north end of the house, the recently refurbished and reopened stable complex reflects the significance of horses and carriages in Vanderbilt's time. The complex could hold up to 40 horses and 20 carriages.

Outside, the gardens Olmsted created are a wonder of variety. From the "rampe douce" — a remnant of the Renaissance which overlooks the broad expanse of the east lawn — and "the ramble" shrub garden area borrowed from Olmsted's design of New York City's Central Park to the Italian and azalea gardens, the greenery is amazing.

The walled English garden, called by many the finest in America, creates a warmer climate by trapping sunshine and excluding cold winds. The garden's beds derived from Elizabethan "knot work" gardens are replanted three times a year, forming a decorative tapestry.

The extensive gardens and seasonal plantings are a key reason locals often visit the estate several times a year. Each fall, 50,000 tulip bulbs are planted, which give way to a variety of summer bedding plants after the spring show. From late summer until the first heavy frost, multi-hued chrysanthemums grace the gardens.

The conservatory and greenhouses, rebuilt in 1957 consistent with Hunt's original plans, still serve their original function: providing cut flowers and plants for the estate. The greenhouses also played a crucial role in the only major motion picture filmed at the estate, the 1979 Oscar-winner "Being There," with Peter Sellers, Shirley McLaine and Melvyn Douglas.

Away from the house and gardens is the winery, which opened in 1985. It is a continuation of George Vanderbilt's vision of a self-sustaining European estate. Within the next few years, 110 acres of grapes will be contributing to the estate's vintages.

In renovated dairy barns on another portion of the estate is the Deerpark Restaurant, an open-air eatery.

Hunt papers offer Biltmore insights

By BARBARA MAYER
Associated Press

As those who read mystery novels know, the brainy hero or heroine can always find an important clue, even after the authorities have gone over the premises with a fine-tooth comb.

Recently, something along these lines occurred when a cache of 300 drawings, water colors and photographs by architect Richard Morris Hunt was unearthed in the files of the American Architectural Foundation in Washington.

The materials depict the Asheville, N.C., mansion Biltmore House, which Hunt designed for George Washington Vanderbilt towards the end of the 19th century. While alive, Hunt, who died in 1895, was known as the dean of American architecture and his great reputation has been restored recently with a revival of interest in traditional design.

Hunt's massive collection of 8,000 drawings, 15,000 photographs and more than 700 architectural books was given by his sons in 1926 to the American Institute of Architects which he helped found.

Biltmore — only one of Hunt's many illustrious projects — is a 250-room French chateau which has been open to tourists since 1930.

Nowadays, as many as 600,000 visit, peering into public and private rooms, servants quarters and greenhouses.

With all this activity at the historic mansion, which has a curator to administer its voluminous historic documents, it seems amazing to think anything new could possibly be discovered about its design or construction.

Yet early this summer, Susan Ward, curator, made a hurried trip to Washington to look at the materials unearthed by Sherry Birk, curator of prints and drawings for the American Architectural Foundation.

Birk just happened to take the oversized volume off the shelf as part of a regular cleaning program.

"'Gee, I wonder what this is,' I thought and I opened it and found all these wonderful drawings of Biltmore as well as some drawings for George Washington Vanderbilt's house in New York," she recalled.

The first thing Birk did was to let Ward know about her find. Then she proceeded to protect it by taking photograhic slides, giving each item an accession number and placing it in an acid-free folder to protect it from deterioration.

"I was very excited because the find shows drawings of existing spaces and some that were never developed," said Ward. "Looking at some of the drawings which showed what Biltmore might have looked like, I had a sense of listening to a conversation between Hunt and Vanderbilt."

The house is in French Renaissance style but early drawings show it as much more Italianate in style, she added.

"I had often heard that Hunt designed some of the furniture for the house but I never could find documentation of this." The new material shows that the throne chairs in the banquet hall, the banquet table and the entrance hall table as well as a series of small carved chairs were designed by Hunt.

Although a client who commissions a pipe organ, a swineherd's cottage and a greenhouse is surely a rare bird, Vanderbilt was like many other clients in his habit of vetoing his architect's proposals. The fireplace, for example, was shown in a number of different locations, and there were alternative arrangements for organ pipes and other features. "You can see the evolutionary process of development," according to Ward.

Although the information contained in the photos and drawings is likely to be of much greater interest to those associated with Biltmore or those studying Hunt's development as an architect, the general public also benefits, according to Birk. This type of data preserves knowledge of America's architectural heritage. Biltmore is still here to study but many other historic buildings are not.

"Architectural drawings and photos are all that is left to show how Fifth Avenue looked in the 19th century. The records we keep today will show the 21st century what the environment once looked like. That's why we encourage architects to keep their drawings and make them available," she added.

The American Institute of Architects houses and exhibits some of these archives at Octagon House, a historic Washington residence that A.I.A. owns and is restoring.

Greeneville makes good base for exploring Smokies

By BILLIE TROWBRIDGE
Hearst News Service

There are places in the United States where the past never seems very far away: Boston, Philadelphia, Washington, D.C., Greeneville, Tenn.

That's right, Greeneville, and the area surrounding it in the foothills of the Smoky Mountains in eastern Tennessee, where the country is rolling and green, the main crop is still tobacco, and the accent takes some getting used to.

Greeneville had been a settlement for about three years when the area's most famous favorite son — get out your coonskin cap — was born on a hot August morning in 1786, just a few miles east of town. Davy Crockett didn't stick around too long, but Davy Crockett Birthplace Park is still there – look-alike cabin and all.

Greeneville makes a good base camp for exploring all that eastern Tennessee has to offer. Within a radius of 100 miles is Gatlinburg, gateway to the Smokies; Pigeon Forge and Dollywood; the scenic and historic Blue Ridge Parkway; Asheville, N.C., the Biltmore Mansion and Gardens; a passle of historic museums, and a variety of outdoor activities.

However, there is no need to leave Greeneville to get plenty of history. The town, current population only 15,000, was named for Nathaniel Greene, a general in George Washington's army, and was settled in 1783.

From 1785 to 1788, it was the smallest and most short-lived state in the union. Stubborn pioneers decided to secede from North Carolina and form their own state, called Franklin. However, cooler heads ultimately prevailed and "The Lost State of Franklin" was dissolved in about three years and became part of Tennessee when it joined the union in 1796.

Greeneville was already a good-size village when a 17-year-old apprentice tailor named Andrew Johnson came over the mountains from North Carolina with his family in 1826 and went to work in a tailor shop. A year later the nearly illiterate Johnson married Eliza McCardle, daughter of a local minister, who taught him to read and write.

A few years later he bought his own shop, which soon was the hub of discussion and debate as Johnson became involved in local politics. In 1829 he was elected town alderman and then mayor; he served two terms in the state legislature, was U.S. representative for five terms, was twice governor of Tennessee and was elected to the U.S. Senate in 1857 as a Unionist. In 1865 he became the 17th president of the United States. He was to serve another term in the Senate after leaving the White House.

The Johnson tailor shop still stands intact inside a Greeneville museum operated by the National Park Service. Across the street is the two-story brick house he occupied until 1851 when he moved into a larger home on South Main Street, where he lived until his death in 1875.

In 1944, his descendants deeded the home and grounds to the National Park Service, which operates it as a museum. The rooms contain original furnishings and personal belongings of the Johnson family.

Almost directly across Main Street is the Sevier-Lowry House. The oldest unreconstructed home in Greeneville, it was built in the 1790s of logs covered with clapboards.

A short but somewhat hilly walking tour of downtown Greeneville includes 23 other historic homes built between 1810 and the mid-1800s, including the Dickson-Williams Home, at one time the showplace of eastern Tennessee. Many notables of the day were entertained there and both the Union and Confederate armies used it as headquarters at one time or another.

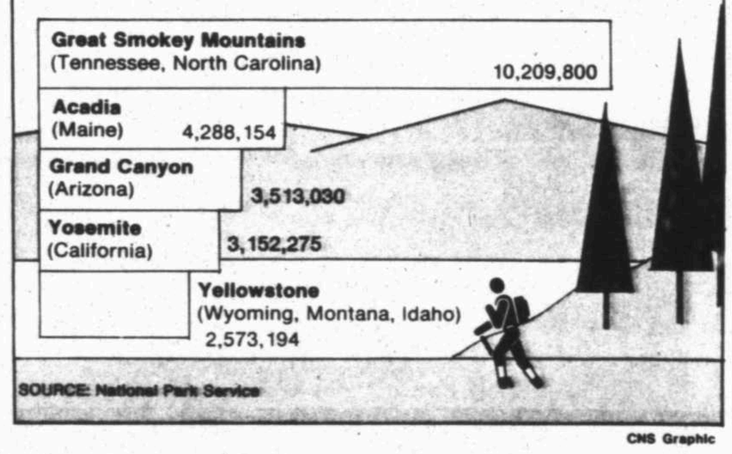

Also on the downtown tour is the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, constructed in 1860 and used as both hospital and stable during the Civil War. It was shelled in 1864 and a cannonball can still be seen lodged in the brick facade.

Other historic stops include two churches built in the mid-1800s, Greeneville Town Hall, Court House Square and the Big Spring, where the town was started and source of the water supply for more than 150 years.

The Old Harmony Cemetary dates from the 1790s. Buried there are soldiers who fought in four wars; the American Revolution, the War of 1812, the Mexican War and both sides of the Civil War. Johnson and members of his family are buried at a site of his choosing on Signal Hill in Greeneville, now the Andrew Johnson National Cemetary.

In nearby Tusculum is Tusculum College, the oldest Presbyterian college in the United States, founded by the Rev. Samuel Doak in 1778 and operated continuously, though under two other names. The Tusculum College Historic District was established in 1980 by the National Trust for Historic Preservation. Eight of Tusculum's 13 buildings and the stone arch at the main entrance were constructed between 1841 and 1928. The Samuel Doak House, begun in 1818, is on the campus and is open to the public.

SKIN IRRITANTS

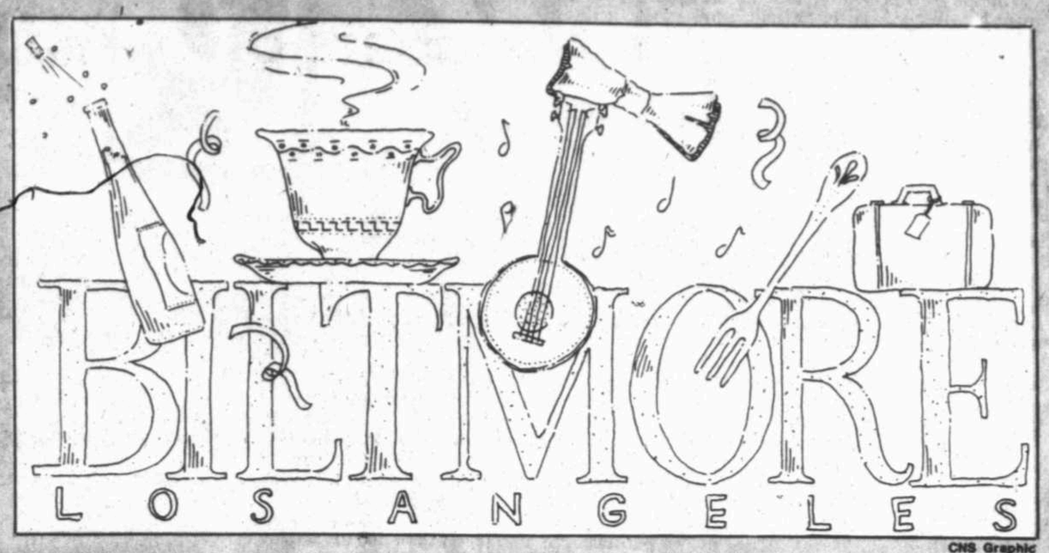

Redness, blotching, itching, and burning are all characteristic of sensitive skin. Flare-ups of these sorts occur in different people for a variety of reasons. One thing is for certain, however. Precautions can be taken to minimize these sensitive reactions. A person with sensitive skin should never scrub with a cloth or sponge. Only tepid water should be used for washing, along with a superfatted soap. If skin still overreacts, a hypoallergenic cleanser should be used. Beauty products containing ingredients commonly cited as irritants should be avoided. Such ingredients include lanolin and propylene glycole (moisturizers), phenylenediamine (found in some hair coloring preparations), alcohol; fragrance, preservatives, and high-pH products. A professional facial should prove to be of great benefit.

Regardless of the season, you will always be right in fashion with a hairstyle designed expressively for you. In creating the right look for you, we take into consideration your facial shape, features, etc. Mary at SALON UNIQUE, is a professional who is here to offer you the finest in hair care. Biltmore Hotel, a Los Angeles tradition

By LOREEN ARBUS and NORM CHANDLER FOX

CNS Graphic

Traditions are hard to come by in Los Angeles. The restored Victorian mansions on two blocks of Carroll Street are the closest Los Angeles comes to the venerable Victorians that blanket San Francisco. And the 19th-century Bradbury Building in downtown Los Angeles is a singular example of the wonderfully vintage buildings similar to the beauties designed by Sullivan on Chicago's Lake Shore Drive. The hotel that is closest in character and charm to New York's exquisite Plaza has to be the Los Angeles Biltmore.

If you visit Los Angeles and you don't have the opportunity to stay there, then by all means come visit this magnificent place. The fading dowager has just gotten gussied up, and she's a jewel!

The Biltmore opened to a great deal of fanfare in the fall of 1923, and the '20s truly roared at this luxurious oasis. In fact, until World War II, The Biltmore was the center of everything social in Los Angeles. Debutante balls, cotillions and charitable gatherings weren't considered successful unless they occurred in one of the ballrooms at the Biltmore.

AFTER THE WAR, society turned westward, and the Beverly Hills Hotel, as well as the Beverly Wilshire, became the crown jewels of hotel royalty.

Happily, in 1976, the Biltmore changed hands and was restored to the tune of $30 million. Downtown Los Angeles was undergoing a renaissance with new skyscrapers going up, and suddenly, this lovely old hotel was placed in the limelight once more. As if one face-lift weren't enough, new management in 1984 poured a new infusion of $40 million to bring the entire hotel back to its original splendor.

If you happen to enter the Biltmore from the Olive Street entrance facing Pershing Square, you might walk in during midafternoon, when the Biltmore serves high tea in the exquisite Rendezvous Court — a cathedral-like Spanish-Italian design with a four-story-high vaulted and elaborately carved ceiling, travertine stone columns and twin ornamentally bronzed staircases at one end.

Another great meeting place is the Gallery Bar, which is nestled discreetly off the awesome vaulted main galleria. This is the spot for late-night imbibing because they offer some of the world's greatest cognacs and Armangacs by the glass. (We wondered how many people ordered the Remy Martin Louis XIII cognac at $65 per snifter.)

But if you really want a hopping, toe-thumping, finger-snapping good time, by all means drop into the Grand Avenue Bar. On weeknights after 5 p.m., this spot becomes a mecca for jazz enthusiasts from all over downtown Los Angeles. There's a delightful happy hour hors d'oeuvres buffet, all kinds of mixed drinks and even wines by the glass.

THE BIG DRAW, however,is the live jazz combos that play everything from progressive to Dixieland. There's no cover charge for the music that brings in a very happy, celebratory crowd.

Gourmets from all over Los Angeles make a beeline for Bernard's, the luxury restaurant in the Biltmore. In a very contemporary setting, chef Roger Pigozzi produces an artful balance between formal French cuisine and the best of the American regional repertory. Among his best dishes are a red chili and egg ravioli filled with lobster and warm duck liver with papaya relish.

Among our favorite entrees are the roasted Lotte fish with pink peppercorns, grilled medallion of veal with artichoke fettucine in a rosemary sauce, sauteed breast of mallard duck, steamed salmon with oyster mushrooms and a noisette of lamb with mint and honey vinaigrette.

Dessertwise, we had difficulty making a selection of the gorgeous pastries, so we ordered "the black plate," which included a small taste of everything.

The guest rooms and suites have been configured into plush appointments replete with green plants, modern art and state-of-the-art accoutrements. It's quite wonderful to move from the gilded past of the public rooms on the main floor to the modern conveniences of the guest rooms.

THE BEST NEWS of all for the future of the Biltmore is that two very accomplished hoteliers, Carlos Lopes and Eric Prevette, are co-heading Windsor Hotel Group, which was just formed to manage the Biltmore. Both Lopes and Prevette have spent many years with Rosewood Hotels, which operates such opulent places as the Bel Air Hotel, Dallas' Mansion on Turtle Creek and Crescent Court and Hawaii's Hana Maui. Lopes and Prevette are seasoned and refined hotel men, and they have plans to institute a private lunch/dinner membership club at the Biltmore, as well as continue to offer the creme de la creme in luxury throughout this grand hotel.

Start your own tradition by staying at, or at least visiting, this unique bastion of luxury in downtown Los Angeles. It may become one of your most vivid memories of your stay in Southern California.

Savannah abounds with Southern hospitality

By LOREEN ARBUS and NORM CHANDLER FOX
Copley News Service

The glorious city of Savannah on Georgia's Atlantic coast is so chock-full of charm that visitors often forget its historical significance. On our last visit we learned, for example, that Savannah was the second planned city in the 13 Colonies — and Philadelphia was the first.

Because the city planners were fearful of attacks by the local Indian tribes, they designed a city based on an ancient map of Peking. This plan provided for a series of stockade squares within the city where citizens could find refuge. Happily, the Indians were friendly, so the fortifications were torn down, leaving a magnificent checkerboard of parklike squares connected by wide, leafy boulevards throughout the city.

The proud inhabitants of Savannah have designated 2½ square miles of the inner city as a National Historic Landmark District that is the largest in our nation. There are more than 1,000 architecturally and historically significant buildings that have been lovingly restored here. In fact, Savannah residents describe their cherished city as "the past preserved with love."

When you visit, be sure to take some comfortable walking shoes because Savannah really must be seen by foot. Besides viewing the majestic antebellum homes — most of which are in pristine condition — there is also a Victorian area of superb homes from the post-Civil War era.

There are wonderful bed and breakfast inns throughout the city, but since many of them are small, they tend to get booked up quickly. We enjoyed the Hyatt Regency Savannah, which, while large, is located overlooking the riverfront, right smack in the middle of the Historic District.

All of this walking and sight-seeing is bound to build up a big Southern appetite. The good news is that Savannah has some excellent restaurants that will satisfy all of your cravings for Southeast coastal regional cuisine.

■ ELIZABETH ON 37TH (912) 236-5547 — Before leaving for your trip to Savannah, we suggest that you phone this place to make a reservation. The eponymous owner-chef was written up in The New York Times and later lauded as one of the best chefs in America — so the restaurant is vastly popular and very crowded. Chef Elizabeth makes original variations on Southern recipes, and we think you'll love her crab dishes, all of her homemade breads and the most delectable desserts imaginable. This is definitely a must in Savannah.

■ MRS. WILKES' BOARDING HOUSE (912) 232-5997 — At the other end of the spectrum, this spot has also become a veritable institution in town. It's a big old house, and there isn't a sign in front of it, but if you're walking along Jones Street, you'll smell great cooking wafting in the air from Mrs. Wilkes'. Everything is served family style, which means giant portions and seconds on everything. The spoon bread is great, and all of the vegetables are just hours from the garden. It's hearty fare served with fresh-squeezed lemonade.

■ PIRATES' HOUSE (912) 233-5757 — Part of the fun of eating here is the house itself, with a low ceiling and 23 small colorful rooms. Stop in the Rain Forest Bar first for an exotic libation made from Southern Comfort or plain bourbon. The crab cakes, seafood gumbo and river fish are all winners here, and definitely save room for the mouth-watering desserts.

■ JOHNNY HARRIS RESTAURANT (912) 354-7810 — This seems to be one of the city's most popular spots among the locals ever since it opened its doors in 1924. Folks from Atlanta have been known to drive down to Savannah just to eat the barbecue at Johnny Harris'. We really liked the ribs and the barbecued sliced pork, but you should also try the she-crab soup. The home-baked pies are also part of the eating ritual here.

■ THE BOAR'S HEAD (912) 232-3196 — This absolutely beautiful dining room overlooks the Savannah River, and the candle-lit atmosphere should start thoughts toward romance. The menu is part refined Southern cuisine and part French. The bouillibaisse is remarkable because of the wonderful local fish and deft seasonings. Try a liqueur-laden souffle for dessert.

■ CRYSTAL BEER PARLOR (912) 232-1153 — It looks like an old tavern that has been around for centuries, and it's the place for fun Southern food. The homemade cornbread is fabulous, as is the crab stew, authentic gumbo, shrimp salad and desserts. Very informal, and a good place to bring the kids.

■ RIVER HOUSE SEAFOOD (912) 234-1900 — This restaurant is housed in an 1810 cotton warehouse overlooking the river. The menu says they're famous for "Low Country Cookin,'" and we can agree. Try any of the shrimp entrees or the crab casserole. The cheese pie makes an unforgettable dessert.

'Survival' tips offered for business travelers

By JIM BARLOW
Hearst News Service

Business travel soon loses its charm. The dreams of living it up on the road on the company's money dwindle to the reality of lonely nights in a hotel room.

Here are some tips about surviving on the road. They come from business people who were asked what they do to make life easier away from home and office.

■ Plan your business trip as carefully as a busy day at the office. That means setting up a typed, easily read schedule with definite appointments. Don't spend your time hassling with logistics. Use it to take care of business.

Either you — or whoever makes up your schedule — should allow for local travel time. That means getting local information — obtainable from visitors and convention bureaus or chambers of commerce. Ask them about travel patterns. For example, in New York City, the subway frequently will get you between midtown and Wall Street faster than a cab.

■ Before you go, check your card files to see people you know or would like to meet at your destination. That's especially useful if it's a city you don't normally visit.

■ Keep separate grooming kits and keep the travel one packed with everything you'll need. Include all the patent medicines you favor. Nothing is worse than waking up in the middle of the night in a hotel room, needing a missing antacid tablet.

■ Experiment with suitcases. Most luggage stores will give you return privileges on baggage. Take it home, pack it and see just how wrinkled your clothes are the next morning.

■ For women, one Houston woman says, "Take half as many clothes as you think you'll need, and twice as many pantyhose."

■ The conventional wisdom is to always carry your baggage aboard the airplane. You'll generally save from 30 minutes to an hour at each stop awaiting the baggage to arrive from the bowels of the airplane.

■ If you can't get all the clothes you'll need in one bag, carry two smaller ones. That means you can check them if there is time, but can generally talk your way aboard the plane with them if time is short.

■ Make sure the bags will fit in the overhead storage compartment. If you know they will and the gate attendant disagrees, offer to come back and check the bags if they don't fit. Generally, you'll win that way.

■ All airplane seats are not alike. Determine where you like to sit on each type of aircraft you fly, and make a note. Then when you, your secretary or travel agent makes a reservation, ask for that seat.

■ One plus for plane travel — you'll have more uninterrupted time there than you'll probably have at home or office. Use it to catch up on some work or just read a book.

■ It's sometimes difficult to turn off the conversation from a seatmate. When you get on the airplane, dive into your work or book as an immediate stopper. Answer questions in monosyllables.

■ Non-stop flights are less hassle. Remember the airline terminology. A through flight is not non-stop. It just means you don't change planes.

■ If you have to change planes, add up the cost-benefit ratios of how much time you should allow for connections. With the lateness of many planes today, determine the cost to your peace of mind from sitting for an extra hour or so in a crowded, noisy terminal vs. the financial cost of missing your flight and appointment.

■ If you travel regularly, investigate joining one of the airline clubs. The waiting is easier there.

■ If at all possible, don't arrive at your destination after 10 p.m. In smaller cities, taxis may be hard to find, and that item you forgot and desperately need is not available because the shops — even the ones at the airport — are closed.

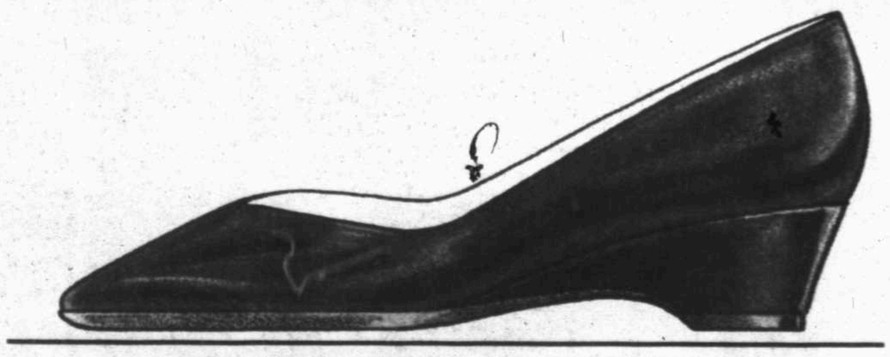

■ Consider using hotels with a "club floor" or similar convenience. Usually they're staffed with concierges during business hours. If you're moving about the city, they can take messages and help you keep up with your schedule.

■ Don't give people the opportunity to mess up. That means confine your haircuts to home, and don't send out your laundry at the hotel. Unless you're staying in a top class hotel, consider carrying a small travel iron.

Formally opened on Christmas Eve 1895, the magnificent 16th century-style 250-room chateau of George Washington Vanderbilt is a remarkable reminder of the leisurely lifestyles of the idle rich at the turn of the century.

Renowned architect Richard Morris Hunt, designer of the base of the Statue of Liberty, as well as many palatial homes in Newport, R.I., and New York City used the Francis I style to fashion an American palace in the tradition of the Loire Valley in France for Vanderbilt.

Not content with just planning a spectacular home, the grandson of railroad magnate "Commodore" Cornelius Vanderbilt commissioned landscape master Frederick Law Olmsted — who designed the park systems of Chicago, Boston, Montreal and New York City and landscaped the campuses of Stanford and Cornell among other universities — to lay out the gardens and parks surrounding the house.

For five years, hundreds of workers toiled to make the three men's vision a reality.

A three-mile spur rail line was built-in to the estate to carry materials, including Indiana limestone blocks weighing up to three tons, to the hillside site. Brick-making kilns and woodworking mills also were established on-site to satisfy the immense demand for materials.

Technology also was in demand. State-of-the-art 1890s appointments — central heating, complete plumbing, refrigeration and elevators and dumbwaiters — were installed and the house was fully electrified, incorporating some of Edison's first filament bulbs.

The workmen's efforts, now on view for thousands of visitors a month year-round, paid off handsomely.

The Biltmore Estate was granted National Historic Landmark status and is operated by a private company. It continues to be a working farm and forest preserve as it was in Vanderbilt's day. The house alone utilized a staff of 80 servants.

Visitors pay a single admission fee ($17.50 for adults) to enter the grounds, which entitles them to the self-guided tours of the house, gardens, stable, winery and the remainder of the estate.

The two- to three-hour tour of the house offers something for everyone.

Art aficionados will enjoy the European-influenced artworks including British and Flemish tapestries, German porcelains, Viennese sculpture and important Spanish and Venetian paintings. Other collectors will admire the blue jasperware Wedgwood mantle, Spode china and Baccarat crystal in the leather-walled breakfast room.

Bibliophiles will be in awe of the 20,000 volumes housed in the ornately appointed two-story library. In the banquet hall, an immense pipe organ dominates a music-lover's attention.

The furnishings, many works of art in their own right, are a mixture of several styles — Jacobean, Old English, Chippendale and Sheraton.

"Below stairs," sportsmen will look with interest at one of America's first indoor swimming pools, now drained, and a maple and pine two-lane bowling alley which the installer Brunswick says is the oldest in existence.

Homemakers may appreciate the sophisticated household amenities, including electric and manual dumbwaiters connecting the upper four floors with six separate pantries; two laundry rooms, plus an ironing room and a drying room with electric coils and pull-out racks; and three kitchens — a main kitchen, one for pastries and the third equipped with an electric rotisserie.

On the north end of the house, the recently refurbished and reopened stable complex reflects the significance of horses and carriages in Vanderbilt's time. The complex could hold up to 40 horses and 20 carriages.

Outside, the gardens Olmsted created are a wonder of variety. From the "rampe douce" — a remnant of the Renaissance which overlooks the broad expanse of the east lawn — and "the ramble" shrub garden area borrowed from Olmsted's design of New York City's Central Park to the Italian and azalea gardens, the greenery is amazing.

The walled English garden, called by many the finest in America, creates a warmer climate by trapping sunshine and excluding cold winds. The garden's beds derived from Elizabethan "knot work" gardens are replanted three times a year, forming a decorative tapestry.

The extensive gardens and seasonal plantings are a key reason locals often visit the estate several times a year. Each fall, 50,000 tulip bulbs are planted, which give way to a variety of summer bedding plants after the spring show. From late summer until the first heavy frost, multi-hued chrysanthemums grace the gardens.

The conservatory and greenhouses, rebuilt in 1957 consistent with Hunt's original plans, still serve their original function: providing cut flowers and plants for the estate. The greenhouses also played a crucial role in the only major motion picture filmed at the estate, the 1979 Oscar-winner "Being There," with Peter Sellers, Shirley McLaine and Melvyn Douglas.

Away from the house and gardens is the winery, which opened in 1985. It is a continuation of George Vanderbilt's vision of a self-sustaining European estate. Within the next few years, 110 acres of grapes will be contributing to the estate's vintages.

In renovated dairy barns on another portion of the estate is the Deerpark Restaurant, an open-air eatery.

Hunt papers offer Biltmore insights

By BARBARA MAYER
Associated Press

As those who read mystery novels know, the brainy hero or heroine can always find an important clue, even after the authorities have gone over the premises with a fine-tooth comb.

Recently, something along these lines occurred when a cache of 300 drawings, water colors and photographs by architect Richard Morris Hunt was unearthed in the files of the American Architectural Foundation in Washington.

The materials depict the Asheville, N.C., mansion Biltmore House, which Hunt designed for George Washington Vanderbilt towards the end of the 19th century. While alive, Hunt, who died in 1895, was known as the dean of American architecture and his great reputation has been restored recently with a revival of interest in traditional design.

Hunt's massive collection of 8,000 drawings, 15,000 photographs and more than 700 architectural books was given by his sons in 1926 to the American Institute of Architects which he helped found.

Biltmore — only one of Hunt's many illustrious projects — is a 250-room French chateau which has been open to tourists since 1930.

Nowadays, as many as 600,000 visit, peering into public and private rooms, servants quarters and greenhouses.

With all this activity at the historic mansion, which has a curator to administer its voluminous historic documents, it seems amazing to think anything new could possibly be discovered about its design or construction.

Yet early this summer, Susan Ward, curator, made a hurried trip to Washington to look at the materials unearthed by Sherry Birk, curator of prints and drawings for the American Architectural Foundation.

Birk just happened to take the oversized volume off the shelf as part of a regular cleaning program.

"'Gee, I wonder what this is,' I thought and I opened it and found all these wonderful drawings of Biltmore as well as some drawings for George Washington Vanderbilt's house in New York," she recalled.

The first thing Birk did was to let Ward know about her find. Then she proceeded to protect it by taking photograhic slides, giving each item an accession number and placing it in an acid-free folder to protect it from deterioration.

"I was very excited because the find shows drawings of existing spaces and some that were never developed," said Ward. "Looking at some of the drawings which showed what Biltmore might have looked like, I had a sense of listening to a conversation between Hunt and Vanderbilt."

The house is in French Renaissance style but early drawings show it as much more Italianate in style, she added.

"I had often heard that Hunt designed some of the furniture for the house but I never could find documentation of this." The new material shows that the throne chairs in the banquet hall, the banquet table and the entrance hall table as well as a series of small carved chairs were designed by Hunt.

Although a client who commissions a pipe organ, a swineherd's cottage and a greenhouse is surely a rare bird, Vanderbilt was like many other clients in his habit of vetoing his architect's proposals. The fireplace, for example, was shown in a number of different locations, and there were alternative arrangements for organ pipes and other features. "You can see the evolutionary process of development," according to Ward.

Although the information contained in the photos and drawings is likely to be of much greater interest to those associated with Biltmore or those studying Hunt's development as an architect, the general public also benefits, according to Birk. This type of data preserves knowledge of America's architectural heritage. Biltmore is still here to study but many other historic buildings are not.

"Architectural drawings and photos are all that is left to show how Fifth Avenue looked in the 19th century. The records we keep today will show the 21st century what the environment once looked like. That's why we encourage architects to keep their drawings and make them available," she added.

The American Institute of Architects houses and exhibits some of these archives at Octagon House, a historic Washington residence that A.I.A. owns and is restoring.

Greeneville makes good base for exploring Smokies

By BILLIE TROWBRIDGE
Hearst News Service

There are places in the United States where the past never seems very far away: Boston, Philadelphia, Washington, D.C., Greeneville, Tenn.

That's right, Greeneville, and the area surrounding it in the foothills of the Smoky Mountains in eastern Tennessee, where the country is rolling and green, the main crop is still tobacco, and the accent takes some getting used to.

Greeneville had been a settlement for about three years when the area's most famous favorite son — get out your coonskin cap — was born on a hot August morning in 1786, just a few miles east of town. Davy Crockett didn't stick around too long, but Davy Crockett Birthplace Park is still there – look-alike cabin and all.

Greeneville makes a good base camp for exploring all that eastern Tennessee has to offer. Within a radius of 100 miles is Gatlinburg, gateway to the Smokies; Pigeon Forge and Dollywood; the scenic and historic Blue Ridge Parkway; Asheville, N.C., the Biltmore Mansion and Gardens; a passle of historic museums, and a variety of outdoor activities.

However, there is no need to leave Greeneville to get plenty of history. The town, current population only 15,000, was named for Nathaniel Greene, a general in George Washington's army, and was settled in 1783.

From 1785 to 1788, it was the smallest and most short-lived state in the union. Stubborn pioneers decided to secede from North Carolina and form their own state, called Franklin. However, cooler heads ultimately prevailed and "The Lost State of Franklin" was dissolved in about three years and became part of Tennessee when it joined the union in 1796.

Greeneville was already a good-size village when a 17-year-old apprentice tailor named Andrew Johnson came over the mountains from North Carolina with his family in 1826 and went to work in a tailor shop. A year later the nearly illiterate Johnson married Eliza McCardle, daughter of a local minister, who taught him to read and write.

A few years later he bought his own shop, which soon was the hub of discussion and debate as Johnson became involved in local politics. In 1829 he was elected town alderman and then mayor; he served two terms in the state legislature, was U.S. representative for five terms, was twice governor of Tennessee and was elected to the U.S. Senate in 1857 as a Unionist. In 1865 he became the 17th president of the United States. He was to serve another term in the Senate after leaving the White House.

The Johnson tailor shop still stands intact inside a Greeneville museum operated by the National Park Service. Across the street is the two-story brick house he occupied until 1851 when he moved into a larger home on South Main Street, where he lived until his death in 1875.

In 1944, his descendants deeded the home and grounds to the National Park Service, which operates it as a museum. The rooms contain original furnishings and personal belongings of the Johnson family.

Almost directly across Main Street is the Sevier-Lowry House. The oldest unreconstructed home in Greeneville, it was built in the 1790s of logs covered with clapboards.

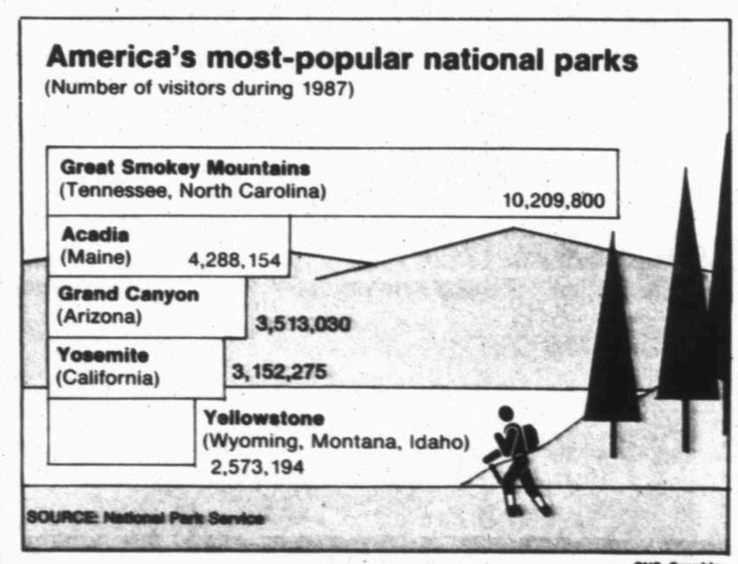

A short but somewhat hilly walking tour of downtown Greeneville includes 23 other historic homes built between 1810 and the mid-1800s, including the Dickson-Williams Home, at one time the showplace of eastern Tennessee. Many notables of the day were entertained there and both the Union and Confederate armies used it as headquarters at one time or another.

Also on the downtown tour is the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, constructed in 1860 and used as both hospital and stable during the Civil War. It was shelled in 1864 and a cannonball can still be seen lodged in the brick facade.

Other historic stops include two churches built in the mid-1800s, Greeneville Town Hall, Court House Square and the Big Spring, where the town was started and source of the water supply for more than 150 years.

The Old Harmony Cemetary dates from the 1790s. Buried there are soldiers who fought in four wars; the American Revolution, the War of 1812, the Mexican War and both sides of the Civil War. Johnson and members of his family are buried at a site of his choosing on Signal Hill in Greeneville, now the Andrew Johnson National Cemetary.

In nearby Tusculum is Tusculum College, the oldest Presbyterian college in the United States, founded by the Rev. Samuel Doak in 1778 and operated continuously, though under two other names. The Tusculum College Historic District was established in 1980 by the National Trust for Historic Preservation. Eight of Tusculum's 13 buildings and the stone arch at the main entrance were constructed between 1841 and 1928. The Samuel Doak House, begun in 1818, is on the campus and is open to the public.

SKIN IRRITANTS

Redness, blotching, itching, and burning are all characteristic of sensitive skin. Flare-ups of these sorts occur in different people for a variety of reasons. One thing is for certain, however. Precautions can be taken to minimize these sensitive reactions. A person with sensitive skin should never scrub with a cloth or sponge. Only tepid water should be used for washing, along with a superfatted soap. If skin still overreacts, a hypoallergenic cleanser should be used. Beauty products containing ingredients commonly cited as irritants should be avoided. Such ingredients include lanolin and propylene glycole (moisturizers), phenylenediamine (found in some hair coloring preparations), alcohol, fragrance, preservatives, and high-pH products. A professional facial should prove to be of great benefit.

Regardless of the season, you will always be right in fashion with a hairstyle designed expressively for you. In creating the right look for you, we take into consideration your facial shape, features, etc. Mary at SALON UNIQUE, is a professional who is here to offer you the finest in hair care. Biltmore Hotel, a Los Angeles tradition

By LOREEN ARBUS and NORM CHANDLER FOX
Copley News Service

CNS Graphic

Traditions are hard to come by in Los Angeles. The restored Victorian mansions on two blocks of Carroll Street are the closest Los Angeles comes to the venerable Victorians that blanket San Francisco. And the 19th-century Bradbury Building in downtown Los Angeles is a singular example of the wonderfully vintage buildings similar to the beauties designed by Sullivan on Chicago's Lake Shore Drive. The hotel that is closest in character and charm to New York's exquisite Plaza has to be the Los Angeles Biltmore.

If you visit Los Angeles and you don't have the opportunity to stay there, then by all means come visit this magnificent place. The fading dowager has just gotten gussied up, and she's a jewel!

The Biltmore opened to a great deal of fanfare in the fall of 1923, and the '20s truly roared at this luxurious oasis. In fact, until World War II, The Biltmore was the center of everything social in Los Angeles. Debutante balls, cotillions and charitable gatherings weren't considered successful unless they occurred in one of the ballrooms at the Biltmore.

AFTER THE WAR, society turned westward, and the Beverly Hills Hotel, as well as the Beverly Wilshire, became the crown jewels of hotel royalty.

Happily, in 1976, the Biltmore changed hands and was restored to the tune of $30 million. Downtown Los Angeles was undergoing a renaissance with new skyscrapers going up, and suddenly, this lovely old hotel was placed in the limelight once more. As if one face-lift weren't enough, new management in 1984 poured a new infusion of $40 million to bring the entire hotel back to its original splendor.

If you happen to enter the Biltmore from the Olive Street entrance facing Pershing Square, you might walk in during midafternoon, when the Biltmore serves high tea in the exquisite Rendezvous Court — a cathedral-like Spanish-Italian design with a four-story-high vaulted and elaborately carved ceiling, travertine stone columns and twin ornamentally bronzed staircases at one end.

Another great meeting place is the Gallery Bar, which is nestled discreetly off the awesome vaulted main galleria. This is the spot for late-night imbibing because they offer some of the world's greatest cognacs and Armangacs by the glass. (We wondered how many people ordered the Remy Martin Louis XIII cognac at $65 per snifter.)

But if you really want a hopping, toe-thumping, finger-snapping good time, by all means drop into the Grand Avenue Bar. On weeknights after 5 p.m., this spot becomes a mecca for jazz enthusiasts from all over downtown Los Angeles. There's a delightful happy hour hors d'oeuvres buffet, all kinds of mixed drinks and even wines by the glass.

THE BIG DRAW, however, is the live jazz combos that play everything from progressive to Dixieland. There's no cover charge for the music that brings in a very happy, celebratory crowd.

Gourmets from all over Los Angeles make a beeline for Bernard's, the luxury restaurant in the Biltmore. In a very contemporary setting, chef Roger Pigozzi produces an artful balance between formal French cuisine and the best of the American regional repertory. Among his best dishes are a red chili and egg ravioli filled with lobster and warm duck liver with papaya relish.

Among our favorite entrees are the roasted Lotte fish with pink peppercorns, grilled medallion of veal with artichoke fettucine in a rosemary sauce, sauteed breast of mallard duck, steamed salmon with oyster mushrooms and a noisette of lamb with mint and honey vinaigrette.

Dessertwise, we had difficulty making a selection of the gorgeous pastries, so we ordered "the black plate," which included a small taste of everything.

The guest rooms and suites have been configured into plush appointments replete with green plants, modern art and state-of-the-art accoutrements. It's quite wonderful to move from the gilded past of the public rooms on the main floor to the modern conveniences of the guest rooms.

THE BEST NEWS of all for the future of the Biltmore is that two very accomplished hoteliers, Carlos Lopes and Eric Prevette, are co-heading Windsor Hotel Group, which was just formed to manage the Biltmore. Both Lopes and Prevette have spent many years with Rosewood Hotels, which operates such opulent places as the Bel Air Hotel, Dallas' Mansion on Turtle Creek and Crescent Court and Hawaii's Hana Maui. Lopes and Prevette are seasoned and refined hotel men, and they have plans to institute a private lunch/dinner membership club at the Biltmore, as well as continue to offer the creme de la creme in luxury throughout this grand hotel.

Start your own tradition by staying at, or at least visiting, this unique bastion of luxury in downtown Los Angeles. It may become one of your most vivid memories of your stay in Southern California.

Savannah abounds with Southern hospitality

By LOREEN ARBUS and NORM CHANDLER FOX
Copley News Service

The glorious city of Savannah on Georgia's Atlantic coast is so chock-full of charm that visitors often forget its historical significance. On our last visit we learned, for example, that Savannah was the second planned city in the 13 Colonies — and Philadelphia was the first.

Because the city planners were fearful of attacks by the local Indian tribes, they designed a city based on an ancient map of Peking. This plan provided for a series of stockade squares within the city where citizens could find refuge. Happily, the Indians were friendly, so the fortifications were torn down, leaving a magnificent checkerboard of parklike squares connected by wide, leafy boulevards throughout the city.

The proud inhabitants of Savannah have designated 2½ square miles of the inner city as a National Historic Landmark District that is the largest in our nation. There are more than 1,000 architecturally and historically significant buildings that have been lovingly restored here. In fact, Savannah residents describe their cherished city as "the past preserved with love."

When you visit, be sure to take some comfortable walking shoes because Savannah really must be seen by foot. Besides viewing the majestic antebellum homes — most of which are in pristine condition — there is also a Victorian area of superb homes from the post-Civil War era.

There are wonderful bed and breakfast inns throughout the city, but since many of them are small, they tend to get booked up quickly. We enjoyed the Hyatt Regency Savannah, which, while large, is located overlooking the riverfront, right smack in the middle of the Historic District.

All of this walking and sight-seeing is bound to build up a big Southern appetite. The good news is that Savannah has some excellent restaurants that will satisfy all of your cravings for Southeast coastal regional cuisine.

■ ELIZABETH ON 37TH (912) 236-5547 — Before leaving for your trip to Savannah, we suggest that you phone this place to make a reservation. The eponymous owner-chef was written up in The New York Times and later lauded as one of the best chefs in America — so the restaurant is vastly popular and very crowded. Chef Elizabeth makes original variations on Southern recipes, and we think you'll love her crab dishes, all of her homemade breads and the most delectable desserts imaginable. This is definitely a must in Savannah.

■ MRS. WILKES' BOARDING HOUSE (912) 232-5997 — At the other end of the spectrum, this spot has also become a veritable institution in town. It's a big old house, and there isn't a sign in front of it, but if you're walking along Jones Street, you'll smell great cooking wafting in the air from Mrs. Wilkes'. Everything is served family style, which means giant portions and seconds on everything. The spoon bread is great, and all of the vegetables are just hours from the garden. It's hearty fare served with fresh-squeezed lemonade.

■ PIRATES' HOUSE (912) 233-5757 — Part of the fun of eating here is the house itself, with a low ceiling and 23 small colorful rooms. Stop in the Rain Forest Bar first for an exotic libation made from Southern Comfort or plain bourbon. The crab cakes, seafood gumbo and river fish are all winners here, and definitely save room for the mouth-watering desserts.

■ JOHNNY HARRIS RESTAURANT (912) 354-7810 — This seems to be one of the city's most popular spots among the locals ever since it opened its doors in 1924. Folks from Atlanta have been known to drive down to Savannah just to eat the barbecue at Johnny Harris'. We really liked the ribs and the barbecued sliced pork, but you should also try the she-crab soup. The home-baked pies are also part of the eating ritual here.

■ THE BOAR'S HEAD (912) 232-3196 — This absolutely beautiful dining room overlooks the Savannah River, and the candle-lit atmosphere should start thoughts toward romance. The menu is part refined Southern cuisine and part French. The bouillibaisse is remarkable because of the wonderful local fish and deft seasonings. Try a liqueur-laden souffle for dessert.

■ CRYSTAL BEER PARLOR (912) 232-1153 — It looks like an old tavern that has been around for centuries, and it's the place for fun Southern food. The homemade cornbread is fabulous, as is the crab stew, authentic gumbo, shrimp salad and desserts. Very informal, and a good place to bring the kids.

■ RIVER HOUSE SEAFOOD (912) 234-1900 — This restaurant is housed in an 1810 cotton warehouse overlooking the river. The menu says they're famous for "Low Country Cookin,'" and we can agree. Try any of the shrimp entrees or the crab casserole. The cheese pie makes an unforgettable dessert.

'Survival' tips offered for business travelers

By JIM BARLOW
Hearst News Service

Business travel soon loses its charm. The dreams of living it up on the road on the company's money dwindle to the reality of lonely nights in a hotel room.

Here are some tips about surviving on the road. They come from business people who were asked what they do to make life easier away from home and office.

■ Plan your business trip as carefully as a busy day at the office. That means setting up a typed, easily read schedule with definite appointments. Don't spend your time hassling with logistics. Use it to take care of business.

Either you — or whoever makes up your schedule — should allow for local travel time. That means getting local information — obtainable from visitors and convention bureaus or chambers of commerce. Ask them about travel patterns. For example, in New York City, the subway frequently will get you between midtown and Wall Street faster than a cab.

■ Before you go, check your card files to see people you know or would like to meet at your destination. That's especially useful if it's a city you don't normally visit.

■ Keep separate grooming kits and keep the travel one packed with everything you'll need. Include all the patent medicines you favor. Nothing is worse than waking up in the middle of the night in a hotel room, needing a missing antacid tablet.

■ Experiment with suitcases. Most luggage stores will give you return privileges on baggage. Take it home, pack it and see just how wrinkled your clothes are the next morning.

■ For women, one Houston woman says, "Take half as many clothes as you think you'll need, and twice as many pantyhose."

■ The conventional wisdom is to always carry your baggage aboard the airplane. You'll generally save from 30 minutes to an hour at each stop awaiting the baggage to arrive from the bowels of the airplane.

■ If you can't get all the clothes you'll need in one bag, carry two smaller ones. That means you can check them if there is time, but can generally talk your way aboard the plane with them if time is short.

■ Make sure the bags will fit in the overhead storage compartment. If you know they will and the gate attendant disagrees, offer to come back and check the bags if they don't fit. Generally, you'll win that way.

■ All airplane seats are not alike. Determine where you like to sit on each type of aircraft you fly, and make a note. Then when you, your secretary or travel agent makes a reservation, ask for that seat.

■ One plus for plane travel — you'll have more uninterrupted time there than you'll probably have at home or office. Use it to catch up on some work or just read a book.

■ It's sometimes difficult to turn off the conversation from a seatmate. When you get on the airplane, dive into your work or book as an immediate stopper. Answer questions in monosyllables.

■ Non-stop flights are less hassle. Remember the airline terminology. A through flight is not non-stop. It just means you don't change planes.

■ If you have to change planes, add up the cost-benefit ratios of how much time you should allow for connections. With the lateness of many planes today, determine the cost to your peace of mind from sitting for an extra hour or so in a crowded, noisy terminal vs. the financial cost of missing your flight and appointment.

■ If you travel regularly, investigate joining one of the airline clubs. The waiting is easier there.

■ If at all possible, don't arrive at your destination after 10 p.m. In smaller cities, taxis may be hard to find, and that item you forgot and desperately need is not available because the shops — even the ones at the airport — are closed.

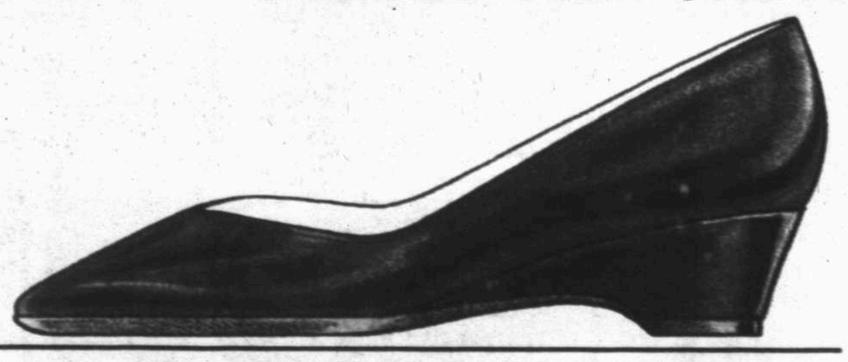

■ Consider using hotels with a "club floor" or similar convenience. Usually they're staffed with concierges during business hours. If you're moving about the city, they can take messages and help you keep up with your schedule.

■ Don't give people the opportunity to mess up. That means confine your haircuts to home, and don't send out your laundry at the hotel. Unless you're staying in a top class hotel, consider carrying a small travel iron.

DEAR ABBY

'America the Beautiful' a promise unfulfilled

By ABIGAIL VAN BUREN

Van Buren

DEAR ABBY: I want to express my opinion on the big controversy about whether we should keep "The Star-Spangled Banner" as our national anthem, or change it to "America the Beautiful."

When I hear "The Star-Spangled Banner," I get all choked up and feel a great pride in our country. It reminds me of the struggle our forefathers had to gain freedom, and keep it.

All I feel when I hear "America the Beautiful" is a sense of disappointment because our country doesn't match the words.

When I hear "amber waves of grain" and "the fruited plains," all I see are farmers going bankrupt and more and more of our property being sold to foreign investors.

Our "spacious skies" are so polluted already, they pose health risks. Our "purple mountains" may still be majestic, but how long will they remain that way with logging and mining and encroaching civilization bringing more pollution?

And "crowning our good with brotherhood"? With all the violence, crime and racial inequality, it seems hypocritical. Also, all the offshore drilling and spills, as well as dumping sewage into our lakes and oceans, make "from sea to shining sea" ridiculous.

Abby, even though "The Star-Spangled Banner" may be more difficult to sing, we should not consider changing it to "America the Beautiful" until we clean up our act and live up to the words of the song. — DON'T USE MY NAME

DEAR DON'T: One of our most cherished rights is freedom of speech. Your points are well taken. Readers?

DEAR ABBY: After all the discussion in regards to the Hogg family of Texas, I couldn't resist sending you the enclosed item from The Cheyenne (Okla.) Star. Here's the headline: "Hogg and Hamm Exchange Marriage Vows."

Yes, Susan Kay Hogg married Russel G. Hamm on Aug. 12 at the First Baptist Church in Leedy, Okla.

This reminds me of something that happened out in western Oklahoma where I grew up. A young fellow named Corn married a girl named Cobb. A year later, they had a baby boy, whom they properly named "Nubbin."

When the mother brought the baby home from the hospital, she placed him in a crib, and all the neighbors gathered 'round and said, "Aw, shucks!" — DALE CANNON, TEMPE, ARIZ.

DEAR DALE: You have outpunned me. However, with regard to the Hogg-Hamm marriage: I'm sure it was legal, but it could not have been kosher.

DEAR ABBY: Please hurry your answer, as the time for my mother-in-law's visit is drawing near. She is by nature a very "curious" person ("nosy" would be a better word), so what should I say when I catch her going through the drawers in my bedroom?

The last time this happened, her excuse was, "I want to know what you need for Christmas." — RESENTFUL

DEAR RESENTFUL: When your mother-in-law arrives, give her a list of "what you need for Christmas," and respectfully ask her to please stay out of your drawers.

DEAR ABBY: I am a widow (age 70) living alone in a remote part of Florida. I recently made a trip to Germany, my native country, after many years. Naturally, I visited relatives and friends. I stayed one week with a close girlhood friend — the mother of three grown children. She was very good to me and knows that she is welcome here at any time.

Well, she has written to tell me that her 25-year-old unmarried son, whom I met for just a few minutes, is coming to America to stay for several months. She informed me that she had given him my address and phone number, and I should "expect" him.

Abby, I know that he was well-raised, but I am old-fashioned and the thought of having this young man as a guest for several months is not pleasing to me.

What shall I do? — OLD-FASHIONED

DEAR OLD-FASHIONED: I think you should write to this "close girlhood friend" and tell her quite honestly what you have told me, that you would not be comfortable having her son stay with you for several months. Offer to put him up for a week until he can make other arrangements.

DEAR ABBY: I have a beautiful 1-year-old son. His father ("Boyd") and I were high school sweethearts — but never married. We broke up after Greg was born. Boyd went into the Army right after he finished high school.

I have met a wonderful man ("Chuck") and we plan to marry soon. I gave Greg his father's last name because I thought it was the right thing to do. Although Boyd pays child support, he never calls or sends his son a card at Christmastime or his birthday. The boy does not even know this man.

Chuck is crazy about Greg and wants more than anything in the world to adopt him. Boyd says, "No way — he is my son."

Abby, how can a man be so cruel and mean? He wants nothing to do with his son, but doesn't want another man to have anything to do with him either. I need your advice. — CALIFORNIA QUESTION

DEAR CALIFORNIA Q.: The state of California will very likely grant adoption under these circumstances after you and Chuck are married. So go ahead with what I hope will be a happy life. If Boyd resists the petition for adoption, you are fairly safe in assuming that his objections will be overruled. Please see an attorney, and let him or her handle it.

Abby's favorite family recipes are included in her new cookbooklet! For your copy, send your name and address, clearly printed, plus check or money order for $3.50 ($4 in Canada) to: Abby's Cookbooklet, P.O. Box 447, Mount Morris, Ill. 61054. Postage and handling are included.

NATURAL GAS

Mauro touts natural gas vehicles

Land Commissioner says Canada far ahead of U.S.

By JOHN PAUL PITTS
Business/Oil Editor

If George Bush and Michael Dukakis want to get serious about solving the nation's energy and environmental problems they might take a lead from Canada, which is using compressed natural gas (CNG) as a transportation fuel, says Texas General Land Commissioner Garry Mauro.

One of the state's most vocal supporters of CNG, Mauro and a contingent of representatives from the Texas Department of Highways and Transportation, Fort Worth Transit Authority, Entex and Lone Star Gas journeyed to Vancouver earlier this month to gain first hand knowledge of the B.C. Hydro natural gas for vehicles program.

"What we saw," said Mauro, "was a multi-fuel system that works. In Vancouver you can pull into a Shell station and buy compress natural gas, propane, diesel or gasoline — all in less than three minues."

He said compressed natural gas is the ideal fuel of choice for reducing air pollution in America. "Tests on converted natural gas vehicles have shown reductions of 50 percent on carbon monoxide, 40 percent on exhaust hydrocarbons and 100 percent on evaporative hydrocarbons," said Mauro.

Mauro says Canada's use of natural gas as a transportation fuel is not a mature industry, but far in advance of the U.S. "Canada is at the adolescent level of development, while the U.S. is still at the new born stage. Canadians are burning CNG in fleets of taxicabs, newspapers delivery vans, courier service cars and trucks and municipal road vehicles," explained Mauro.

According to Mauro, two things — profits and federal tax credits for CNG conversions — have spawned the rapid advance of the CNG industry. "Those in the CNG are making money, and that has helped advance the industry." He said Canadians viewed CNG as just another product and another profit center. "One petroleum distributor told me that he was in the real estate business and he didn't care what product he sold just as long as he sold lots of it," Mauro said.

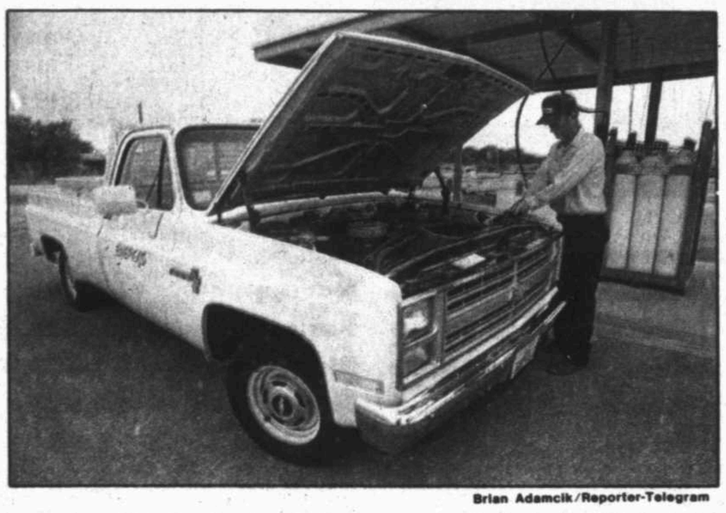

To encourage vehicle owners to convert to CNG, the Canadian government gives a $600 tax credit, which covers about 50 percent of the conversion cost. But the real savings, says Mauro, comes in the fuel cost and maintenance cost. "Canadian fleet operators using CNG save about 30 percent on fuel cost and 50 percent on maintenance by using the clean-burning fuel," he noted.

The General Land Office, which oversees 16,000 oil and gas wells on state lands has been a strong supporter of CNG for the past 18 months. Mauro sees the use of natural gas as transportation fuel as a method for turning the Texas economy around.

"It is just common sense to promote the use of an abundant, clean-burning transportation fuel...It doesn't make sense that Texans must go to Vancouver to see how it is best implemented," he said.

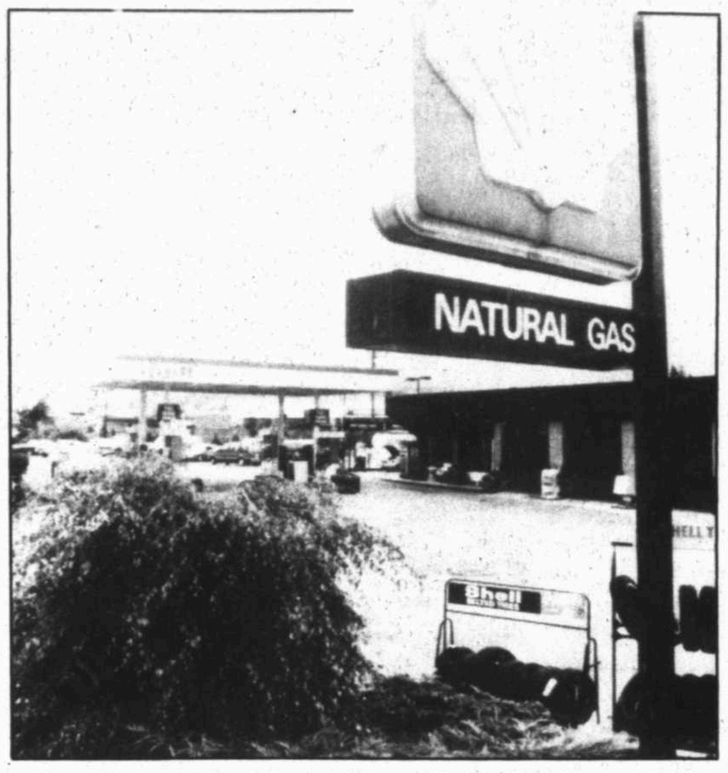

Mauro says there is no need for Texas to be left behind, saying that the Canadian experience represented economic opportunity for all of Texas. He said new markets for CNG would mean new jobs for Texans.

Canadian service stations such as this Shell station can fuel a natural gas vehicle in three minutes. Diesel, propane and gasoline give customers four fuel options.

Ford, Nissan blaze trail to minivans

By JOHN HOLUSHA
New York Times News Service

In announcing last week that they would jointly produce and sell a new mini-van in the United States, the Ford Motor Co. and Nissan Motor Co. were trying to solve a common problem: how to introduce a new model without all the expense of developing it on their own.

Both companies wanted to get into the market for car-like, front-wheel-drive mini-vans — a market that is expected to grow to one million units a year by 1992. But neither had any reasonable expectation of selling the 250,000 vehicles a year that would be needed to justify the costs of designing an all-new van and equipping a factory to produce it.

By combining forces, however, they expect the project to create profits if each sells 60,000 to 70,000 vehicles a year. The Ford-Nissan deal, an indication of the new flexibility of the domestic auto industry, is unlikely to be the last of its kind.

The auto rivals were able to work out a mini-van deal because each had something to contribute.

Nissan, which already has a mini-van well along in the design process, will do most of the design and engineering work. Ford, which now produces full-size vans at Avon Lake, Ohio, will provide the production site by expanding that plant to make the smaller vehicle.

Expanding an existing plant requires much less time and money than building a completely new factory.

Analysts estimate that the deal will save Ford as much as $1 billion in engineering and development costs, while Nissan will obtain access to Ford's supplier base in this country for as much as 75 percent of the content of the vehicle.

The previous Japanese strategy — simply assembling components in this country that were shipped from factories in Japan — became uneconomical with the rise in the value of the yen.

"The truck market is becoming a niche market, just like the car market before it," commented Maryann N. Keller, an analyst with Furman Selz Mager Dietz & Birney.

BancHome's downtown branch manager Lynn Clark shows off the building's plaque commemorating its position as the location of Midland's first financial institution.

BancHome branch moves 'back to the future'

By ALLEN E. HOWLAND
Assistant Business/Oil Editor

For the first time since 1959, the sounds of change jingling in tellers' drawers and the soft rustle of cash being counted are once again resounding through Midland's oldest banking establishment.

Since the First National Bank of Midland was founded in 1890 on the southeast corner of Wall and Main, the building and the city have been through their share of changes. After First National moved to his current location in 1959, its former site was converted to office usage until recently.

As owner of the historic Oil & Gas Building which stands on the site, BancHome Savings Association earlier this year undertook an extensive modernization and facelift on the building and moved their downtown branch into the freshly renovated space in April.

It seems appropriate that BancHome's energy lending operations moved to the building, where many of Midland's first energy deals were struck, said BancHome marketing manager Larry Hellums.

"That's why we used a 'back to the future' theme because we've moved back to where much of Midland's future was financed."

Only a small portion of the current lobby area was encompassed by the original building, and little of the native marble flooring and pillars are visible in the current configuration.

The current structure, with its Art Deco exterior touches, was rebuilt and added on to after two fires in the bank building's first 25 years.

Firms seek ways to limit burden of growing retiree benefit costs

By GLENN KRAMON
New York Times News Service

A growing number of companies, anticipating that rapid growth in medical costs will continue, are seriously considering ways to limit their obligations for retired workers' health costs, benefits consultants say.

While few employers have actually taken steps to cap their liability, many may do so soon partly because they fear the government will try to shift more costs to them and partly because of new national accounting standards that will force companies to recognize on their balance sheets more of their retiree medical obligations.

For some companies, this accounting change could reduce net income by a staggering 25 percent or more, some consultants say.

"In the next year I would expect to see most medium-size to large companies tighten up their retirement medical plans significantly," said Robert A. Moreen, senior vice president in Philadelphia for Hay-Huggins, a benefits consulting firm.

For the employer, the annual saving could be millions or even tens of millions of dollars.

For some retirees, the extra expense could be hundreds or thousands of dollars a year.

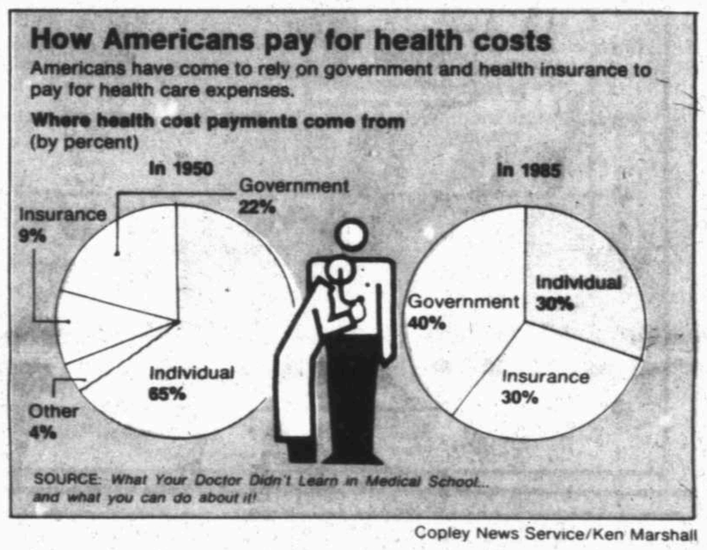

The changes could be even more painful if medical bills continue to rise.

And they could particularly affect employees who retire before Medicare coverage kicks in at age 65 or who did not begin working for the company until mid-career.

This prospect troubles groups like the American Association of Retired Persons, which says that one in six retirees over 65 and one in four of all retirees currently has some sort of employer health benefit.

The association is calling for tax incentives to encourage employers to set aside money for retirees' medical benefits and for vesting standards to assure that employees are guaranteed the benefits even if they leave the company before they retire.

Most large companies still pick up all or almost all of retirees' medical expenses that Medicare does not, no matter what the price, and they will not publicly acknowledge formulating any plans to limit their liability.

Copley News Service/Ken Marshall

But benefits consultants in New York, Philadelphia, Cleveland, San Francisco and Washington say they have been working with companies that have been studying such changes.

Among the actions being considered by many employers is paying a smaller part of the medical premium for early or shorter-service retirees.

For example, the employer would contribute only half as much for someone who spent 10 years at the company as for a 20-year employee.

The annual cost of a medical insurance plan for a retired person and spouse typically ranges from $2,800 to $4,000 for a retiree under 65 and $1,200 to $2,000 for one over 65 who has help from Medicare, said Steven J. Ferruggia, director of group actuarial practice at Buck Consultants in Secaucus, N.J.

Many employers now paying the entire amount may soon ask shorter-service employees to pay half, he said.

Medicare covers more than the employer does for retirees over 65.

Now some companies, deciding they will no longer cover everything that Medicare does not, may introduce or raise premiums, deductibles and co-payments.

As a result, Moreen said, in a typical case a retired person who once would owe nothing on an $8,500 medical bill could soon owe $1,500.

At least two employers with a total of more than 60,000 employees, TRW Inc. and the Pillsbury Co., have made even more dramatic moves to limit their health care liability.

They have decided that instead of guaranteeing a certain level of medical benefits, they will assure only a certain dollar contribution to the premiums paid for a retiree's health plan, just as they do with pensions.

Right now the amount is usually high enough that the retiree owes no premium or at least no extra premium.

But if the cost of medical plans rises sharply in coming years, as most people expect, and if the company does not increase its contribution just as sharply, the retiree will have to pay more.

The TRW plan, which does not affect current retirees, took effect Aug. 1 and will affect 50,000 workers when they retire.

Under the plan, the company's maximum contribution to a health plan premium in the first year would be $160 a month for a retiree not yet eligible for Medicare and $65 for one who is (the amount is doubled if the retired worker has a spouse or dependent).

JOHN PAUL PITTS

Energetic political event lacks energy substance

Pitts

This humble country journalist got his first taste of the big time political campaign trail this week, when I covered the Lloyd Bentsen event in Odessa. It was an eye opener.

As I crossed the overpass by the airport on Highway 191, I spotted the red and blue lights of several police cars ahead. I thought accident at first, but when I passed I saw that they were only blockading the crossover.

There were two more cars at the next crossover, and now I think: bank robbery — roadblock. By the time I passed eight police cars at intersections it dawned on me: Bentsen — security.

I was on my way to the Lloyd Bentsen campaign event in Odessa and I should have known, but somehow I could not imagine such tight security for a man that only months before had walked into the Reporter-Telegram with only a single aide tagging along. How quickly things change.

Security was even tighter at the door of the UTPB Theater Arts Building, where Bentsen was to speak. In almost 20 years of journalism, I have never had to flash a press card, but I was told that would be the routine at this event. I walked to the press entrance and presented my card.

The Secret Service man's eyes popped and his head jerked back in laughter: "What the...what's this?" he exclaimed.

"That's my press card, sir."

We are issued a press card each year by the DPS, and before I left for the interview I hastily looked for mine. I finally found it — folded, spindled and mutilated — in a forgotten part of my desk (where I keep such seldom used things as my AARP card). It had no photo of myself, even though the printing across the top clearly reads: "not valid without photo." But being the quick-thinking journalist I am, I remedied the situation by cutting a picture of myself from my column in the newspaper and taping it to the card.

The man at the door continued to laugh. He shows it to another agent and he laughs. Finally, a lady I didn't know steps forward and rescues me. "I know him. That's Mr. Pitts," she tells the laughing men, and I am waved on.

A short time later, a bus pulls to a quick halt in the parking lot, and a pack of bearded, unkempt people in tennis shoes and Salvation Army clothes stumble out with armloads of equipment, making a frantic rush toward the press entrance.

A lady nearby looks on in fright, and I understand why. Frumpled, bearded and scowling, the uninitiated might easily mistake this group for a band of Middle East terrorists. But I recognized them from the Jessica rescue operations. They were the national TV press corps.

Now I could see why they were laughing at my makeshift press card. This gypsy band of picture-takers may dress like derelicts, but their press cards are strictly first class, very official-looking, multicolored, laminated jobs displayed on chains around their neck. Some had several cards on several chains. Very impressive!

I had done a one-on-one with Pat Robertson when he was a candidate for president, but this was my first encounter with a presidential campaign event.

I keep saying event, because that's what this was — a carefully staged political event, totally void of spontaneity and for the most part void of news value.

Somebody had told me it was supposed to be a Donahue-type confrontation in which a moderator would run around with a cordless microphone and members of the audience would put hard-hitting questions to Bentsen. About as close as it got to that scenario was the lady running around with a microphone.

The audience was solidly Democratic. In fact only the most ardent and supportive Democrats were present at this by-invitation-only event. They cheered everything Bentsen spoke out for, and cheered twice as loud when he spoke out against Reagan or Bush. And the cameras rolled.

Before the question and answer series got underway, I spotted a Democrat I knew in the audience (actually I know three). I called her to the side and asked her if she would question Bentsen for me.

I pleaded: "Ask him how he can reconcile Dukakis' deplorable record on energy issues. If Dukakis has

Basin rig count continues upward

From Staff Reports

The number of rigs working in the Permian Basin rose a second week, according to Baker Hughes Inc. of Houston. The tally rose three to stand at 105.

At the same time, the U.S. rig count fell 17 as drilling activity was partially interrupted by Hurricane Gilbert, the company said.

Lea County, N.M. was the most active county in the Permian Basin this week, gaining four rigs to stand at 14. Andrews County and Eddy County, N.M. were second with 11 rigs.

Reagan, Cochran, and Dickens Counties in Texas and Roosevelt County in New Mexico saw renewed activity as each gained a rig this week.

Irion, Loving and Scurry Counties each lost all active rigs this week.

Among major oil producing states, Louisiana had 11 fewer working rigs, followed by Texas, 10; Wyoming, four; Oklahoma, three; and Kansas, which declined by one.

North Dakota and Pennsylvania both increased by four working rigs, while Ohio gained three and Colorado, California and New Mexico added two apiece. Michigan gained one.

Although Texas declines primarily were reported along the coast, Baker Hughes economist Ike Kerridge said Louisiana's were scattered throughout the state.

Hurricane interrupts Gulf drilling

HOUSTON (AP) — The number of working oil and gas rigs showed the biggest single-week decline since mid-July, dropping by 17 to total 921 as production was partially interrupted by preparations for Hurricane Gilbert, Baker Hughes Inc. reports.

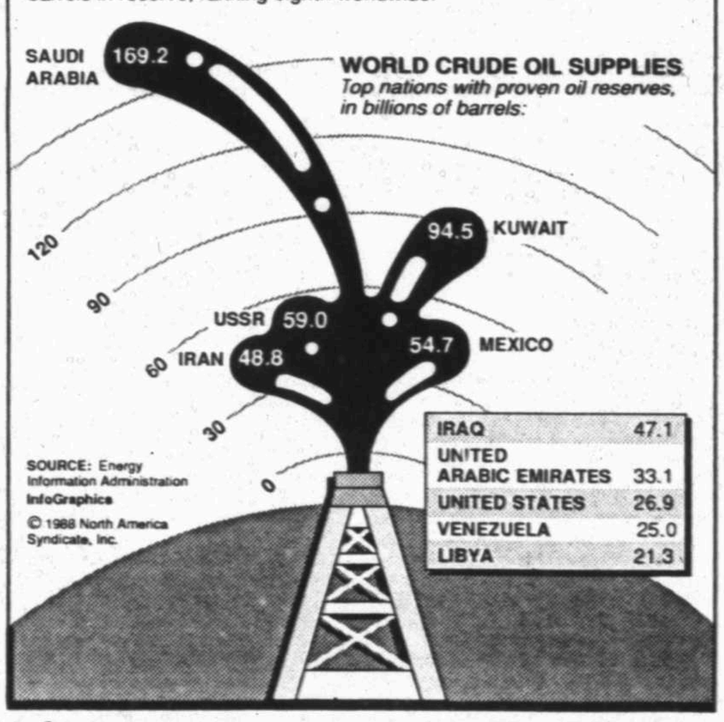

It was the lowest level reported since the count reached 894 on Aug. 1, Baker Hughes economist Ike Kerridge said.

The dip in the number of working Texas rigs centered in the state's Gulf Coast region, signaling that weather played a factor in the lower numbers, Kerridge said. The count probably would have plunged still lower if a more accurate method were available for recording offshore rig evacuations, he added.

"The offshore count really does not reflect the shortened rig count in the gulf due to Hurricane Gilbert," Kerridge said. "Our feeling, from what we have heard, is that most of the rigs in the gulf were shut down at least a few days."

World crude oil reserves

With 169.2 billion barrels in proven reserves, Saudi Arabia leads the world in crude oil supplies. By comparison, the U.S. has 26.9 billion barrels in reserve, ranking eighth worldwide.

TRC levies $10,200 in penalties

AUSTIN — The Railroad Commission assessed a total of $10,200 in administrative penalties to four oil and gas operators for problems under Commission well plugging rules.

Nalco Energy, Ltd., Comanche, was penalized a total of $6,000 for one inactive and unplugged well each on the company's Boss Northcutt and J.A. Scott "A" leases in Comanche County. Commission records indicate the well on the Nurthcutt lease became inactive in April 1980 and the other well became inactive in November 1981.

Plexus Petroleum Co. of Snyder received a $3,000 penalty for an inactive and unplugged well on the J.R. Lemley lease in Borden County. The well has been inactive and unplugged for almost six years.

Two other companies agreed to pay penalties without admitting any violation of Commission rules. Source Petroleum, Inc. of San Antonio agreed to a $500 penalty for an inactive well on the Paul Kleinschmidt lease in Guadalupe County. Oil and Gas Investments Inc. of Houston agreed to a $700 penalty for seven inactive wells on the Lee Luscher lease in Fort Bend County.

To date in 1988 the Commission has levied more than $739,000 in pollution and well plugging penalties.

State lease sale brings New Mexico $800,000

SANTA FE, N.M. (AP) — The New Mexico Land Office has received bonuses of $800,142.77 from sale of oil and gas leases on state trust lands.

New Mexico Land Commissioner W.R. Humphries said Thursday 59 leases totaling 20,101 acres located in known production areas were bid on at Tuesday's sale.

The top bonus was $109,000 paid by Union Oil Co. of California for a 360-acre tract 20 miles northeast of Loving in Eddy County. The offer was made in a sealed bid.

The highest bid during the oral auction was made by Yates Petroleum Corp. of Artesia, which paid $38,000 for a 640-acre tract 11 miles northeast of Caprock in Lea County.

The land office retains 20 percent of the proceeds from the oil and gas lease sales to meet operational costs and distributes 80 percent to the public beneficiaries of the trust lands.

Royalties paid to the state on oil and gas production from the trust lands go to the state permanent fund. Income from investment of the permanent fund, which now totals about $2.7 billion, is distributed to the beneficiaries.

Bolyard Oil diversifies into financial services

DALLAS (SWN) — Bolyard Oil & Gas, Ltd., a public company quoted on NASDAQ has announced its acquisition of acquired Stock Transfer Company of America, Inc., a Dallas based transfer agent and registrar for publicly held companies.

The acquistion was made for eight million newly issued shares of Bolyard with an agreed to value of $0.0625 per share. In addition, the company's offices are being relocated to Dallas and Danny Wetreich, president of Stock Transfer Co. of America, Inc. has also been appointed president of Bolyard Oil & Gas, Ltd.

"This transaction represents a diversification by Bolyard into the financial services field," said Wetreich, "and we shall be looking for other acquisition opportunities while developing our interests in oil and gas."

Stock Transfer Co. of America provides stock transfer services in full compliance with reporting requirements and turnaround time, and a wide variety of services in addition to transfer agency, such as proxy mailing and tabulation, providing Inspectors of Election at shareholders meetings, report and notice mailings to shareholders, cash or stock dividend disbursement services, and custom designed management reporting information.

Top oil and gas companies fared better in 1987

TULSA, Okla. (AP) — A five-year decline in profits for oil and gas companies apparently was reversed in fiscal 1987 as the top 400 public oil and gas companies in the United States showed improvements over the previous 12-month period, the Oil and Gas Journal reported.

Companies with refining or petrochemical operations fared better than those that depended only on revenues from oil and gas production, the weekly petroleum business magazine reported.

The magazine also reported that a recovery expected in drilling and development activity in 1988 has not occurred, but the Journal said its analysts believe a modest recovery in revenues and profits from those operations has only been postponed.

Crude prices remain below 1987 levels and in the United States an oversupply of natural gas also has kept those prices down, the Journal said.

Low crude prices and strong product demand will combine to give refiners and petrochemical manufacturers healthy profit margins in 1988, the Journal predicted.

Total assets of the top oil and gas companies gained marginally over the 1986 fiscal year, reaching $501 billion, the Journal said. Total revenue for the 400 companies in the survey increased 5.6 percent, reaching $446 billion.

Both total revenue and net income reversed a five-year decline in fiscal 1987. The group's return on assets, on revenue and on equity all improved during the period but all remained at depressed levels, the Journal said.

Shrimpers treading rough waters

GALVESTON, Texas (AP) — On a recent Friday morning, Sam Arcidiacono started the motor of his 36-foot shrimp boat and dropped the mooring lines at 6 a.m., just as he's done for nearly four decades.

After three hours on the bay, he returned to the docks with the day's catch — $36 worth.

Unlike the old days, the 55-year-old shrimper is finding it increasingly difficult to make a living at the only business he's ever known.

It's not exactly the good life that Arcidiacono pictured when he paid $23,000 for the Lina Maria, named after his two daughters, in 1963. Its aging motor gulps down about $6 an hour in fuel and a quarter of his daily earnings go to his one deckhand. So, after expenses, the day's catch netted him about $10.

"A couple of years ago, when there was shrimp, these boats would sell for $50,000," he said. "Today, maybe they sell for $20,000, $30,000."

The problem is clear, but Arcidiacono isn't so sure about the cause.

"We've got funny laws," he said, referring to the restrictions that designate legal shrimping areas. Pointing to a buoy 100 yards away, Arcidiacono said: "If I go past that line, they can stop me and give me a $200 or $300 fine. Like I'm stealing.

"This is my business and I'm just barely making a living."

Arcidiacono isn't alone in his complaints. Shrimpers all over Galveston Bay were bemoaning the problem most of the morning.

"We're just boat-riding out here," one said.

Arcidiacono is hoping legislators will offer help to the industry before it's too late.

"We work just like a farmer," he said. "Trouble is when a farmer has a bad year the government pays. Why don't they pay us?"

Frog legs have businessman hopping

JACKSON, Miss. (AP) — A businessman is leaping to fill the gap created by dropping supplies of bullfrogs, whose legs are consumed as a crispy delicacy in the South.

Bruce Maghan was almost hopping in anticipation of an experimental program to raise the big, hopping amphibians.

"It's not really even off the ground yet. But we're pretty excited," the owner of Stillashak Institutional Sea Products said in a telephone interview from Pascagoula on the Gulf Coast.

"If you look what has been done in this state for the shrimp, oyster, striped bass and redfish industries, there's no reason it can't be done for frog legs," Maghan said.

Maghan said that three years ago he was paying $2.15 to $2.20 a pound for frog legs. The price is now about $4.06 per pound.

"I have been quoted as much as $5 to $5.10. That goes to show you that the market is way up. Three years ago, I was getting about six to eight pair of legs to the pound. Now, its about four to six pairs per pound.

"But we are also looking at the remnants of supplies, and those are depleting fast," he said.

Maghan said in 1986-87, more than 8.6 million pounds of frog legs came into the United States from India and Bangladesh. He said the market could be as much as 10 million pounds.

But India and Bangladesh have put a five-year moratorium on such exports, he said.

"They (the bullfrogs) are wild over there and they have taken so many of them that the insect problem has increased, so they aren't shipping any more.

"But I believe there is no reason why Florida, Georgia, Alabama, Louisiana and Mississippi can't raise all the frogs we need," he said.

Maghan said the adult frogs eat insects, but he's trying to come up with a feed that will increase their size and growth.

He plans to start with tadpoles and raise them all the way to adults.

"It is a long process," Maghan said. "It is not something we expect to do overnight. We expect to raise the critters in a pond, but everything else is still up in the air."

Changes enlivening accounting profession

By ELIZABETH M. FOWLER
New York Times News Service

To outsiders, accounting appears to be a quiet profession, seldom changing. But not these days.

A yeasty mixture for change faces the profession. For one thing, the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants, with 268,000 members, is imposing stricter auditing standards, starting Jan. 1.

This means more emphasis on job training, along with higher charges to clients. The institute is also planning stiffer educational requirements.

Then there is the issue of salaries, which were raised sharply amid fanfare a year ago by Price Waterhouse, a large public accounting firm. A number of other firms have followed.

The job outlook in accounting remains good, the government says.

The rules were changed, the institute says, partly as a response to concerns that "civil liability suits and revelations of fraudulent financial reporting have prompted questions about the integrity of financial reporting systems."

A booklet explaining the new standards has been issued by Laventhol & Horwath, a major accounting firm. Some firms are already using them.

According to the booklet, the standard accountants' letter in annual reports will be at least three paragraphs long (formerly it was two) and longer if the auditors are concerned about particular issues.

Also it will tell readers that the audit was done to provide "reasonable assurance" that the financial records are "free of material misstatement." That change is taken to mean that accountants are to ferret out fraud actively rather than simply report any they happen to run across.

It is hoped that the statements will be read by more stockholders, especially those who used to consider them too technical to be helpful.

Laventhol & Horwath's national director for auditing, Abraham D. Akresh, said the goal was to get opinions "into understandable English."

The booklet points out that the new rules will "increase the likelihood of detection of material errors and illegal acts" through deeper investigation by auditors into corporate figures.

The hope is that this will bring earlier warnings of possible business failures, but the booklet cautions that "there is still no assurance that the auditor will detect all irregularities, since some types like forgery or collusion might elude detection."

Akresh said, "We need more broad-based accountants." Since auditors will have to do more work to produce an annual report, he said, the costs to clients are expected to rise.

In education, the institute wants states to raise their requirements for accountants. By the year 2000 those who want to join the institute must have 150 semester hours of education, or a year more than the average 120 hours needed for a bachelor's degree.

The institute emphasized that it wants accountants with a broad background in liberal arts, including written and oral communication, history, economics and mathematics.

A year ago Price Waterhouse announced a much higher salary level for beginners and for those at all other levels as well.

Arthur Siegel, the firm's vice chairman of accounting and auditing services, has said, "Results have been very encouraging, and our statistics show lower turnover at all levels."

He said the new accounting standards would not have much impact on Price Waterhouse because they represent "articulation of some things that we already do."

Job opportunities in the field appear good, according to the Labor Department's Occupational Outlook Quarterly.

It noted recently that among 1984 college graduates "accounting and nursing had the lowest percentage of graduates not in the labor force" a year later. It said that 95 percent of accountants were employed while an additional 2 percent were back in school, possibly earning advanced degrees in law or business.

In recent years, more than 35 percent of new holders of bachelor's degrees in accounting joined public accounting firms. So did more than 50 percent of master's' degree holders.

Others hold accounting jobs in companies, government or hospitals or on temporary assignment. Since firms now offer more services, many accountants have become specialists in taxation, management consulting and international accounting.

The institute recently reversed a long-held position by allowing its members to sell securities, insurance and other financial services.

In the future, said Source Finance, a recruiting firm, accounting jobs are "expected to grow much faster than the average for all occupations, at least through the mid-1990s."

Liquidating could mean significant tax savings

By JAN M. ROSEN
New York Times News Service

NEW YORK — Owners of certain closely held corporations may achieve significant tax savings if they liquidate and distribute their companies' assets to shareholders or make other basic changes in their companies' structure before the end of the year.

Jerry Joszef, tax manager for Laventhol & Horwath in New York, calls this perhaps the single most important tax-planning consideration of 1988 for owners of small businesses.

Under current law, if a corporation liquidates and distributes its assets, both the corporation and its shareholders may be subject to tax on any gain realized. But qualified corporations with a value of $5 million or less will escape double taxation if they are liquidated before the end of this year, because of the transitional rules in the Tax Reform Act of 1986, Joszef said.

For companies valued at more than $5 million, the tax savings decrease as the value rises, and there is no benefit for companies worth more than $10 million, the tax expert explained.

Certain gains realized in a liquidiation would not qualify for tax relief, and each business would have to be studied on an individual basis.

"Over the last couple of years, we have been advising a lot of clients either to liquidate and reorganize as a partnership or to convert to 'S corporation' status," Joszef said.

An S corporation is a special corporate status allowed for small businesses under the Internal Revenue Service code. It gives its owners the special legal protections of corporate status. But because profits flow through to the owners, taxation occurs at the lower individual rates instead of at the corporate rate.

Robert Rakshys, tax supervisor for Laventhol & Horwath in New York, gave an example of the tax savings available this year. Suppose that a qualified corporation with a value of less than $5 million went into liquidation before Dec. 31, realizing a $1 million capital gain, and distributed its assets to its shareholders.

Assume that the shareholders also realized $2 million of gain upon receipt of the corporation's assets in liquidation. The corporation would not be subject to tax upon the distribution of its assets in liquidation. Only the shareholders owners would pay taxes, at the individual tax rate of 28 percent, or a total of $560,000.

But suppose the corporation waited until next year. In 1989, a corporate tax of 34 percent would be due, or $340,000. The owners would thus realize a gain of $1,660,000, rather than $2 million, and would have to pay tax at the 28 percent marginal rate on that gain, amounting to $464,800, bringing the total tax bill to $804,800. Thus, acting this year would result in tax savings of $244,800.

For companies that would face very high tax costs from a regular liquidation and that cannot qualify as an S corporation, there is another option under Section 333 of the IRS Code. This allows for a one-calendar-month liquidation, after which the business can operate as a partnership.

Converting to S corporation status is also an important tax-planning consideration for some corporations, Joszef said.

Texan torpedoes play prominent role in Tucker

By STEVE SMITH
Dallas Times Herald

PORT LAVACA, Texas (AP) — In a dusty, cluttered Quonset hut garage outside this nondescript Gulf Coast town is a dull maroon car lying in pieces, waiting to be reassembled into what may be this year's most important car. But Curtis Foester is no hurry; cars are no fun if you hurry with them, no matter how much they're worth.

Foester will restore his prize — the last Tucker ever built, and one featured prominently in the big-budget film, "Tucker: The Man and His Dream," when he gets around to it. Your hobby, says Foester, should never be confused with your business.

And truth should never be confused with fiction. The film about Preston Tucker, a legitimate, tragic automotive visionary if there ever was one, is interesting, at times even exciting. But it may be the first film biography in recent memory that makes the title character out to be less interesting than he was in real life.

Tucker, played by Jeff Bridges in the film, was a brash, feverish young entrepreneur who, 40 years ago, dared to challenge the "Big Three" — General Motors, Chrysler and Ford — by building his own luxury car and selling it for $2,600, $400 less than a comparable Cadillac.

In describing the car, Tucker punctuated only with exclamation points: It would be all-new, like nothing this country had ever seen! But within two years of the car's 1947 introduction, Tucker's company — indeed, his whole world — collapsed around him.

A combination of bad publicity resulting from an investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission, political pressure by elected officials whose constituents were anxious to see Tucker fail, and a chronic lack of working capital sank the Tucker Torpedo before it ever had a chance.

Foester, a fifth-generation resident of the Port Lavaca area, owns two Tuckers, both of which "Tucker" director Francis Ford Coppola rented (for $2,500 apiece) to star in the movie. One car is now undergoing restoration in Port Lavaca, the other is on display at the Central Texas Museum of Automotive History in Rosanky, east of San Marcos, because "it's gotten too valuable to drive," Foester says.

IN THE FILM, look for the car that drives onto the race track for a test session; that's Foester's museum piece, Tucker No. 5, the fifth one built. And look for the scene where the factory workers celebrate the construction of their 50th (and last) car. It's the real No. 50. Foester tacked it together long enough to let Coppola use it for the movie, but now it's all over his garage.

Foester was a teen-ager in 1947, when he traveled with his father to Houston to see the Tucker display. "Tomorrow's Car Today," the ad campaign said, and it was true.

"We could hear the 'ooh-ing' and 'ah-ing' before we even saw the car," Foester says. "There was no question people were ready to buy, the question was just when the car would be available. Every other new car then was just a warmed-over 1942 model."

Automotive development had virtually stopped during World War II, he explains, "and the Tucker was the first all-new car available."

Tucker had become moderately wealthy during World War II by selling plastic machine-gun turrets to the Air Force. In 1946, he approached the War Assets Administration, which was charged with deciding who got the huge plants appropriated to build war supplies, seeking an enormous 480-acre plant outside Chicago in which Dodge has built engines for bomber airplanes. The problem was, everybody else wanted it, too.

Incredibly, Tucker got the nod, but the financial promises he made to get it were the first in a series of big-time debts he was gathering. By 1949, he had been indicted by the Securities and Exchange Commission for mail fraud and for SEC violations pertaining to a stock issue. Though Tucker was cleared on Jan. 22, 1950, the damage to his credibility was irreparable.

None of this made much difference to the young Foester, or to his enchantment with the car. Periodically, he would see one on the road; he recalls driving his father's meat truck through Edna one afternoon in 1950 and seeing a sign on a Tucker parked by the road. The car was a prize in a VFW raffle. Foester bought a (losing) ticket.

As he grew older and his finances improved, he began buying and selling a series of cars, always keeping his eyes open for a Tucker. He located one at a used-car lot — it was the same car given away at the raffle in Edna 14 years before — but the car was literally in pieces, and Foester balked at buying it.

YEARS PASSED. Eventually, in 1969, Foester figured it was time to find a Tucker. "I wrote letters to every private Tucker owner — 23 of them — and 18 responded. Eight were for sale, or at least the owners were willing to attach a price tag to them. There were only four in my price range, which was about $3,500," Foester says.

Many of the original Tucker autos which could be located were included in Tucker: The Man and His Dream, lending an air of added authenticity to Francis Ford Coppola's movie.

One optimistic owner priced his Tucker at $50,000, "which I took to mean he really didn't want to sell it."

Foester ended up buying Tucker No. 5. It had been a test car for the Franklin company, the firm that supplied the World War II surplus six-cylinder helicopter engines that Tucker adapted to power his cars. Once, on the way back from the Franklin plant, Tucker instructed his driver to go though New York and give radio and newspaper personality Drew Pearson a ride. Pearson had openly suggested that Tucker was incapable of building a working production car. That perception evidently changed when he rode in Torpedo No. 5.

"He was, I understand, quite impressed," Foester says.

A few years ago, Foester bought another, even more historic Torpedo: No. 50, the last Tucker built. It is undergoing a painfully slow restoration in the garage on Foester's ranch.

Completely restored, a Tucker Torpedo might have been worth $100,000 before the movie's release. Now, who knows? There were only 51 of them built — one that was a pieced-together, hand-built prototype that Tucker nicknamed the "Tin Goose," and 50 that were constructed on the assembly line. Forty-six remain.

What Tucker accomplished in a limited time, on an even more limited budget, is remarkable. His car was most certainly not, as the SEC called it, "an engineering monstrosity."

He did make a few miscalculations, though Tucker was convinced that rear-engine cars were the wave of the future, reasoning that the weight over the wheels that the engine is powering would improve traction.

THIS IS CORRECT, although modern-day car builders have adapted the concept to front-wheel-drive cars, which lack the tendency toward unpredictable handling associated with cars heavily weighted in the rear. By all accounts, the Tucker Torpedo was a handful on wet pavement, or when trying to turn sharp corners at high speeds.

Rear-engine, rear-wheel-drive cars can be successful: The Volkswagen Beetle proved economical and effective, and Porsche proved the design could be downright fast. But to date, no one has been able to construct a big rear-engine, rear-wheel-drive car any better than the one built by Tucker and his designer, Alex Tremulis.

One of the most respected automotive designers in history, Tremulis, who had designed Cords, Duesenbergs and Auburns and later designed Ford Thunderbirds, managed to incorporate most all of Tucker's strange ideas into a big, low-slung, flashy body that looks sharp even today.

Seat belts, disc brakes, padded dashboards and a host of other innovations we now take for granted were incorporated into the Torpedo. More, such as fuel injection and a radical new transmission, were planned. It was possible to remove and replace the entire engine in less than a half-hour.

A large center headlight that turned in the direction the car was turning, intended to light the way before the car itself changed course, was not one of the subsequently copied options. "About as effective as shining a flashlight into a bucket of water," Foester says.

As the end drew near for Tucker's company, Tucker staged a typically grandiose event to prove his cars' road ability once and for all that, inadvertently, proved some of the car's safety innovations.

He sent seven Torpedoes to the Indianapolis Motor Speedway, along with a crew of test drivers headed by a loyal, talented engineer named Eddie Offutt. The cars circled the track for thousands of miles, 24 hours a day, with drivers working in shifts.

Offutt was driving early one morning, near dawn. Some say he fell asleep. Others — including Offutt — say the right rear tire, a then-revolutionary tubeless design, blew out. At nearly 100 mph, the Torpedo rolled over at last three times, maybe more, and landed on its wheels.

Offutt suffered only a bruised knee. The flat tire was replaced. The car was started and driven away. All the safety innovations, including a windsheild designed to pop out in a crash, worked.

The whole car worked, or would have if Tucker had been able to sustain production long enough to iron out some wrinkles. And if he'd had access to top-quality materials that only the Big Three seemed capable of acquiring. And if he'd had enough money.

IN RETROSPECT, however, even Tucker's loyal fans, the members of the Tucker Automobile Club of America — of which Foester is past president and a charter member — are skeptical of Tucker's ultimate intentions.

Foester recalls some informal, late-night conversations at some of the early club conventions, long before anyone but this small group cared about Tucker's legacy. "There'd be half a dozen of us in a hotel room talking, maybe Eddie Offutt, Alex Tremulis and Tucker's sons and daughter. They knew what was said in that room wasn't going any further. And we'd ask one of them, 'Was Tucker really trying to build a car, or was he just selling paper?'

"They'd all flare up. 'Hell, no,' they'd say. 'He was trying to build a car, the best one ever.' "

During his trial, one of Tucker's friends saw him at an athletic club. "What went wrong?" the friend asked.

"I tried to build my car too big and too fast," Tucker told him. "And I took the advice of a lot of old men."

Once his company folded, Preston Tucker was never again a force in industry, but it was not for lack of trying. There was a deal working with the Brazilian government to fund the Carioca, a little commuter car that never got off the ground, and there was some sort of negotiations going on in Waco, apparently involving an innovation in oil field equipment. It seemed Tucker was always fighting for money to fund a new pie-in-the-sky.

But Tucker's final battle was for his life. Years of chain smoking unfiltered cigarettes caught up with him, and he developed lung cancer in 1955.

In December 1956, he contracted pneumonia. He died the day after Christmas. His death rated 15 paragraphs and a small photo inside the December 27 edition of the Dallas Times Herald. It began: "Preston Tucker, whose plans to revolutionize auto making raised hopes and heartaches, died in a Ypsilanti, Mich. hospital yesterday. He was 53."

Tucker: Real life as bright as the dream

By PHILIP S. EGAN
New York Times News Service

The December, 1946 issue of the now defunct Science Illustrated magazine carried a dramatic front view of a vehicle with fenders that pivoted with the front wheels and a drawing of an all-hydraulic drive train.

This was the "Tucker" — a new car concept that set the stage for Preston T. Tucker's entrance onto the automotive scene.

Earlier that year The New York Times reported, "The 'Torpedo' Car Is Expected to Make Debut Next Year."

The article was accompanied by a photograph of what appeared to be a very unusual full-sized car — this too was a Tucker, although it was different from the one pictured in Science Illustrated.

In neither article was there a mention of the actual designers of the automobile: George Lawson, in 1946, and Alex S. Tremulis who, in 1947, was the Tucker Corp.'s chief stylist.

Not only was there no mention of the designers, there were not even any cars:

The pictures in Science Illustrated were carefully drawn renderings and the photo given to The New York Times was actually of a one-quarter size clay model photographed against a realistic background.

It was not until March 1947 that Tucker had a factory in which to make his dream automobile.

At the time, the factory was the largest on earth, the former Dodge plant in Chicago, which had made B-29 engines during World War II.

But even at this time, Tucker and his backers did not feel that they had the final design.

According to J. Gordon Lippincott of Lippincott & Margulies, a corporate design and image consulting firm, "Tucker gave me a ring on the phone and said that he wanted to come up and talk to me about styling an automobile — as fast as possible."

Tucker and Lippincott agreed on terms and in March 1947, Lippincott dispatched five designers to Chicago — Hal Bergstrom, Tucker Madawick, Budd Steinhilber, Read Viemeister and myself.

Our job was to generate design proposals for the 1948 Tucker in concert with Tremulis.

In two months of concentrated effort, our team raced to build a full-sized clay model alongside another being built by Tremulis and his team.

When our design team first met with Tucker it proved to be a mesmerizing experience as he described his dream car.

A highlight of his presention to us was the engine.

According to Tucker, the engine would be huge and slow turning, capable of "driving a full-sized car at 50 miles per hour at 500 revolutions per minute."

The typical engine of the time turned at nearly 2,000 revolutions per minute at 50 mph.

The meeting lasted for several hours and Tucker spoke without let-up.

He was quietly persuasive and charming and his eloquence was punctuated with malapropisms.

For instance, he called the gas pedal the 'exhilerator' instead of the accelerator.

But Tucker was still faced with a chorus of "nays" about his big engine from the test drivers and engineers who struggled to make the slow turning, technologically backward engine work.

Finally Tucker gave up on his lumbering 500-cubic-inch engine.

A group, which included his son, found a substitute — a helicopter engine made by Aircooled Motors Inc. in Syracuse, N.Y.

The group converted the engine to liquid cooling and fitted it with a gear box from a 1936 Cord automobile.

So much for the dream of a fully hydraulic drive train.

The first 25 of these engines, complete with tooling, cost $5,000 each.

With some creative financing, after Tucker bought Aircooled Motors, the cost was down to $1,500 an engine.

But the price of the engine was still as much as the car was supposed to sell for.

Plans were on the drawing board for a less expensive version of the engine, which was never made.

One of Tucker's very positive concerns was related to autombile safety in a crash.

There was to be no dashboard to smash against for a passenger in the right front seat.

He insisted that his cars have crash padding and pop-out windshields.

Oddly, he did not require seat belts.

But Tucker's conceren for safety was not inclusive.

For example, I designed an energy-absorbing steering wheel that Tucker did not approve.

Instead, Tucker had another wheel designed to his specifications.

Tucker's steering wheel was based on a design being used in the Cadillac and it had a very unsafe, protruding, center-of-the-wheel hub.

But the wheel was not produced in time to be installed in a pilot run of 1948 Tuckers.

Instead, all Tuckers were equipped with Lincoln Zephyr steering wheels, a last-minute gift from the Ford Motor Co.

The pilot run of 50 cars began in the spring of 1948, with the helicopter engine and excellent body stampings from dies made by eight Detroit tool and die shops.

Fifty sets of stampings had been ordered; not even a drop in the bucket for an automotive start-up.

Why only 50?

Rumors ran rampant that Tucker's cash was running low.

Then came a Securities and Exchange Commission investigation with a subpoena of the company books.

Tucker closed the plant, feeling that operations could not continue without records.

Thirty-seven pilot-production 1948 Tuckers were produced.

In my opinion, they were excellent cars, although they did not have all of the features that Tucker envisioned for his dream car.

An additional 14 cars were assembled by volunteers when Tucker and his seven co-defendants were tried on 31 counts of mail fraud, violations of SEC regulations and conspiracy.

All of the defendants were exonerated, but Tucker's money-raising potential was wiped out.

He had raised about $25 million and needed much more.

Preston Tucker was a dreamer, he had courage, conviction and an idea.

I thought him to be utterly sincere; a true believer in what he promised.

But the $25 million in start-up capital he raised was only a down payment — even in 1948 — on what proved to be a very expensive dream.

Philip S. Egan was one of the designers of the 1948 Tucker. His book, "Design and Destiny: The Making of the Tucker Automobile," will be published later this year.

Chevrolet dealers market imports using Geo label

By JOHN HOLUSHA
New York Times News Service

LAS VEGAS, Nev. — About 80 percent of Chevrolet's 5,000 dealers have agreed to market the company's imported cars under the Geo brand name this fall.

Top executives of Chevrolet, the General Motors Corp.'s largest marketing division, said the creation of the Geo brand name was an attempt both to win buyers who reject domestic brands and to discourage its dealers from taking on competing franchises.

Chevrolet officials discussed the Geo strategy as they introduced their 1989 models to more than 4,900 Chevrolet dealers here.

Until now, Chevrolet had sold three Japanese-based cars under its own brand name.

They are the Sprint, imported from Suzuki in Japan; the Spectrum, imported from Isuzu in Japan, and the Nova, produced by the joint GM-Toyota factory in Fremont, Calif.

Michael H. Erdman, Chevrolet's marketing manager, said 28 percent of buyers of imported cars had never been in a domestic dealership and had no intention of visiting one.

Another 17-18 percent are uncommitted to either imported or domestic brands, he said.

"We are talking about a total market of almost 4 million vehicles a year," Erdman said. "As a manufacturer we have to reach out to these people."

Chevrolet officials said the Geo brand was also an effort to persuade dealers to concentrate on products supplied by General Motors.

"Some dealers have been very vigorous" in adding franchises of low-priced cars from other auto makers, said Steve McAvoy, Chevrolet's passenger car marketing manager.

One dealer suggested that the proposed setup was a way for GM to play the highly competitive small-car market without endangering the Chevrolet image.

"With the Geo line, if a car fades, they can drop it easier than if it was called a Chevrolet," said Jack Price, a dealer in Omak, Wash.

And some dealers appeared to have reservations about the new approach.

"The salesmen were confused before Geo; this may just make it worse," said Larry Cook, a Chevrolet dealer from Craig, Colo. "It's going to be tough for smaller dealers to separate Chevrolet from Geo."

Chevrolet executives described Geo as a "family" of vehicles whose prices will range from $5,995 for the base Metro to about $14,000 for a fully equipped Tracker.

The division will also try to establish a family image for two different lines of cars to be introduced next year.

A new mid-size four-door sedan and coupe, derivatives of General Motors' GM-10 program, will be introduced next spring.

Both will be named Lumina, a new name for Chevrolet.

A third vehicle, a front-wheel-drive mini-van with a plastic outer body, which is mechanically unrelated to the GM-10 cars, will also be called a Lumina.

The Lumina cars are expected to compete with the Ford Motor Co.'s highly successful Taurus and Sable sedans.

The mini-van appears aimed at Chrysler's car-like mini-van.

Truck sales continued to gain at the expense of cars and one executive said he expected Chevrolet to be selling more trucks than cars within a year.

Amercian S&L ashes look golden for Bass

By NATHANIEL C. NASH
New York Times News Service

WASHINGTON — In agreeing to take over the American Savings and Loan Association of Stockton, Calif., the nation's largest insolvent thrift, Texas billionaire Robert M. Bass is betting the resurrected company will be able to make a lot of money by operating the major part of the business as a traditional thrift — that is, taking deposits from consumers and making mortgages and other consumer loans.

People close to the transaction between the Federal Home Loan Bank Board and the Robert M. Bass Group say they believe that after stripping away all the bad loans and other assets, American Savings will be healthy, well capitalized and one of the largest thrifts in California, with 185 offices and deposits of $14 billion from one million customers.

"In California you are buying a stable and loyal deposit base, people that have stayed with American Savings through thick and thin," said one official close to the transaction.

"The people who did bread-and-butter thrift lending — taking deposits and making mortgage loans — are the ones that have made a bundle. If you have one of those thrifts, you have a lot of franchise value."

Indeed, a look at the details of the transaction, which was announced Monday, indicate Bass has little exposure to either loss or profit from American Savings' $10 billion in bad real estate assets. That is almost entirely covered by the $2 billion pledged by the bank board.

But he does have a chance to get back the $500 million he plans to inject into the new American Savings simply by operating it as a traditional thrift.

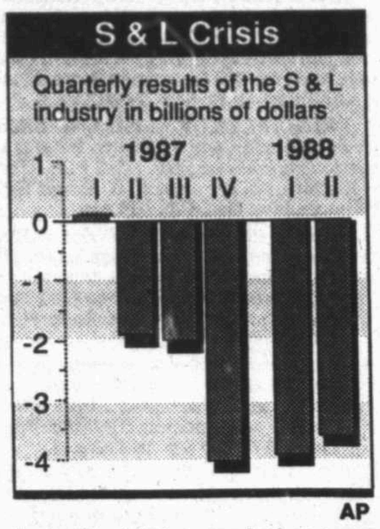

People close to the transaction also say the Bass Group is betting that the severely depressed industry will rebound. These people say that assumption is based on the belief the government will ultimately act in some definitive way to turn the industry around, most likely through federal guarantees or a taxpayer bailout.

Though the basic business approach planned by the Bass Group may seem straightforward, the details of the transaction are highly intricate and involved.

People close to the transaction say that the final details have yet to be worked out and that the numbers being used by the negotiators are subject to change.

In part, the Bass negotiators appeared to pattern the new American Savings after the bailout of Houston's First City Bancorporation earlier in the year.

Like that restructuring, American Savings will be split into a "good bank" to house the consumer deposits and good loans and a "bad bank" that will essentially be selling off bad real estate loans and other assets as efficiently and quickly as possible.

In addition, a holding company will have a real estate management unit and a merchant banking unit.

The good bank will assume the public profile of American Savings, and it will continue to run its branches.

Its assets will include roughly $10 billion in good real estate loans — mostly single-family residential mortgages — plus a $6 billion loan to the bad bank and a $1.5 billion line of credit to the merchant banking unit.

The $500 million in investment capital that Bass has promised to inject into the good bank will give the unit a capital-to-asset ratio of 4 percent, which industry analysts consider a reasonably strong level.

By the terms of the agreement with the bank board, Bass also intends to expand the number of consumer services that the thrift offers. These could include mutual funds and a full array of auto, personal and other consumer loans.

Though it appears that the Bass Group has not yet officially asked the current chairman of American Savings, William J. Popejoy, to remain, it has evidently developed a close business relationship with him during the months of negotiations and has indicated that it would like him to stay as head of the thrift.

Popejoy resigned as chairman of the thrift's holding company, the Financial Corp. of America, based in Irvine, Calif. Following his resignation, Financial Corp.'s board voted to file for bankruptcy protection from creditors.

Though the agreement does not give exact numbers, it appears that the bad bank will have about $5 billion in bad real estate loans, plus American Savings' entire $13 billion portfolio of mortgage-backed securities, which were financed by Wall Street borrowings in the form of repurchase agreements.

Under the terms of the agreement, a group headed by the chief financial officer of the good bank will oversee the eventual liquidation of the mortgage-backed securities.

With interest rates rising during the Bass Group's four and one-half months of exclusive negotiations with the bank board, the paper losses on those securities have grown to more than $1 billion from $500 million.

In addition, in order to fund its real estate operations, the bad bank will borrow $6 billion from the good bank and will pay interest at a so-far-undisclosed rate.

Interest and principal payments will come from two sources. One will be any liquidated real estate assets or whatever is left after selling the mortgage-backed securities and paying off the repurchase agreements.

But losses from the assets are certain. And when such losses occur, the bank board is supposed to ante up, using its $2 billion in promised assistance.

Under this structure, Bass has little risk exposure, people close to the transaction say. But since 75 percent of the bad bank's tax credits will be passed through to the bank board, plus 30 percent of the good bank's profits, there is little chance for a killing in the troubled real estate.

And illustrating the fact that he did not factor in any profits from bad assets, only this week is the Bass Group beginning to pore over American Savings' loans to segregate the performing ones from the delinquent ones.

Though Bass does not envision making a killing on California real estate, that part of American Savings' holdings was what first interested him, those close to the transaction say.

Indeed, at first he was going to make an offer for the American Real Estate Group, which for years had been trying to liquidate the thrift's troubled real estate holdings.

Under the current deal, the unit, which has about 400 employees, will be a separate operating subsidiary and will have the responsibility to liquidate the real estate in the bad bank, as well as handling other real estate business for Bass.

This is the only business that will differ greatly from that of a traditional thrift. Under the agreement, the merchant bank will have a $1.5 billion line of credit from the good bank and will be capitalized by a $50 million investment from the Bass Group.

Its business activities will include making commercial loans; investing in stocks, bonds and other securities issued by companies; making acquisitions, and conducting leveraged buyouts.

So far, the agreement to permit the Bass Group to set up a separate merchant bank has caused the most intense controversy. Members of Congress have complained that the bank board should be trying to impose less risk-taking in the resolution of sick thrifts, instead of more.

But M. Danny Wall, the bank board chairman, and others close to the transaction contend that the bank board has imposed heavy restrictions on the merchant bank.

The unit will not be able to invest in real estate, conduct hostile takeovers or borrow under its own name except for buying stock on margin.

Also, some strict accounting rules will apply. The unit will have to report quarterly to the bank board the value of its assets on a marked-to-market basis. And reportedly if the unit shows losses of any appreciable size — which could deplete the $500 million in capital at the good bank — the merchant bank will be forced to liquidate.

Only time and close scrutiny by Congress and the financial community will tell whether the terms of the innovative deal will be seen as good for the government as well as the bank board.

One thrift expert noted that even though the bank board has estimated that its cost is about $2 billion, the ultimate cost to the Government will be more, since the Bass Group will share in 25 percent of the tax breaks, funds that otherwise would flow to the Treasury.

Bass fortune flows from oil money

Robert Bass

FORT WORTH (AP) — The acquisition by the Robert M. Bass Group of American Savings and Loan Association is a venture into a new field by the Fort Worth billionaire whose family fortune stems from Texas oil money.

But analysts say the financier's move was not unexpected.

"We know they've looked before at other S&Ls in the Texas area," said Bruce Benteman, a research analyst for Wealth Monitors, a Kansas City investment advice firm.

"This is obviously one of the biggest deals that they've done," Benteman said. "It shows the pockets of Bob Bass and his affiliates — it shows how deep they are."

Bass, 40, has agreed to put up $550 million in cash to acquire the Stockton, Calif.-based thrift, the nation's largest insolvent savings and loan.

Bass' personal wealth is estimated at more than $1 billion. The wealth of the Bass family, including Robert's brothers Sid. R., Lee M. and Edward P., is estimated at $5 billion to $6 billion.

The brothers have a history of buying troubled businesses and then waiting for a turnaround and the profit that follows.

Their fortune dates back to Texas wildcatter Sid Richardson and his series of successful oil strikes. Richardson never married and left some of his millions to his partner and nephew, Perry Bass.

Perry's four sons each inherited $2.8 million, and they combined assets to form Bass Brothers Enterprises. In 1968, Perry, a competitive sailor, handed over the business to son Sid.

All educated at Yale University, the Bass brothers have been described as atypical Texas tycoons with a conservative style and quiet manner.

Robert M. Bass started his business career after Yale at Wells Fargo Bank and returned to Texas in 1974 to a spot at Bass Brothers Enterprises.

Tales of rivalries among the four brothers have surfaced in recent years, and in 1983 Robert M. Bass broke away to form Robert M. Bass Group to pursue deals on his own.

The savings and loan deal announced Monday is one in a series Robert M. Bass has been involved in recently.

He bought the Westin Hotel chain from Allegis Corp. for $1.53 billion. In March, Bass sold the Plaza Hotel in Manhattan for $410 million to fellow billionaire Donald Trump.

Bass reached an agreement on May 17 to buy Bell & Howell Co., a publishing and information services company in Skokie, Ill.

Also in that field, Bass has been making offers for Macmillan Inc., another publishing and information company. The Robert M. Bass Group already owns 9.2 percent of Macmillan. Now London-based Maxwell Communication Corp. has announced its intention to buy the firm.

Nevada group to sell shares in Mustang Ranch

By NATHANIEL C. NASH
New York Times News Service

WASHINGTON — It is the entrepreneurial spirit, Nevada-style.

A group there plans to sell shares in the nation's largest legal brothel, whose scores of "independent contractors" and 105 rooms produced a profit last year of almost $1 million, a prospectus says.

The papers, filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission last week, outlined plans to raise $23.3 million to buy the two Mustang Ranch brothels, in Storey County, from Joseph Conforte and his wife, Sally, who started the business 20 years ago.

Investors are being asked to pay $20 for each of 1.165 million common shares of Mustang Ranch Inc., which will own Mustang's brothels, where prostitutes do a seven-day-a-week business.

"We are very serious about this," said Peter A. Perry, a Nevada lawyer and chief executive of Mustang Ranch Inc., a company formed last year, which is making the stock offering. "I can confirm that we have a registration statement pending with the SEC."

Under the proposed offering, a group led by Perry and Donald R. Clough, a Nevada real estate developer, is offering to buy Mustang Ranch for $18 million.

The difference between that cost and the amount raised will go toward capital improvements, financial reserves and administrative costs.

Four managers and directors, including Perry and Clough, will hold enough stock to control more than 40 percent of the company.

No brokerage firm is underwriting the offering, and all the shares are being offered by "officers, directors, and employees as a self-underwritten offering," the prospectus says.

Last year, the Mustang Ranch brothels showed a drop in gross revenues to $5.4 million, from $5.9 million in 1986. But profits rose from $848,000,to $917,000.

While prostitution is illegal in every state but Nevada, the securities sale is not improper.

"We are not merit regulators," one SEC official said. "Otherwise we would have people trying to get us to prohibit tobacco companies, alcohol companies and companies that do business with South Africa from selling securities to the public."

Though the SEC does not seem to be in a position to stop the stock sale, individual states could. Scott Stapf, spokesman for the North American Securities Administrators, said that 36 states have the power to block sales by mail to state residents.

For those accustomed to reading the habitually dry and excessively long propectuses filed at the SEC, the filing deviates only in content, not in style.

"The brothels are licensed boarding houses at which the independent contractors, as female prostitutes, make available their services for the performance of sexual acts with male customers," the prospectus says.

The brothel does not set the fee structure for the business of prostitution, or impose any "pricing schedules or guides."

The women turn over half their receipts to the company and pay a fee of $10 a day for room and board. They generally work seven consecutive 12-hour days, then are off for two to three weeks.

The prospectus notes that the offering is a high-risk venture, primarily because of potential lawsuits, adverse publicity and the potential for clients or "independent contractors" to acquire sexually transmitted diseases, including AIDS.

"Although no independent contractor doing business at the brothels has been reported to have been tested 'positive' for exposure to the AIDS virus, the level of incidence of AIDS has been reported by the media to be extremely high amongst prostitutes," the document said.

Compaq compacts desktop units

HOUSTON (AP) — Compaq Computer Corp. is continuing its market battle with industry giant IBM with its introduction of a smaller, power desktop computer in its growing line of products.

The Houston-based company introduced the Compaq Deskpro 386-20e. The new computer offers more standard features and the same capabilities of the company's larger 386-based personal computers in a smaller package, said Compaq president Rod Canion.

The unit is aimed at users of 286-based personal computers who need a faster, compatible unit.

The new computer is being introduced in direct competition with the comparably sized and priced IBM PS-2 Model 70-121, said the company, which touts itself as the world's leading manufacturer of portable personal computers.

The Deskpro incorporates Compaq's Flex architecture in a smaller form, offering compatibility with the industry standard while running 25 percent faster than the IBM PS-2 Model 70-121, Canion said.

The Deskpro comes standard with one megabyte of RAM and can be arranged with up to 16 megabytes without using any of its four expansion slots.

"This degree of expansion capability is unprecedented in such a small package," Canion said.

"In the two years since we pioneered the 386 revolution, Compaq has continued to deliver new industry-standard products with the latest advances in 386 technology and performance," Canion said. "Compaq continues to lead the industry by supplying more than half of the 386-based products sold to users by dealers in the U.S. through the first half of the year."

Three models of the Deskpro were introduced Monday:

— Model 1, equipped with 1.2-megabyte diskette drive and one megabyte of RAM, listed at $5,199.

— Model 40, with a 40-megabyte fixed disk drive, listed at $6,599.

— Model 110, with a 110-megabyte fixed disk drive, listed at $7,999.

All three models include a high-performance, 16-bit video graphics controller built onto the system board.

Business called 'Disneyland of Dairy Stores'

Dairy sales top $100 million a year

Stew Leonard can't help but smile, while thinking of the success of his "Disneyland of Dairy Stores" in Norwalk, Conn. Stew Leonard's Dairy Store has sales of over $100 million a year.

AP Laserphoto

NORWALK, Conn. (AP) — The crowd's five deep at the petting zoo and just parking the car requires patience, skill and help from a guy in a sheriff's uniform directing bumper-to-bumper traffic around a huge lot.

Inside, robot dogs sing mournfully of lost love and Rich Milk, spokescarton for "The Farm Fresh Five," an animated quintet of dairy products, plays to a packed house. College kids in cow costumes cavort between shows and helium balloons float through popcorn-scented air.

It's not a theme park, it's "The Disneyland of Dairy Stores," as Rich Milk puts it. Should that description stay with you, owner Stew Leonard won't mind a bit. "Disney's my hero," he says.

"The Different Dairy" is another catch-phrase, and proof of that can be found on the bottom line: Stew Leonard's Dairy Store sells $100 million worth of food a year, more per square foot than any other grocery. This despite an inventory of 700 items — a typical supermarket carries 24,000 — and the presence of 93 other markets within 15 miles of that clogged parking lot.

Each year, 500,000 pounds of butter, 10 million quarts of milk and 500 tons of salads pass his computerized checkouts; in a typical week, 100,000 pounds of his buddy Frank Perdue's chickens fly off the shelves.

Leonard focuses on customers; 100,000 troop through every week, and his mission's to see that they walk out happy. To do that, he gives them what they want the way they want it. Choosy about berries? He'll put them out loose. Prefer fish on ice instead of on Styrofoam? He'll build a fish bar.

The responsiveness works both ways. Stew's customers stuff his suggestion box with more than 100 comments a day, and some come in on Sundays to put in their two cents in person, at monthly meetings with management.

A vacationing shopper homesick for the store sent a snapshot of herself holding a Stew Leonard's bag in Moscow's Red Square. Stew tacked it up. He's since received 7,000 pictures of customers and bags at such spots as the Taj Mahal and the Great Sphinx. His favorite: an underwater shot of skin divers holding their bag beneath the Bermuda Triangle.

The store's "a mini-carnival" to customer Doris Brown of Norwalk, who says taking her two preschoolers "can take the edge off a very bad day."

The large sales and loyal following, combined with a cheerleading management style that stresses teamwork, advancement and fun, have made Stew Leonard a small-business superstar. He's in a dozen books (Tom Peters' "A Passion for Excellence" mentions him 22 times) and numerous marketing and management training videos. He's the star of a Dale Carnegie ad campaign. And recently, he was one of 11 business people honored by President Reagan.

Leonard's advice to the next generation of corporate Americans, already dissecting his methods in business schools across the land: "Don't go into business to get rich. Do it to enrich people. It will come back to you.

"Big business always makes it sound so complicated," he adds. "You don't have to reinvent the wheel. You just have to care."

Like friend and neighbor Paul Newman, whose salad dressing he helped launch, Leonard has now tasted fame. Unlike the actor, who "puts his coat over his head when he goes out to dinner," Leonard is eating it up.

"I can hardly believe it," says the silver-haired, bespectacled grocer. "To be the hero in your own thing, that's the dream of every entrepreneur."

The philosophy that got him here is literally chiseled in stone outside the dairy, a rambling gray building that resembles a barn. A three-ton hunk of granite at the entrance reads:

"Rule 1 — The customer is always right.

"Rule 2 — If the customer is ever wrong, re-read Rule 1."

Skeptics need only hang around the customer service counter where cheerful employees soothe the disgruntled. Recently, they included a woman complaining of stale coffee beans. When had she bought them? "Two years ago." She got a refund, as did the shopper who returned her Christmas tree in March.

It had dried out.

Not long ago, a woman asked for — and got — a refund for 20 pounds of shrimp. Later, a worker discovered she'd never paid for them.

"My hardest job is not to catch her, but to keep those people on the customer service desk from developing a bad attitude," says Leonard, who thinks "999 people out of a thousand are honest."

"I know I've got to get cheated once in awhile, but don't tell me about it. Don't shade my thinking."

"I grew up in Norwalk, so I feel like it's part of me," says employee Richard Lung, who works on "Stew's News," a sort of "People" magazine for employees that a business magazine calls "the ultimate company newsletter."

"I had no art degree, but four years ago, he gave me a chance. I'm glad — it's a special place to work." Among other fringe benefits, Lung says, his employer has paid for art classes and seminars at Bridgeport University.

Some kids dream of becoming movie stars. Stew Leonard dreamed of being a milkman. The youngest of seven, he'd get up at 4 a.m. for the thrill of riding along on his father's Norwalk milk route.

His father died four months after Stew graduated from college. He took over the business, got married, had four children. Then, in 1968, the state built a highway through his dairy.

Leonard gambled he could get customers to make a special trip for milk by building a store around a dairy.

He was 38 years old. He remortgaged his house, dipped into his kids' college fund and borrowed $482,500 from the Small Business Administration, a record amount at the time.

From the beginning, the store was different. Instead of many narrow aisles, Leonard built one wide labyrinth that brings customers face-to-face with the entire inventory. In 1969, the year he opened, it consisted of seven items.

Since then, he's added on 27 times. The store now features a $1 million kitchen that turns out 200 salads and hot entrees daily, a barbecue department and a seasonal garden shop that pops up with the crocuses.

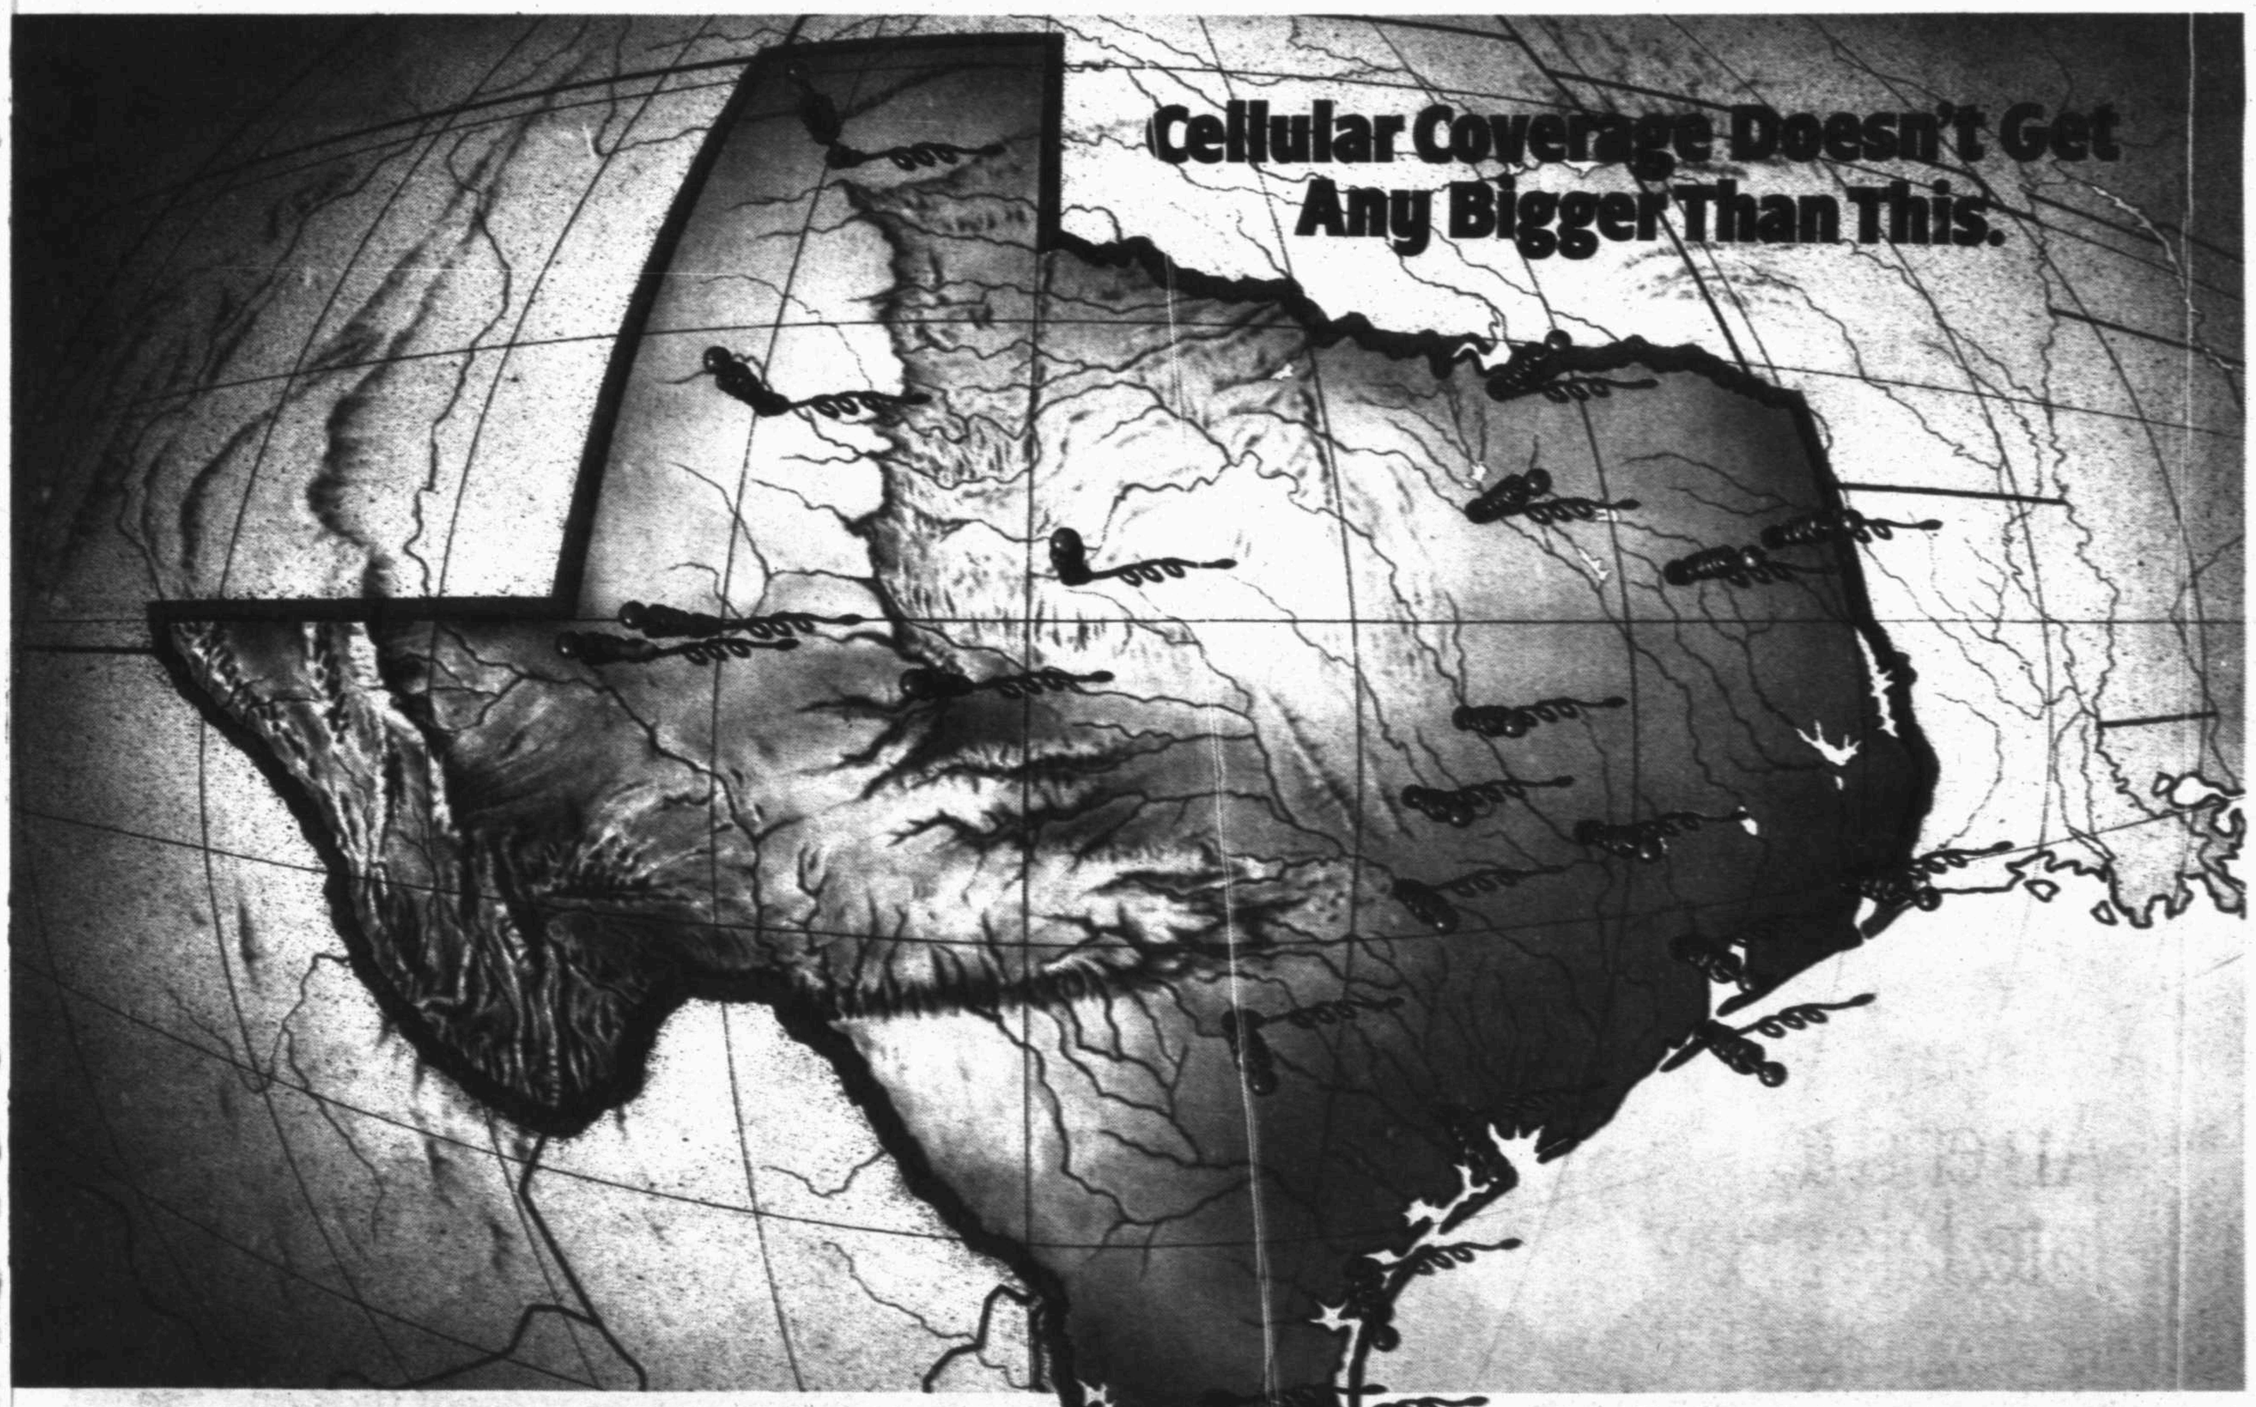

The milk-processing plant, which pasteurizes and packages 5 million half-gallons of milk and 1½ half-gallons of orange juice annually, is glassed-in so customers can watch cartons whiz by at 150 per minute.

Stew's children have all joined the business.

A firm believer in nepotism, Leonard has 22 relatives in the store. Half his 600 employees have relatives here too. "It's very good for the culture of a company," he says.

In spare moments, Leonard works on his design for the new and improved Stew Leonard's, set to open in Danbury in two years. He says it'll be similar to Norwalk, only bigger.

And this time, the cows will be real.

Baby boomers vulnerable on pocketbook issues

New York Times News Service

Count the Reagan administration's economic successes: Inflation is running a tepid 5 percent, unemployment is at a decade low and after-tax household income has never been higher.

How, then, can Michael Dukakis hope to score points with voters on pocketbook issues?

One reason is that Americans must now work harder to earn the fruits of the good life.

Between 1980 and 1986, average wages fell by 2 percent. Household incomes rose by 10 percent, but only because millions of women left hearth and kiddies for paying jobs.

Frank Levy, an economist at the University of Maryland and the author of "Dollars and Dreams," offers another reason — one with considerably more political bite.

Small changes in average wages and incomes, he argues, mask large variations within the work force.

The big losers: the baby boomers in general; young, blue-collar workers in particular.

Their frustration with Reagan administration happy talk could cost George Bush the White House.

During the 1970s, Levy says, a 30-year-old who had finished high school earned 15 percent to 20 percent less than a 30-year-old with four years of college.

However many of the best blue-collar jobs disappeared in the 1981-82 recession and in the years of industrial restructuring that followed.

Wage rates in unionized, high-paying industries including steel, autos, chemicals and rubber have not changed much.

But employment has fallen sharply, and younger workers with little seniority have been pushed into lower paying trades.

By 1986, a typical 30-year-old high school graduate was earning just $18,600 — 16 percent less in real terms than his counterpart in 1973, and a third less than contemporaries who graduated from college.

Few high school graduates who have any job at all are poor.

But the squeeze on young, semi-skilled laborers has certainly increased the competition for lesser jobs held by the unskilled.

That competition may explain why the halving of the unemployment rate since the winter of 1982-83 has reduced the proportion of Americans living below the poverty line by just 10 percent.

One way out of the blue-collar squeeze, of course, is higher education.

But the financial barrier to a college degree is a tougher hurdle than it was in the 1970s.

Between 1980-81 and 1986-87 the inflation-adjusted cost of attending a four-year public college increased by 26 percent, while the median income of families facing the tuition bills rose by just 5 percent.

Government did not rush to ease the burden: The average Guaranteed Student Loan, the primary source of federal aid available to lower-middle-income students, fell by 13 percent during the same period.

While younger workers in general have generally fared better economically than young blue-collar workers, the last decade has hardly given the baby boomers much to celebrate.

In 1987 the average 30-year-old man earned $20,100, 13 percent less in real dollars than a 30-year-old a decade earlier.

More galling, the earnings gap between young and middle-aged workers has widened dramatically.

The average 30-year-old man in 1977 made 19 percent less than the average 50-year-old.

By 1987, this gap had opened to 39 percent.

Where one stands on the economic ladder may have less to do with personal satisfaction, Levy notes, than where one expects to end up.

But here, too, recent history offers little basis for optimism.

Compare what happened to the parents of the baby boomers with what has been happening to the boomers themselves.

In 1950 the average 30-year-old man earned just $13,100 (in 1987 dollars), but could look forward to a 58 percent pay increase by 1960.

In 1960 our typical 30-year-old male was making $19,300, and could still expect a 44 percent raise by 1970.

Since then, however, the economic prospects of the young have grown dicier. The average 30-year-old in 1977 had to settle for an increase over the decade of just 21 percent.

Defining the baby boomers' plight is a lot easier than solving it.

Some policy choices could make a difference.

Wage subsidies, financed through taxes on affluent older taxpayers, would ease the burden on workers at the very bottom of the pecking order.

Easier access to college would give well-motivated children of blue-collar families a better chance to join the white-collar elite.

Simply avoiding a recession would spare the young (and almost everyone else) from a temporary economic pinch.

But most economists would argue that the key factors determining incomes in the long run — the rates of technological change, labor force growth and capital accumulation — are not easily influenced by government.

Ronald Reagan did little to change them. And neither Bush nor Dukakis has offered a hint on how he might.

Newmont agrees to sell foreign assets

New York Times News Service

DALLAS — The Newmont Mining Corp., one of the largest gold mining companies in the United States, said it has agreed to sell the foreign assets of its Newmont Oil Co. subsidiary to the Dutch subsidiary of Clyde Petroleum PLC, a British oil exploration company, for $234 million.

Under the terms of the agreement, the Clyde subsidiary, Clyde Petroleum BV, will assume $46.7 million in liabilities, including debt and taxes.

The proposed sale is Newmont Oil's second this month. Two weeks ago, Newmont announced that it had agreed to sell the oil subsidiary's domestic properties to the Mobil Corp. and to a group of Dallas investors for $170 million.

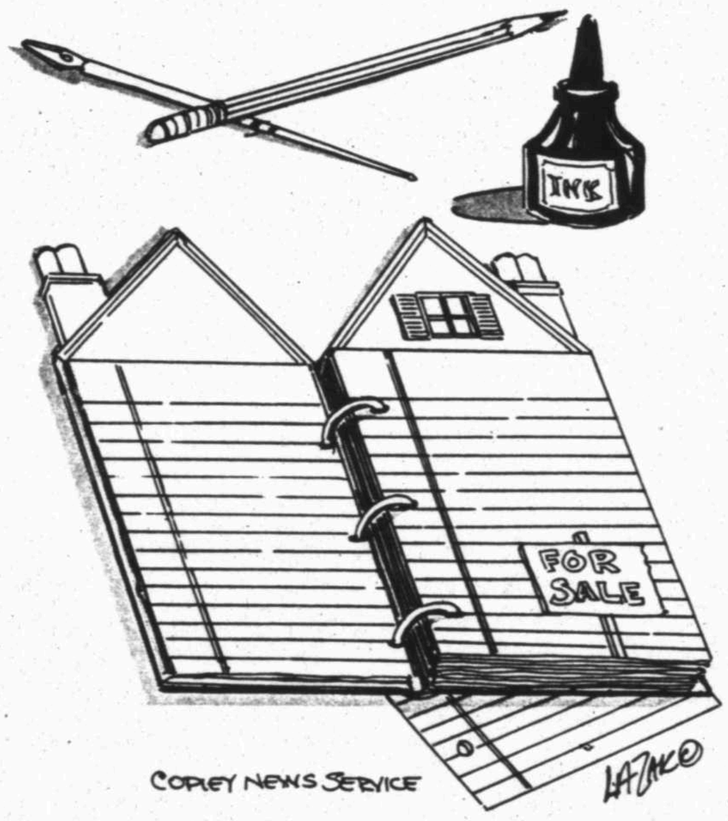

Proceeds from both sales will be used to reduce the company's debt to about $1.2 billion by year-end.

Newmont declared an extraordinary cash dividend of $2.2 million, or $33 a share, last fall in its effort to thwart a hostile takeover by T. Boone Pickens of Amarillo.

Home kits aim for those priced out of market

Do-it-yourselfers build afforable housing options

By TONY KENNEDY

PLYMOUTH, Minn. (AP) — As more Americans find themselves priced out of the housing market, do-it-yourself home building could get a taste of the good old days when thousands cut costs by raising their own roofs.

One company in the business, Miles Homes, believes the concept of "sweat equity" still has some attraction, particularly among consumers with annual incomes of less than $60,000.

The company's biggest years were in the late 1970s, when it sold do-it-yourself packages to as many as 2,200 people a year, many of whom lived in then-booming Texas.

Having taken some hard licks during the recession, Miles is now happy to sell 800 homes a year. But the company is optimistic about the future.

"This is not our best year, but we expect 1989 to improve," said Richard Cornwall, president and chief operating officer of Miles Homes.

The real heyday for do-it-yourself home construction in this country was from 1900 to 1940, when two of the biggest kit-home manufacturers were Sears, Roebuck & Co. and Montgomery Ward, according to research published earlier this year by Tab Books Inc. of Blue Ridge Summit, Pa.

Sears alone sold more than 100,000 kit homes from 1900 until the start of World War II, when all domestic construction came to a virtual standstill, according to Tab.

It wasn't until the late 1960s that a resurgence in the do-it-yourself attitude and an upswing in construction costs caused kit homes to become popular again, Tab says.

Since that time, the industry has grown to the point where about 20 percent of the new single-family homes built annually in the United States have some degree of owner involvement, according to the National Association of Home Builders.

The Build Your Own Home Directory says about 138,000 Americans built their own houses last year.

Currently there are more than 2,000 kit-house manufacturers and dealers nationwide, according to the Tab research.

Although Cornwall admits Miles' share of the market is small, he said Miles is one of the few companies in the country offering a complete package for the do-it-yourselfer: land evaluations, blueprints, materials, construction loan money and mortgage financing.

Under new owner Peter DeGeorge, who paid Meriden, Conn.-based Insilco Corp. about $100 million for the company in April, Miles has pulled in its territorial reins so that its principal markets are in the Midwest and along the Eastern seaboard.

Cornwall said Miles makes much of its money off the package of precut materials used in the construction process, but the company's financing arm also profits when customers make good on the three-year construction loans that are at the heart of the sales pitch.

Dave Dunnigan, publicity director for Miles, said 65 percent of the customers are first-time homebuyers, many of them with annual incomes of $25,000 to $60,000 a year who often do not have enough savings to make a big down payment.

Land costs not included, Miles will finance the purchase price of its homes, which range from $25,000 to $65,000, for up to 36 months around market rates. No down payment on materials is required, but an appraisal fee of $250 is required upon credit approval. Payments on the three-year loan cover interest only and at the end of the three years the construction loan balance is due in full and usually is paid through the use of a mortgage, which can be obtained from Miles.

"We've front-ended so much money out of our pocket, the customers are usually in a good position," said Scott Gerber, marketing manager. "But most people will not come out ahead unless they are involved in building it."

Ideally, if the customer does enough of the construction and the home is built in a location that has value, the result will be a structure that is worth more than it cost to build it.

But, as Gerber said, "we have people whose expectations aren't met."

Indeed, in April 1978 the Federal Trade Commission ordered Miles to stop making "false, misleading and deceptive" claims related to the construction process. For instance, the company used to advertise that the only skill required for assembly was "the ability to drive a nail or use a hammer."

Dunnigan said the company has long since made the corrections and no other action has been taken by the FTC.

Now when customers do not come out ahead, it is usually because they added a luxury item like a whirlpool bath that was not called for in the blueprints.

Only a handful of people have walked away from their houses as they were under construction, Gerber said. Those who have frustrations in the process can turn to company experts for advice.

The sweat, by the way, still produces some equity. The Council of Amerian Building Officials says consumers can cut home construction expenses by 25 percent to 50 percent depending on how much labor they do themselves.

Radon warning boon to testing companies

By JONATHAN P. HICKS
New York Times News Service

Executives of companies that provide radon detection and testing services say their prospects received a lift from a public health advisory issued by the government last week.

The companies reported a sharp rise in inquiries from homeowners and businesses worried about the possibility of high radon levels in their homes and offices.

Stock prices of the publicly traded companies in the field have also surged.

"The phones have been ringing off the hook," said Paul B. Rosenberg, treasurer of Tech-Ops Landauer Inc., a Glenwood, Ill., concern that is the nation's largest radon testing company, with about two-thirds of the market.

"We have seen a large amount of interest and new orders from customers all around the country. Many are new but many are retailers with whom we've done business who have increased their orders several times."

In issuing the advisory, the government cited new evidence that radon, an invisible and odorless radioactive gas, poses a hazard in more homes than previously thought.

Radon, which forms naturally when uranium in soil and rocks decays into radioactive particles, can seep into homes through cracks in foundations and areas around drainage pipes.

It is known to cause cancer, and the Public Health Service now thinks that radon is responsible for as many as 20,000 lung cancer deaths each year.

The government report urged that most houses and apartments on low floors be tested for the gas.

Tech-Ops tests homes by placing a detector in a home or office for at least two months, Rosenberg said. "You can't gauge the level of radon without testing the air for an extended period of time to account for changes in the weather," he said. The detection canister is then returned to the company for analysis.

Tech-Ops reported $14.5 million in sales for the nine months that ended June 30, compared with $12.6 million in the corresponding period a year earlier. Earnings for the nine-month period were $3.66 million, or $1.72 a share, up from $2.8 million, or $1.39 a share, for the year-earlier period.

The federal advisory was issued last Monday. Tech-Ops's stock, which was trading around $29 two weeks ago, closed at $38.375 Friday on the American Stock Exchange.

The stock of Versar Inc., an environmental testing company based in Springfield, Va., closed Friday at $8.875 on the American Stock Exchange, after trading at about $5.75 two weeks ago.

Another publicly traded company, Electro-Kinetic Systems Inc., based in Trainer, Pa., announced last week that its new radon detection device had met the Environmental Protection Agency's requirements and would be available for sale by Oct. 1.

But most companies engaged in radon testing are small and private, experts and analysts said.

The analysts added that the field would probably grow robustly in the next decade.

"This radiation testing is an area where there is a lot of growth potential, in radon and beyond," said Stephen D. Weinress, an analyst with L.H. Friend in Los Angeles.

Weinress said that some big corporations had shown signs that they might be interested in entering the market, although any such moves would not occur soon.

"Every company with people working around radiation needs a third party to monitor radiation," Weinress said.

"When you consider the growing concern about radiation from people who work around it — from people working at nuclear utilities and military uses to hospitals and people who examine baggage at the airport — it is a growing area. This radon concern makes that growth even stronger."

Michael Markels Jr., president of Versar, said that despite the widespread interest in radon testing, it would be some time before the company's earnings were affected. "From the time a hazard is recognized until the time that the money flows to meet the research takes a while," he said.

Markels, who has a doctorate in chemical engineering, predicted that indoor environmental concerns would stimulate additional areas of business for companies like Versar, which he founded in 1969. "First there was the concern about asbestos," he said. "Now there is radon.

"The average person spends 85 percent of his life in the home," Markels said. "We will find that indoor environmental pollution will be the next main subject of environmental concern in this country. And that will have an effect on our business."

Testing for the EPA accounts for about 40 percent of the company's business, Markels said. The remainder comes from testing homes and businesses, he said.

These companies test for a wide range of substances, and they have moved in recent years into research into the health effects of substances found in many homes.

"We have houses where we do research into things that affect the everyday household," Markels said. "We test for such things as what happens when you burn materials on your stove, when you use glue to put down a carpet or the impact of gas stoves."

stood against the energy industry on every single issue to this date, including windfall profits and deregulation of gas, how can we trust him now?" She looked at me in shock as if to say: "What makes you think I would dare ask such a question?"

Indeed, stupid me! I really thought there would be some tough, pertinent energy questions put to the vice presidential candidate by an audience who counts on oil for its existence.

There were two or three pertinent questions, but for the most part the interrogations were dull, innocuous and uninformative, because all were carefully worded so as not to put Bentsen on the spot.

It was a boring, benumbing display of political rhetoric aimed for the ten o'clock news, where Bentsen would get three positive sentences and one cheering crowd shot. Newspapers were not even allowed within shouting distance of the candidate.

Least it sounds like we are faulting Democrats alone, I should point out that both parties work the press to their advantage.

The more I listened, the more I found myself in sympathy with the rudeness of Sam Donaldson and other members of the national media, who stand on the sidelines and scream at passing presidents. I was so hungry to pin Bentsen down with a pertinent question that I could hardly contain myself.

The reporter next to me had a notebook, but he did not write. Sometimes he even appeared to doze. This was the third time today he had sampled this rhetoric and he would do it once more in Lubbock before he slept.

Network cameras rolled, but that was just in case Bentsen slipped and said something. Suddenly, I understood how bored journalists can seize upon the slightest slip of the tongue to make a story. George Bush mistakenly called September 7 — not December 7 — Pearl Harbor Day and it became headlines for a week.

At one point in his speech, Bentsen mistakenly called the Gulf of Mexico the Persian Gulf. He quickly corrected it, but I wondered if that slip might not become the lead story on the networks later that night, and later the main topic on Nightline. Would Ted Koppel call in an expert on campaign bloopers from Georgetown University?

It's difficult to say which came first: The bored journalist or the dull politician, but what it comes down to is a paralyzed political process that offers the public very little of substance. "It's all contrived," said former presidential candidate Walter Mondale.

I once thought it would be glamorous, being a part of the national press corps and following presidential candidates around the county. I have since changed my mind. Living out of a suitcase, running from plane to bus four times a day to hear the same speech is not my idea of glamor.

Airlines benefit from fuel savings

By MIKE SHERIDAN
Hearst News Service

When the price of oil hit $36 a barrel in the early 1980s, airlines did everything they could to conserve fuel.

To lessen the weight of aircraft, they scraped coats of paint from the exterior of their planes and installed lighter carpet inside. Liquor bottles made of glass were replaced with plastic. Some carriers installed seats that met all federal requirements but weighed less.

Although jet fuel, then pegged at more than $1 a gallon, has since dropped to about 57 cents a gallon, airlines are continuing to make conservation fly.

"Who's to know what the future has in store, or when fuel costs will skyrocket and become 30 percent of operating expenses again," said William K. Horn, an assistant vice president of information resources at the Air Transport Association, a trade group in Washington, D.C.

When a gallon of jet fuel hit $1.04 in 1981, the airlines spent more than 29 percent of their cash operating expenses — including interest payments but excluding depreciation — on fuel. But during the first quarter of this year, with kerosene pegged at 57.7 cents per gallon, the amount the airlines spent for fuel was 16 percent of operating expenses.

Not all the cost savings have gone to the bottom line.

"The airlines have spent less for fuel over the past several years, but those fuel savings subsidized discount fares," said Tim Neale, a spokesman for the ATA. "Fuel took a big dip four years ago, but you also had an awful lot of discount fares because fuel prices were down and airlines were seeking to increase market share."

In an attempt to reduce fuel costs further, airlines over the past 15 years have bought more fuel efficient airplanes. Piedmont Airlines took delivery this month of the first Boeing 737 Series 400 twin-engine jet to roll off the assembly line of the Boeing Co. in Seattle. The new airliner is about 10 feet longer than the 737-300 series models, but more importantly, it uses less fuel to transport more passengers.

"The airline industry has made great strides since the oil price increases of the 1970s," said Bruce E. Hicks, vice president of corporate communications at Continental Airlines. "Airlines have become more fuel efficient, buying more fuel efficient jets. Right now fuel is about 50 cents a gallon vs. $1.20 a few years ago. But remember, the industry thought it would go to $2 a gallon, so airlines began ordering newer planes for their fleets."

"For every trillion cubic feet of natural gas used, it will create approximately 100,000 new jobs for Texas." He says there is 1,000 trillion cubic feet of natural gas reserves in the U.S. (a 75 year supply) and that one-third of those reserves were in Texas.

For B.C. Hydro, CNG is merely business as usual, but for Texas it remains a challenge for building a vital economic and environmental future. He expects natural gas, and possibly CNG, to play a major role in the national energy policies of Bush and Dukakis. "Natural gas will be a major force in national security by reducing our addiction to imported oil," he said.

VANS

"It is difficult for any one company to justify the investment needed for a low-volume product. With this sort of deal, the two companies share the expense and get the product to market faster."

If Ford had to start from scratch on a new mini-van, it would take almost five years before the vehicle could reach dealer showrooms.

Since Nissan has already done much of the design work, production is scheduled to begin in the fall of 1991.

Ford's vice chairman, Harold Poling, called the agreement with Nissan part of his company's "evolving strategy for global competitiveness."

The strategy, he said, includes the use of "new business relationships to fill limited-volume niches in each of the parties' respective markets."

The Ford-Nissan arrangement breaks new ground on several fronts.

First, Ford managed to bypass its longtime Japanese affiliate, the Mazda Motor Co., evidently without serious objection. Mazda, which is 25 percent owned by Ford, is reportedly talking with it about selling Ford-made pickup trucks and utility vehicles through Mazda dealerships in the United States and overseas.

Perhaps more important, the Ford-Nissan deal represents the first time a Japanese car maker has been willing to give an American company responsibility for manufacturing a vehicle to be sold under its label. In all the other American-Japanese joint ventures in this country, the Japanese have kept a tight hold on the production process.

For instance, at Fremont, Calif., where vehicles of both the General Motors Corp. and the Toyota Motor Corp. are jointly produced, Japanese managers run the plant.

Officials of Japanese and American auto companies alike say the key to success in a joint undertaking is to achieve savings by making cars or trucks the same under the skin — and then making the skins different enough so that buyers regard them as different products.

Ford has been praised by analysts for its arrangement with Mazda involving joint use of the Ford plant in the Detroit area. Although both vehicles are based on Mazda's 626 platform, the Ford Probe model looks very different from the Mazda MX6, which is produced on the same assembly line.

"Ford has figured out how to do these deals so they make sense for both sides," said. Keller of Furman Selz.

Officials of GM's Chevrolet division, by contrast, have complained that the Nova model produced in the joint venture with Toyota was an old-fashioned car that was difficult to sell.

Analysts say they expect more joint undertakings between American and foreign auto makers as the car and truck market becomes more fragmented by the introduction of new models.

Cooperative ventures will also help Detroit trim its overhead, a major goal. Since two companies share the design and engineering workload, staffs can be reduced.

Poling said Ford simply did not have enough engineers and other technical people to do a mini-van on its own without cutting into programs of higher sales potential.

"You are going to see a lot more risk sharing and the elimination of redundancy in engineering and design at the car companies," said Charles J. Brady, an analyst with Oppenheimer & Co.

COSTS

A retiree who had served 20 years would qualify for the full contribution, a 10-year worker for half.

In each succeeding year, TRW's contribution to the premium can rise by only 50 percent of the medical care cost component of the Consumer Price Index — and only up to 4 percent.

That means the retiree will owe more and more as time passes.

"We wanted to get control of the dollars," said John K. McMahon, director of employee benefits at TRW.

"That doesn't necessarily mean we won't spend money, but it gives us control."

At Pillsbury, more than 12,000 salaried employees are granted one "total value" credit — currently $1,400 for each year of service or a total of $28,000 for a 20-year employee.

Based on this amount, they are given a yearly annuity with which they can buy various health plans.

Limitations like those at TRW and Pillsbury stir expressions of concern from the American Association of Retired Persons.

"It leaves the individual bearing the biggest risk," said Judy Schub, a coordinator for the association's federal affairs economics team.

"It also may remove some of the cost-containment pressure that large employers have been exerting on providers, and I'm afraid of losing that."

She fears that if the employers' own liability is capped, they will not have as strong an incentive to bargain with doctors and hospitals to hold down costs.

While many companies have been slow to adopt changes like those at TRW and Pillsbury, the pace may soon speed up because of an approaching change in accounting rules, consultants say.

The Financial Accounting Standards Board, a private organization that creates the rules accountants follow, is expected to issue a proposal within two months that would force companies eventually to treat as a current expense more of their retiree medical obligations.

Companies now must account only for what they pay out for current retirees.

Under the proposed change, which could take effect in 1992, they would have to project post-retirement medical costs for a future retiree and account for them while the employee is still working, just as they do for pension obligations.

The extra cost will be enormous, said Rich Ostuw, a vice president in Cleveland for TPF&C, a consulting arm of Towers, Perrin.

"For a typical large company today," he said, "the cost of post-retirement medical benefits is about $300 per active employee annually, or roughly 1 percent of payroll. Under the expected FASB rules, that would change to about $2,600, even with the improvement in Medicare catastrophic care coverage approved this summer."

That legislation, the first major expansion of the Medicare program, provides additional coverage for catastrophic illnesses.

"Now consider the average profit per employee, based on the Fortune 500 industrial companies," Ostuw said. "It was roughly $8,000. So $300 is a pretty small percentage of company profits, but $2,600 is pretty big. All told, we expect that for a typical large company the change in accounting rules will reduce profits by about 25 percent.

"Many companies will say, 'We overcommitted in the past because we did not understand what the long-term costs would be for the benefits we promised, and we must make a correction now.'"

Ostuw added that in the long run an employer could cut the increase in its expenses in half — from $2,300 per employee to $1,150 in the example just given — by redesigning its plan in such ways as providing only a defined dollar amount.

For a large employer, that could mean a saving of millions or even tens of millions of dollars.

A few companies may even move to drop their retiree medical obligations altogether.

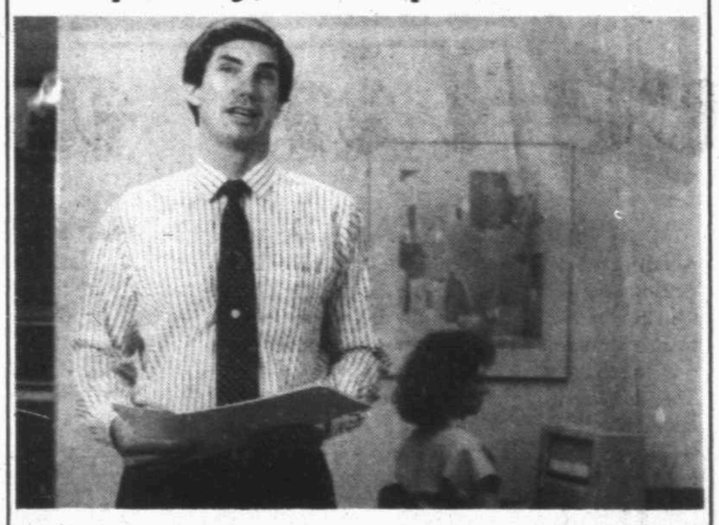

One problem is that companies do not receive the tax advantages for the money they set aside for such benefits that they do for pension money, said Deborah Chollet of the Employee Benefits Research Institute in Washington.

Partly because of this, few employers have such funds for medical benefits.

"If we want to encourage the continuation of employers providing medical benefits for retirees we will have to give them some favorable tax status on pre-funding them," said Bruce E. Noda, a principal in San Francisco for Mercer Meidinger Hansen.

But Congress has not been very receptive to such changes or to changes sought by the retired persons' association, said Gary Christopherson, director of health legislation for the House Select Committee on Aging.

"When our top secretary had to take off unexpectedly, I didn't panic."

"This was one of the most wonderful experiences of my life, to be able to get to know these kids — one I will most definitely not forget. I am extremely glad I got the chance to do this, and I wish all those doing this after me all the luck in the world. You're going to love it."

The degree of enthusiasm expressed in 18-year-old Shelby Bond's letter to Midland Arts Assembly, now called Arts Assembly of Midland, is not unexpected in the young.

But, he's not the only teacher who has expressed such positive sentiments about being a part of the Arts Assembly-sponsored KidsArts & Company program.

"I really enjoyed it; the kids were great," says artist Kelly Moran, whose summer KidsArts students, with permission from the Parks and Recreation Department, painted murals on the four exterior walls of the Washington Park building next to the picnic area.

"I thought it was a way to expose kids to music in a fun-type, relaxed atmosphere," says Karen Walker, orchestra director for the Midland Independent School District and violinist with the Midland-Odessa Symphony.

Ms. Walker taught music along with Bobby Mills, the music/art teacher at Scharbauer Elementary. "Together, we had a good time," she says.

"I certainly would do it again and again," says dancer Margaret Edmonds, who teaches dance for Barbara Craig in Odessa. "They taught me."

She remembers watching one of her student's moves very carefully when she was teaching at the Midland Boys Club this summer.

"He was doing some break dancing, and I said, 'Hey. Slow that down. I want to learn this one.'"

And, she did.

Working as KidsArts coordinator has been "by far" the most fulfilling part of Barbara Maldonado's job as administrative assistant for the Arts Assembly, Midland's umbrella organization for the arts.

"I get to see the art put into action," Ms. Maldonado says. "I like the idea of the children getting so much out of it, and, at the same time, it helps the arts organizations. Everyone benefits from stimulating creativity; we can never have too much of that."

KidsArts began in the fall of 1986 with two instructors — an artist and a dancer — who taught children ages 6 through 12 every other week for eight weeks at four sites — Casa de Amigos, Midland Boys Club, St. Andrews Presbyterian Mission and the Washington/Northeast YMCA.

With the Assembly working as the liaison between the artists and the after-school programs, the arts outreach program has expanded to include an instructor representing art, dance, drama and music. Each of the four instructors teaches one day a week at one of the four sites.

The purpose of the program is to increase participation in the visual and performing arts among young children of low-income and minority families whose opportunities for these creative activities are limited, Ms. Maldonado says.

"I feel that KidsArts is fulfilling its goals," says Judy Morris of Casa de Amigos. "It is getting the kids from low-income neighborhoods to participate in very high quality instruction in the four arts that are currently offered and providing very good role models as teachers."

Thus far, Casa has hosted classes in all four areas and reached around 200 kids in the process.

One of Ms. Morris' wishes for the program is "more scholarship money available for low-income children who show promise in the arts. I'd like to see more of our low-income children involved in the arts here in Midland."

Some scholarships have been available through the Museum of the Southwest, which has awarded four to outstanding students so they could attend classes there.

In addition, KidsArts, which is partially funded by Chevron USA, received a van from Southwestern Bell Telephone Company and its Telephone Pioneers.

And this past spring, First City National Bank hosted a showing of plywood painted murals by the students at Midland Boys Club and clay masks painted by students at St. Andrews Mission.

A sign of the success of the program is the addition in 1988, at the request of the after-school program site directors, of a summer session.

"The kids that have participated have been opened up to something new they had never experienced," says Nick Sanchez, director of Midland Boys Club. "It gave them more confidence — enough to present a play to parents. The kids did it because they wanted to, not because they were told to.

"The kids were really impressed with the tour at the theater (Theatre Midland). They were amazed by everything that was involved in a play — costumes, makeup, the lighting — everything."

"KidsArts had a real good impact on the boys and girls at Northeast Y," says Al Jackson, Northeast YMCA director. "More children were involved in the KidsArts program this summer than ever before.

"They all wanted to paint murals on the building at Washington Park. They came up with their own ideas, and each scene tells a story — playing basketball, playing soccer, picking up trash and keeping the park clean. KidsArts is very, very useful."

Dance created "so much interest," Jackson says, "the Y has expanded its regular programs. Without the arts instructors provided by the Arts Assembly, the after-school programs wouldn't have been so successful. "

Barbara McWilliams, St. Andrews Presbyterian Mission after-school program volunteer, has high regard for the instructors.

"With Kelly Moran, they had very fine art instruction and look forward to it every time," she says. "Shelby Bond was a lot of fun; the optional drama class this summer built up from 12 children to 25."

Bond, who is currently traveling with Up With People, spent his time exposing his students to as many aspects of acting as he could.

"I tried to do this at a level that would hold their attention, but would allow them to possibly learn without always knowing they were,' says Bond. "The most successful way of accomplishing this was through the use of theater games. We began with these and gradually built up to short improvisations where the characters had a purpose to the scene."

Bond also took his students on a tour of Theatre Midland which, he says, "Really gave them more of an idea of what we were learning."

"Shelby videotaped them at the end, and that was by far the most thrilling thing they had done," Ms. Maldonado says.

This summer marked the first time Ms. Edmonds had taught an entire semester program for KidsArts.

"Teaching that class was different from teaching at a studio," she says. "When the kids come to the studio, the parents really want to see that they've learned something. Having fun is very important, but sometimes it takes second place in the studio."

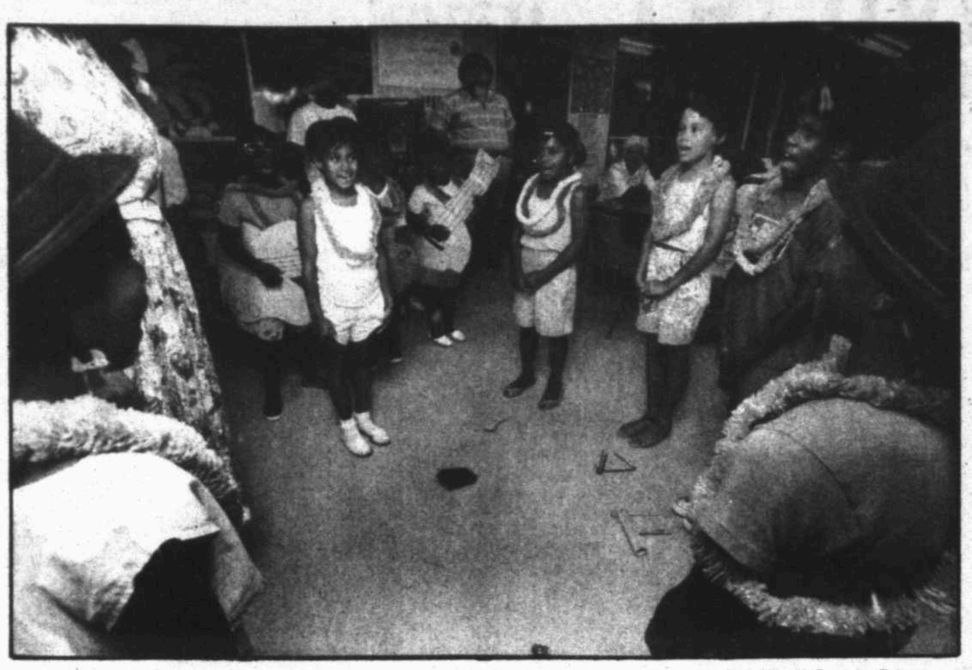

Ms. Edmonds' approach this summer was geared to having fun.

"All dance is is just movement," she says. "I wanted them to have fun moving. Ballet tends to take it a little bit deeper, but I wanted to keep it simple and say, 'If you can move, you can dance.' "

She also wanted to remove the myth that dancing is for "sissies."

"You really must have an athletic ability to keep doing it for any length of time," Ms. Edmonds says. She laughs and adds, "After the first two classes, I totally forgot that these kids were new to this. I wouldn't give them a break, and these kids would be totally exhausted."

She recalls a couple of older students saying, "Wow, this really is hard work."

Casa de Amigos youth sing for senior citizens at Casa as part of the KidsArts program, sponsored by Arts Assembly of Midland.

Ms. Moran, who has been teaching for KidsArts since the program began, has taught working in clay, drawing and self-portrait to expose the students to the various types of art.

"I also show them pictures of art to make them feel comfortable looking at art," Ms. Moran says. "The kids really want to be there and learn. It feels great. Art is fun. There's no pressure. I think it's a way for them to take a little bit of a different look at the world and see things a little bit differently."

Ms. Walker, who was a little skeptical at first about tying herself down to being in town every Tuesday during the summer, says, "I would like to have had the same kids more often. Every Tuesday was almost a starting over point."

Her class included some basic fundamentals of music — half notes, quarter notes, rhythm.

"Then, I taught them fun silly songs that they would have a good time doing, and I taught them hand-jive — things that would build their coordination," Ms. Walker says.

Other instructors since the progran began include Frieda Duggan, Leslie Hill, Danny Holeva and Kay Sprecher, art; and James Cramer, Charles Willett and Octavio Nieto, dance. Teachers who have signed on for the fall sememster, which begins the first week in October, include Ms. Moran and Gloria Youngblood, drama.

The arts — music, art, drama and dance — help broaden a person's internal and external world and are vital in developing well-rounded individuals.

"The basis for children staying in school and for building self-esteem is to give them experiences on which to build their competency and their feelings of self-worth," Ms. Morris says. "Art experiences are just as important as academic experiences in trying to build the whole child."

Contest open for Arts Assembly logo

From Staff Reports

Wanted: A new logo for The Arts Assembly of Midland, formerly known as Midland Arts Assembly.

The arts organization's board of directors recently voted to change the name on the recommendation of the long-range planning committee.

"There has been confusion over the similiarity of our name and that of Midland Arts Association," says Jean Posey, the Assembly's executive director. "In spite of the problems associated with changing names of groups, such as ours, we decided it was the best action we could take. We are having a new logo contest, and we will start our 1989 program of work with a new name and a new face."

Entry forms for the logo competition are available in today's edition of the Reporter-Telegram.

The umbrella organization for the arts in Midland, the organization is perhaps best known for its May Celebration of the Arts.

Other programs include KidsArts & Company, the Gallery of Midland Arts each November and December at Midland Park Mall, Midland Marquee in Sunday's Reporter-Telegram, a community calendar, Cityline — 682-ARTS, the Advistory Council, the Directory of Midland Visual and Performing Artists and a quarterly newspetter.

'A...My Name is Alice' night of laughter

Midland Community Theatre's current running musical production "A...My Name is Alice" allows men to engage in an activity for which they are well known.

Girl watching.

Temple

An all-female romp through the seasons of life, "A...My Name is Alice" provides an evening of laughter. The six-member cast — Debora Dillard, Barbara Iglehart, Dana Ritter, Patsy Allen, Patty Loftis and Carole Cristiani — work well as an ensemble.

Each also has shining moments spent alone in the spotlight.

I recommend to those who want to see this production that they call Theatre Midland ASAP. Mabee Theatre II is small and most performances are sold out and have a waiting list. The theater has added two performances Sunday, Oct. 2 and those are available. I couldn't get a seat opening night so I went for dress rehearsal, and it was already obvious that this was one not to miss.

Men and women alike in the theater were chuckling to themselves and out loud. The production is for mature audiences. No children please.

The Permian Basin Fair and Exposition had record crowds Friday night only to be dampened by rain on Saturday. Those who didn't see the pig races in person missed a treat. Pigs love Oreo cookies. All were male except one, Hannie Faye Bacon, and named for, well, personalities in the news.

In addition, Cajun, the white racoon, owned by Texas Safari of Clifton, was a special treat. He and his Pekingese friend put on quite a show at the petting zoo. Although the petting zoo was designed for children, many adult kids like myself were enjoying animal watching.

The Christian rock group Petra gave those who attended its Monday performance at Chaparral Center all they came to hear plus more. Fans, ranging in age from 8 to around 50, spent much of the evening on their feet, keeping time to the music and singing along. I'm sure mine wasn't the only backbone John Schlitt's voice sent chills down.

Before closing the concert, Bob Hartman, the remaining founding member of the group which began in 1972, talked about Christians being in a spiritual warfare against Satan. And, the group's current tour is called "This Means War."

"If you are a Christian tonight, you are in a spiritual warfare," Hartman said. Some people have difficulty with the devil concept, and he didn't know about the devil until he found God, he said.

"If you want to find out if the devil's real, you don't have to go to a seance or play a Ouija board, just get close to God," Hartman said. "Satan can't handle anything that has anything to do with God."

"Satan is foremost a thief," Hartman said.

When he asked the crowd if they were spiritual wimps, boos could be heard throughout the hall. When he said, "Get on your knees and fight like a man," cheers filled the center.

"God wants you to be Satan's personal nightmare," Hartman said, asking people to be that by telling others about Jesus Christ.

The audience responded enthusiastically to his message and to the music.

In 1980, when I was living with my cousins Pat and Tom Frizzell, one of their school-age daughters, Rachael or Virginia, called me to the phone. They didn't know the call was from an entertainer who was performing in Midland that night. He was setting up an interview.

When I told them who was on the phone, their squeals could be heard throughout the house so I asked them to join us at La Bodega.

As long as I live, I will remember the two of them standing by our table wanting to be noticed yet not wanting to be noticed. He could not have been more charming and insisted they sit down, join us for dinner and sit at his table during the show.

That evening, Virginia said something to me that I have laughed at often in the years since — "I have a case of perma-smile."

Thank you Michael Martin Murphey for that memory. Murphey performs at 7:30 p.m. Wednesday at Midland's Chaparral Center. He puts on a high-energy show.

The occasion is the center's 10th anniversary celebration. Sponsored by KNFM-Radio, admission to the concert is canned goods.

Ex-Midlander sells 5 books to Dell Publishing

Elaine Gunter Coffman, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Del F. Baucum of Odessa, has recently sold five books to Dell Publishing Company in New York.

Her first book, "My Enemy, My Love," will be out in mid-September. Ms. Coffman has taken an apartment in Manhattan to be close to her publisher. She also has a home on Chesapeake Bay in Annapolis, Md.

Ms. Coffman earned a scholarship from North Texas State University and graduated cum laude with a degree in Elementary Education. She then went on to earn her masters from Texas Tech in special education.

Although she grew up in Midland and graduated from Midland High School, she was born in San Diego, Calif., and lived there until she was about 6 years old. She moved to Austin in 1979.

She has served as secretary of Midland Community Theatre's Act IX, president of the First Presbyterian Women of the Church, president of the Permian Civic Ballet Guild and as a member of Midland Symphony Guild and the Midland Country Club. She is a member of the Daughters of the American Revolution, Magna Carta Dames, Colonial Dames, Daughters of 1812 and Americans of Royal Descent. She is affiliated with Chi Omega Sorority.

Ms. Coffman's next book, "Entanglements," a contemporary romance about West Texans, is expected to be out in 1989. Dell Publishing has acclaimed Ms. Coffman as a natural story teller and a sensual new voice in writing.

She will be at Hastings Books, Records & Videos, Midland Plaza, in October to autograph of her first book, "My Enemy, My Love."

Carthage and its cultures focus of Houston exhibit

From Staff Reports

Carthage was utterly destroyed by Roman forces in the Third Punic War in 146 B.C. — the city was burned to the ground, the earth was ploughed with salt and the population decimated. But Carthage rose again and again. This great city and its successive cultures is the focus of a major exhibition at the Houston Museum of Natural Science through Oct. 2.

"Carthage: A Mosaic of Ancient Tunisia" gives the most comprehensive view of ancient Tunisian life and culture ever exhibited in the United States. Houston is the second city in a five-city, two-year national tour.

Enormous brightly colored mosaics, outstanding Roman bronzes and a collection of rare Punic jewelry are being exhibited with 300 other pieces, many to be seen by the public for the first time. The exhibition shows ancient Tunisia as a center of culture, history and art from 800 B.C. to the beginning of the Islamic period after the seventh century A.D.

Destroyed by the Romans, Carthage rose again to become a great cultural center whose role in history has been recently reaffirmed by 15 years of archaeological excavations in the area.

Among the items on display are 17 of the world's most outstanding pictorial mosaics — the largest approximately 27 feet long and six-and-a-half feet wide — that provide a visual record of life in the region from the first to the fourth centuries A.D.

The Punic jewelry includes gold amulets decorated with sacred lions, faience demons, necklaces of precious tone, bronze mirrors and bells for warding off evil spirits.

There are five sections to the exhibit:

■ Prehistory and the Berbers — shows the importance of the cultures in ancient Tunisia before the coming of the Phoenicians and Romans. Highlights include a death mask mold of a Berber from the third century A.D.

■ Punic Carthage — introduces viewers to the region through maps and a Carthaginian "Hall of Fame," includes biographical information on such legendary figures as Hannibal and Queen Dido.

■ Carthage Reborn: The Coming of Rome — looks at the rebirth of Carthage following its destruction by the Romans.

■ Romanization — deals with the changeover from Punic and Berber civilization to integration with the Roman Empire. Included here are such items as a lead mask associated with performance in the theater and a mosaic with an Egyptian theme of pygmies hunting wild animals.

■ Cathaginian Twilight — features mosaics showing aspects of late Roman religion in Tunisia. On exhibit are one of Tunisia's most beautiful mosaics: the head of summer from the city of Acholla.

"Carthage: A Mosaic of Ancient Tunisia" is organized and sponsored by the American Museum of Natural History, New York City. The art objects and artifacts are on loan from the Institut National D'Archeologie et D'Art, Tunisia. The exhibition is funded in part by the National Endowment for the Humanities and is supported by an indemnity from the Federal Council on the Arts and Humanities.

Carthage is on view in the Museum's Jones Gallery through Oct. 2. Museum admission is free to members and children 4 and under; $2 non-member adults; and $1 non-member children 5 to 11 years.

Complementary educational programs and a special Planetarium program on the "Seven Wonders of the Universe" are planned in conjunction with this exhibition.

The Houston Museum of Natural Science, a private, non-profit organization, is located in Hermann Park across from Miller Theatre. The Museum is open Sunday and Monday from noon to 5 p.m.; and Tuesday through Saturday from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. For more information about admission fees and hours, please call 1-713-526-4273.

'Messenger of Death' action drags

By MYRA LEE SALCEDO

Salcedo

Charles Bronson is Garrett Smith, a Denver Tribune reporter assigned to investigate the massacre of six children and three wives — all members of the same Mormon family, an expelled sect. Soon, the plot reveals that the only surviving member of the family, the husband and father of the slain victims, is involved in a feud with his brother and father. He has plenty of cultist relatives who could have killed his family in order to make them "pay for their sins with blood atonement."

When Smith approaches a relative of the murdered family, the man asks "Gentile?"

"Worse," Smith deadpans, "I'm a reporter."

It's the only humorous moment in this film, which stars Bronson in one of the more subdued roles of his career. But Bronson's character isn't the only laid-back element in this slow-moving whodunit. With the exception of the car chase scenes, the pacing of the film tends to drag, especially for an "action" film.

Smith is more of a peacemaker, an intermediary between the feuding brothers, who are well played by Jeff Corey and John Ireland. He soon discovers that a third party is involved, and the final outcome of the film, which reveals the murderer, isn't much of a surprise.

It's difficult to say where "Messenger of Death" goes wrong, but it succeeds in being a lukewarm drama rather than an intense potboiler.

One of the problems is that Bronson is not terribly convincing as a newspaper reporter. Although it is gratifying to finally see on film a computer-filled newsroom sans typewriters, it's hard to accept the brutality with which Smith acts to literally "kick" the story out of someone. Although Smith needs strong-arm tactics to survive the mess he gets into, it's not entirely plausible that a reporter would also be an excellent fighter, especially with no background to explain his hand-to-hand combat expertise and expert marksmanship.

"Messenger of Death" starts and finishes strong, but the message gets somewhat muddled in the middle, which takes the edge off of the enfolding drama. Although itis fairly consistent and well-shot in scenic Colorado, it just doesn't pack a punch. One wonders if the book on which it was based, "Avenging Angel" by Rex Burns, is better.

"Messenger of Death," rated R for some brutal violence, is showing at the UA Cine 4 on Cuthbert.

'Little Shop' to be staged at Tech

LUBBOCK — The national touring company of the live production of "Little Shop of Horrors" will be presented at Texas Tech University in the Allen Theatre at 8:15 p.m. Thursday, Oct. 6.

"For the past five years, the cast of "Little Shop of Horrors" has kept its audiences rolling in the aisles both in New York and overseas," says a release from Texas Tech. "The charm and success of this production exists in the cartoon-like characters of Howard Ashman and the raucous musical score of Alan Menken."

Leading the cast is Audrey II, a cross between a cactus and a sharked-toothed avocado, who sings and dances its way into the viewer's funny bone. Human members of the cast include Seymour, king of the nerds and Audrey, a dizzy blonde bombshell with an Elmer Fudd lisp.

Also along for the ride are a trio of "she-bop" girls, a greedy flower shop owner and a sadistic leather-clad dentist who likes to work with Novocaine. The musical score shoots the audience back into the 60s with a combination of Rock 'n' Roll, Latin riffs and sweet ballads, all of which keep the audience's feet tapping while they watch the fate of the cast and the world unfold in the hungry jaws of Audrey II.

"Little Shop of Horrors" is being presented one night only, and tickets are on sale at the University Center Ticket Booth and Sears at the mall. Prices for this event are $8 for Tech students (with valid IDs) and $14 for all other patrons. Due to the necessity of ID validation, students will not be able to purchase their tickets at Sears. All tickets will be $14 at the door on the night of the event. All seats for this event are reserved.

For more information call the U.C. Ticket Booth at 806-742-3610.

Texas State Fair scheduled for Oct. 7-23

From Staff Reports

DALLAS — The 1988 State Fair of Texas is set for Oct. 7-23 in Dallas.

Competition has always played a large part in State Fair traditions. Winners abound — in the livestock arenas, in the contest kitchens, in the stadium, on the stages and scattered in almost every other spot around the 277-acre Fair Park.

But competition takes on even more importance this year, as the Fair's theme salutes "The Winning Ticket" and hosts several new competitive events at the 1988 State Fair of Texas.

For the first time Fair visitors can watch celebrity look-alike contests, auditions for "The Gong Show," llama judging and an attempt to break the record for the "World's Largest Landlocked Sandcastle."

The sandcastle, projected to require 4,000 tons of sand, will be built over a four-week period and exhibited during the fair. Auditions for "The Gong Show" will be held Oct. 14-15.

The celebrity look-alike contest is scheduled for Oct. 23 and will include categories for national political personalities, movie or television personalities, comic strip characters and well-known Dallas area personalities.

In the livestock arenas, new events for llamas and draft horses will be added to the line up of past years. National Santa Gertrudis and Brown Swiss cattle shows will be highlighted during the 36th annual Pan American Livestock Exposition...while the horse show agenda includes competition for Palominos, Arabians, (and) Appaloosas...

A family look-alike contest will be held Oct. 22, with divisions for mother-daughter, mother-son, father-daughter and father-son look-alike.

One new contest, the Breakfast and Brunch Bake, will join the Creative Arts staples of cakes, cookies, candy, bread and numerous other competitions which always draw large Fair audiences.

In the livestock arenas, new events for llamas and draft horses will be added to the line up of past years. National Santa Gertrudis and Brown Swiss cattle shows will be highlighted during the 36th annual Pan American Livestock Exposition Oct. 7-16, while the horse show agenda includes competition for Palominos, Arabians, Appaloosas, as well as for donkeys, mules and miniature horses.

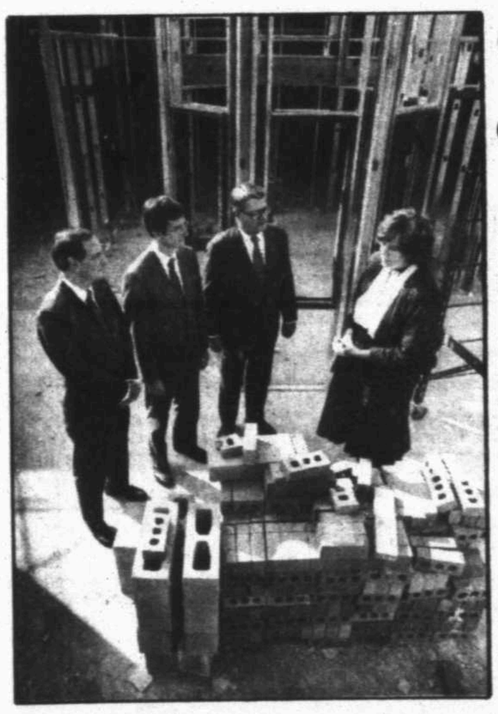

In the Cotton Bowl, the universities of Texas and Oklahoma will meet in their traditional rivalry Oct. 8, while several Dallas high schools will play Oct. 21. The Cotton bowl will also be the site of World Championship Wrestling matches, featuring Kerry Von Erich, on Oct. 15.

A nightly parade and fireworks show, several daily performances by ice skaters and high divers, foreign exhibits led by the People's Republic of China, daily concerts by a variety of performers, as well as merchandise for sale, Midway rides and games and palate-pleasing foods await fair-goers.

A special attraction playing at the Music Hall during the State Fair will be "Elvis: A Musical Celebration." The show, a multi-million dollar, multi-media look at the life and times of the legendary "King of Rock 'n' Roll," features 20 performers in addition to newsreel footage and movie scenes of Elvis. Tickets range in price from $5 to $35.

Separate tickets will also be required for the football games and wrestling matches. All other events will be offered under the regular State Fair gate admission of $4 for adults and $1 for children (ages 5 to 11) on weekdays and $5 for adults and $2 for children on Saturdays and Sundays. Senior citizens are admitted free each Tuesday.

Fair grounds will be open from 7 a.m. to 11:30 p.m. daily, and buildings will be open from 10 a.m. to 10 p.m.

Cadets from Fort Stockton's old Gibbs Field plan reunion

FORT STOCKTON — After many months of planning, the long-awaited reunion of the Gibbs Field cadets and instructors will be transformed from a dream into a reality. Gibbs Field was a primary flight training school used during World War II.

The event is scheduled to begin on Thursday and wind up Saturday. Some of the reunion plans include receptions for the people stationed at Biggs Field, Bar-B-Q and dance with WWII era music, tours of historic Fort Stockton, Gibbs Field, and also the Ste. Genevieve winery. An exciting airshow with aerobatics and aircraft of different vintages on static display is also scheduled along with many other events too numerous to mention.

Gibbs Field was located in the West Texas town of Fort Stockton and was in its heyday during the years 1942 to 1944. The school graduated over 5,000 pilots. When the base ceased operations in May of 1944, the field and facilities were turned over to Pecos County. The airbase has served as the county and Fort Stockton airport since that time with many of the original structures from Gibbs Field days still in use and intact.

A group of community minded citizens realized that the Gibbs Field era was a shining star in Fort Stockton's past and decided that a reunion was in order for all who taught or earned their wings at Gibbs Field.

A committee was formed back in 1986 to plan, organize, and promote the reunion. Several of the committee members were actually present in the Gibbs Field days and served as instructors or students.

The preliminary registration packets have been mailed to the located personnel and the initial response is strong. Many events, such as the airshow, are available to the public as well as the Gibbs Field personnel.

The Fort Stockton Chamber of Commerce, 1-336-2264, may be contacted for any information desired regarding any of the Gibbs Field reunion activities.

Murphy to perform at MC

From Staff Reports

Michael Martin Murphey brings his "Cherokee Fiddle" to Midland's Chaparral Center Wednesday for a free "Listener Appreciation Concert" held in honor of the center's 10th anniversary and sponsored by KNFM-Radio.

The opening act is Odessa's Westwind, winner of the KNFM Battle of the Bands at the Permian Basin Fair and Exposition.

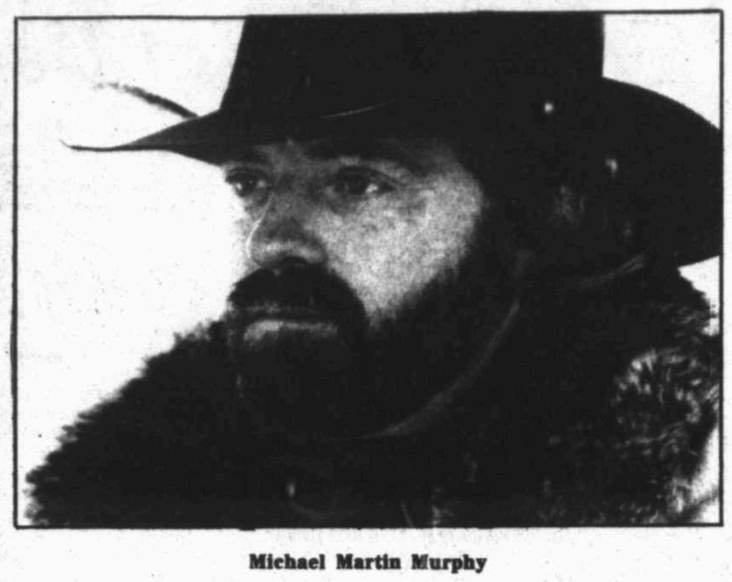

Cost of admission is canned food which will go to the Permian Basin Food Bank. Those attending need to pick up a ticket at one of 17 outlets in Midland, Odessa and Big Spring. For more information call KNFM-Radio, 563-5636.

Murphey's hit songs include, in addition to "Cherokee Fiddle," "Wildfire," "Carolina in the Pines" and "Geronimo's Cadillac." He has released his 15th album, "River of Time."

Murphey's youth was steeped in music. He was influenced by the throbbing emotion of Hank Williams, the western stylings of Bob Wills and by the example of Woody Guthrie, a troubadour who lived on the road and used his music to make a difference.

Attending UCLA, Murphey played in a group called the Lewis and Clark Expedition with Boomer Castleman. Living in the Mojave Desert, he wrote songs for Flatt and Scruggs, the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band and a 22-song album about a Mojave ghost town called "The Ballad of Calico" for Kenny Rogers.

When fellow Texan and friend Michael Nesmith became one of the Monkees, Murphey penned one of the group's smash hits, "What Am I Doin' Hanging Around," which led to his being signed as a songwriter by Screen Gems. Eventually, Murphey found himself a part of the singer-songwriter scene of Los Angeles that included Linda Ronstadt, Jackson Browne and others.

Michael Martin Murphy

By 1971, Murphey moved back to Austin, where he became a part of that city's music scene along with performers like Willie Nelson and Jerry Jeff Walker. Amidst the cross-pollination of musical styles going on at that time, Murphey forged his own style that included old time country and mainstream pop music, becoming a part of the vanguard of what was known as "Texas outlaw" music.

Murphey became involved with Indian rights activists like Guy Dull Knife and wrote "Geronimo's cadillac," which became an anthem for the Indian rights movement. Working with producer Bob Johnston, Murphey released "Geronimo's Cadillac," "Cosmic Cowboy Souvenir" and "Michael Martin Murphey."

He moved to Colorado in 1974 and his next album "Blue Sky, Night Thunder," included shuch songs as "Carolina in the Pines" and "Wildfire," which became a No. 1 pop hit.

Murphey has lived in Taos since 1978. He is also known for such hits as "Back Sliders Wine," "What's Forever For," "Still Taking Chances," "Don't Count the Rainy Days," "Disenchanted," "What She Wants," "A Long Line of Love," with Holly Dunn, and "A Face in the Crowd," which reached No. 1 nationally on the country charts.

When he's not on the road touring, he can be found entertaining audiences at the Sagebrush Inn, Taos.

Classical guitarist will give recital

From Staff Reports

SAN ANGELO — Javier Calderon, widely recognized as one of today's finest classical guitarists, will appear in recital 4 p.m. today at the San Angelo Museum of Fine Arts, Avenue C and Burgess Street.

The concert serves as the premier of the third season of the San Angelo Chamber Music Series, with five additional concerts to be held in upcoming months.

Born in La Paz, Bolivia, Calderon made his debut at 17 as a soloist with the National Symphony Orchestra of Bolivia. He was nominated in 1975 as one of the "Outstanding Young Artists of the Year" by High Fidelity-Musical America Magazine and today performs extensively in the United States, Europe, South America and Asia.

A critic of the Evening Star in Washington, D.C. wrote about one of his performances, "to hear the manner in which Calderon managed Moussorgsky's insistent piano ostinatos and balanced the myriad shifting harmonies and dynamics, was to hear a miracle conjured entirely in the whispered world of the classical guitar."

Encouraged by an uncle to learn the cello, Calderon played that instrument in the National Symphony Orchestra of Bolivia as a youth, which gave him experience and a clear understanding of ensemble music. He enjoys performing chamber music for guitar with other instruments, and has played in chamber recitals with such musicians as violinists Alexander Schneider and Regiero Ricci, violist Emanuel Vardi, and cellist Yo Yo Ma.

Like Andres Segovia, Calderon is interested in expanding the repertoire of the guitar. He performs his own arrangements of Bach suites, the Spanish Dances of Albeniz and Grandos, and many Latin American folk dances. Many composers have dedicated compositions to him. It was for Calderon that the eminent American composer Alan Hovhaness wrote his Guitar Concerto in 1979.

In today's performance in San Angelo, Calderon will play a variety of selections, including "Suite for Guitar" by Manuel Ponce, "Chaconne in d minor" by J.S. Bach and "Sevilla" by Isaac Albeniz.

Season tickets for the Series are $30 for the general public, $25 for Art Museum members and $25 for Students. Individual tickets are $7.50 for the general public, $7. for Art Museum members and $5 for Students. To reserve tickets or for more information call 1-658-4084.

Nuremberg culture subject of videoshow

From Staff Reports

Video Tuesdays at the Museum of the Southwest, 1705 W. Missouri Ave., are continuing through the remainder of the year with an emphasis on artists through the ages and art history.

The schedule for the remainder of September and for October is as follows:

— Tuesday, "Tradesmen and Treasures: Gothic and Renaissance Nuremberg" - During the 14th, 15th, and 16th centuries Nuremberg evolved from an important Late Gothic city within the Holy Roman Empire to a Renaissance center whose artistic, humanistic, and scientific achievements had far reaching consequences. Views of castles, churches, and homes are shown as well as artists' works.

— Oct. 4, "The Age of Rembrandt (1600-1680) - In the 17th century the Northern Spanish Netherlands became an independent Holland and rose to pre-eminence in science, trade, education, and art. It was the Golden Age of Holland, and Rembrandt became the outstanding artist of his age. And — "Baroque Painting in France and Italy (1600-1800) - This is a survey of the immense variety of style and intention in French and Italian Painting beginning with the dramatic realism of Caravaggio and ending with Guardi's atmospheric landscapes and including Poussin, Watteau, Boucher, and Tiepolo.

— Oct. 11, "Goya" - In this film Goya's most prominent works are featured — the etchings, war scenes, bullfight sequences, tapestries, portraits of royalty and of friends, frescoes, and the black paintings. Goya is considered one of the greatest Spanish masters of all time.

— Oct. 18, "Multiplication of Styles (1700-1900)" - A survey of the painting, sculpture, and architecture of 1700-1900. And - Daumier (1808-1885) - Henri Daumier was a sharp, observant visual wit of the 19th century who took the part of ordinary people against kings and princes, of the poor against the rich, of social justice against inequality. And - "Toulouse-Lautrec (1808-1879)" - This film portrays the man as well as the creative genius who cynically documented the world of gaiety in which he could not participate.

— Oct. 25, "Degas: The Unquiet Spirit" - This unorthodox artist dared to show women as real people engaged in often unglamourous activities. Included is a look at a private collection of Degas' fragil and rarely seen wax sculptures.

Hours are Tuesday through Saturday 10 a.m. until 5 p.m. and on Saturday 2 until 5 p.m. Admission is free.

Opening lead: Four of ♠

Sometimes, the location of a key card can be crucial. But once in a while it will make no difference. Witness this hand from the recent Summer North American Championships in Salt Lake City. We have interchanged one card between the East–West holdings.

East's jump to three hearts posed a slight problem for South, since his side might have had a 4–4 spade fit. After some thought, however, he elected to make the sensible bid of three no trump, and that became the final contract.

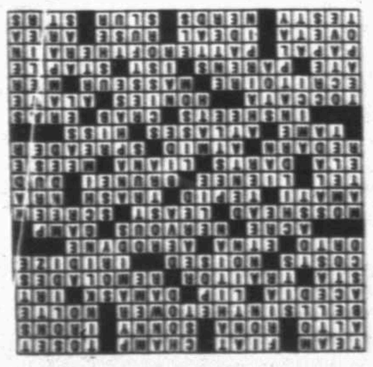

West led his fourth–best spade and declarer, Joey Silver of Montreal, realized at once that West had to be void in hearts. He cashed four rounds of diamonds and, when West followed to all, declarer knew that his distribution was either 5–0–4–4 or 6–0–4–3.

With only eight fast tricks in sight, declarer needed either a fourth trick in clubs or an endplay for his fulfilling trick. Since East could not be allowed to gain the lead, declarer had to hope that West's club holding included the jack if he held only three cards in the suit. If West started with four clubs, it might seem that the percentage play would be to finesse him for the jack, but Silver realized that, if that were the case, the location of the jack was unimportant.

Declarer cashed three rounds of clubs, discarding hearts from hand while hoping the jack would drop. When that card did not appear, South exited with the table's remaining club, pitching his penultimate heart. Fortunately, West was forced to win this trick, and he had to concede the fulfilling trick to declarer's jack of spades.

Symphony to feature Soviet violinist

From Staff Reports

Shkolnikova

Now in his 15th season, music director Thomas Hohstadt will conduct the opening concerts of the Midland-Odessa Symphony & Chorale's 1988-89 Master Season.

Those concerts will be held at 8 p.m. Tuesday at Lee High School and at 8 p.m. Thursday at Odessa's Bonham Junior High.

Joining Hohstadt for the concerts, which feature the music of Press, Holst and Tchaikovsky, will be Russian violinist Nelli Shkolnikova.

Categorized as a child prodigy, at age 5, she was enrolled in a music school attached to the Moscow Conservatorium.

International fame came to Ms. Shkolnikova when the young student became first prize winner in a competition which included 30 violinists from 25 countries. It was her performance of the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto that she will perform with the Midland-Odessa Symphony that brought her such honors. She quickly gained international recognition and concert tours followed to Europe, Canada, Japan, Australia and the United States.

After her second tour in Australia in 1970, Moscow suddenly decided to allow her to perform only behind the Iron Courtain. Then, in 1982, after performing in West Berlin, she threw away her return ticket and defected.

Already in her 50s, she started a new career, settling in Melbourne, Australia to teach.

Today, she is a music teacher at the University of Indiana, in addition to being a soloist. She has appeared with major orchestras in the USSR, Czechslovakia, Hungary, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, Finland, East Germany, France, Austria, Japan, the United States, Australia and New Zealand.

The Midland performance is sponsored by NCNB Texas, and the Odessa performance is sponsored by Mr. andMrs. Earl Rodman.

Season tickets are available by calling the Symphony Concert Line, 563-5269, or by purchasing them at the door.

Tickets for individual performances may be purchased at Texas American Bank, Midland, M-Bank in Odessa or at the door. Discounts for groups of 20 or more are available by calling the symphony office.

ENTERTAINMENT IN BRIEF

O'Keefe program focus

"Georgia O'Keeffe: The Artist and the Woman," a program of slides and commentary is scheduled for noon Wednesday at the Museum of the Southwest, 1705 W. Missouri Ave.

The program will be given by Dorothy Perkins.

Those attending are invited to bring a lunch. The museum will furnish drinks.

Ms. Perkins, former head of Midland High School's English Department, book reviewer and a participant in many Midland community organizations, has a long held interest in Ms. O'Keeffe and her work.

Ms. Perkins' interest began in a college art history class and continued when she viewed the painting "Ranchos de Taos." Further study of Ms. O'Keeffe's art work and of her life added to Ms. Perkins' regard for the artist.

She felt a particular affinity when reading that Ms. O'Keeffe drove her Model T across the plains to a teaching job. Ms. Perkins drove her brother's Model A across the plains to Midland for her first teaching assignment.

Ms. Perkins earned a masters degree in English from Middlebury College, vermont. This year, she was named "Outstanding Volunteer of the Year in the Arts/Humanities" by the Volunteer Center. She was nominated by the museum where she has been a long time volunteer.

Robertson, business manager for ARCO, with a season poster in appreciation of the $12,000 grant from the ARCO Foundation.

Symphony receives ARCO grant

From Staff Reports

Marvin E. Pringle of Midland, ARCO vice president and district manager, presented the Midland-Odessa Symphony & Chorale with a $12,000 grant from the ARCO Foundation, specifically to continue the Youth Programs in the Midland and Ector County school systems.

In presenting the grant, Pringle noted that the foundation's income has declined as a result of oil price fluctuations recently and this generous gift, representing a significant increase over previous support, was testimony to the value the foundation places on the Symphony Youth Program.

For five years, the Symphony, working with the Midland County Independent School District and the Ector County Independent School District, has presented a series of free in-school concerts to all 4th, 5th and 6th grade students in Midland and Ector Counties.

These concerts, which have utilized the Symphony Chamber Orchestra, the Thouvenel String Quartet and the Lone Star Brass Quintet, will reach over 16,000 students. This series is considered to be a major factor in the exceptionally high enrollment in the string and orchestra classes inboth school districts.

"ARCO feels that this first-hand exposure to live professional musicians is a valuable supplement to the students education and has lasting benefits to the student and the community as well," Pringle says. "We are proud to be a part of this endeavor."

Protect your car from sludge damage

Sludge.

The word itself sounds dirty, grimy, slow-sludge.

If you say the word over and over, it begins to take on the characteristics of the awful thing it represents. Sludge.

This slushy mass of sediment that all too many people find clogging their engines is really the legacy of neglect; a by-product of poor engine maintenance and, sometimes, poor motor oil formulation and poor engine design.

Top motor oil marketers can guarantee the quality of their motor oil. but the best formulations in the world are negated of car owners don't understand that sludge is an avoidable engine deposit.

As far as engines are concerned, sludge can become public enemy number one.

Motor oil is about 80 percent base oil and 20 percent additives. The battle against sludge is fought by delicately balanced additive packages. A number of chemical compounds act in concert to collectively fight sludge build-up.

Viscosity index improvements allow motor oils to flow freely at most temperatures, making multi-grade oils and all-temperature engine protection possible. On-demand lubrication during cold-engine start-ups eliminates metal-to-metal contact and keeps microscopic metal from contributing to sludge build-up.

Oxidation inhibitors keep engine oil from permanently thickening into sludge.

Bearing corrosion inhibitors form a protective coating over bearings that if otherwise not protected contribute to the "S" word problem.

Foam inhibitors work to collapse air bubbles that form in the motor oil due to severe churning, and thus avoid metal-to-metal contact by engine parts.

Detergents prevent build-up of deposits which cause sludge on engine parts, but cannot remove already established engine deposits.

Dispersants, one of the most important additives relative to sludge, keep particulate matter suspended in engine oil, where it remains harmless until the oil is changed. Yes, some particles are caught by the oil filter, but not all.

there are other additives, such as friction modifiers and anti-wear additives which are more performance oriented. These additives are maintenance related, and intended to aid in keeping your engine free of sludge.

The additive story has a sad, but noble ending. Additives freely give themselves up to protect your engine. The life span of any additive package is limited, based on the severity of your driving...which brings us up to maintenance.

Proper oil change intervals, based on the severity of your driving, can virtually guarantee you a sludge-free engine.

Someone who drives 25 highway miles to work and drives home each evening is not someone whose driving patterns could be called "severe." These individuals should change their oil every three months or three thousand miles. They should also maintain a full oil pump; low oil levels contribute to sludge and varnish build-up.

Taxis, police cars and other fleet vehicles fall into the "severe conditions" category, as do many passenger cars driven for frequent short intervals. Short frequent drives break down additive packages much more quickly than long, infrequent drives. One good rule of thumb is to add up the number of hours a vehicle is in service. For example, a taxi operated 24 hours a day, seven days a week is working for 168 hours every week. Most commuting drivers take three to four months to reach those totals. Accordingly, the motor oil in the taxi should be changed every week. Not doing so is a gilt-edged invitation to Mr. sludge.

By the way, change your filter with every oil change. Not changing your oil filter is like bathing in dirty water.

Today's motor oil are formulated to prevent sludge. We know that the advanced additive technology used in our engine oil formulations will withstand the most severe type of operations encountered in consumer driving today.

Say no to sludge. change your oil at engine manufacturers' suggested intervals. Look for oils with SF/CC or SF/CD ratings. Read your owner's manual for proper SAE viscosity requirements and maintenance schedules based on your driving habits and climate you live in.

Improperly worn seat belts can cause injury

By H. JOSEF HEBERT
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON (AP) — Many motorists who wear seat belts are still exposing themselves to serious injury by wearing them improperly, according to a federal study that says women, children and motorists over 50 are most likely to put themselves at risk.

The National Transportation Safety Board study raised questions bout the way some belt users wear the safety devices after examining 167 accidents in which at least one occupant was belted.

Twenty-one percent of the motorists wearing belts had too much slack in the shoulder harnesses, and 7 percent of the occupants, often children, wore belts that were improperly routed behind the back or under an arm.

Thirty-one states have laws requiring use of safety belts. But NTSB Chairman Jim Burnett said, "We have a lot of misuse and that problem has to be tackled."

Overall, the safety board said, lap-shoulder belts provide excellent protection with 80 percent of the belted occupants suffering minor or no injuries. But the study suggested the results could have been even better were it not for improper wearing of belts.

The NTSB study was not a random sample and, therefore, does not necessarily translate into similar percentages for all motorists, said Lynne Smith, who was involved in writing of the report. But, she added, the data are consistent with previous findings of widespread misuse.

The four-member safety board urged the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration to require that safety belts meet standards for the maximum amount of slack allowed or require that the belt systems be equipped with a "pre-tension" device that automatically pulls a belt tight a split second before a crash.

The safety board questioned the widespread use among U.S. carmakers of a belt-design that allows a person to pull the belt out to its full length without it automatically retracting. Most foreign manufacturers use another design which automatically keeps the belt snug against the occupant, but which has been criticized as being less comfortable and, therefore, less likely to be used.

The safety board said there is evidence indicating drivers aged 50 years or older and female occupants are the most likely to misuse belts, especially wearing them too loosely. Ms. Smith said that, generally, slack equal to no more than the width of a fist should be allowed in the shoulder belt.

Remember to comparison shop for insurance

By The Associated Press

"Comparison shopping" for an auto insurer can result in sharply reduced insurance costs.

"While all auto insurance policies may appear similar, quite the opposite is true," says Charles F. Wright, assistant vice president, Aetna Life & Casualty, "and a smart consumer can often save hundreds of dollars.

Some of the money-saving discounts offered by various companies, he says, include:

■ A "total account" credit to those who insure both car and home with the same company. The credit differs from state to state, Wright says, but is usually 10 percent off the auto premium, or 5 percent off both auto and homeowner premiums.

■ Some companies offer a "first accident forgiveness" which, after five continuous accident-free years, guarantees that rates will not go up after a first at-fault accident.

■ Car pool commuters often qualify for discounts.

■ Installing anti-theft devices in your car may qualify you for a discount. "A 5 percent credit is typical for an alarm-only device or an active disabling mechanism which prevents the car from starting," says Wright. Some companies offer a 10 percent credit for a passive disabling device that automatically prevents the car from starting.

■ You can save money by insuring children who drive infrequently because they are away at school on the parents' policy rather than separately.

■ Check the companies that make discounts available to females between 30 and 64 years old who are the only drivers in the household.

■ Good driver discounts are offered by some companies to drivers with accident-and-violation free records and to motorists d. ing fewer than a certain number of miles a year.

■ Some states require discounts be given to drivers who take driver training or defensive driving courses.

■ Drivers still at school may be entitled to a "good student discount" program by maintaining a high scholastic average.

Berg Motor is offering coolant system inspection, oil change, Cadillac Roadside Service

Just in time for fall, the Service Department at Berg Motor Company is offering a free coolant system inspection as well as an oil change and lubrication for a very competitive price of $19.95, according to Ralph Gardner, service manager.

Berg Motor Company is also offering any Cadillac owners a new service - Cadillac Roadside Service. "The objective of this program is to provide on-site roadside assistance, in the form of minor repair or towing service for disabled vehicles," explained Gardner. "This is accomplished primarily through a network of dealer technicians dispatched with specially-equipped vehicles.

Under this program, a Cadillac owner will call an advisor on a toll-free number. The advisor will either (1) instruct the owner on how to solve the problem, (2) contact a technician to assist the owner, or (3) arrange to have the owner's car towed.

Cadillac Roadside Service is available 365 days a year, 24 hours a day to all Cadillac owners - regardless of model or year.

"Due to this service, I am now required to wear a beeper until midnight in case we need to dispatch a technician after the Service Department closes. We are required to have a technician available after we close until midnight, Monday through Friday. On weekends and holidays we are on-call from 8 a.m. until 12 midnight," stated Gardner.

Designed for the traveling Cadillac customer, Gardner feels that this service is a big plus for people who might need assistance on the weekends and holidays and do not know who to call.

When an owner calls the Roadside Operations Center, the advisor will determine if the car can be repaired at roadside within a reasonable period of time, approximately 45 minutes. If it can't be repaired within that time or requires the resources of a Cadillac service facility, towing services then can be arranged for the owner.

"These services - Cadillac Roadside Service, free coolant system inspection and competitive priced oil change and lubrication, helps us obtain the type of customer satisfaction that our service department technicians are dedicated to," concluded Gardner.

The Roadside Service vehicle used for the Cadillac Roadside Service is a specially equipped Suburban. The Suburban is ideal for comfortably transporting up to six passengers, as well as carrying the parts, tools and equipment needed to make minor Roadside Service repairs.

New concept in auto care at Chaparral

A new concept in auto care is available at Chaparral Wash and Lube Center, located at 2300 North Big Spring. To help get your car ready for fall and winter driving, the experienced Chaparral staff offers a quality quick change lube service along with Midland's best full service car wash.

"One of the unique features of this service that we offer is a free car wash with every oil change and lubrication," explained Leon Jeffcoat, president of Chaparral Systems, Inc. Prices for the oil change and lube range from $15.50 to $21.50, with Pennzoil, Quaker State and other major brands available.

If summer sun and vacation driving has taken its toll on your car, then you will want to "clean up" with Chaparral's quality, friendly service.

The design of Chaparral Wash and lube is different from most other car washes because the customer stays with the vehicle throughout the car wash cycle. A comfortable waiting area is available for customers as they wait for their car to be serviced and vacuumed.

A full service car wash, which includes a wash by gentle cleansers, chamois brushes and soft water is just $6.95. Vacuuming, hand drying, window cleaning and special attention to service and detail are included. A discount is given with the purchase of Texaco gasoline.

The lube center is located behind the main building which faces Big Spring Street, so just pull into the north driveway and follow the sign at the north side of the building.

"We check belts and hoses and liquid levels during your lube job," Jeffcoat said. "Our service technicians have more than 15 years of combined experience, and many times they can catch minor problems that can save you time and money later."

Generally open on rainy days, Chaparral's lube center and gasoline pumps are at your service. With the purchase of gasoline or an oil change, if the clouds are threatening, you'll receive a rain check for your next car wash.

Chaparral Wash & Lube Center is conveniently located at the corners of Big Spring and Scharbauer and for your convenience accepts Texaco, Visa, MasterCard, American Express and Discover credit cards. Hours are 8 a.m. to 6:30 p.m. Monday through Friday and 8 a.m. to 6 p.m. Saturday. For more information call 682-8013.

Car Council explains 'slick' engine

If your car's automatic transmission seems to be taking longer than usual to shift through its gears, you may need a tune-up rather than transmission service. A "slick" engine, according to the Car Care Council, can cause a transmission to hesitate in lower gears and downshift.

The reason, says the council, is that when the engine needs a tune-up, having lost some of its pep and performance, it will have to work harder to climb a hill, accelerate or otherwise operate under load.

This extra demand on the engine causes a decrease in engine vacuum. Vacuum is one of the main factors in transmission shifting control. The transmission responds by remaining in a lower gear longer or, sometimes, downshifting to lighten the engine's burden.

This sensitive interrelationship between the engine and transmission requires that both be functioning properly for efficient performance, says the Car Care Council.

NOTE: High under-hood temperatures can cause deterioration of vacuum hose with resultant leaks. This can affect other components including cruise control, heater/air conditioner controls, retracting headlamp doors and the various mechanisms that affect engine operation.

The technicians at Rogers Ford Service Department have made a commitment to quality customer services. They are factory trained to work on all Ford, Volvo and Volkswagen cars.

Motor oil ingredients differ widely

So many variables exist in the production of motor oil, it is not inaccurate to say that like snowflakes, all oils are not formulated alike, according to automotive industry spokesmen.

In general, the composition of motor oil is about 80 percent base stock and 20 percent additives; but within both categories, differences abound.

Base stocks are refined from crude oils. Crude oils themselves have as principal components three basic types of hydrocarbon molecules; paraffinic, naphtenic and aromatic. When pumped from the ground, crude oil contain a hydrocarbon mixture of gaseous products, gasoline, diesel fuel, lubricating oil stocks, asphalt and other compounds. These elements are separated primarily through vacuum and/or atmospheric distillation. The lubrication oils, which vary in their ability to burn and flow (volatility and viscosity), serve as the base stocks for motor oils.

After further refining to remove wax, nitrogen, sulfur and metal compounds, additives may be introduced to the oil to achieve specific performance characteristics.

Rogers Ford technicians can service any car

The qualified technicians in the Service Department at Rogers Ford have made a commitment to quality customer service. The 20 experienced technicians, who are qualified to service anything that pertains to an automobile, are all factory trained to service any Ford, Volvo or Volkswagen vehicle.

"Due to the technology of today's cars, all the technicians must be well trained and are sent to training schools in Oklahoma City, Dallas and Houston. Our mechanics are second-to-none because not everyone can service these cars," explained Wiley Meador, service manager. "I recently sent three people to a school for a new car that Ford will be coming out with this fall. This type of training of our technicians is necessary in order to stay informed and well-trained in all aspects of the cars which we service."

"The Ford vehicles are becoming more complex than the Volvo and Volkswagen cars. A computer in a new '89 Ford will make the car shift instead of the transmission," Meador added.

Many of the vehicles serviced at Rogers Ford have a warranty for six years or 60,000 miles. These cars are serviced every 7,500 miles and are completely checked over before the customer returns.

The Service Department will also service any automobile, regardless of make or model. They have a diagnostic computer which helps them determine a problem that a vehicle may be having and enables them to service the vehicle more efficiently.

The service a customer receives from the staff in the Service Department at Rogers Ford demonstrates their commitment to quality customer service.

Conversion vans are new vehicle on market

By The Associated Press

Cars, pickups, jeeps, trucks, recreation vehicles — and now, conversion vans.

One more option in considering wheels in an auto-conscious country is the conversion van, a full-size utility and minivan that is shipped without windows and seats and such and then converted to a passenger vehicle.

Some van converters start with a sheet metal box, a motor and wheels and add seating, sidewalls, insulation, wiring, seat belts, wood trim, radios and TVs, windows, and exterior trim.

Conversion van sales increased 13 percent in 1987, according to the Automotive News.

"We posted a 38 percent increase and are projecting even greater interest in the 1989 model year," says William T. Becker, vice president of marketing, advertising and consumer relations for Glaval Inc., an Elkhart, Ind., conversion company.

The staff at Clepper Automotive Service are better able to service their customers at their new location which they moved into last spring. The 18,000 square foot facility is located at 3404 W. Wall.

Clepper has 18,000 square foot facility to better service their customer's vehicles

Clepper Automotive Service would like to thank their customers for the last five years of business and are better able to service their customer in their new 18,000 square foot facility which was opened last spring at 3404 W. Wall. Clepper Automotive Service is open Monday through Friday, from 6 a.m. until 6 p.m.

Of the 26 bays at this large center, two are reserved for minor repairs. "These two quick-service bays are used for oil changes, sticker inspections and other minor jobs that can be completed quickly," Alvin Clepper explained. "That way, anyone who has a job like this to be done can be waited on immediately, with no waiting and be out, in a matter of minutes."

Clepper Automotive is a full service repair shop that can repair anything from a Rolls-Royce to a Volkswagen, and Jimmy and Alvin Clepper guarantee that you will be satisfied with their work.

Clepper Automotive, established in 1984, boasts more than 180 years of combined experience with foreign and domestic vehicles.

"We have the latest computer diagnostic equipment for fuel injected vehicles, Jimmy Clepper explained. "TECH-NET' is a computer bank in California that is used as a diagnostic tool for any type of car. Factory instructors come out and train our employees on the latest equipment and specifications."

"We pride ourselves on our speed and efficiency," Alvin added. "All of our mechanics are trained to work in all different areas of repair work. That gives us the advantage of not waiting for one person to finish a job before another can begin."

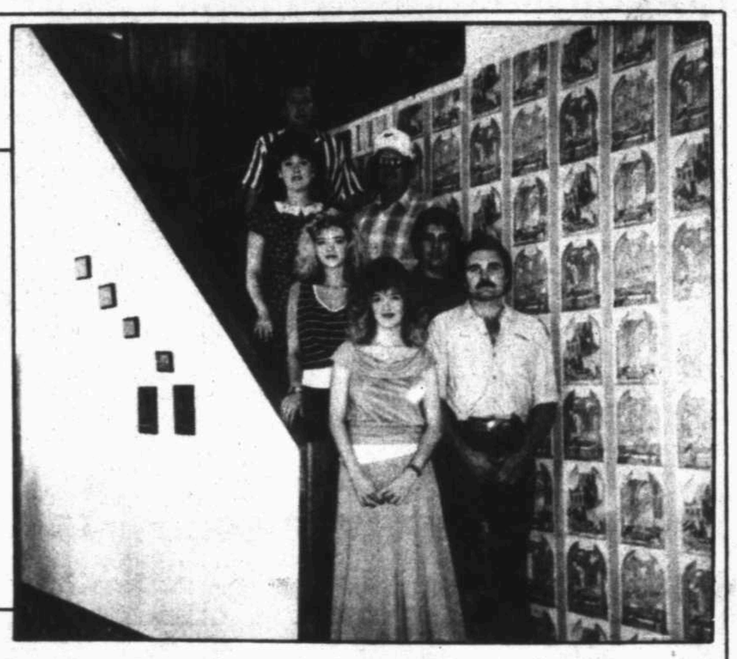

Clepper Automotive is homeowned and operated by West Texas natives who understand your transportation needs.

"We treat our customers the way we would want to be treated," Alvin explained. "With an appointment, many repairs can be made in one day."

Clepper Automotive has more than $50,00 invested in parts to ensure quick repair of your vehicle.

Be sure to stop by 3403 W. Wall or call 694-CARS for more information on how the Cleppers can meet your automotive needs.

"We never intended to be the biggest shop," Alvin concluded. "We just wanted to be the best. Now we're both!'

Arc Truck and Auto Body have been in the body repair business since 1976. From the bottom, left to right, are Vonnie Johnston, office manager; Monty Brewster, shop foreman; Jimmi Yarbrough, office staff; Ben Luna, paint shop foreman; Lisa Blair, office staff; D.K. Robinett, shop manager; and Allen Frasier, president.

Customers have relied on Arc Truck & Auto Body for quality repairs since 1976

Arc Truck and Auto Body has been in the body repair business in Midland since 1976. You can count on owner Allen Fraizer and all staff at ARC to do the job right.

"We guarantee our work," Fraizer said. "We have been doing business in Midland for a long time and we will continue to be here for our customers in the future."

During a recent media investigation into the repair industry, reporters were shocked to find improperly repaired vehicles that "would virtually disintegrate in another collision."

Examples of the improperly done work include one car that was returned to the owner with a broken hood hinge. It was reported that had the car been in another collision, it could have decapitated the front seat occupants. Inspections also revealed unibody car rails that had been spliced, improperly welded and stretched.

Fraizers warns that during the current economic crisis, a variety of what he calls "Shade Tree Body Shops" have sprung up around town.

"This hurts the consumer and all the reputable shops in Midland," Fraizer pointed out. "Some of us have worked hard over the past years to establish good reputations and we don't want that ruined by a few 'fly-by-night' mechanics."

Insurance companies have also come under fire in the past for directing vehicles to shops not properly equipped to do the work or for not being willing to pay the bill for safe and durable repairs.

"The average consumer is unaware that he is driving a new type of vehicle involving the sophisticated crash absorbing technology of unibody design built with high strength low alloy metals," Fraizer said.

Another way ARC Truck and Auto Body insures customer satisfaction is with the paints they use. Dupont has recently introduced a new line of paint called Cronar that uses the most technically advanced pigmentation process available. Fraizer realizes that a painter's skill is of primary importance for a professional color match but so is the paint that is used. "We are the only shop in West Texas that uses Cronar paint. This paint gives the quality of finish my customer have come to expect from my shop."

If you are ever involved in an accident and take your car in to ARC, don't be surprised if you receive a copy of the text "Body Shop Horrors."

"It's ironic that hairdressers must be licensed by the state but vehicle repair shops are not," Fraizer said.

Before you select a body shop, Fraizer suggests that you ask several questions, including:

- Will the shop guarantee its work and if so, for how long?
- Will the shop still be around in the years to come?
- Has the shop invested in the proper equipment to complete your job in a safe manner?
- Does the shop employ skilled and knowledgeable personnel?
- Can the shop show you a completed job and give you a tour of the shop area?

ARC Truck and Auto Body can answer "yes" to all of the above questions. Call 682-9722 or come by 2800 W. Francis. ARC features 24-hour wrecker service and specializes in fiberglass repair.

Keep car in top operating shape

You should keep your car in top operating condition all year round for safety and fuel economy. To this end, Car Care Council provides a six point check list:

1) Battery and electrical system; A battery that's 100 percent efficient at 80 degrees C. will be only 64 percent at 30 degrees C.

If your car has been slow to start have the battery and charging system checked. Often you may find the trouble is no more serious than a corroded or loose battery connection.

2) Fuel and ignition systems: How long has it been since you've had a tune-up? When starting a cold engine, much of the car's available battery power is diverted to the starter, so there may not be enough voltage left in the system to fire worn spark plugs.

New plugs nearly always are part of a tune-up. Periodic tune-ups can ferret out those parts that should be replaced. Hairline cracks in the distributor cap and rotor, for example, or faulty wiring are dangerous. On cars with distributor breaker points and condenser, regular attention to tune-up services is especially critical.

Keep the gas tank as full as possible to minimize condensation.

Kent/Avis Lubrication Centers are family owned, operated in West Texas

Kent/Avis Lubrication Centers are the West Texas front-runners in the ten minute oil change service center concept. With ten units located in Midland, Odessa, San Angelo and Big Spring, Kent/Avis Lube is part of a growing, family owned and operated business, Kent Oil, Inc.

Formerly known as Kent Lubrication Centers, Kent/Avis Lube represents no change in ownership, but a franchise association with Avis Service, Inc. Avis is already well-known throughout the nation as an auto renting and leasing agency.

You can expect quality, friendly service from the trained technicians at Kent/Avis Lube Centers. No appointment is necessary. The ten minute oil change includes draining and replacing your vehicle's oil with the oil of your choice and installation of a new oil filter.

Only high quality filters are used, including Pennzoil filters.

It's more than just an oil change at Kent/Avis Lube Centers. Technicians also lubricate the chassis, check the differential, wash all windows, and vacuum the front and back floorboards.

Each vehicle is checked for important proper fluid levels, including brake, power steering, transmission and windshield washer fluids. If you are running on empty, these fluids will be replaced, as a part of your service.

Additionally, the PCV valve and filter, radiator overflow reservoir, air filter, tire pressure and windshield wiper blades will all be checked out for you.

The basic service charge for a single grade oil is just $19.95. You'll be offered a free cup of coffee or a soft drink while you wait on your ten minute servicing.

For an additional charge, Kent/Avis Lube technicians provide additional valuable services including air conditioner/freon recharging, radiator flush and fill with antifreeze, transmission filter and differential fluid changing and state inspections (most locations).

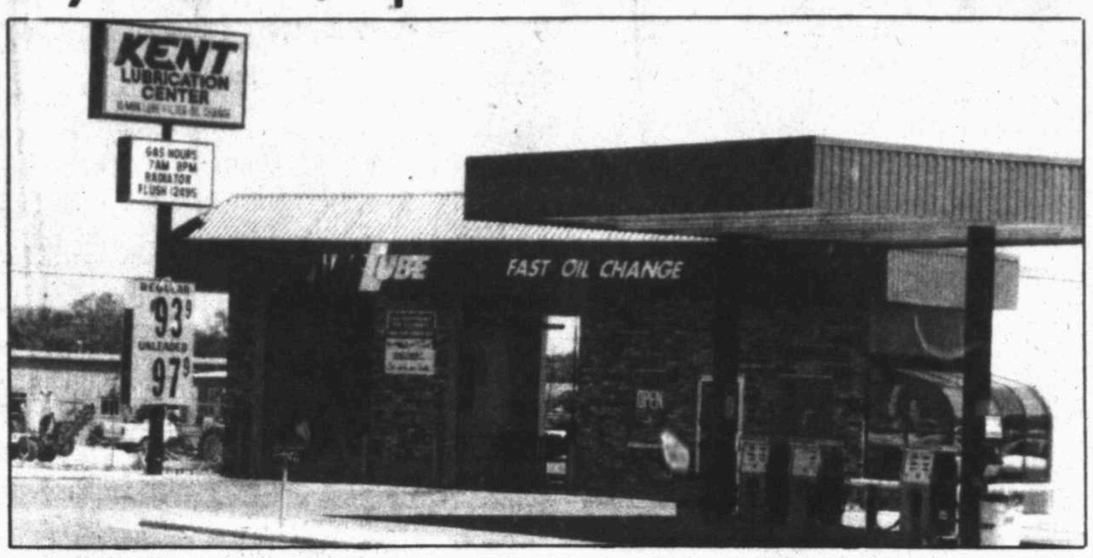

All Kent/Avis Lube Center services are guaranteed. The mechanics have all undergone an in-house training program, in addition to technical training and support from major product suppliers.

A service reminder will be mailed out in 90 days following your oil change to remind you that your vehicle is ready for another visit to Kent/Avis Lube.

The management team consists of Bill Kent, managing partner, Jerry Larned, president and partner, Mike Pinter, division manager and Bennett Robb, vice president of finance and partner.

Kent/Avis Lube Centers, first established in 1977, are just one area of growth for Kent Oil, Inc., a West Texas business since the 1950's.

Hours at each location at 7 a.m. to 6 p.m. Monday through Saturday.

Kent/Avis Lubrication Centers have ten units, which are family owned and operated by Kent Oil, Inc., in Midland, Odessa, San Angelo and Big Spring. Go by 3310 W. Wall or 1001 N. Midkiff today for a ten minute oil change.

Transportation Departments releases figures on higher speed limits on rural interstates

By The Associated Press

It is too early to say whether higher speed limits on rural interstate highways are unsafe, but preliminary figures show only a 1 percentage point difference in traffic fatality rates, the Transportation Department reported. The department said that during the first nine months of 1987, traffic fatalities on highways with the 65 mph limit rose 18 percent from a year earlier in the 37 states that had adopted the higher speed, compared with a 17 percent increase in 11 states that had not.

However, "The 65 mph speed limit has not been in effect long enough to determine its long-term impact on safety," said the report to Congress, required by a law allowing states to exempt some rural highways from the 55 mph national speed limit.

Most of the states raised their speed limits in April and May of last year. Arizona, California, Louisiana and New Mexico accounted for 70 percent of the fatality increase in states that raised the rural speed limit, the study said.

From Jan. 1, 1987, to the time of the speed limit change, fatalities had increased 10 percent from the corresponding period a year earlier. After the speed limit was raised through Sept. 30, 1987, fatalities were 23 percent higher than a year earlier, the study said.

The increase was statistically meaningful, but the study cautioned against applying it to broad conclusions about the long-term effects of the higher speed limit.

While Americans debate the pros and cons of a 55-mph speed limit, most West Europeans legally drive much faster than that, and they've been doing so with a lower fatality rate than the United States.

West Germans can go as fast as they want on their highway system known as the autobahn so long as they obey other traffic rules, such as the proper use of directional signals when changing lanes.

Elsewhere in Western Europe, speed limits range from 86.6 mph in Italy to 55 mph in Ireland, which does not have an extensive superhighway system.

The latest statistics of the 12-nation European Economic Community, for 1986, when a uniform 55-mph limit was still in effect in the United States, indicate a highway fatality rate of 14.4 per 100,000 population in contrast to 19.9 in the United States that year.

Safety of cars is great concern for buyers today

By The Associated Press

Safety will be among the choices new car buyers will have this year, according to the National Coalition to Reduce Car Crash Injuries.

Air bags and anti-lock brakes are two of the major safety devices that many manufacturers are offering. Three-point rear seat belts will also be more commonplace this model year, the Coalition points out.

Eleven of the world's 17 largest automobile manufacturers will offer inflatable air restraint systems as either standard or optional equipment, according to a study conducted by Ralph Nader, consumer advocate.

Four other manufacturers have committed to air bags beginning in 1990 and General Motors — which offers them as options on the Delta 88 — says it will offer 3 million cars with air bags by 1992.

Berg Body Shop has experienced staff in all phases of automobile paint, repairs

The Body Shop at Berg Motor Company has an experienced staff in all phases of auto paint and body repairs. Equipment includes in-house conventional frame and two car unibody bench machines. "The repairing of today's unibody cars must be done on a machine with measuring capabilities as well as pulling and straightening capabilities," explained Sam Rivera, manager.

With many highly skilled craftsman to insure a good repair, the trained staff of technicians are experienced in working on a wide variety of vehicles, but specialize in unistructure damage. All vehicles must be returned to within three millimeters, plus or minus 1 1/2 millimeters, of factory specifications in order for them to steer and track properly.

Rivera explained that the two bench type systems that are used to straighten cars is used by tying down at four points and then technicians can pull the car in any direction. "By tying down the vehicle, the center structure is stable and we can pull the car in any direction - up, down, out, - and it only effects the area where a person is pulling."

Berg Body Shop is the only body shop which has two of these systems thereby providing a quick repair for their customers.

"In the 1950's and 1960's, if a car frame was bent, it could many times never be straightened properly, but that is not the case today," stated Rivera. "Berg Motor spent over $50,000 in frame straightening equipment. They purchased these machines to repair today's vehicles that have been in a wreck. Many shops don't have this capability."

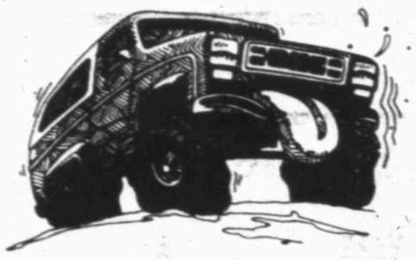

The qualified technicians at the Berg Body Shop are (from left to right) Steve Bonilla, Angel Moreno, Benny Rivera, Jerry Acosta, Abel Guerra, Jesus Moreno and Sam Rivera, manager.

Berg Body Shop also has two in-house paint mixing systems. The urethane system is for today's modern base coat and clear coat finishes. The lacquer system is for refinishing earlier model cars. These systems allow the technicians to accurately color match any color finish on any car or truck.

Rivera is willing to work in complete cooperation with insurance companies to insure that your car is returned to pre-accident condition.

The Body Shop technicians have been to several factory sponsored training sessions at the General Motor training center in Dallas. These sessions enable the technicians to stay updated on changes in construction of Cadillac and Oldsmobile, as well as other models of cars.

The Body Shop at Berg Motor Company is open Monday through Friday, from 7:30 a.m. until 5:30 p.m.

European Auto Service specializes in foreign cars

Tony Smith and the staff at European Auto Service specialize in minor, major and custom service for BMW, Mercedes, Volvo, Saab and others.

Exclusively servicing only foreign-made cars gives European Auto Service the advantage of concentrating on a single job and doing that job better.

Formerly BMW Service Center, European Auto Service grew so much in the last year, that a name change was only natural.

Exclusive service is the philosophy behind Tony Smith's business and customers have found it to be a good philsophy.

With over 50 years of combined experience, Tony and his mechanics, Ken Yates, Chris Biever, Dean Phillips and Cary Stotes work on a variety of foriegn-made cars including Volvo, BMW, Mercedes and Saab. Tracy Yates is the office manager.

"We use only original parts in our repairs," Smith added. "And we guarantee our repairs for six months or 6,000 miles."

"While we work on specialized types and makes of foreign cars, the majority of these cars are very expensive," Smith explained. "They are an investment and not something that you take to any service station to be repaired. We make our repairs by the book."

"The men and women that designed and built these automobiles know more about them than anyone else could hope to," Smith continued. "Following their instructions to the letter is the only way to do the job right."

Smith emphasized that the maintenance of the car is another area where the manufacturer's instructions should be followed. "Get the owner's manual out and follow their suggestions," Smith advised. "taking proper care of the car can make it last longer and travel farther."

A short visit to European Auto Service showed the variety of the work offered. Free estimates are available by calling 682-1593 and hours are 7:30 a.m. to 6 p.m. After hours appointments are made on request.

"All our cars are locked inside the building overnight," Smith added. "And each of our customers receive personalized service."

Reasonable rates thanks to low overhead make the repairs to your car less expensive at European Auto Service, so call 682-1593 today.

Jack Sherman Chevrolet is equipped with new state of the art CAMS equipment

Jack Sherman Chevrolet is equipped with the new state of the art CAMS (Computerized Automotive Maintenance System) equipment that enables technicians to easily and effectively diagnose the most complicated General Motors computer systems in today's cars.

"This diagnostic tool interfaces all GM on board computer systems. It enables the service technician to make an accurate and quicker diagnosis of a computer system," explained Jerry Griffith, Service Department foreman. "We also are linked up directly with TAN (Technical Assistance Network) in Detroit. This network consists of approximately 30 people who receive information from other CAMS dealers throughout the United States and continually update the CAMS system with the latest information available."

Technicians are able to link up their computer with the CAM's system in Detroit and at the same time, discuss a car's problem over the phone with a TAN expert. This will insure proper diagnosis and repair of vehicle.

This system also provides a Vehicle service monitor that can be installed on an automobile while a customer is driving around town and will record a "driveability" problem when it occurs. All a customer has to do is push a button and the problem is recorded - approximately 30 seconds before and after - and can be played back on a CAMS machine.

Griffith feels that the CAMS is an excellent tool even though it doesn't repair the vehicles. After a service technician makes a diagnosis, the Service Department at Jack Sherman has 10 qualified technicians who have received training by General Motors.

The CAMS systems can also obtain current updated bulletins on any changes in a product or diagnostic procedures. It will even be used on future projects that will determine problems in a car's computerized sound system, anti-lock brakes and suspension, as well as other innovative areas.

Jack Sherman is the place to take your car so it can be serviced using the CAMS system. The Service Department is open Monday through Friday, from 8 a.m. until 6 p.m.

Charlie Kilgore, Jerry Griffith, service department foreman, and Kevin Griffith, use the CAMS computer to inspect an 1988 Iroc-Z before it is delivered to a customer.

Kris Hoban, K-Mart Automotive Center manager, offers his customers reliable quality service with name-brand products.

K-Mart offers quality service with name brand products

At K-Mart Automotive Service Center, Kris Hoban and his crew are trained technicians, experienced in many phases of vehicle repair.

"K-Mart Automotive Service Center offers full service in tires, brakes, front end, shocks, batteries and more for many U.S. and foreign vehicles," Hoban explained. "We value our customers, so we offer the customers reliable, quality service with name brand products such as Uniroyal, Mowhawk, Exide, Monroe and more at a low K-Mart price."

K-Mart also offers a fleet service for all sizes of companies large or small, nationwide services and warranties, and state inspection stickers for qualified vehicles.

"K-Mart has six training centers across the United States," Hoban said. "Our service employees go through these training centers and are certified for specific repairs."

K-Mart has been in the automotive business for 20 years. Hoban has been with K-Mart for 11 of those 20 years. "We're here for the customer," Hoban added. "K-Mart is America's favorite store and will continue to give its customers reliable, quality service at a reasonable price."

Automakers, suppliers offer many anti-theft devices

By FREDERICK STANDISH
Associated Press Writer

DETROIT (AP) — The nation's automakers and suppliers are offering a growing array of anti-theft devices in an effort to stem the growing number of stolen vehicles.

Most of the devices marketed by the Big Three, Honda, Mazda, Nissan and Toyota involve alarms that honk the horn and flash the headlights to scare off a would-be car thief. Others systems disengage starter motors.

Most of the devices supplied by automakers as standard equipment come on the maker's more expensive cars. The systems are optional on many less-expensive models.

Then there are devices that an owner can pick up at a local auto parts store — things that fit around the steering column like a big doughnut, menacing-looking hooks that lock the steering wheel to the brake pedal, and still other systems that detect motion and sound, such as breaking glass.

Despite all the technology put into anti-theft systems by automakers and parts suppliers, there was a 5.3 percent rise in the number of car thefts in the nation from 1986 to 1987, the latest annual figures available from the FBI.

And the National Auto Theft Bureau in Chicago says while those devices may stymie thieves, most of the cars stolen nowadays fall into two categories — cars in which keys were left in the ignition and cars that were simply towed away.

"Approximately 13 percent of the recovered (stolen) vehicles still had the owner's keys in the vehicles ..." said Tim Kett of the organization. "About 10 percent of the vehicles were towed. This is a common technique used (by thieves) in urban areas."

When tow trucks aren't used by thieves, there are a variety of products offered outside dealerships designed to keep a driver's car where the driver left it.

Automobiles are becomming more high-tech

Going more and more high-tech to make your driving easier, cars now can:

- Talk to you, warning you in soothing tones when your gasoline's running low.
- Steer with all four wheels, getting you around corners better.
- Give you computerized directions for your trip, and tell you how you're doing on it.

Some such magic is in early stages. But a continued automotive trend- reflecting consumer demand-emphasizes performance: Carmakers are giving you more and more power from smaller engines.

Keeping pace with automotive technology is petroleum science.

Getting more power out of smaller engines means they run harder and hotter. So scientific advances have been worked into a wide range of motor oils. At the top is synthetic technology, producing lubricants that outdo nature's best.

For example, Mobile I synthetic automotive engine oil flows easily, retaining lubricating properties, at 55 degrees below zero F, when conventional oils are virtually solid. And the synthetic still retains its lubricating qualities at 580 degrees F, long after conventional oils have started to deteriorate.

The key to a good synthetic's built-in superiority is the way it's made, say Mobil scientists. A conventional engine lubricant starts with crude oil. A series of refinery processes leaves several thousand kinds of hydrocarbons that more or less work together.

In contrast, to make a synthetic, explain Mobil researchers, you start with a few pure chemical "building blocks," chosen just for their special lubricating capability. These are assembled into the finished base fluid-which contains no substances not ideal for lubriction.

Turbochargers are adding oomph to more and more cars-using otherwise wasted exhaust gas to whirl impeller fans 120,000 times a minute. That's to compress more air into your engine, boosting the air-fuel plower charge. In hard-working turbochargers, temperatures can rise to 600 degrees F in the "hot soak" period, when the engine is shut down and cooling oil is no longer flowing.

Mobile researchers in a paper to the Society of Automotive Engineers reported tests showing excellent turbocharger protection by synthetic oil against deposits and bearing wear at extended oil-change intervals. Premium conventional oils tested under identical conditions at normal oil-change intervals showed significant coke deposit formation in the turbocharger bearing area, often leading to bearing failure.

Cars using synthetic Mobil engine oil scored 37 victories in leading 1987 racing series worldwide.

Several components, systems in cars need to be checked before winter months begin

As your car emerges from the summer vacations, having overcome the challenges of long distance driving, several components and systems are in need of recuperative maintenance.

Your vehicle may indeed be subject to post-summer heat–that is, to less than peak performance–until it receives a little special care and treatment.

According to automotive industry spokesmen, checking a few key areas, and performing service if needed, is what the car doctor would order for your four-wheel patient. The check-up and prescription list should include:

- Engine tune-up–Restoring the engine to full operating performance is usually required after thousands of miles of hard driving during the summer months. Adjustments to timing and carburetion should be checked, new spark plugs installed, oil changed, battery analyzed and spark plug wires and battery cables examined.
- Filter replacement–A number of filters are placed in every car to keep various systems clean. After performing the tough cleaning task during the summer, they are probably ready to be changed. The oil filter should be replaced at the same time the oil is changed. A clean air filter will help your car "breathe" better as winter approaches. Don't forget the fuel filter, which is often neglected, but very important for a smooth-running engine.
- Vision check-up–Anything that helps insure good visibility is a requirement for safe driving. Summer weather often harms some of these items. Check your windsheild wipers. If they are torn or if they are not producing a clean wipe, replace them now in preparation for winter precipitation. Examine all lights and turn signals, and fix those not working properly. Fill your windsheild washer reservoir and make sure the washers are functioning correctly.
- Fuel System Treatment–Accumulation of dirt and contaminants in the gasoline tank are prevalent after summer driving. Help clean the fuel tank and lines with gas treatment–which comes in 8-ounce bottles and can easily be poured into the tank–on a few of your next gasoline fill-ups. Newer cars with fuel-injection systems often experience clogged injectors, which–sometimes unknown to the driver–will hinder fuel economy and gradually decrease performance. A bottle of fuel-injection cleaner poured into the gas tank can prevent such problems.

In tough conditions, motor oil maximizes true performance for automobiles, trucks

As an oil field electrician covering over 24,000 square miles in Wyoming, Kevin Doerr must drive through the roughest of roads-in all kinds of weather-to get to the oil wells he services. The harsh winters and dry, hot, dusty summers put a tremendous burden on his company-owned Chevrolet S-10 pick-up.

Because each electrician at West Industrial Electric is responsible for his own vehicle, Doerr takes personal pride in the fact that his work vehicle has travelled 79,000 of these grueling miles without a major engine repair. The key to his low repair bills is a program of regular maintenance that keeps his truck in prime running condition and prevents small problems from growing into major ones.

Doerr was so impressed with the results of the company program that he adapted it to his personal vehicle, a Cheverolet Blazer 4-by-4, that has racked up over 50,000 miles in the last 3 years. In all, he spends only $550 per year maintaining his Blazer, including tires, shocks, motor oil, oil filters and other parts.

By investing such a small dollar amount, Doerr's Blazer remains in peak condition in spite of annual temperatures that consistently exceed 40 degrees below zero and 100 degrees Fahrenheit. But the extremes in temperature are only part of the stress test that a Wyoming vehicle must endure. In the course of each year, Doerr is constantly battling the snow and ice of winter, the overflowing rivers and deep mud of spring and the sand-filled dry months of summer. All of this is over terrain that includes unpaved mountain roads as well as wind-swept open valleys.

"After the success we've had with the company vehicles, putting them through the strains of the 'oil patch', it was obvious that taking regular care of the engine would be a great thing for personal vehicles too-and it is, "Doerr says.

The West Electric success includes a 50 percent reduction in maintenance costs and a quadrupling of vehicle engine life. Before beginning the program, which includes regular servicing and the use of 10W-40 motor oil, engines had been failing after only 40,000 miles. Now, many of the engines are still running strong at 100,000 miles and replacements are not planned until they've reached over 200,000 miles.

"I believe I'll see the same kind of life out of my personal vehicles as we do with the company trucks," Doerr says.

Doerr checks oil daily in both vehicles, and changes the motor oil every 2,000 miles. That's a company policy, and a personal preference he said.

Doerr also follows the company policy on shock absorbers for his own truck.

It has been proven that regularly scheduled maintenance can quadruple a vehicle's engine life.

"Every 30,000 miles, we take a look at the shocks to see if they're starting to get soft. If they are, we replace them immediately rather than trying to get an extra 5,000 miles out of them. Your vehicle takes a tremendous beating going down the road, so why not give it the support it needs?

Doerr gets maximum performance from his vehicles, even under tough Wyoming driving conditions, by following a few other simple maintenance tips which can easily be adapted by any driver.

- Inspect spark plugs for carbon deposits and corrosion every 5,000 miles.
- Examine fan belts regularly.
- Clean battery posts and tighten battery cables every 10,000 miles
- Change transmission fluid and filter every 15,000 miles.

Doerr also suggests that factors most people consider cosmetic can also increase vehicle life-like regular washings. "You'd be surprised at how just keeping a vehicle clean, including the undercarriage, will make it last," he says. He suggests installing running boards to prevent wear and corrosion on a truck or van body caused by splashing road dirt.

A complete and good-quality undercoating is also recommended, as are skid plates to prevent damage to the drive train and oil pan caused by driving over tough terrain.

With the costs of pick-ups and heavy duty personal vehicles rising so much every year, Doerr says it only makes sense to pamper his vehicle and extend its life to the maximum. The $500 annual maintenance expense is a small price to pay for knowing that when his working day is over he can depend on his vehicle to get him home.

Car care is especially important during winter

By The Associated Press

With winter, and its rain, snow, sleet and sub-freezing temperatures in the offing, car care becomes especially important.

Motorists are advised to have a professional technician check for signs of wear on the car.

Walt Alley, director of training at the Midas Insitute of Technology in Palatine, Ill., suggests checking these car service areas:

■ Brakes. Checks brake pads and shoes for wear.

■ Exhaust system. Look for holes in the muffler, exhaust or tailpipe.

■ Oil and lube. Use the proper winter weight motor oil and give your car a lube job to help protect suspension and steering parts.

■ Shocks. Worn-out shock absorbers can hinder braking, especially during sudden stops, and allow excessive body rolls on curves.

Alley also suggests assembling a "winter survival" kit to keep in the trunk, to include booster cables, shovel, tow chain, rock salt or sand, emergency flares, flashlight, and first-aid kit.

If the coolant looks dirty, he says, have the cooling system flushed and replace the antifreeze.

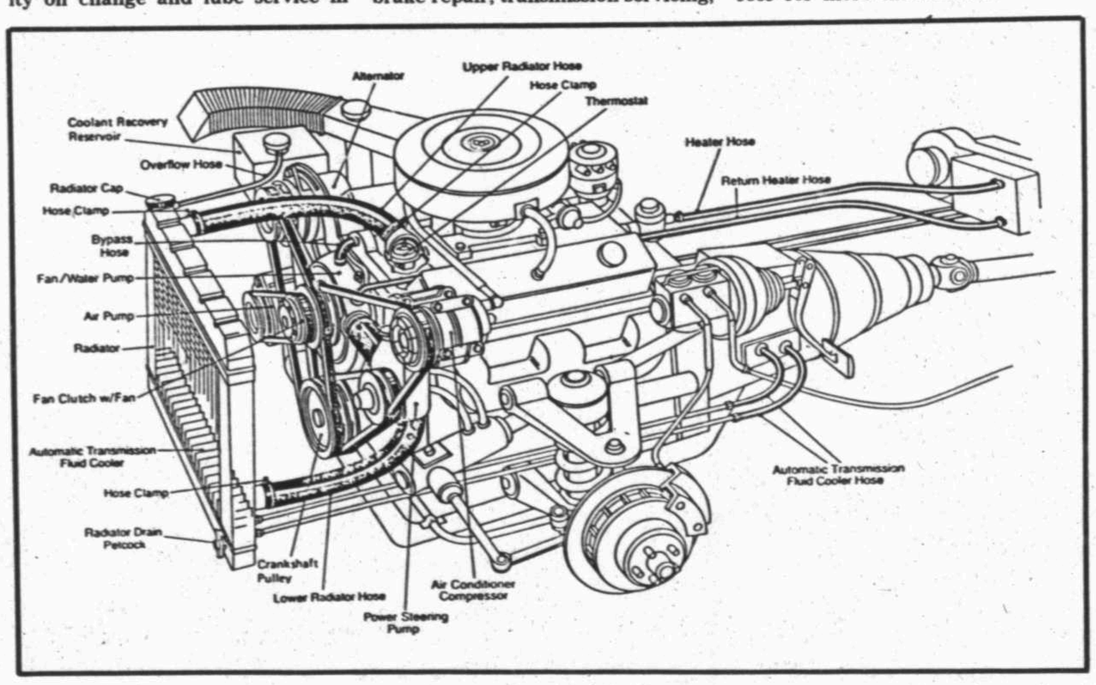

Racing driver Alan Kulwicki advises car owners also check tires, the gas tank — running out of gas and flat tires and the two leading nonmechanical causes of highway breakdowns, he says — and antifreeze.

Gas tank cap important item on automobile

One of the most often taken-for-granted automotive items is the gas tank cap, the little metal or plastic top you probably handle once a week if you fill up at the local quick stop self-serve pumps.

That little plastic top is a very important item, believe it or not.

A bad cap allows moisture into your car's fuel system, which could add water to your gas tank.

This detailed diagram of a car's engine helps remind car owners how important it is to have their cooling system checked at the end of a long, hot summer. Extended periods of under-hood temperatures that exceed 300 degrees can cause cooling system parts to deteriorate more quickly.

Pressure test is essential to complete cooling system servicing for vehicles

For much of the country the summer of '88 will be remembered for its record breaking heat. Scenes of cars stalled with steaming radiators were not uncommon. For those that survived without overheating, there still could be some residual damage, says the Car Care Council.

Extended periods of under-hood temperatures that exceed 300 degrees F can cause cooling system parts to deteriorate more quickly than normal.

All the more reason to have complete cooling system service done this fall, emphasizes the Council, who calls attention to this critical aspect of vehicle maintenance.

Cooling systems are pressurized for operating efficiency. Therefore, a complete checkup of the system, in addition to visual inspection of drive belts and hoses, should include a pressure test. This is a simple procedure which can be done by any service shop (or home mechanic) with a tester. Eighty-five percent of all repair shops are so equipped.

The pressure test usually will disclose leaks or potential leaks at hose connections, in the radiator core, at the water pump cylinder heads or elsewhere in the system.

The next step in fall preparation is flushing the system. Buy a top quality cooling system cleaner and follow the instructions carefully. Flush all chemicals from the system before adding new anti-freeze coolant.

NOTE: Be sure you are using the type of antifreeze coolant specified for your vehicle in the correct proportions. Do not install pure ethylene glycol anti-freeze right from the container. It should be diluted with fresh water, usually in 50-50 proportions but never more than 70% antifreeze coolant. Pure ethylene glycol will cause overheating and does not provide adequate freeze protection.

Model-makers at Franklin Mint sculpture prototypes with noted detail of classic luxury cars on tiny scale

By The Associated Press

The 1929 Duesenberg J., the 1931 Bugatti Royale and the 1928 Isotta Fraschini are among the 12 classic automobiles in the Franklin Mint Precision Model collection.

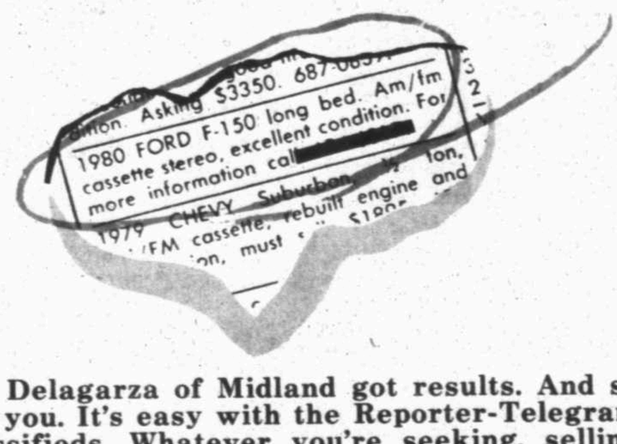

Model-makers at the Franklin Mint near Philadelphia sculptured prototypes of the luxury cars on a 1:43 scale, noting details inside and out, including tiny instruments and gauges on the dashboards.

Matching dies were made for each of the components, at least 50 parts for each model, which was then painted and hand-polished.

Among the models is that of the 1931 Bugatti Royale, which weighed in a 7,150 pounds and now valued at more than $8 million, with some estimates over $20 million.

Tom Monaghan, whose businesses include Domino's Pizza and the Detroit Tigers baseball team, paid $8.1 million in 1986 for one of six Bugatti Royales ever manufactured, said to be the only one not housed in a museum.
