Chinese troops again open fire

Violent weekend

Beijing citizens shout oaths against the government as they gather around the body of a man who died when an armored personnel carrier on its way to Tiananmen square crashed through a troop convoy that had been stopped by a group of protesters during weekend confrontations in China.

BEIJING (AP) — Soldiers swept through Beijing today shooting at enraged civilians, and there were reports of fighting between military units sent to quell the unarmed pro-democracy protests.

The army, which killed hundreds of people in a crackdown on the protests over the weekend, reportedly shot and killed at least three civilians today.

In Washington, President Bush condemned Chinese authorities for the "bloody and violent" crackdown. He said he was ordering a suspension of American military sales and commercial export of weapons to China.

One Chinese military source said soldiers fought each other around the Nanyuan military air base on the southern outsksirts of the city today. He said the fighting was serious.

But residents living near the restricted base said they had seen a steady stream of planes landing and taking off but had not seen or heard fighting.

Artillery shelling also was heard in a far northwestern suburb.

Asked whether soldiers were fighting each other, one Western diplomat said: "It's more than that. There is solid evidence." He would not elaborate.

Chinese sources said the People's Liberation Army is deeply split over the government's May 20 decision to declare martial law and send troops to Beijing. The 38th Army, based around Beijing, reportedly refused to advance on the city.

The source said the 38th was ordered to take over from the 27th Army, which is responsible for the carnage over the weekend. It is not clear whether the army is obeying the order.

Although there have been no accurate tallies, more than 1,000 people are widely believed to have been killed and thousands injured since the army moved to retake Tiananmen Square from student-led protesters.

Philippine Vice Consul Corazon Patarata told a Manila radio station from Beijing today that the diplomatic community estimates 3,000 protesters have been killed by the army.

Protests against the crackdown were reported in several provincial cities as the government praised the military attacks as a patriotic effort to put down rioters trying to overthrow the communist system.

A Chinese journalist said one man's body was ripped apart with machine gunfire from his chin to his stomach this morning and three others were shot and wounded when 17 truckloads of troops attacked a crowd at a major intersection west of Tiananmen Square.

Chinese witnesses said a girl was shot in the chest around noon when troops charged up a narrow residential street near the square.

Two more people died in gunfire from troops who rushed up a central Beijing street in the late afternoon, other Chinese witnesses said.

A U.S. Embassy official also said soldiers fired indiscriminately from 50 to 100 military trucks that hurtled down a normally quiet street flanked by a park and foreign embassies. In the evening, about 30 tanks took up positions outside an apartment complex for diplomats.

The American and other embassies began sheltering foreign students studying at Chinese universities.

Tank and troop convoys moved throughout the night and day, and helicopters dropped off supplies at Tiananmen Square for the thousands of soldiers occupying the area since they drove out protesters early Sunday.

Burned-out hulls of buses and military vehicles littered streets, which protesters by the thousands refused to quit. Public transportation was at a standstill and most downtown shops closed.

No Chinese leader has come forth to take responsibility for the decision to turn the military on civilians, filling hospitals with the dead and dying, and it was not known how much opposition exists.

Chinese sources said senior leader Deng Xiaoping, 84, ordered the attack to halt seven weeks of student protests for a freer China and an end to official corruption. They said Deng was in a military hospital being treated for prostate cancer.

Premier Li Peng, who ordered martial law in Beijing, has not appeared in public or commented on the violence. He and old guard ideologues, many in their 80s, are believed to support the action.

The massacre has discredited the government, army and Communist Party and many enraged citizens are calling for revolution.

Before the massive weekend attack, hundreds of thousands of people had thwarted troop movements into the city.

Eight Iranian mourners die in stampede

TEHRAN, Iran (AP) — Millions of mourners today flooded into a square where Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini's body lay, causing a stampede the official news agency said killed eight people and injured at least 500.

Khomeini's only son, Ahmad, read over Tehran Radio the first pages of his father's political testament, which is believed to contain guidelines on how the Islamic Republic should be governed. The section broadcast warned against U.S. plots and called for unity, but it made no reference to the problem of succession.

Khameini

President Ali Khamenei, named Sunday to succeed Khomeini, told state television today: "We hope temporarily to be able to fill the leadership, because the new terms of the constitution are currently under review." Khamenei retained his title as president and is considered an interim leader.

OPEC ministers step up negotiation

VIENNA, Austria (AP) — OPEC ministers stepped up bargaining to try to reach a quick agreement on a new pricing and production accord, in part to let Iran's oil minister return home for the funeral of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini.

Ministers of the 13-nation Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries met late Sunday to work out troublesome issues before their formal strategy session set to begin today.

Some officials wanted to strike an early deal so Iran's Gholamreza Aqazadeh can hurry home for the funeral of the Iranian leader, who died Saturday.

The ministers of the oil producing nations are meeting to set their output and price goals for the last half of the year.

Saudi Arabia's oil minister, Hisham Nazer, said he would like to see higher crude prices, but declined to say how much. "The market decides the price," he said.

Nazer, the pivotal negotiator in the talks, said he expects crude oil demand to increase "a substantial amount" in the remainder of the year.

Saudi Arabia, the world's largest crude exporter, pumps nearly a quarter of all OPEC oil, giving it powerful leverage over the negotiations.

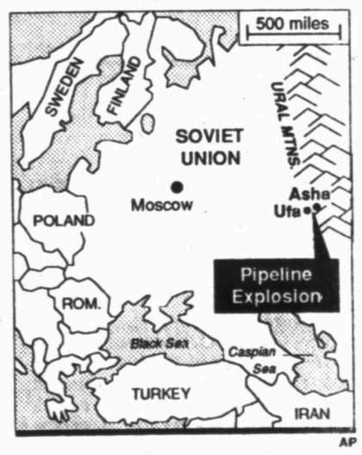

With forecasts of higher demand, the ministers appeared ready to boost their production ceiling from the current level of 18.5 million barrels a day. Officials said they were considering lifting their output cap to 19.5 million to 20 million barrels a day.

Aqazadeh said he expected new demand would be about one million barrels a day in the July-December period. Such an increase, analysts said, would likely hold prices at current levels and have little effect on gasoline prices at the pump.

Some of the OPEC countries, seeking an advantage at the meeting, have turned up production in recent weeks. Total OPEC output is estimated at about 21 million barrels a day.

"If you raise the ceiling and some members violate their quota, then prices will decrease," said Aqazadeh.

A sticking point in the talks is how the ministers would divvy up the extra amount. Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates would like a larger share of the total than now allotted. Both are pumping an estimated 1.6 million barrels a day, compared with quotas of about 1 million barrels.

Pipeline/train disaster may have killed 800

MOSCOW (AP) — As many as 800 people were killed when gas leaking from a pipeline filled a mountain valley, exploded and engulfed two passing trains in flames, a newspaper editor in the area said today.

Tass said 800 of the more than 1,200 people aboard the passenger trains, including many children bound for summer camp, were missing after Sunday's explosion in the Ural Mountains along the Trans-Siberian Railroad.

"Military units are searching the adjacent forest and mountains in the hope that some of the passengers managed to escape the tornado of fire," the official news agency said.

Mobil Producing offering severance package to 100

From Staff Reports

Mobil Producing Texas & New Mexico Inc. announced today it is seeking to reduce its Midland staff.

Mobil sent out letters Friday to 100 employees in three departments — producing, exploration and drilling — seeking voluntary severance. "I am not prepared to say how many of that number will be severed locally, but it is significantly less than 100," said George Dalton, producing operations manager. He said a press statement would be released within a few days detailing exactly how many would be cut in Midland.

Dalton said the letters were not aimed just at long time employees nearing retirement but at younger employees as well. "The voluntary severance package will be open to all," he said.

Dalton said the reduction in the Midland workforce was part of Mobil's ongoing program "to remain effecient and competitive" in today's market.

Currently, 300 are employed by Mobil in Midland.

U.S. to suspend weapon sales to China

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush today condemned Chinese authorities for a "violent and bloody" weekend crackdown against pro-democracy demonstrators and said he was ordering an immediate suspension of American military sales and commerical export of weapons to China.

"We deplore the decision to use force," Bush told reporters in a hastily convened mid-morning news conference. He urged Chinese authorities "to avoid violence and to return to their previous policy of restraint."

Hundreds of Chinese have been killed, and many more wounded, since the army moved in over the weekend to clear Tiananmen Square.

Bush said he thought it was impossible for China to return to the days of total repression. "We're beyond the kind of cultural revolution response," he said referring to the crackdown on dissent and diversity that began in the mid-1960s.

He said he wanted to forge a careful response to the situation in China, and rejected advice from some who recommended the withdrawal of the U.S. ambassador. He said the ambassador had been active in monitoring events in Beinjing and provided an important resource for the United States.

Bush said, "I do not want to see a total break in this relationship" with China.

But in announcing steps that included a freeze in contacts between U.S. and Chinese military officials, he said:

"We cannot condone the violent attacks and cannot ignore the consequences for our relationship with China."

Bush also was asked about events in Iran, where radical leader Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini died over the weekend. He said "we're not sure yet" what will happen with the government in the Islamic nation although he said President Ali Khamenei appears to be in charge.

"There's a way for the relationship with the United States to improve and that's for the release of the American hostages" being held in Lebanon, he said.

Bush also said he welcomed Sunday's elections in Poland in which candidates endorsed by the trade union Solidarity appeared to have gained decisive victories.

"Communist bureaucrats beware in Poland," Bush said. "It seems to me like there's quite a move moving toward freedom and democracy."

Bush's comments on China were strikingly similar. "I think the depth of the feeling toward democracy is so great that you can't put the genie back into the bottle," he said.

"This is not the time for an emotional response," Bush said. He said it was not possible to know who exactly is in charge in China.

Bush said his response to the weekend of violence in Beijing did not include imposition of economic sanctions. But, he added, "I reserve the right to takle a whole new look at things if the violence escalates," he said.

He added, "Throughout the world we stand with those who seek greater freedom and democracy."

Bush, who was expected to meet at the White House later in the day with congressional leaders, won immediate applause from one liberal Democrat for his announcement.

"I think he's taken the exact, appropriate steps," said Sen. Alan Cranston of California. "He has avoided taking extreme steps that would not contribute to the resolution of the problems."

Bush spoke as eyewitnesses reported soldiers had swept through Beijing earlier in the day, shooting at enraged civilains. The civilians were angered by the Army's weekend sweep through the center of Beijing that routed the pro-democracy demonstrators, killing hundreds in the process.

There also were reports of fighting between military units sent to quell the unarmed pro-democracy protests.

Bush noted the reports of internal military strife, but said, "I certainly want to stop short of predicting a civil war between units of the People's Liberation Army."

Among the other steps, Bush also said he would order U.S. officials to give a "sympathetic review" to any request by Chinese students for an extension of their stay in the United States and would offer assistance through the international Red Cross.

But the centerpiece of his response was the announcement that government-to-government military sales would be banned, along with commercial expost of weapons.

Arms transactions between China and the U.S. government have grown slowly since June 1964, when the administration of former President Ronald Reagan first declared China eligible to make purchases.

Since that declaration, China has purchased slightly more than $700 million worth of gear or technology in four transactions.

The Pentagon was unable to provide immediately the value of undelivered weaponry that would be affected by the suspension announced by Bush today.

Lt. Col. Rick Oborn, a Pentagon spokesman, said all four projects were still listed as "continuing," but that some of the older transactions were probably near completion.

The four transactions included a $98 million sale of technology and assistance in October 1985 to build an artillery ammunition plant; the sale of 55 avionics kits to modernize the electronic systems on Chinese F-8 jet fighters, worth $550 million; the sale of four Mk-46 torpedoes in February 1986, valued at $8 million, and the sale in Jauary 1987 of artillery-locating radar sets worth $62 million.

Oborn said the Pentagon did not have any statistics available on ongoing commercial transactions.

Bush said the demonstrators who were swept from China's Tiananmen Square by overwhelming military forces over the weekend were "advocating basic human rights, including freedom of expression, freedom of the press and freedom of association."

"I don't want to see a total break in this relationship and I will not encourage a total break. When you see these kids struggling for democracy and freedom, this would be a bad time for the United States to withdraw."

Bush, back from a 10-day overseas trip that dwelled on unity in Western Europe, called congressional leaders to the White House for a briefing likely to be overshadowed by the weekend's dramatic events in Beijing and Tehran.

Last week's NATO summit and the president's widely acclaimed arms-control initiatives were billed as topping the agenda for today's bipartisan leadership meeting. But the talks were almost certain to be sidetracked by discussions of the bloody military crackdown in China and the death of Khomeini.

Until meeting with reporters at mid-morning, Bush had little to say Sunday on either subject as he wound up a weekend of rest.

University of Texas student Walter Pong, smeared with paint to symbolize blood, lies in front of the Chinese consulate in Houston Sunday. About 1,000 Chinese students attend Texas schools demonstrated to show their support for their counterparts in China.

Chinese in Houston showing their support

HOUSTON (AP) — Chinese students and their supporters wore black arm bands in memory of the hundreds of people who died in Beijing this weekend as they marched to the Chinese consulate's office to protest the violence.

An estimated 600 people, including many non-Chinese, participated in the march Sunday, which began in a city park and continued about two miles to the consulate's office.

Fake white flowers were pinned to the arm bands worn by most of the marchers. Some wore red or white head bands with Chinese characters printed in black, and a few were splattered with red paint to resemble blood.

Several people at the front of the peaceful procession carried a large wreath of yellow and white flowers.

The marchers were angered by the Chinese government's decision to use force against pro-democracy protesters who have occupied Beijing's Tiananman Square in recent weeks. At least 500 people were killed this weekend when Chinese tanks and troops stormed the square and opened fire.

Those participating in Sunday's march in Houston walked along one lane of a city street shouting such chants as "Down with (Chinese senior leader) Deng Xiaoping," "Down with communism," and "Long Live Freedom."

Many carried signs blasting the Chinese government's actions and calling for those responsible to be punished. Other signs asked for the killing to stop.

One person carried a stuffed doll hung on a stick with a sign on its back that said "Deng. Butcher Dog."

"It's really a tragedy. The students just wanted some changes," said Gene Lai, a professor at Baylor College of Medicine who is from Hong Kong. "I hope the violence is over."

After arriving at the consulate's office shortly before noon, the students started shouting for several minutes for someone to come out and take part in the memorial service. Nobody came out of the building where Chinese Consulate Yao Xian Ni and other Chinese officials live.

A man who answered the telephone at the consulate but who would not give his name said he had no comment.

Rescue workers climb over the wreckage of two trains which were traveling between Novosibirsk, the largest town in Siberia, and Adler, a popular Black Sea resort on Sunday. They were devastated when a pipeline a half-mile away burst, pouring liquefied petroleum gas down a slope and engulfing the trains in flames. Several hundred persons were killed.

President Mikhail S. Gorbachev, who visited the remote site Sunday, told the new Soviet parliament "a few hundred people" had been killed. He said incompetence and a lack of discipline might have contributed to the accident.

Gennady K. Dmitrin, editor of Evening Chelyabinsk, said his newspaper has a list of between 500 and 800 people dead. He said that list was preliminary.

Dmitrin said children under age 8 did not have train tickets and therefore were not included in the count Tass gave for the number of people aboard.

Asked about the death toll given by Dmitrin, Dr. Vladimir Ruchki, a local Health Ministry spokesman said: "It's about right." He said more than 600 people were hospitalized. Tass said more than 500 people were hospitalized and that 85 percent suffered severe burns.

The blast threw 14 cars off the track, and the ensuing fire enveloped the cars and created a one-mile-long blaze, the government daily Izvestia reported. The total number of railroad cars was not known.

"The picture I saw was terrifying, catastrophic," Dmitrin said, reading from a correspondent's first-person account published in his paper.

In Moscow, speaking to Congress, Gorbachev called for a minute of silence and the 2,250 deputies stood to mourn the victims. Gorbachev then recessed the session for a national day of mourning.

The 58-year-old Soviet leader, in remarks from the Kremlin's Palace of Congresses broadcast live on radio and television, said the 1,153 mile-long pipeline burst a half mile from the rails.

He said the liquefied petroleum gas poured down a slope toward the tracks for three hours. Despite the leak, pumps were turned on to compensate for the pressure loss.

"Everything started to accumulate, and when this mass reached the level of electrical train contacts, a spark ignited this condensed cloud," Gorbachev told the deputies.

The Islamic Republic News Agency said in addition to those killed and injured in the stampede outside Mosalla Mosque, scores of people were knocked unconscious as temperatures soared to 100.

State television showed victims being carried out of the square as crowds scrambled to get closer to the air-conditioned cubical where Khomeini's shrouded body lay in a glass-covered bier.

The revolutionary patriarch's characteristic black turban rested on his chest.

Television cameras zoomed in on a bearded young man cooling mourners with a water hose.

Khomeini, 86, died Saturday of a heart attack, 11 days after intestinal surgery, leaving the country gripped by its worst political crisis since the revolution that catapulted the Moslem cleric to power in 1979.

Khamenei, 49, apparently was appointed to avoid a leadership vacuum.

Khomeini's body was transported by ambulance to the mosque, where hundreds of thousands of his followers had waited all night. He is to be buried Tuesday.

Wailing men, women and children screamed and pounded on the ambulance as it moved slowly through the crowd.

■ Khameini role outlined — 2D

Beating on their breasts and heads in a traditional Shiite sign of mourning, they screamed "Sorrow, sorrow is this day ... Khomeini the idol smasher is with God today!"

Crowds waved life-size portraits of the stern-faced, white-bearded Khomeini decorated with black ribbons and red flowers.

Readings from the Koran, Islam's holy book, blared from the mosque's minaret.

The government declared 40 days of mourning.

The official news agency said crowds blocked streets to the mosque and Khamenei had to be flown in by helicopter.

Under the constitution, Khomeini's leadership was supreme. He had no specified duties and was considered the divinely guided representative of the prophet Mohammed.

The constitution requires an ayatollah lead the country, but Khamenei is a hojatoleslam, a middle-ranking cleric.

Sections of Khomeini's "divine political will and testament" read Sunday at an emergency session of Parliament gave no hint on resolving the crisis.

Georgia boy hits pay dirt in his call for 'Kids' Day'

DAHLONEGA, Ga. (AP) — Eleven-year-old Larry Banister II is acknowledged to be the most precocious promoter in this old gold mining community now that his efforts in behalf of Kids' Day have begun to hit pay dirt.

And this definitely is a gold letter day for the blond, curley-haired boy from Dahlonega. Not only is today his 11th birthday and the last day of the school term. But thanks to Larry, it's also Children Appreciation Day in Juneau, Alaska.

Larry has a personal copy of the proclamation issued by Juneau Mayor Bruce Botelho.

"He's one of the mayors I wrote, asking him to proclaim a Kids' Day," said the talkative fifth grader with no doubts about being promoted to sixth grade.

What Larry's really interested in promoting at the moment is Kids' Day. During the past year or so, he has written hundreds of letters to politicians across the country, asking them to set aside a special day to honor kids.

"I got the idea a couple of years ago, on Grandparents Day," he said as he lounged on a couch in the office of his family's mortuary.

"We were told at school that it was Grandparents Day," he recalled. "I said to myself, 'There's a Mother's Day, and a Father's Day, even a Grandparents Day, so why not have a day honoring children? After all, we're the hope of the future, the ones who are going to have to clean up all this mess the older generation is leaving us.'"

Not being one to mess around himself, he sat right down and began his letter writing.

"I wore out three typewriter ribbons and used up all my dad's stationery," he said. "I got the names and addresses of the state legislators from my grandfather, who was the county coroner at the time. And I used my World Alamanac to get the zip codes of all the big cities and sent those letters 'In Care of the Mayor.'"

It wasn't long before his efforts paid off. Dahlonega officials proclaimed Oct. 15 as Kids' Day. Officials in nearby Dawsonville followed suit on Dec. 6.

Gov. Joe Frank Harris fell into line with a statewide Kids' Day on Dec. 8.

Larry said Hawaii County, Hawaii, declared May 19 to be Kids' Day, "but Georgia is the only state I've gotten so far."

What he's shooting for is a national Kids' Day, maybe even an non-paid holiday honoring kids. He badgered his congressman, Democratic Rep. Ed Jenkins, into offering a resolution last year but the proposal failed.

This year, however, a similar resolution was offered by Rep. Joseph P. Kennedy III, D-Mass. The proposal, which would have the second Sunday in October national Childrens' Day, was approved by a voice vote in the House on May 9 and was sent to the Senate Judiciary Committee.

A spokesman in Kennedy's office said the congressman was influenced by his 8-year-old twin sons "who thought there should be a day honoring children."

Larry said he doesn't care what date is chosen but he wants it to be called "Kids' Day."

"It's a punchier name," he said, adding he'll go to Washington to lobby the Senate if the resolution doesn't get action soon.

His mom, Joyce Banister, said she wouldn't be surprised at anything her son does.

"We're real proud of Larry," she said. "He's always reading or playing with his computer. He also likes soccer but what he really likes is politics."

Appeals court gets $9.4 million against Soldier of Fortune

STATE

HOUSTON (AP) — A federal appeals court this week considers whether Soldier of Fortune, the self-styled "Journal for Professional Adventurers," must pay $9.4 million to the family of a Texas woman gunned down by a hit man hired through an ad in the magazine.

After a three-week trial, a U.S. district court jury in Houston last year made the award to the son and mother of Sandra Black, who was shot to death Feb. 21, 1985, at her home in Bryan, about 90 miles northwest of Houston.

Gary Wayne Black, now 19, was awarded $1.5 million. The jury said Mrs. Black's mother, Marjorie Eimann, 65, should receive $400,000. The two also were awarded $7.5 million in punitive damages.

So far, none of the claims has been paid, although $500,000 from the magazine's insurance carrier has been put into a trust account pending the outcome of the appeal, according to Larry Thompson, the magazine's trial attorney.

On Wednesday, a three-judge panel of the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans will hear arguments from lawyers for both the magazine and the plaintiffs — 20 minutes for each side, then take the matter under advisement. No decision is expected for at least three months, attorneys said, with any ruling likely to be appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court.

"It's primarily a First Amendment argument," Thompson said. "That's really the thrust of the argument. I don't think there's any question this case is destined for the Supreme Court if they choose to accept it."

"I'd be happy for the case to go to the Supreme Court," Ronald Franklin, Mrs. Eimann's attorney, said. "I think we're going to win at whichever level.

The appeal centers on a pretrial ruling from District Judge David Hittner, who ruled Soldier of Fortune could not enjoy full First Amendment protection because of the commercial nature of the ad.

"They contend they are immune from civil liabilities because they are protected by the First Amendment," Franklin said. "They're not complaining of any factual problems with the jury verdict. It's as I understand a pure legal argument."

"There are a lot of problems we had with the trial," said E. Barrett Prettyman, the Washington lawyer who will present the magazine's side before the appeals court. "It breaks down into two very broad categories. One is simply the negligence law of Texas. The other relates to the First Amendment."

Prettyman said if the jury finds negligence, it should be against the advertiser and not against the magazine.

"There are plenty of cases which I certainly would say hold our view that this is improper," he said.

Mrs. Black's husband, Robert, is on the Texas death row for paying hit man John Wayne Hearn $10,000 to kill his wife. Hearn, who shot Mrs. Black twice in the head, is serving three life terms in Florida for the Black slaying and two others in that state.

Robert Black contacted Hearn through a personal services classified ad Hearn placed in late 1984 in Soldier of Fortune.

"They have to convince the 5th Circuit that advertisements placed by hit men are protected by the First Amendment, even when the publisher knows the reason for the advertisement," Franklin said. "We proved without any doubt that Soldier of Fortune knew that the ads were in fact being used to solicit crimes, including murder for hire."

Hearn's ad appeared in four issues of the magazine, which has a circulation of about 150,000 monthly. It read: "Ex marines. '67-69 Nam vets. Ex-DI, weapons specialist — jungle warfare. Pilot. ME. High-risk assignments. U.S. or overseas." It also provided a telephone number.

Episcopal Synod calls fall meeting

FORT WORTH (AP) — The next step for a new voluntary association formed by traditionalist Episcopalians is a fall meeting of its leaders, officials say.

During a three-day meeting that ended Saturday, the Episcopal Synod of America was formed by 1,800 Episcopalians opposed to women's ordination. A Synodical Council is expected to meet in November, said the Rev. Canon Brien Koehler of Fort Worth.

He said about 300 churches were represented at the meeting, including about half of the 57 in the Diocese of Fort Worth. The association formed its own House of Bishops and House of Deputies, reflecting the structure of the larger denomination.

Although the traditionalist group will operate within the laws of the 2.5 million-member Episcopal Church, resolutions approved at the meeting made it clear that if the new synod is thwarted by church leaders, the traditionalists plan further action.

Bishop Clarence Pope of the Fort Worth diocese, who was named president of the synod, said such action could result from an "impediment to our being faithful to what our vision of the church is.

"If such a roadblock came where we could not function and could not minister to those who had serious needs for ministrations from a bishop in this succession, I think we would have to act. But I think that is far down the road," Pope said.

Jane Osborn, coordinator of religious education at St. Alban's Episcopal Church in Arlington, said she fears formation of the new association will make traditionalists in the Diocese of Fort Worth more determined to push out those who disagree with them.

"Everyone is just kind of waiting to see what this new organization will mean," said Ms. Osborn, who will soon leave the Diocese of Fort Worth to move to San Antonio and pursue her dream of becoming an Episcopal priest.

But, during the final Mass of the meeting, Pope preached consideration for those in the denomination whose views are different.

"Ours is not a vocation to smugness and insularity. Charity, courtesy and forbearance must be the rule and not the exception," Pope said.

Dallas AIDS educators targeting IV drug users

DALLAS (AP) — Each week, volunteers pass out condoms and bleach to residents in some of Dallas' poorest neighborhoods in an effort to stem the spread of AIDS among intravenous drug abusers.

"It's like watching an iceberg creeping out of the water," said Shirley Walker, director of health programs operated by the Dallas Urban League. "We know it's out there; it's just a matter of how long it takes to surface."

Usually AIDS outreach workers approach people standing idle in certain neighborhoods and offer them free bleach and condoms, said Jo Valentine, a county health educator who has been working among drug abusers more than two years.

"We don't force anything on people," she said. "The bleach kits are very popular. People ask for them."

Drug users are told how to clean their needles with bleach and water and are encouraged not to share them. A team may reach 75 to 90 people a day, Ms. Valentine said.

AIDS has killed 1,008 people in Dallas County.

So far the disorder, which strikes the body's immune system, has hit hardest among the homosexual and bisexual populations. But now acquired immune deficiency syndrome is quickly spreading among intravenous drug users.

The AIDS-causing virus is most commonly spread by sexual intercourse and the sharing of intravenous-drug needles.

In Texas, IV-drug users make up 5 percent of the total AIDS cases, or 343 of the 6,707, according to the Texas Department of Health. Nationally, 20 percent of the 94,280 AIDS cases have been among IV-drug users. Another 7 percent, of 6,620, were homosexuals who used IV drugs.

Several local service agencies are seeing the results of the spread of the disease into the drug-using community.

AIDS Arms Network, which once prided itself on going anywhere to process a new client, now has prohibited its employees from going to crack houses for client intakes.

And the Daire Center, operated by Oak Lawn Community Services, closed one week recently to install a new security system to ward off the drug-using colleagues of some newer clients, said Tom Jones, director of the day care center for AIDS patients.

Food stamps currency of drug trade, inspector says

DALLAS (AP) — Food stamps are being bartered for everything from crack to birdbaths in the poverty pockets of Dallas. For drug dealers, the monthly allotments can mean up to $500 a day in earnings, a newspaper reported.

The government-issued food stamps have become the currency of an illicit underground economy in the city's destitute areas.

"You can buy almost anything with food stamps if you look hard enough," said Gordon Hardy, the inspector general for Texas' Department of Human Services, the agency responsible for overseeing the state's $948 million food stamp program. In Dallas, nearly 29,000 households receive food stamps.

"I don't know what a branch of government can do" to halt the abuses, Hardy told The Dallas Morning News.

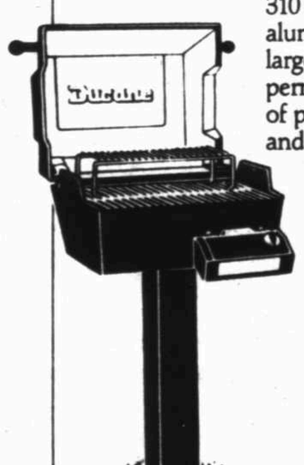

On a daily basis for two months, the newspaper observed the food stamp-for-crack trade in George Loving Place, home to 212 families and one of 17 public housing projects operated by the Dallas Housing Authority.

Although the government sets stringent guidelines to ensure that the stamps get into the right hands, no agency oversees whether the stamps are used for their intended purpose.

The government estimates that about $24,000 worth of stamps illegally change hands in Dallas' drug trade each month. But Dallas police and clergy in West Dallas say that figure is far too low.

Survey: Half of judges gain more from assets than salaries

WASHINGTON (AP) — About half America's federal judges earn more from investments and other outside sources than they would gain from the pay increase proposed by President Bush, a comprehensive analysis of their government records shows.

Most federal judges have six-figure investment portfolios, according to an Associated Press review of 935 financial disclosure forms. Many of the jurists make more money off the bench than on.

The judges, whose current salaries range from $89,500 to $115,000 a year, are pressing Congress for a 30 percent salary increase. Bush proposed a 25 percent increase after an effort for a 51 percent pay hike was killed in Congress.

The AP study of disclosure reports found:

■ In all, between 41 percent and 64 percent of the judges already make more money from all outside sources than they would get from Bush's raise, which would range from $22,375 for district judges to $28,750 for Chief Justice William Rehnquist.

■ At least 62 of the judges are millionaires, perhaps as many as 176.

■ Only five judges reported no household income other than their salaries.

■ At least 93 judges, and perhaps as many as 258, said they make more money from outside income than from salary.

Nonetheless, many judges are dissatisfied.

"In a way, we're sort of like second-class citizens," said James Latchum of Delaware, complaining about the defeat of the 51 percent raise earlier this year and some restrictions on judges' outside income. The 70-year-old judge is very likely a millionaire who in 1987 made between $31,107 and $93,600 on assets valued between $920,000 and $1.5 million.

For its study, AP examined 1987 reports, the most recent complete set available. Most material in these reports are provided within wide numerical ranges rather than in exact dollar amounts.

The millionaires include the well-known and the more obscure.

Gerhard Gesell, who presided over the trial of Oliver North, has extensive farm holdings and is worth at least $1 million, perhaps more than $1.3 million.

Possibly the wealthiest, Circuit Judge Richard Cudahy of Chicago, is the scion of a Milwaukee meatpacking family and is worth at least $8.4 million.

At the other end is Alcee Hastings of Miami. Hastings, now facing ouster in a Senate trial, reported legal bills between $450,000 and $1 million in 1987 from his acquittal in court of soliciting a bribe. He reported he was between $699,005 and $985,000 in the red at the end of the year.

The median or typical judge reported net investments worth between $140,000 and $350,000. These assets generally reflect family funds or substantial incomes before and after appointment to the bench. Median means half the judges are above those figures and half below.

Federal judges' salaries put them in the top 1 percent of American wage and salary earners. Members of Congress also get $89,500, but many members keep two homes and commute between them.

For 10 years, financial disclosure forms have been required of federal officials, focusing considerable attention on Congress and the Cabinet. The judges, in contrast, have received less scrutiny.

The disclosure forms understate judges' wealth by valuing some assets and income in wide numerical ranges and by exempting some holdings, such as homes — the largest single asset for most Americans.

Public opposition helped defeat the 51 percent raise for the judiciary and Congress on Feb. 7 — a day Circuit Judge Frank Coffin refers to as "Black Tuesday."

Since then, Bush recommended a 25 percent raise for judges, with some new restrictions on outside earnings. The judges, who say inflation has eroded 30 percent of their buying power since 1969, are seeking a 30 percent raise with no strings attached.

The big squeeze on judges' buying power came between 1969 and 1975, a period of high inflation during which they got no raises. Many of those eligible for the increases are in full or semi-retirement, while three-fourths of the active judges have been appointed since nearly annual cost-of-living raises began 14 years ago.

No judge has quit since the raise was scuttled, and there is no shortage of people eager to don the black robes.

Sen. Phil Gramm, R-Texas, who helped select about a third of his state's 56 federal judges, said the pay hasn't made it hard for him to find applicants.

"Around 30 people will ask to be considered," Gramm said. "I'm not alarmed. There are good people out there."

A driving force in the judges' campaign is their discontent over how much some lawyers in their courtrooms are paid.

"When young people out of law school are making much more than I am, I don't feel that $89,500 is adequate compensation," said Judge Howard Turrentine of San Diego, a millionaire who complained that he is paid less than 30 of 32 former law clerks.

He said he asked the clerks their salaries at his 75th birthday party.

Coffin gave Congress a document quoting unnamed judges who — one after another — griped about how puny their salaries looked beside those of some private attorneys.

The judges compare themselves to the financial cream of the legal crop. A survey by The American Lawyer magazine found that in 1987 profits per partner in the 100 firms with the most revenue ranged from $155,000 to $1.4 million. They are concentrated in a handful of big cities.

The 10,098 partners in those firms represent just 1.5 percent of all the lawyers in America. The Census reports that the 1987 median income for the nation's 707,000 lawyers and judges was $45,069.

Some judges say their salaries aren't adequate to meet expenses.

Circuit Judge A. Leon Higginbotham Jr. of Philadelphia wrote the government pay commission that he didn't feel bad when judges "get secondhand cars and keep them for 10 years," have "suits which are almost threadbare" and "cannot afford country clubs."

But "judges today are confronted with the real problem as to whether they can provide for their children the type of educational opportunities which they had," wrote Higginbotham, who went to Yale.

On top of his $95,000 salary, he took home between $106,175 and $173,670 in 1987, mostly from real estate investments and teaching at five law schools.

Ninety-seven percent of the judges use their personal assets to produce unearned income. In addition, 400 supplement their income, generally through pensions or settlements from former law firms, and sometimes from teaching law, speaking fees or book royalties.

Pepper's death presents opportunity for GOP

MIAMI (AP) — The death of Rep. Claude Pepper, whose larger-than-life national status made his congressional seat untouchable, has unleashed a frenzy of speculation and backroom politicking over his replacement.

Pepper

Florida Republicans see an opportunity to bolster their new majority in the state's congressional delegation by nominating and electing the first Cuban-American representative.

Democrats have promised to campaign under the banner of Pepper, who had held the 18th District seat since its inception in 1962.

The date of the special election will be set after today's funeral for Pepper, who died Tuesday at age 88.

"It's sort of like a chess game," said Mayor Xavier Suarez, who was busy last week trying to broker his political influence with possible Democratic candidates in hopes of boosting his political capital.

"The alliances are shifting by the hour," Suarez said in between phone calls. "It's like an earthquake; a hole opens up and then it gets filled in."

State GOP Chairman Van Poole and John Buckley, spokesman for the Republican Congressional Campaign Committee, said the party believes it can win the seat, which covers most of Miami and Miami Beach and some suburban areas.

But Dade County Democratic Chairman Simon Ferro said: "As far as we are concerned, this is going to be the Claude Pepper memorial seat."

The Republican Party in Florida is coming off its most successful election since Reconstruction.

Besides giving George Bush his largest margin over Michael Dukakis of any state in the presidential election — nearly 1 million votes — Florida elected Republican Connie Mack to replace retired Democrat Sen. Lawton Chiles, won two congressional seats from the Democrats and took a 10-9 lead in the delegation when Democratic Rep. Bill Grant switched parties.

Florida is expected to gain at least three congressional seats after the 1990 census, and Democrats see the elections that year as a watershed.

"We're on edge here," state Rep. Mike Abrams, a Democrat whose district includes North Miami Beach. "All the trend lines are wrong. We need a win."

Pepper's district reflects the changes in Florida politics.

When carved out for Pepper, who earlier had served 14 years in the Senate, it was filled with retirees from the Northeat. The percentage of voters calling themselves Democrats has dropped in a decade from 72 percent to 54 percent. A little less than 50 percent of residents are Hispanic, many of them Cuban exiles solidly behind Presidents Reagan and Bush.

Pepper won every 1980s election by a landslide and drew no opposition last year. He was a holdover New Deal liberal who adopted a tough anti-communist viewpoint.

Gingrich case will keep focus on House ethics

WASHINGTON (AP) — The House ethics committee soon will begin reviewing a complaint against Republican Whip Newt Gingrich, an omen that the chamber's ethics problems are not a bad dream that will vanish with the departure of Speaker Jim Wright and Majority Whip Tony Coelho.

Ethics committee members could begin as early as Thursday, at their next meeting, to review a Democratic member's complaint that Gingrich, R-Ga., violated rules on outside income and receipt of gifts.

The allegations against Gingrich, revolving around a partnership formed to promote a book he co-authored, are not the only reasons an ethics cloud will hover over the House while Democrats try to divert attention from their leaders' conduct.

Still pending are Justice Department investigations of House members' personnel practices, Justice Department internal probes of leaks about those investigations, the conviction of a Republican lawmaker for having sex with a minor and more public hearings by a House task force considering changes in ethics rules.

But as Wright prepares to leave Congress rather than fight 69 charges of rules violations, and as Coelho, D-Calif., plans his exit to avoid repeated questions on a junk bond deal, many seething Democrats will pay close attention to the case against Gingrich. The Georgia Republican filed the original complaint against Wright, although the allegations he cited were later dropped.

Asked if he expected to be a victim of retribution, Gingrich said last week, "I may be," but added he would trust the judgment of the eight-member ethics panel that is equally divided politically.

Gingrich said he wouldn't be surprised if the committee — officially the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct — took up his case this week. Committee Chairman Julian Dixon, D-Calif., said the panel may consider the complaint, filed by Rep. Bill Alexander, D-Ark., within two weeks.

Rep. Beryl Anthony Jr., D-Ark., chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said Democrats "do not have an organized strategy where we met and said, 'We're going to do A, B or C on Newt. Our strategy is to sit back and let the process work. The assumption is the committee will move with deliberate speed. They've got nothing to gain by postponing it."

Koop lauded as hero in Boston AIDS walk

BOSTON (AP) — Gay rights activists, once among outgoing Surgeon General C. Everett Koop's harshest critics, applauded him wildly as a humanitarian hero at a walk attended by 18,000 people seeking to raise money to fight AIDS.

The crowd on Boston Common roared its approval Sunday and chanted, "Koop, Koop, Koop" as the 72-year-old public health chief, who will step down from his post this year, approached the podium.

"You're running the risk of embarrassing me," Koop said. When the crowd refused to stop applauding, he added, "I could have used used that during my eight years in Washington."

Gay rights activists once warned that Koop's conservative views on abortion and homosexuality would prevent him from responding effectively to the AIDS epidemic.

Instead, Koop angered his traditional supporters by calling for frank AIDS education and telling Americans to use condoms to halt the spread of the disease.

Face-saving airlift risky for Gorbachev

The Kremlin continues to pay dearly for its ill-conceived invasion of Afghanistan. After more than eight years of war, culminating in a humiliating withdrawal last February, the Soviet Union is now propping up the beleaguered puppet regime of President Najibullah with an airlift. There has been no equal to this since the Allies mounted the Berlin airlift in 1948.

Moscow had hoped the civil war in Afghanistan would end when Soviet troops retreated across the border. Accordingly, the Soviets proposed cutting off aid to the Marxist Najibullah regime if the United States would cease aiding Moslem guerrillas fighting to overthrow the regime. The Bush administration rightly turned down this proposal and said it would continue to arm hundreds of thousands of rebels besieging the capital city of Kabul in the expectation that they would win a military victory.

With the outcome of the civil war depending in large measure on Soviet ability to provide food, fuel and weapons to the rag-tag Afghan army, the high-cost, high-risk Kabul airlift is now in its third month. Almost every day since early March, giant IL-76 aircraft have flown up to 40 missions to the Afghan capital, braving guerrilla missile attacks on the risky approach to Kabul's airport. The magnesium flares scattered by the aircraft to divert the guerrillas' Stinger missiles plummet to earth at a temperature of more than 5,000 degrees Fahrenheit. Hundreds of adults and children have been burned by showers of white-hot magnesium.

Among the 10,000 tons of vital supplies that arrive each week are the Scud-B missiles that have proved a major deterrent to guerrilla offensives and, ironically, flour made from American wheat shipped to the Soviet Union. The Kremlin has sanctioned handsome rewards for the volunteer crews running the airlift. Many pilots making the perilous flight twice a day for 15 days of the month are now earning the equivalent of $17,220 monthly, more than 10 times their normal salaries. Soviet economists estimate that the airlift is costing more than $40 million a month, or nearly $500 million a year.

Not surprisingly, Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev has voiced his impatience with this heavy drain on Soviet resources. He wants a diplomatic solution within six months. Meanwhile, President Najibullah has promised to appoint a commission to talk peace with guerrilla leaders. He has also renewed his appeal to the United States to discuss a bilateral arms cutoff.

The Kabul airlift is a risky face-saver for which Gorbachev is likely to find little support at home. Which is another reason the Bush administration should firmly resist all calls to halt support for the rebels. When the airlift ceases, as it must, the challenge for the United States will be to help rebuild a democratic Afghanistan at the earliest opportunity and to resettle the 5 million refugees who fled the prolonged conflict.

Nuclear 20 Questions

Until 1985, U.S. law prohibited the sharing of nuclear weapons design with any other country except Britain. Yet for a decade, American officials had been secretly helping France design nuclear weapons. The extensive help secured France's tacit cooperation in NATO plans, despite its supposed independence, and many other benefits. It's less clear that the secrecy was so necessary.

The covert assistance program is described in a Foreign Policy magazine article by Richard Ullman of Princeton. To avoid giving away weapons design information, prohibited by law, U.S. officials would have the French describe their weapons program and then respond, indicating which lines of research were unpromising. The exercise was known as "20 Questions."

In this way the French learned how to miniaturize nuclear warheads for use on multiple-warhead missiles, and how to protect them from the electromagnetic pulse of nearby nuclear explosions. Besides design information, they were told how to conduct underground nuclear tests, and how to prevent accidental detonations and unauthorized launches. They were given information on missile guidance and propulsion, and on Soviet targets and defense measures, Mr. Ullman reports.

The exchange policy was begun by President Nixon and Henry Kissinger. Its logic was that since France had a nuclear force anyway, it might as well be as safe and efficient as possible, and the French saved from wasting money on false leads. French governments, both conservative and Socialist, seem to have greatly appreciated the sharing of nuclear secrets.

In return, Mr. Ullman relates, they coordinated their nuclear targeting plans with NATO, made supply routes and airfields available to NATO forces, shared intelligence data and even cooperated with American efforts to curb the proliferation of nuclear weapons.

Was the assistance legal? The 20 Questions routine may have fallen within the letter of the Atomic Energy Act but hardly within its spirit. Succeeding Administrations seem to have kept Congress, or at least certain members, informed. But the program was not given a clear legal basis until 1985.

The program, if of the extent Mr. Ullman describes, brought great benefits to both sides. Why, then, did it have to be kept so secret? The French evidently insisted on secrecy, but Washington could have pressed harder for disclosure. In retrospect at least, it seems imprudent to have depended on the miraculous. Who could have reasonably assumed that the secret would, as it did, keep all these years?

TODAY IN HISTORY

Today is Monday, June 5, the 156th day of 1989. There are 209 days left in the year.

Today's highlight in history:

On June 5, 1968, at 3:16 a.m. EDT, Sen. Robert F. Kennedy was shot and mortally wounded at the Ambassador Hotel in Los Angeles shortly after claiming victory in California's Democratic presidential primary. Five other people were wounded. Kennedy's assassin, Sirhan Bishara Sirhan, was immediately arrested.

On this date:

In 1723, economist Adam Smith was born in Kirkcaldy, Scotland.

In 1783, Joseph and Jacques Montgolfier publicly demonstrated their hot-air balloon in a ten-minute flight over Annonay, France.

In 1883, economist John Maynard Keynes was born in Cambridge, England.

In 1884, Civil War hero General William T. Sherman refused the Republican presidential nomination with the words, "I will not accept if nominated and will not serve if elected."

In 1917, about 10 million American men began registering for the draft in World War I.

Terrorist blames U.S. for Israel's acts

DAMASCUS, Syria — The Palestinian terrorist believed to have blown up Pan Am flight 103 says he is a civilized man who wouldn't kill a planeload of American civilians. But Ahmed Jibril's nice-guy image is only skin-deep. In an interview with us, Jibril said that if his enemy, Israel, harms him or his followers, he would not hesitate to retaliate against Americans.

Jack Anderson

One would have to crawl inside Jibril's mind to track that twisted rationale. It is easier just to accept the version of reality subscribed to by many Islamic fundamentalists — that the United States is to blame for all the ills of the world, and there is no such thing as an innocent American.

Jibril is a portly, 52-year-old man, thinning on the top with a salt and pepper mustache. He is the secretary general of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine-General Command. But he looks more like a cordial mafia don.

In a four-hour interview with us in Damascus, Jibril was often genial, except when he talked about America: "I will tell you that if our organization is subjected to any extraordinary Israeli action, we would be sure that you — the Americans — are accomplices also. The Bush administration would be an accomplice too, and we would have our own reaction."

Jibril is clearly paranoid about paramilitary action against him and his followers, and no matter where it came from, he would assume the United States pulled the strings.

Besides the repeated accusations coming out of Washington, D.C., about the Pan Am bombing, Jibril has been unnerved by other "signs" that Israel, acting on orders from the United States, might take some action against him soon.

On March 8, Jibril's men caught two U.S. Embassy officials from Damascus snooping around the perimeter of his most sensitive commando base, about 25 miles from the city. They were taking pictures and had maps, compasses and binoculars. Jibril's men "detained" the two diplomats for eight hours before letting them go.

Later, Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk Charaa charged that any intelligence the two collected would have been passed on to Israel.

Jibril also revealed that a "superpower" nation had warned him that the United States was planning to waylay a plane that was carrying some of his guerrillas from Libya to Syria during the first week of May. He said a U.S. fighter plane from an aircraft carrier in the Mediterranean was going to chase the Libyan plane and force it down. "We were warned by several parties, among them superpowers, just one hour before the flight. We then did everything in a different way."

Jibril's definition of "superpower" evidently extends beyond the United States and the Soviet Union. One of his members confirmed that the tip-off came from the Soviet Union, but Jibril himself said there were other superpowers. If another country warned him, according to our sources, it would most likely have been Italy.

That assumes the United States had a plan to intercept the Libyan plane carrying Jibril's men. A State Department official told us there was no such plot.

But Jibril was obviously jittery about Israel. He repeated, "Let me tell you now that if the Israelis and the Mossad (Israel's secret service) try some extraordinary thing against our fighters, we would have a reaction ... We would hold the Americans responsible."

MINI-EDITORIAL — A recent study showed that despite the growing number of teenage pregnancies, schools are still not equipped to keep the young mothers on the educational track. In some schools, pregnant girls are banned from social and student government activities. Some don't allow for the absences that go along with pregnancy. Schools are ignoring the reality and in the process robbing girls of an education because of one mistake.

Blood of students will nourish tree of liberty

WASHINGTON — Undemocratic regimes everywhere are facing the prospect of civil war.

In China, the massacre of students was the death knell of the regime. The demonstrators' goal was not to wring a few trappings of democracy from the corrupt gerontocracy, but to instill the dangerous spirit of freedom in a billion Chinese. The purpose of the original hunger strike was to create a handful of martyrs around which to rally a movement.

William Safire

When Deng's regime was unable to get local army units to move against the demonstrators, it appeared that the Communist leadership's mild reaction was not so much indecisive as it was cunning: the young demonstrators, allowed to stew in their own juices, would be defeated by boredom. They would go home in dribs and drabs, denied martyrdom.

Deng's delayed reaction, however, was not dictated by shrewdness but by the need to organize brutality. He slipped out of Beijing, met with the seven army commanders and out-Mao'd Mao by winning the agreement of six to teach the students a bloody lesson: that Communist power comes out of the barrel of a gun.

The Tiananmen massacre established order, all right, but also established a national underground determined to overthrow that order. Idealism alone is repressible, but idealism alloyed with a passion for vengeance creates a gun barrel all its own.

Counterrevolution — civil war — is under way, and may take years or Deng's death to prevail, but today's student-killers will one day be replaced by today's heroes. That is why the thousands of bloodied students are the victors of the massacre; this day will be the next democratic government's national holiday.

Civil war is also possible in Iran, after the death of the old man who turned back the clock by a millennium.

We do not know the dynamics of Persian dissent. Perhaps the world will see a falling-out between the ayatollah's most fanatic followers and the long-vaunted moderate mullahs; or perhaps the defeated military and the repressed secular middle class will conspire with exiles to move against the fundamentalists.

However the split occurs, the likelihood of a peaceful and parliamentary resolution of differences is remote. A great fault line runs through Iranian society; now that the transfixation with a charismatic is past, it's only a question of time before the earthquake.

That brings us to the threat of civil strife in a third country: the war that may or may not break out in and around the Soviet Union. The political struggle is already under way, and has so far been peaceful.

When repression does turn violent, as in the gassing of Georgian nationalists in Tblisi, it is disavowed by Moscow. When republics conflict and old nationalist hatreds appear — as happened last weekend when Uzbeks rioted against Meskhetians in Uzbekistan — trouble is put down bloodily but out of camera range.

The civil struggle has been to transfer power from an inefficient party to an anti-ideological leader. Its success lies in the genius of Mikhail Gorbachev to subject himself to criticism as he makes subjects of his critics.

But how will the new above-party power structure manage the intensified yearning for independence in its European satellites? How will it handle demands for sovereignty in the illegally annexed Baltic States? And how will it later respond to anti-Russian demonstrations sure to come in the vital Ukraine, which would be the beginning of the Soviet disunion?

What we have seen in China this week, and what we are likely to see in Tehran before long, suggests that the Russian leader will probably revert to totalitarian type: in the end, he — or the man hastily put in to replace him — will call out the army to teach the demonstrators a brutal lesson, as Deng has just done, as the czars used to do.

We can hope that Gorbachev uses his burgeoning power to set free the nations whose people want freedom, and then returns his own power to his own people. Maybe — for the first time — freedom will gently evolve.

But history teaches that empires do not break up voluntarily; dictators never dictate freedom; totalitarian states do not overthrow themselves. On occasion — the shah of Iran, Marcos of the Philippines — the strongman cannot bring himself to order troops to kill the people, but few dictators are so squeamish.

No outsider wants to sound incendiary, but the sad truth is that the tree of liberty in indeed nourished by patriot blood. The thousands of brave young Chinese who were killed this weekend did not, in Lincoln's phrase, die in vain; their sacrifice will lead their people out of Communist bondage.

Coelho turned into Democratic martyr, hero

WASHINGTON — The big House Democratic majority has reacted with defiance, not repentance, to the fall of Rep. Tony Coelho by elevating him to martyr and hero.

Martyrdom, because few in the Democratic cloakroom think he decided to abruptly terminate his meteoric congressional career to hide financial wrong-doings that would surely surface in any full-blown ethics investigation. Heroism, because of his perceived self-sacrifice in saving his party from protracted ordeal. "Tony will always be a hero to me," one well-placed Democrat incapable of guile told us.

That suggests the congressional Democrats may be learning wrong lessons. They ignore the salient characteristics of today's House: the intense partisanship and the ravenous quest for political funding that made him indispensable to them and the acquisitive thirst for personal gain that brought him down. Instead, they see him victimized by a deranged political climate where one little error — an insider deal involving a mere $100,000 junk-bond purchase — is fatal.

Coelho's heroism was underlined by Jim Wright's reluctance, which ended on Wednesday, to step down as speaker. That only confirmed the Democratic rank-and-file attitude. Despite Wright's eloquent farewell and his plea to end the "mindless cannibalism," few tears were shed in his behalf, while there is breast beating over Coelho.

Rowland Evans and Robert Novak

He is in fact the quintessential House Democrat of the 1980s. His rise came a decade ago in an atmosphere filled with fear of party realignment as the ideological balance moved right and Republican operatives moved into high tech. His answer as the new Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee chairman was not new ideas but new money-raising ventures.

That meant tapping corporate political action committees (PACs) previously thought the exclusive property of the GOP. Rather than compromise liberal ideological principles, the Democratic coin for repaying the PACs was legislative and oversight favors for the special interests, such as the savings and loan industry, that proved to be such generous givers. That was half the reason for Wright's demise. It would have played prominently in an ethics probe of Coelho.

There is little appreciation of this by colleagues. Nor do they view the other half of Wright's ethical difficulties — his obsessive search for more income — as the real cause of Coelho's undoing.

Coelho's attitude toward making money while serving in Congress was blurted out a year ago when he was told of a newspaper account of financial disclosures showing Sen. Paul Sarbanes with zero net worth. "You've got to be kidding," said an incredulous Coelho. Current financial disclosures show Sarbanes a little above zero but not much: a personal residence in Baltimore in the $100,000 to $250,000 range (which does not have to be listed but is) and a $5,000 to $10,000 bank savings account.

In contrast, Coelho's current disclosure lists these holdings, quite apart from his unlisted personal dwelling: rental properties, up to $200,000; savings and loan stock, $5,000 to $15,000; limited partnerships, up to $35,000 (including one with now departed House aide John Mack); two IRA accounts up to $15,000; a money market account, $5,000 to $15,000; savings accounts from $15,000 to $50,000. Only after The Washington Post disclosed his fateful $100,000 junk bond purchase were details of that transaction added to his financial disclosure.

That adds up to something less than wealth and is trifling when compared to House colleagues who have amassed millions on the public payroll. But it is not bad for somebody who went straight from college to Capitol Hill as a staffer and who will leave the public payroll for the first time June 15. It certainly leaves Sarbanes far behind.

The potential mischief in Coelho's commercial dealings is lost on most of his colleagues, many of whom are engaged in the same activity. Rather, regret is being noised around that the fiercely partisan Coelho and Wright will be replaced by the kinder, gentler Thomas Foley as speaker and Richard Gephardt as majority leader.

In contrast to his friend and political ally Coelho, Gephardt fights with ideas: first tax reform (vigorously opposed by Coelho) and then economic nationalism. But he has not become the unopposed choice for majority leader, once reserved for Coelho, because of what he thinks but because his passage through bitter presidential primaries with no blemish certifies his ethical good health.

The sensibility of the House is that Tony Coelho sacrificed himself for his fellow Democrats and that now is the time to lie low with Dick Gephardt.

If you get a new air conditioner this summer ...

DON'T LET 'EM MESS WITH YOUR FURNACE!

Here's why you may need to think about winter during the hottest part of the summer.

If you need a new air conditioner this summer, chances are someone will try to sell you a gadget called a heat pump instead. You've probably seen heat pumps advertised, because they're being promoted heavily by the electric company.

The electric company wants you to believe that a heat pump will cool your home in the summer, and heat your home in the winter. Here's a fact that they haven't told you:

A heat pump will not cool your home as well as a high-efficiency air conditioner.

Here's why you should think about winter when you hear a sales pitch for a heat pump:

A heat pump will not work well enough by itself to keep you warm all winter long.

If all you had was a heat pump this winter, you and your family would get uncomfortably cold when the outside temperature drops. So they'll either attach the thing to your present gas furnace. Or they'll try to sell you a whole new gas furnace that you probably don't even need!

Think about it. Why does the electric company want you to have an electric heat pump, something that will not keep you warm all winter long, and will not cool you as well as an air conditioner? Who will really benefit?

It takes more electricity for a heat pump to do the same job in the summer as a modern high efficiency air conditioner. And it takes a lot more electricity to run a heat pump in winter than it takes to run an efficient natural gas furnace. And it still won't get the job done!

After all, the more electricity you use, the higher your electric bills. And with a heat pump, you'll be paying those high electric bills all year round.

If your air conditioner goes out this summer, by all means replace it with a new high-efficiency air conditioner. The latest models work better and are more efficient than ever.

But if you get hit with a sales pitch for a heat pump, here are three simple things to keep in mind this summer that may have everything to do with keeping your family comfortable next winter.

1. Use the Right Appliance for the Right Job.

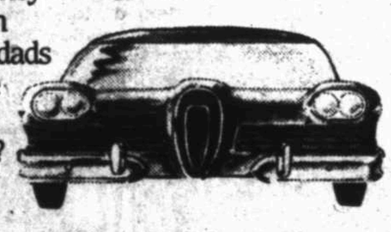

When you need to keep your home cool, a modern high-efficiency air conditioner is without a doubt the best way to do it.

When it comes to heating your home, the best way to do it is a natural gas furnace. Period.

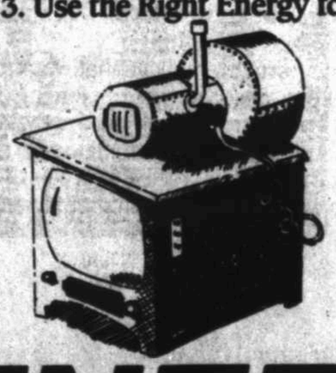

2. "It seemed like a good idea at the time."

How much money has been spent on gadgets and doo-dads that seemed to be the hottest things going at the time? 8-track tapes. CB radios.

A lot of fads have come and gone over the years, but your natural gas furnace steadily and dependably keeps your family comfortable every winter. Natural gas furnaces just get better and better.

3. Use the Right Energy for the Right Job.

There are good reasons why you don't see wind-powered lawn mowers, steam television sets, and electric airplanes. They would be a terrible misuse of energy.

Electricity is exactly right for lights, air conditioning, and some appliances in your home. But not for heating.

Natural gas is the most efficient energy on the planet when it comes to the major job of heating your home.

It's environmentally sound. Natural gas is the safest cleanest-burning fuel we have. It doesn't contribute to the acid rain problem. Plus there's plenty of it to last well into the 21st century ... and beyond.

So if your air conditioner goes out in the middle of our hot West Texas summer, replace it with a new modern high-efficiency air conditioner. And give some thought to winter.

Don't let 'em mess with your furnace!

Polish nationals support Solidarity

CHICAGO (AP) — More than 14,000 Poles casting absentee ballots in three U.S. cities for elections in their homeland gave overwhelming support to Solidarity candidates, and many predicted a similar result in Poland.

"The outcome of yesterday's election shows that the government-...doesn't have any support at all," Maciej Wierzynski, producer of a Polish-language television program, said Sunday.

But Ryszard Krystosik, a spokesman for the Polish embassy in Washington, said projecting a victory in Poland for the opposition, led by the Solidarity trade union, based on the outcome from the United States was unwise.

■ Related story — 1D

"To draw that conclusion on these results is premature," Krystosik said in a telephone interview.

As government and opposition candidates in Poland wrapped up their campaigns for the elections Saturday, Polish nationals in the United States flocked to consulates in Chicago, New York and Washington to vote a day early.

Candidates backed by the opposition garnered more than 95 percent of the 5,000-plus valid ballots cast in Chicago in the races for which they were eligible, said Kazimierz Masiak, an opposition poll watcher.

In one contest, which pitted Solidarity-backed candidate Andrzej Lapicki against former government spokesman Jerzy Urban, Lapicki garnered 98.3 percent of the valid ballots cast in Chicago, Masiak said.

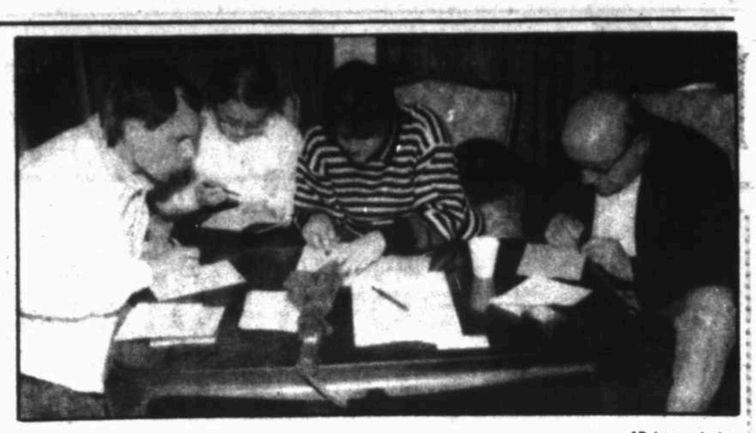

Results in New York were similar. More than 9,000 people voted there, and partial results showed Solidarity candidates leading with more than 90 percent of the vote, said a consular official who declined to give his name.

In Washington, where few Poles live, Krystosik said 469 people had voted. Of the valid ballots, Solidarity candidates garnered between 77 percent and 88 percent, he said.

"The election is a rejection of the government's social and economic system," said Hubert Romanowski, an election judge in Chicago with Solidarity.

The elections, the freest in the East Bloc in more than four decades, were set up by an agreement between the communist-led government and the opposition.

Under the agreement, 65 percent of the seats in the 460-member lower house, or Sejm, were reserved for the Communist Party and its allies. Balloting for the newly created 100-member Senate was wide open.

NATION in brief

Hundreds arrested in nuclear protest

SEABROOK, N.H. (AP) — Anti-nuclear activists blocked gates at the Seabrook nuclear power plant today, capping a weekend of protests that brought the arrest total to more than 650.

About 40 people were arrested as they sat in the road in front of two gates and kept workers on the 7 a.m. shift from entering the plant on time. They were quickly loaded into a van, many of them dragged by officers, and taken to the Seabrook police station.

The arrests came a day after nonviolent demonstrations that resulted in 627 arrests, the second largest number of arrests in one day in 13 years of demonstrations that have made Seabrook a symbol of the nation's anti-nuclear movement. The largest was in May 1977, when 1,414 people were arrested.

There was also a rally on Saturday, which attracted an estimated 4,000 people.

"I think this truly marks the beginning of a new era of resistance to the Seabrook project. We will be back at this plant as they continue to attempt to license it," said Roy Morrison, shortly after he was arrested Sunday on a criminal trespass charge.

After today's arrests, a handful of protesters continued to mill outside the gates, but spokeswoman Dianne Dunfey said she did not believe there would be more demonstrations today. She said protests could continue later in the week as low-power testing at the plant draws near.

Suburbs ranked by income

CHICAGO (AP) — The Chicago metropolitan area has the nation's wealthiest and poorest suburb, according to a survey.

The Los Angeles and St. Louis areas had most of the nation's 15 poorest suburbs, and New York area communities dominated a list of the richest 15, said the study released Sunday.

The study was based on 1987 Census income and population projections, and directed by Pierre deVise, an urbanologist at Roosevelt University.

"The nation's richest suburbs come closest to representing the American dream as portrayed in films, novels and pop sociology," deVise said. The poorest "resemble the American nightmare," he said.

Chicago suburbs Kenilworth and Ford Heights were named the wealthiest and poorest suburbs, respectively. Per capita annual income in Kenilworth was $61,950, while in Ford Heights it was just $4,943, the study said.

"The nature of suburbs is changing dramatically," said deVise. "The future of American politics now lies in the suburbs."

After Kenilworth, the wealthiest suburb was Bloomfield Hills, Mich., near Detroit. Per capita income there was $59,830.

Nancy Reagan plugs book

WASHINGTON (AP) — Nancy Reagan says there were things she "longed to say" during her tumultuous eight years at the White House that she promises will appear in her upcoming memoirs, "My Turn."

The former first lady, speaking publicly in Washington for the first time since she and President Reagan left for California more than four months ago, offered a few insights Saturday into her old and new lives at a Library of Congress and Random House forum on first ladies.

Mrs. Reagan said that while there is "a certain dignity" to remaining silent, she decided to write a book for her own peace of mind, for her children and to help set the historical record straight.

"I felt I could start rebuilding a private life by writing about some things," she said.

But the former first lady said she realizes "there's a fine line you have to walk. You step on one side, and you sound offensive. You step on the other side, and you sound like you're trying to get even. I hope I've avoided those pitfalls."

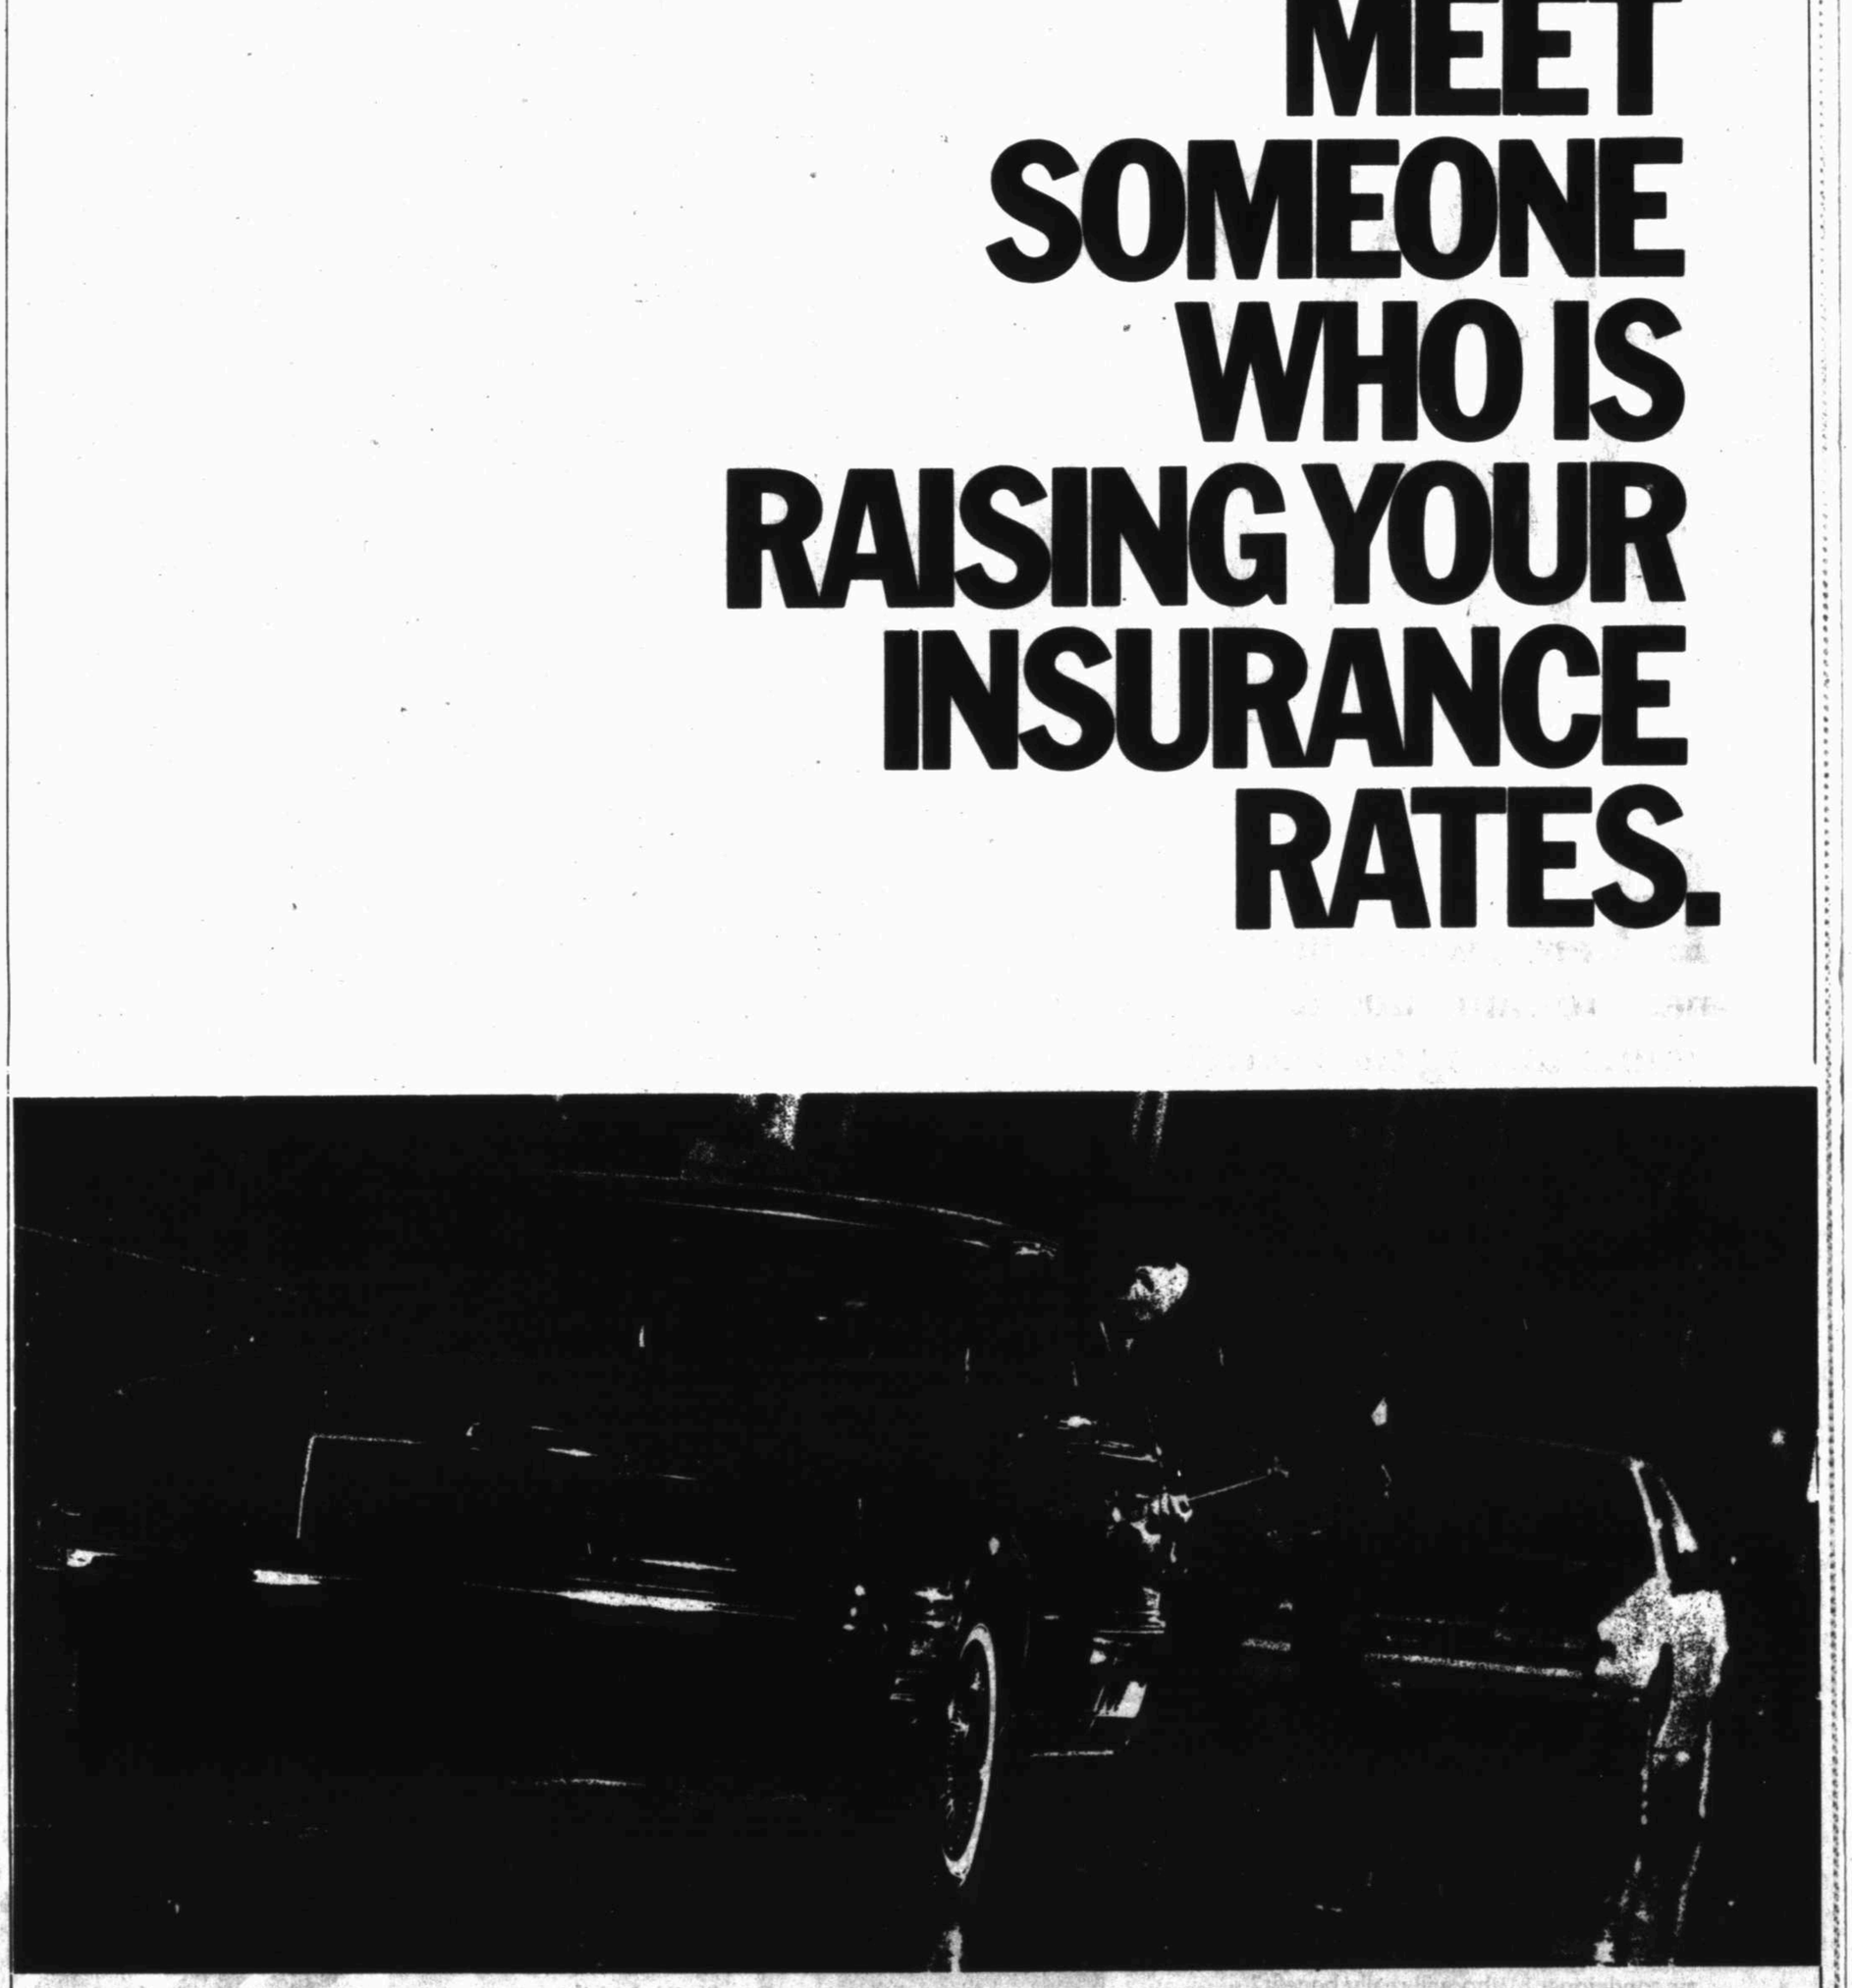

Restraints questioned

LOS LUNAS, N.M. (AP) — A state report prepared last month says straitjackets, "papoose boards" and other physical restraints criticized by federal inspectors are still in use at Los Lunas Hospital and Training Center.

Inspectors said such practices were "no longer condoned at enlightened facilities" and "substantially outside the realm of accepted practice."

Hospital Administrator Carolyn Klintworth declined comment, referring inquiries to Nancy Hunter, spokeswoman for the state Health and Environment Department.

MEET SOMEONE WHO IS RAISING YOUR INSURANCE RATES.

Why do insurance premiums go up? You're looking at one big reason. Auto theft. The number of auto thefts has gone up 32% in the last 10 years. And the average value of those thefts has gone up 181%.

With the value of cars going up, a professional thief can easily steal over $50,000 worth of vehicles in a single night. And guess whose premiums pay for replacing those cars? If you feel a pain in your wallet, you guessed right.

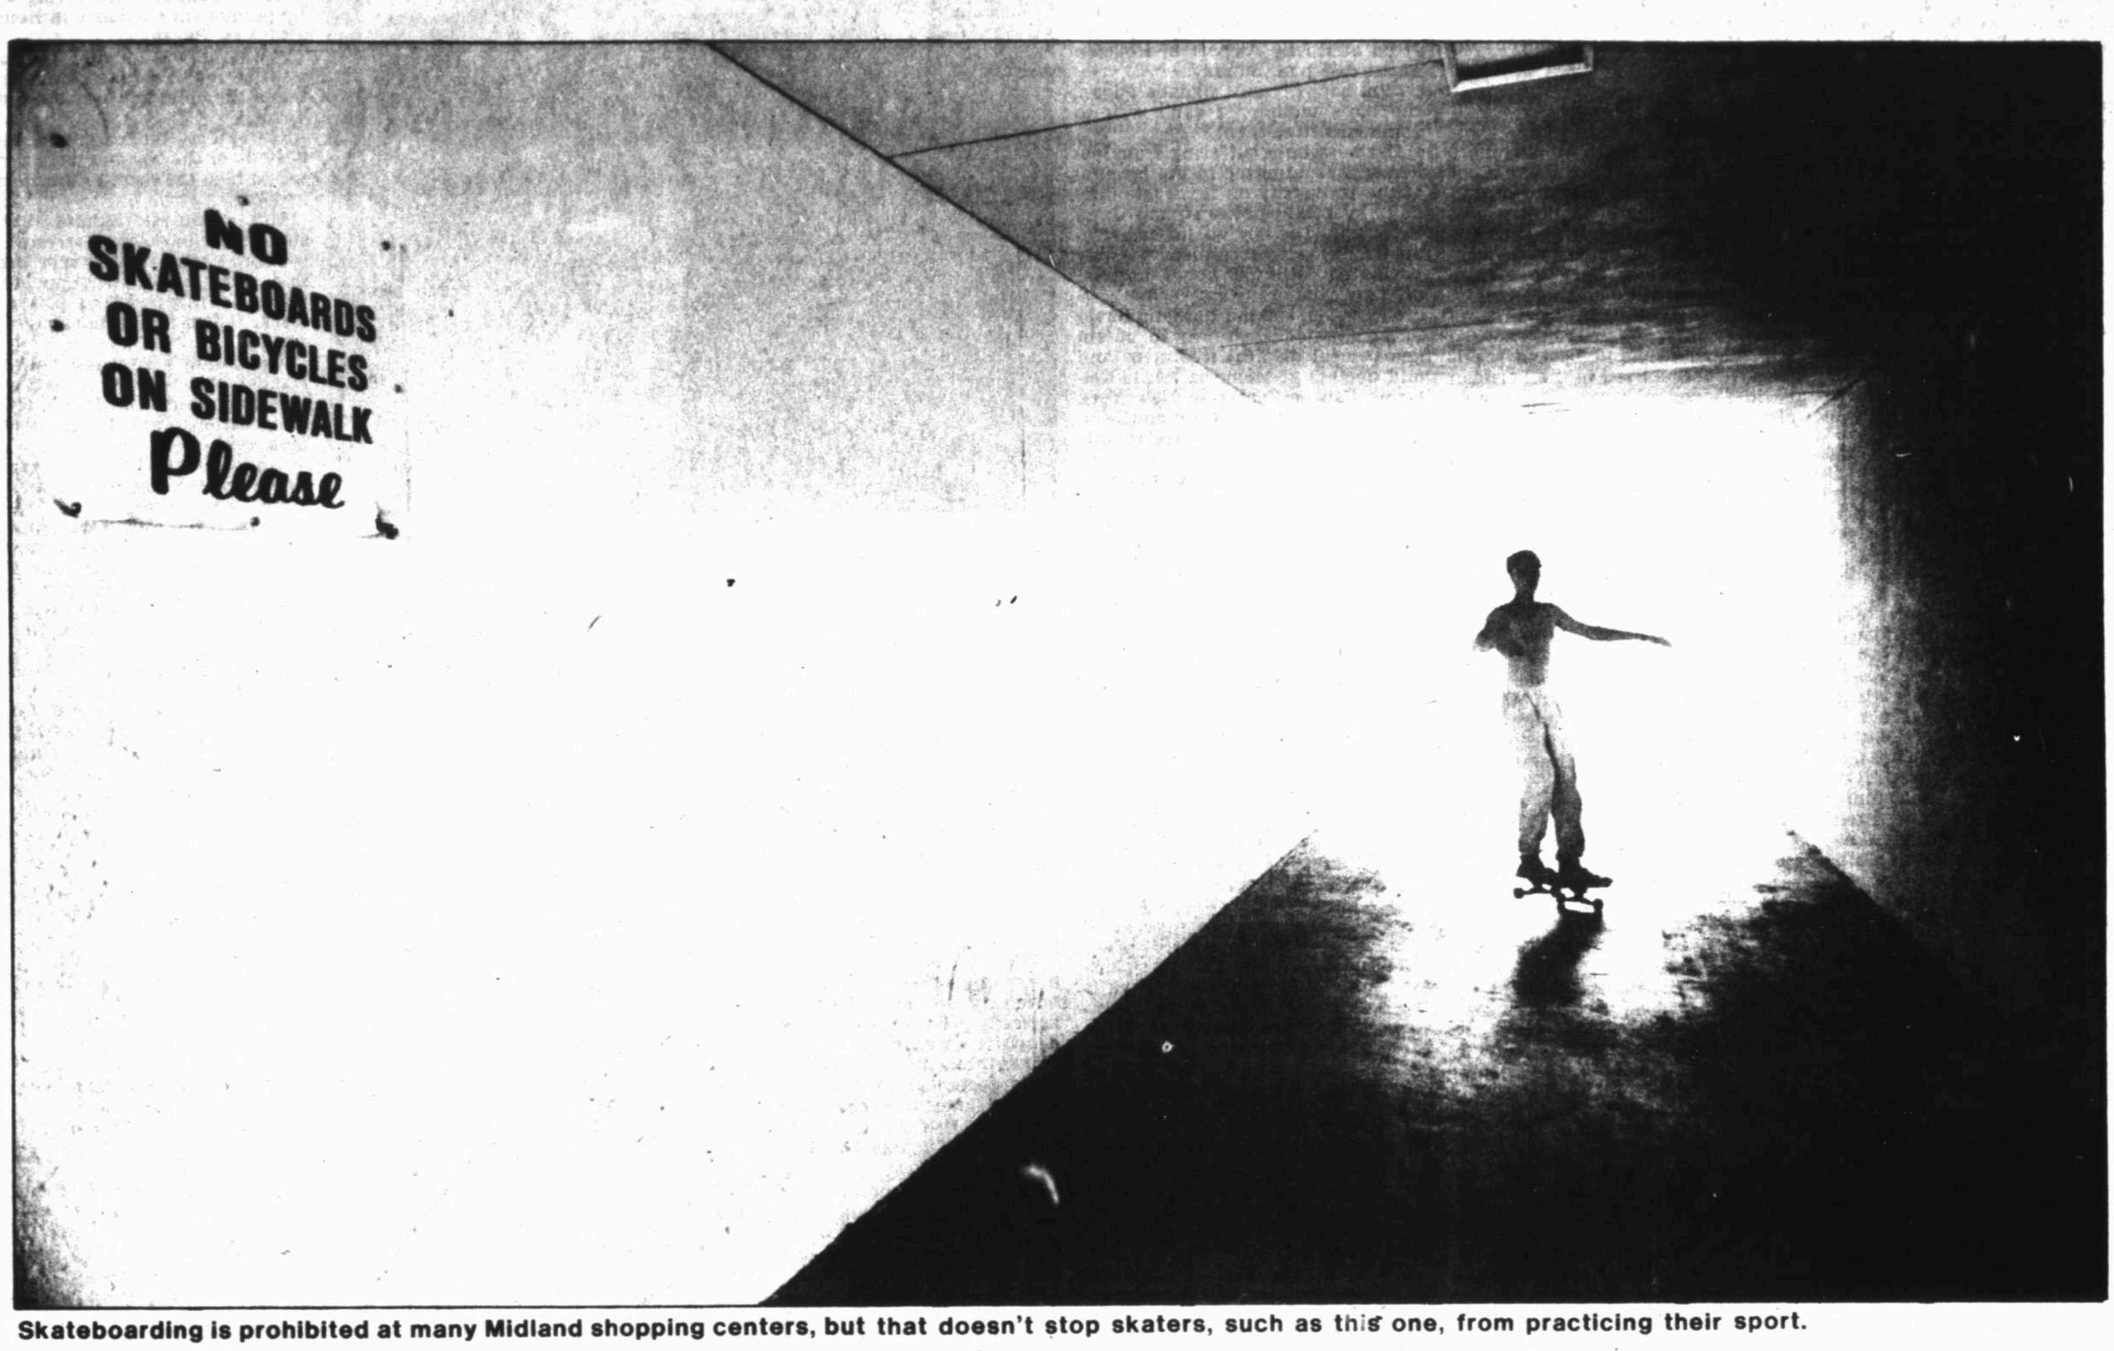

At State Farm, we believe that ways must be found to keep these thieves from forcing premiums to go up. That's why we work closely with the National Auto Theft Bureau to help stop car thieves, throw them in jail, and recover the cars they stole. And why we started a pilot program to etch vehicle identification numbers on key parts of theft-prone car models.

State Farm is there, every day. Finding more ways to help protect our policyholders from the causes of rising premiums. So we can keep insurance affordable.

Skateboarding is prohibited at many Midland shopping centers, but that doesn't stop skaters, such as this one, from practicing their sport.

THRASHERS: 'We're not criminals'

Ralph Medina, 15, is geared up for skating with protective kneepads.

Skateboarding is not a crime, depending on whom you ask.

When Rusty Thompson, 16, streaks up out of a concrete drainage ditch, pops up on a curb stop, turns his board 180 degrees and plunges back down, he doesn't think about drugs, defacing public property or Satan.

The Lee High School sophomore just wants to have fun.

A West Texas sun beats down and cars hiss by one recent afternoon as Rusty and six of his skateboard buddies thrash "Pluto," a relatively mellow skate ditch off State Highway 191 near the Sam's Wholesale Club outlet.

"I guess it's called Pluto because it's way out here," said Rusty, who's wearing baggy black trousers and a backwards black baseball cap covering a crop of red hair, which trickles down the back of his neck into a thin tail.

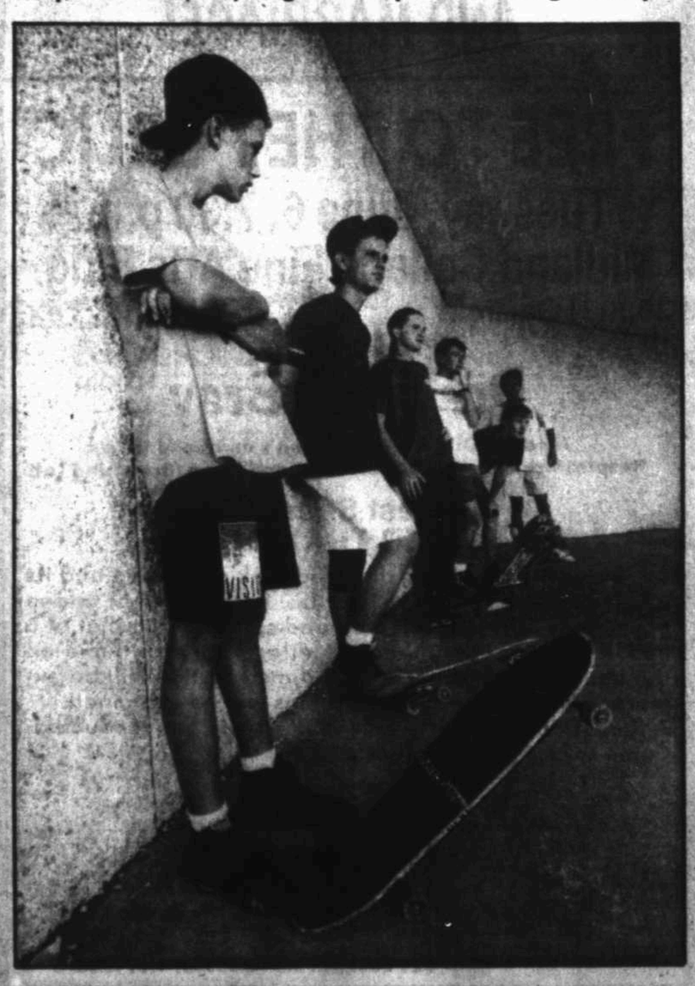

Naming ditches, ramps and other skateable structures is part of being a skater, as is incorporating terms such as "disaster slide," "boneless," "no-comply" and "slappy," all skating tricks, into the daily vernacular.

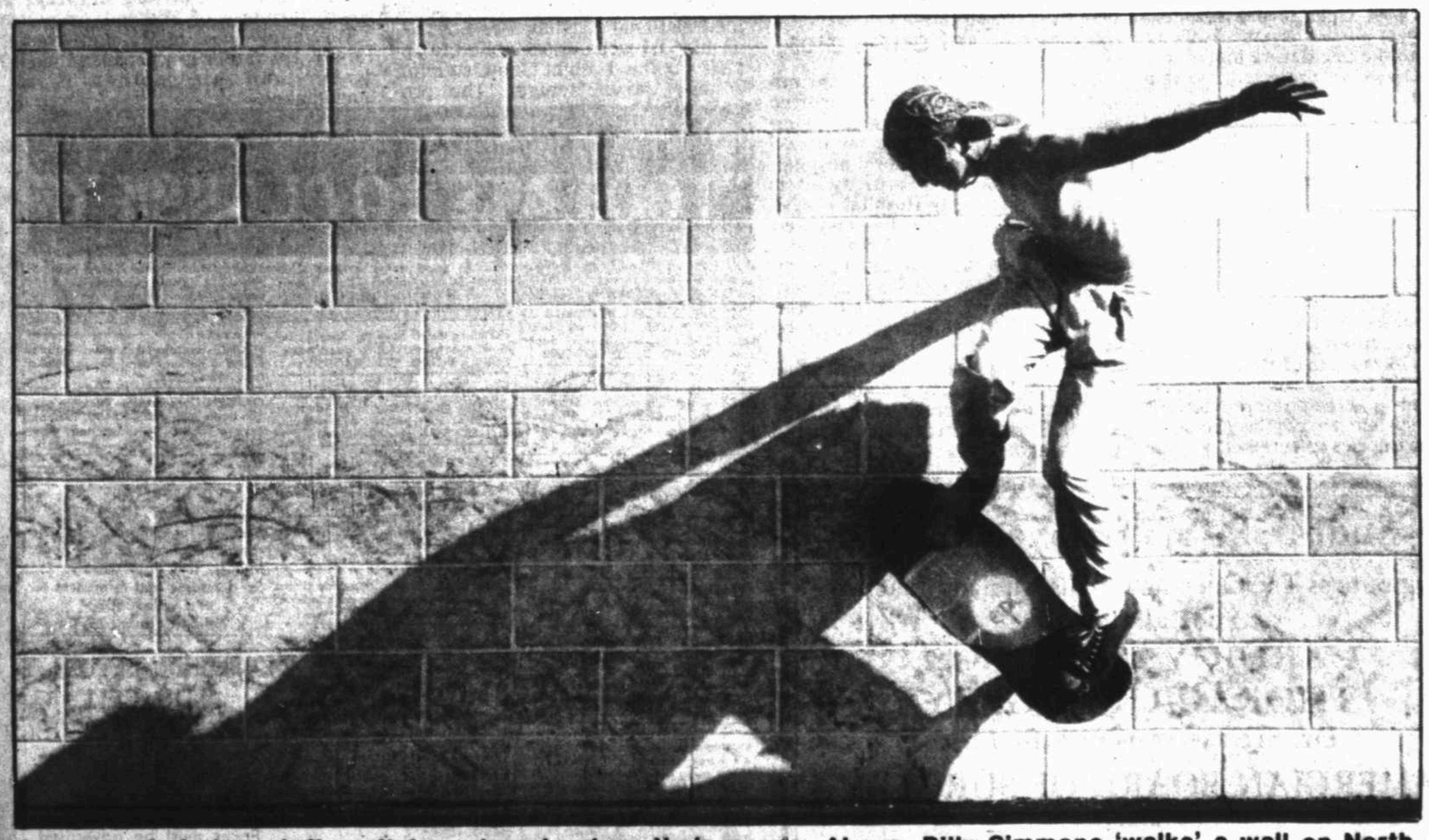

As Rusty's countenance profoundly displays, skating is as much an attitude as a recreation for those who inevitably get the bloody knees or broken bones that accompany learning or creating a daring new maneuver.

Not one of the six riding Pluto this afternoon has a leg or arm void of a bleeding abrasion, an ugly scab or at least that one scar commemorating an attempted feat that ended in a high-speed collision of flesh with concrete or wood. The Huckleberry Finns on wheels also have the communal spirit, sarcastic attitude and boyish grit to show for it.

Rusty said at least some in his loosely-knit skate group of about 30 Midland junior high and high school students ride in and around Midland and Odessa almost every day and sometimes drive as far as Big Spring, which has better ditches. Their favorite Midland hangouts include a couple of ditches, backyard wooden ramps, parking lots and "anywhere there's a flat area where you don't get kicked out," Rusty said.

Boy arrives for Texas cancer treatments

HOUSTON (AP) — A cancer-stricken 4-year-old boy begins medical evaluations today at M.D. Anderson Cancer Center following a legal battle that sent his mother to jail.

Accompanied by his smiling mother, the family's attorney and a New York caseworker, Darian Pagan arrived at Hobby Airport in Houston about 8:45 p.m. Sunday.

"I'm happy," said Migdalia Pagan, the boy's mother. "I can't wait to commence treatment."

Darian, who is suffering from leukemia, was admitted to the hospital at the University of Texas late Sunday, hospital spokeswoman Jane Brust said. The boy was to be evaluated today with treatment possibly beginning within 48 hours, hospital officials said.

Mrs. Pagan and her husband David Pagan wanted their son to obtain less painful medical treatment and told doctors at Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center in New York they were reluctant to continue their son's chemotherapy treatments there.

Although the hospital obtained a court order preventing the parents from taking the boy away after two years of treatments, he was removed illegally by his father May 28.

Brooklyn Family Court Judge Leon Deutsch ordered Mrs. Pagan jailed, though she insisted she did not know the whereabouts of her husband and son. Mrs. Pagan was freed after the father and boy appeared in court Thursday.

Dressed in shorts, a sports jersey and displaying a shy smile upon arriving in Houston, Darian appeared unaffected by the crush of reporters and curious airport bystanders who greeted him.

Migdalia and Darian Pegan arrive in Houston on Sunday to undergo cancer treatments after Migdalia was released from jail for refusing to divulge the location of her son who was taken from a New York hospital in defiance of a court order.

A woman in the crowd handed him a brightly wrapped package topped with a small stuffed dog.

David Pagan, 36, stayed in New York with the couple's 14-year-old son until the school year is finished. Then he plans to join his family here.

"We hope that by doing this we're showing the parents all around that they have choices to make and they have to make those choices and find out," David Pagan said at LaGuardia Airport in New York.

The Pagans are considering taking up permanent residence in Houston, said Mrs. Pagan.

While he was missing, the father notified relatives to tell them he had taken the child and was headed for Texas.

On Friday, the parents regained custody of the boy and were permitted to take their son to the Houston hospital.

Mrs. Pagan said Sunday that she should not have been arrested.

"I have been treated very badly," said Mrs. Pagan, who spent two nights in Rikers Island prison last week. "I feel it is unfair. I feel it is wrong."

The family's attorney, Steven J. Mandel, said the couple had won a very important point in principle in their battle to select treatment for their son.

"The treatment they offered us here was less aggressive than in New York," Mrs. Pagan said.

She said the New York clinic was giving their son excessive and unnecessary treatments. The couple especially objected to intensive radiation therapy he was receiving and believed it might leave the boy brain-damaged, she said.

Proposed neurosurgery convinced the couple that they should take their son from the hospital. Doctors at M.D. Anderson had told them the surgery was not called for and that there were alternatives, which will include chemotherapy, Mrs. Pagan said.

SKATE

He said downtown Midland's parking garages and building courtyards are a skater's paradise at night, when there's less chance of being run off by police or security guards.

Then there's always freestyling in the parking lot in front of Skate Stiks, a skate-oriented store in the Fairmont Park shopping center at the southwest corner of Wadley Avenue and Midland Drive. At least a handful of skaters can be found there every afternoon jumping curb stops, trying new tricks and just horsing around.

Lee Freshman High School student Eric Forrester, 16, started skating on and off from third grade until about five years ago, when "all of a sudden the bike got left in the garage."

With his short blond hair and Midland Angels baseball cap, Eric, standing with Rusty and the others at the Pluto ditch, wouldn't look out of place going "wilding" with a John Deere tractor in a corn patch. But, like Rusty, he's got the attitude.

Eric said the Midland skate scene has been growing, especially in the past year. But he said a negative public view of skateboarding and police pressure also have become more intense since the media have been publicizing satanism.

Pictures of skulls, snakes and bizarre, mutated humanoids commonly are found on skate-oriented T-shirts, stickers and skateboard bottoms, leading some to believe they symbolize Satan, Rusty said. To skaters they're just meaningless drawings, he said.

The misconception and recent hightened publicity, however, forced Skate Stiks manager Jason Groce, 18, to remove some boards with the more outlandish drawings from display racks.

Groce said business at his shop has been steady for the past three years, despite the bad rap skating sometimes gets.

"We could always do better," said Groce, who skates because it "makes me feel good and relieves stress."

Rusty, though, said police don't always make skaters feel good about their hobby. He said some of his friends have been stopped by police and threatened with $500 fines, but none he knows has been arrested.

The city has no specific laws addressing skateboards, but it does have City Ordinance 9111, which generically prohibits street skating but allows it on sidewalks. Without defining "skating," the ordinance could cover everything from roller and ice skates to fishing for skate, a saltwater fish having a flattened body with winglike fins. The maximum fine is $500.

Lt. Damon Shupp of the Midland Police Department said he has never heard of skateboarders being arrested and that they receive only a verbal warning "99 percent of the time."

"I'm sure they've told they could be fined," Shupp said. "A skateboarder is classified as a pedestrian and the same laws apply."

The public, he said, doesn't always perceive skaters as a bunch of boys out having fun.

"We do get complaints about them riding in and out of traffic," Shupp said. "A lot of them ride down the middle of the street. We've had complaints of skateboarders running pedestrians off the sidewalk."

The biggest troublemakers are what Shupp called the "hardcore" skaters, who vandalize property, provoke fights and harass citizens.

Those types of skaters are also the biggest problem for riders like Eric and Rusty, who said their image has been tainted by those more bent on destruction than pure skating.

"They do the drugs," Rusty said. "They shout obscenities at the old ladies and they can't skate. They're more punks than skaters and do all the 1940 tricks that are so old that they're not fun anymore."

That image of a skateboarder has carried over into the public, which overall doesn't know the difference between the punks and true skaters, Rusty said.

"They think we're all delinquents," he said. "We get blamed for everything."

Eric, who has had bottles thrown at him from passing cars as he rides down the streets, said not every non-skater is an anti-skater.

"There are some who drive by and wave at you," he said. "Some will even stop and watch. None of us look scary. We're just kids."

'Converted' fund-raiser attacks other 'fat cats'

New York Times News Service

HOUSTON — For more than a decade Jim Calaway was known in Washington as a Texas oilman with a gold-plated address book because he could raise millions of dollars for Democratic candidates.

Now he is disillusioned and repentant, and he believes he helped corrupt the American political system.

"I was a fat cat," Calaway said in an interview.

"Although I hate that term, that's what I was, a fat cat raising money for other fat cats. It was wrong, and I made a mistake."

As chairman of the Democratic Victory Fund in the 1988 campaign, Calaway worked full time persuading his many friends and political acquaintances across the country to write big checks.

He was so successful that he is already receiving visits from politicians planning races in 1990 and even 1992.

But those politicians are getting a disquieting message.

"I am telling the same thing to everyone of them that comes down here asking me for help," Calaway said.

"I am not giving away a single one of my hard-earned dollars until some basic reforms are enacted to stop lobbyists from walking around the nation's capital with sackfuls of money, and I will encourage every contributor I know to take the same view."

Calaway's "conversion", as he describes it, began last September when he suddenly abandoned the presidential campaign to spend a month alone on his sailboat in Galveston Bay.

Later, upon reading that 98 percent of the congressional incumbents won re-election and that only half the eligible voters went to the polls, he said he gradually came to realize that a national crisis was at hand.

For Calaway, the troubles of House Speaker Jim Wright and House Democratic whip Tony Coelho could be only a taste of the future.

"What's happened to Wright and Coelho may happen to others," he said, "and it better be a warning to all of them in both parties because the chickens are coming home to roost for having too much money washing around Capitol Hill."

He is concerned that the warning is not heard.

"Many of my dear friends in Washington believe they can continue playing business as usual," he said, "and they are fools for doing it because out here in the boondocks there is such a wave of disgust over the way the country is being run that eventually it will knock down anyone who stands before it."

Although Calaway now speaks with the righteousness of a populist outsider, the walls of his office have photographs and other mementos that testify to years in the political establishment.

Beginning in the late 1960s, he worked in a variety of local campaigns. Then in 1978 Hamilton Jordan, the chief of staff in the Carter White House, drew him into national politics, signing him on to President Jimmy Carter's re-election campaign for 1980.

Subsequently, Calaway raised money for presidential compaigns by Sen. John Glenn, former Sen. Gary Hart and former Vice President Walter F. Mondale.

After Hart withdrew from the 1988 race, Calaway was invited by the Democratic National Committee to head a fund-raising effort.

Governor plans to call special legislative session

AUSTIN (AP) — The Legislature hadn't even ended its regular 1989 session before lawmakers were talking about an agenda for the special session that Gov. Bill Clements says he will call June 20.

"We've probably had a dozen requests to open the call already," said Mike Toomey, the governor's deputy chief of staff, as the final gavel fell on the Legislature Monday night.

"I expect that number will rise with the sun tomorrow," Toomey added.

Clements said he will summon lawmakers back to the Capitol to try to finish in 30 days of overtime what they couldn't do in 140 days — overhaul the state's troubled workers' compensation system.

Only the governor can call special sessions, and he sets the agenda by including in that summons what items will be considered.

But if past experience is a guide, a one-subject session seems unlikely. Any time the Legislature meets, lawmakers have pet projects they want debated.

Already, Clements is being pushed to include revision of the state's parimutuel wagering tax and of open meetings legislation on the special session agenda.

The governor has said the list of agenda requests is "as long as my arm," and aides said the lawmakers' suggestions would be reviewed.

But so far, the only thing Clements has promised on the agenda is workers' compensation reform.

After 18 months of study and 140 days of the regular session, lawmakers failed to agree on improvements in the system to pay workers for death or injuries suffered on the job.

The governor says the problems are so serious, businesses are being frightened away. The system "is one of the worst in the nation...It's hurting our effort to bring new jobs to Texas," he said.

The Legislature's study, conducted at a cost of $450,000, concluded that workers' compensation insurance premiums in Texas are too high and the benefits paid out too low.

The Legislature's standoff was between trial lawyers, who make a living defending injured workers, and lobbyists for business and insurance groups.

Business groups blamed high jury awards to employees and the threat of lawsuits for skyrocketing insurance costs. They want to abolish jury trials in disputed claims. The House passed a bill to do that.

Shrimper doused with gasoline, set afire, dies

GALVESTON (AP) — A shrimp fisherman who suffered burns over 98 percent of his body after being doused with gasoline and set afire a week ago has died at a local hospital.

Tay Tran, 39, died Saturday afternoon at John Sealy Hospital in Galveston. He had suffered second- and third-degree burns in the attack.

Three fisherman arrested on attempted murder charges in the attack remained in the Galveston County Jail. Those charges could be upgraded.

Investigators said Tran had tried to quell an argument among several Vietnamese fishermen over alleged stolen boat equipment about a month ago.

Diver Dennis McGrath surfaces with a sack filled with sea urchins collected from waters off the Maine coast. Urchins are prized in Japan, and University of Maine researchers are seeking ways to make the spiny creatures more desirable by increasing its egg content and giving it a deep yellow color.

University of Maine researchers hope to create better sea urchin

PORTLAND, Maine (AP) — The voracious Japanese appetite for sea urchins has created a booming market for the spiny creatures, and University of Maine researchers want to develop an even better version.

"Presently, if you take 100, you might get 50 or 60 in a load that are grade A color," said Ben Baxter, extension marine program coordinator. "We're trying to get it up to 80 or better. In the Japanese market, which is very fussy, if you can produce a reliable product, that is worth more."

Sea urchin gourmets consume the eggs, or roe. Researchers hope they will get greater quantities of roe and give it the colors considered most desirable by Japanese diners if they keep urchins in pens and feed them kelp and fish byproducts, Baxter said.

The new, improved urchins could double or triple a seller's income.

A state Department of Marine Resources official doesn't believe the project will make anybody rich because "ranching" the urchins will probably not be economically feasible.

"That's one of their pipe dreams," said Phil Averill, director of the Maine Fisheries Technology Service. "The price isn't there. They aren't going to get any more for that urchin than the wild harvester is."

Averill said the industry has been around for 25 or 30 years in Maine, but it really took off in the last three years because of the yen's high value in relation to the dollar.

"We are estimating that 10 million pounds were shipped last season," he said. "That's up from like 6 million a year before that, and there was like 1 million the year before that. You can estimate 35 cents a pound. On 10 million pounds, that's $3.5 million."

When the value of the yen drops in relation to the dollar, the Japanese are likely to start shopping elsewhere for their urchins, Averill said. Maine's urchins are not much different from other urchins, and people harvesting them here don't always know how to pick the best ones, he said.

"There's been a tremendous amount of urchins rejected for quality reasons," Averill said. "Maine has a so-so reputation."

Baxter maintains the research could lead to superior sea urchins of a bright yellow color favored by many Japanese.

"They can range from a muddy brown to a rain-slicker yellow, with several cream colors at the other end of the spectrum," Baxter said. "If they have a bright yellow color, it gives them a sweetish flavor. It can almost be a honey flavor."

Averill said the state and the university have developed a color chart that the Japanese can use in ordering urchins that will be pleasing to the eye. The roe color preferred by the diners varies from city to city in Japan, and the chart gave Maine urchin sellers a better idea of what to send.

Inmates say living less tense aboard the 'Love Boat' jail

New York Times News Service

NEW YORK — Last summer, when the Bibby Venture was docked in the East River, the inmates dubbed it "the Love Boat" — an odd name for the country's first offshore floating jail.

Now temporarily docked at the Brooklyn Army Terminal, the four-story converted troopship is still popular with the 355 prisoners who occupy space once reserved for British soldiers on their way to the Falklands.

"We live large on the barge," declared an inmate, Angel Velazquez, 37 years old, who smiled as he stood on the sunbaked recreation deck watching other prisoners play a loping game of basketball as a sailboat fluttered by on the water below.

But the river view is not what impresses the inmates, who are awaiting trial and will typically be aboard the barge for less than a month. The main appeal of the barge, they say, is that it is not Rikers Island, the city's densely populated penal colony where tensions run high and violence is part of daily life.

"Here, it's not all tense," said Gregory Callens, 26, of the Bedford-Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn, who is charged with narcotics possession. "There is less static flowing through the air.'

It is a difference that has already been absorbed into the jargon of the jails where, said Callens, many do not want to admit they would rather be on the barge.

"People feel that institutions should have hostility," he said. " 'Being soft' is a phrase we use, and no one wants to admit to being soft."

'Soft' is a relative term for inmates, as it probably was for the war-bound British soldiers. The alternatives may be worse, but life in the cramped confines of a troopship — with its low ceilings and narrow corridors, catwalk stairwells, green-grey paint slopped around the doorways and a lingering smell of diesel fuel — is not exactly cushy.

The inmates are bused to the Brooklyn House of Detention to see visitors and, because there is no indoor gym on the barge, there is no place for recreation in cold or rainy weather.

The inmates on board the Bibby are all classified as minimum- or medium-security risks. Special categories of prisoners, such as known homosexuals or those in need of medical or psychological attention, are excluded. Ninety sleep in dormitories; the rest live in single "cabins," as cells are called on the barge.

Because inmates have to be escorted at all times, up and down the numerous staircases, the ratio of correction officers to inmates is practically one for one, higher than at Rikers.

The cramped layout has produced another exception: on the barge, inmates get their commissary goods delivered to them, rather than having to go to a window and stand in line. At Rikers, that is a moment typically fraught with danger and friction, inmates say.

"The system is working here," said Bruce Wilson, 26, who is from the Poconos region of Pennsylvania and spent a month in the House of Detention for Men on Rikers, a multi-tiered jail built in 1933. "Here we get our meals hot."

The concentration of low-risk prisoners and high numbers of staff members is dictated largely by the alarms raised in virtually every neighborhood destined to play host to a prison barge.

Lawsuits, petitions and emotional political appeals by community groups have dogged the itineraries of the city's two existing jail barges.

The Bibby Venture, the maiden ship of the city's jail fleet, is in transition. Once parked at Pier 36, off the Lower East Side of Manhattan, it shipped off to Brooklyn last August as part of an agreement with neighborhood groups. In July, it is scheduled to dock at Pier 40 in the Hudson River, off the West Village.

A court injunction, sought by neighborhood groups, was recently lifted, and the city's Department of Correction is awaiting final permits from the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers and the New York Secretary of State's office.

Last month, the Bibby Venture was joined by her sister barge, the Bibby Resolution, which was last used to house workers at industrial sites in Europe. The second barge, which began accepting prisoners two weeks ago, is temporarily moored at Pier 36 before undergoing an environmental review at its proposed permanent site at nearby Pier 35.

Satanism reaches 20 percent of students

Hearst News Service

SEATTLE — Chaplain Didi Prentice was astounded the first time she heard about Satanism from convicted kids at Echo Glen, the institution where she works.

It started with an 18-year-old who asked for a personal counseling session.

"He asked me, 'What's this thing about love I hear at chapel?' I don't know anything about love,'" recalls Prentice, a Protestant chaplain. After about two months, she says the young man confided he had been in a satanic church since he was 11 years old.

"From then on, it was just one kid after another," she says. "I was so ignorant. All I could do was to be quiet, and that was the key." Her silence gave them permission to talk.

Today, half a file drawer in Prentice's tiny office at Echo Glen Children's Center in North Bend, Wash., is filled with information about Satanism. She estimates 20 percent of the kids she sees at the institution have been involved in satanic worship or satanic cults.

But there seems to be little that law enforcement agencies can do, even if crimes are committed, because of the lack of physical evidence and witnesses willing to testify.

Ex-FBI agent Ted Gunderson claimed on national television there are mass satanic burial sites in Mason County, but informants are afraid to come forward for fear of being killed by other cult members.

Nationally, the country was shocked by the recent cultlike killings of 15 people at a ranch in Mexico. The torture-slayings were reportedly conducted by a cult of drug smugglers.

Satanism — the worship of Satan and especially the rejection of Christianity — exists publicly in some areas. In San Francisco, for example, the Church of Satan is listed in the telephone company's directory information. Satanic cult activity, which involves ritualistic slayings or torture of animals and humans, is more complicated.

Debates persist over whether the cults are real or imagined. Books have been written by people who claim to have survived satanic cults. Therapists say they have treated female cult survivors called breeders, who repeatedly bore babies used for human sacrifices.

Air travel instills plane panic

Flyer develops methods to deal with fear

By JEANNE FREEMAN
Copley News Service

Midnight was not far off, and the wind came only in fitful gusts, rattling some unknown metallic object out in the dark beyond the cold light that coated the railway platform like a sheet of ice.

Two silent figures stood sentinel at the far end of the platform, suitcases at their feet like well-trained dogs brought to heel. Another figure leaned motionless against a pillar as if frozen there.

This was the Amtrak station in Greenville, S.C., in the dead of winter. It was a stark and melancholy place on a frayed edge of downtown. Across the street, two neon signs burned in dirty windows behind ironwork. One irradiated the name of a bar; the other, a pawnshop. When you slammed the door of your car in the station parking lot, you looked over your shoulder and hurried into the building.

It's near the hard center of night that the Southern Crescent passes through Greenville on its northern run up to Washington, D.C. In a small Southern city, people safely ensconced in the plump embrace of civilization are asleep then. The hour is haunted by the ragged fringes of society.

And by airplane phobics.

This, my friend, is what fear of flying will bring you to.

My last trip north on the Crescent, as I lugged my bags to the platform edge, I scanned the bleak faces of my fellow passengers. I found myself looking directly into one I knew.

I think he winced. I had met him a few times socially, many times seen his photograph reproduced on a newspaper page or watched his image on a television screen during the 6 p.m. news. He was a well-known lawyer and an important figure in state politics.

ANOTHER FUGITIVE from manned flight.

The lawyer and I sat up late that night in the club car as the Crescent rocked and jolted its way toward Virginia. His destination was Pennsylvania. His partners were flying up the next afternoon. I was going to Connecticut.

We traded stories of panic sensation. He told how, halfway to Atlanta one time, he broke into the shakes — certain that he was on the verge of leaping to his feet and demanding the airplane be landed immediately. He hadn't flown since.

I told about the last time I was supposed to fly to San Francisco. I went to a lawyer and had my will drawn up. Then I'd written each of my four sisters goodbye letters in which I told them how much they'd meant to me in life.

Over the Rockies that trip, I stopped a flight attendant as she drifted down the aisle. I tugged at a corner of her apron. "How long," I croaked, "is this turbulence going to last?"

"What turbulence?" she asked.

"This turbulence," I hissed frantically, grabbing a seat arm with both hands.

The flight attendant looked at me for a long moment. "This isn't turbulence," she said finally. "The pilot doesn't even have the seat-belt sign on."

The lawyer and I compared notes of attempts we'd made to overcome our fear. And we sighed in unison at the sad fate to which our misguided senses of self-preservation had sunk us: loitering on railway platforms at odd hours, frittering away whole days peering out gritty train windows at the backsides of buildings.

THE LAWYER eventually took a fearful-flyers' class. I, on the other hand, continue with my home remedies. To say they produce mixed results is to make a generous overstatement of their outcomes. I manage to fly. But I am not a happy flyer.

I used to pretend I was on a bus. This worked for a while. I'd claim a window seat in the front row, pull down the shade, stare fixedly at the wall in front of me and sweat.

I survived two transcontinental airplane trips by doing this, and one along the Eastern seaboard. When we'd hit bumpy air and the icy hand of mortal fear would grip my heart, I'd launch into fervent (usually) mental recitation: "I'm on a bus. I'm on a bus."

Then one day a friend of mine told me he thought this concept far more frightening than reality. "A Greyhound bus?" he parroted me, apparently stunned by the idea. He lowered his voice to ominous tones, "Hurtling 550 mph through the sky at an altitude of 33,000 feet?"

After that, methods I employed to deal with flying included:

1. Arriving at the airport one hour in advance of departure time and drinking numerous alcoholic beverages. Continuing to do same during flight.
2. Asking people to hold my hand while in the air. (Many times asking total strangers to hold my hand while in the air.)
3. Playing cards at a demonic pace non-stop during flight, even faster during landings. (Generally I play solitaire. But often seat companions volunteer to play gin rummy with me. On occasion, they insist. I think mostly this happens when they glance in my direction and see only the whites of my eyes.)
4. Train travel.
5. Various combinations of the above.

MY MOTHER likes to tell me a story about when I was a 2-year-old and my father ran a small private airport amid the scrub pine and sandy flats east of Raleigh, N.C. She says she used to drive into town once a week to buy groceries, leaving my father to baby-sit.

When I would fret, my mother says, my dad would take me up in a small prop plane and run through a few simple aerial acrobatics. That always shut me up. My mother invariably finishes this story with her face suffused in an expression of triumph.

See there, she means for me to understand, You used to love flying. It was the only thing that would stop your crying.

Sure it did. I figure I was struck dumb in terror.

Over the years, I've developed a routine that increases the odds of my being able to climb the steps of doom and enter an airplane. I begin by collecting airplane success stories. I solicit testimonials from everyone I know about times they have flown and nothing happened to them.

I read and reread statistics about airplane safety vs. automobile safety. And, as soon as I get on an airplane, I make a point of introducing myself to the flight attendants. I try to do this before I begin to hyperventilate. I tell the flight attendants my name and then I confide, "You'll probably want to keep an eye on me." After that, believe me, they do.

MY FAMILY has never come to terms with my fear of flying. They seem to take offense when I use alternate means of travel. I think my "problem" has become the family skeleton.

When I decided to move to California, my mother snapped, "Of course, you're going to fly out there." My sister replied firmly, "Of course, she is. She has to be adult about it." My daughter backed them up.

The three of them accompanied me to the airport. I got on the plane. I buckled my seat belt. A man sat down beside me, and we exchanged greetings. Then I unbuckled my seat belt, and I got back off the plane.

My family met me at the gate, all three outraged and talking at once. "I'm driving," I announced grimly.

I got to the ticket counter with the three of them hot on my heels and I told the agent I wanted a refund. Behind me I heard a furious chorus of "Don't give her the money back!" "Don't let her get away with this!"

The agent held the airplane long enough to have my luggage removed. I filled the car with gas that night, and set off for California the next morning.

In my family, we have yet to speak of this incident.

Education conquers fear

By JOHN M. GLIONNA
Copley News Service

For Estelle, the image is a fiery midair collision between two fully loaded commercial jets.

Greg frets over the idea of a plane losing an engine and crashing into some housing development.

And Lisa has nagging thoughts about being aboard a wounded airplane as it plummets from 35,000 feet. She thinks of scratching at the windows, helplessly awaiting death.

"It's got to be the worst, the most prolonged way to go," Lisa said, "just waiting to hit the ground."

And, perhaps the worst scenario for many: being aboard a flight targeted by terrorists, becoming a part of the kind of wreckage that recently dropped onto a rural field outside Lockerbie, Scotland.

These are the nightmares of fearful fliers, those sometimes irrational anxieties that keep men and women of all ages and education levels from taking faraway vacations, attending mandatory business conventions or even a high-school reunion — because they climb the carpeted walls at the mere thought of being on an airplane.

Airline statistics suggest that more than 25 million Americans, or one in every six people, experience white knuckles over thoughts of flying — whether it's a fear of losing control of their lives five miles above the ground or being distracted by unfamiliar noises they encounter in the air.

Although few run the aisles in abject panic, many timid fliers often sit anonymously in their seats, digging their nails into the armrest or the arm of a fellow passenger.

NOW, FOLKS are being offered a chance to take a stand against those fears — through a fearful-flier's course offered by USAir.

Taught by clinical social workers and veteran pilots, the seven-week courses cover such topics as "Turbulence: What causes it and how does it affect the passengers and aircraft?" and "Fears and phobias."

The classes also include tours of such usually off-limits areas as jet cockpits, FAA control towers and radar rooms.

USAir, one of several carriers to do so, offers 10 such courses a year, one each in cities including Los Angeles, Boston, Philadelphia, Washington, Cleveland and San Diego.

Graduating students are required to take a one-hour flight and walk about the plane while in the air.

"Most of our students are white-knucklers, people who do the Valium and Bloody Mary thing to make it through a flight," said Frank Petee, a 67-year-old retired flight captain who piloted the first passenger flight of USAir (then called Allegheny) in 1949.

"Their work suffers as a result. They start to worry two weeks before their vacation. And when they get there, they immediately start worrying about getting back."

Sometimes they don't even get off the ground.

"As the plane begins to taxi toward the runway, they get up and say 'Let me off,' " said Carol Stauffer, director of the airline's fearful-flier program. "Their luggage goes to a lot of places they never make it to."

Last fall, Stauffer and Petee published a book, "Flying Without Fear," which delves into greater detail on the condition known as aviophobia.

ONE REASON for the book: a lot has changed since USAir began the fearful-flier classes in 1975.

"People want to discuss terrorism more these days — they want some assurances about what the airlines are doing about it," Stauffer said.

And every time an air disaster makes news, more people think about such things.

"There have been some recent mishaps that have brought about questions about the design and maintenance of airplanes," said Stauffer. "There's just lots of stuff about the older planes that people want to know about."

The makeup of the classes is also changing.

No longer the exclusive domain of timid housewives, Stauffer said, many classes include construction workers and businessmen no longer afraid to admit they're fearful of flying the friendly skies.

For many students, the image of the quirky John Madden — the superstitious former football coach who not only refuses to fly but who does commercials for Amtrak — is no longer a convenient rationalization for their fears.

Others are tired of jokes from friends or pressure from well-meaning family members — who are determined to drag them, kicking and screaming, into the 20th century, into the era of manned flight.

"I haven't even told my family about my fears, because my dad would say 'C'mon, you're just being a child about this,'" said Lisa, whose fear of flying recently caused her to miss a 10-year high school reunion in upstate New York.

HER FRUSTRATIONS began about four years ago during a particularly rough flight out of Denver's Stapleton Airport.

"Things were flying around inside the plane, people were getting really upset and the pilot didn't explain or anything. He just told the stewardesses to take their seats," she said.

"Ever since that flight, I haven't been able to live my life the way I want. I love to travel, and you can't take the train everywhere."

Estelle's bout with aviophobia has not been any easier.

A native of London, she was aboard one plane that had to make an emergency landing in Iceland. And a flight her father took not long afterward was forced to land in a snowstorm because of a bomb threat.

Like many fearful fliers, Estelle monitors newspaper and television reports of airline mishaps, crashes and terrorist incidents. "It's become something of a morbid fascination," she said.

When it came time to board a flight home to London recently with her husband and two children, Estelle couldn't bring herself to do it.

"We left the airport with my 3-year-old screaming, 'I want to go to London! I want to go to London!'..."

SINCE THEN, she has felt nauseous every time she nears an airport, she said. She has tried hypnosis and pills, and she even went to a mystic to help with her fears.

Then, on a short flight from San Francisco, she met a pilot who told her of the fearful-flier class.

On a recent evening, Estelle was joined by 13 others in a San Diego class — including a man who has yet to visit the condominium his wife bought in Hawaii more than a year ago.

Petee addressed them in his airline captain's suit ("It gives me more authority"), offering information about airplane turbulence and curious noises heard during flights.

To put his students at ease, he also offered statistics about airline safety, offering information to help them combat their fears.

Those figures include: Of 18,000 flights originating from American airports each day, more than 99 percent are routine. Airline mishaps are responsible for an average of 129 deaths a year, whereas highway fatalities equal that number every day.

An hour later, the class was boarding a 737 jetliner. It was the first contact many had had with a plane in months.

For this first visit, they were told, the door would be left open to alleviate any claustrophobia.

As they sat stiffly in their seats, Stauffer went through several breathing exercises, talking over the microphone like a flight attendant giving safety information.

LATER, THE class walked nervously about the plane, checking out the overhead compartments, watching as Capt. Petee described instruments in the cockpit.

In a few short weeks, they would embark on their one-hour graduation flight. And then, with any luck, the sky will be their limit.

They will head to destinations throughout the world for long-delayed vacations and business trips.

But as Greg can tell you, some fears die hard.

"I'm not so afraid of terrorists taking over a plane," he said, peering uneasily out a window. With a terrorist, you've still got a chance. But if an engine falls off, it's all over.

"That's the kind of thing I worry about."

Writing name causes panic

Copley News Service

Do you tremble and shake when trying to write a check or a hotel registry?

If so, you may be suffering from graphophobia — the fear of signing your name in public.

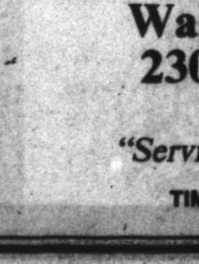

According to Shirley Riff of the TERRAP Phobia Treatment Progam in Texas, graphophobia begins when folks get an anxiety attack while they writing their names. Their mind then convinces them that simply signing their name in front of others will cause a similar attack in the future.

Another name for the anxiety is WPT — or "what people think" syndrome. Riff says up to 2 percent of the U.S. population suffers from the social phobia.

Driving habits can reflect different personality traits

By LYNNE KORNECKI
Copley News Service

For most of us, driving is a fact of daily life. Our cars are practically part of our families, even rating their own special room in our homes — the garage. We rely and depend on them to get us where we're going, and feel stressed and stranded when repairs send them to the shop.

But what happens to your personality when you get behind the wheel? Are you a soft-spoken Dr. Jekyl at home and a raving Mr. Hyde in your car?

Do you roar out of the driveway, impatient to reach your destination — tailgating, speeding, running yellows and, in general, driving everyone else on the road crazy?

Are you ready to blast your horn and blow your stack when someone cuts you off? Or are you entirely the opposite — feeling intimidated, threatened and nervous when confronted with those who have bad driving habits?

Picture the following scenario:

It's 3 p.m. and you're driving your children home from school on a narrow, winding, pockmarked street that has no shoulder and a speed limit of 35. Glancing in your rear-view mirror, you suddenly see a little red sports car zoom up behind you. It's so close that you can see the driver and his passenger making obscene gestures at your law-abiding speed.

They're riding your rear bumper so closely that you can't even see the front end of their car in your mirror. As the driver, responsible for the safety of your young passengers, you feel edgy and threatened into going faster.

What do you do? Do you rise to the other driver's baiting or pull over and let the road hog have his or her way?

IMPROPER DRIVING, according to National Safety Council statistics, accounted for 62 percent of fatalities in motor vehicle collisions in 1987. The council defines improper driving as: speeding, disregarding various rights of way, driving left of center, passing improperly, following too closely and making inappropriate turns.

Ronald Nelson, a clinical social worker with a private practice, says our psychological reactions on busy expressways are comparable to those we may have in other hectic, crowded places, such as Saturday mornings at the grocery store.

Shoppers are pushing their carts around, mindlessly stopping in front of others, or stopping unexpectedly, meandering into the center of the aisle — oblivious to others who are shopping faster and who may want to pass.

"In these circumstances, whether it's the highway or the grocery store, our internal needs set us up as either capable or powerless — winners or losers," Nelson said. "Our past fears, past experiences and personal biases are projected into what is going on around us."

Unfortunately, in our culture, he observed, people have the mindset that someone has to win and someone has to lose. This perspective gives rise to a flurry of emotions as we all jockey for position in our daily life determining winners and losers.

"Cars therefore, are an extension of our personalities," continued Nelson. "Their styling and the power they represent can be very important to some people. And if we accept that our cars are an extension of ourselves and the image we project so, too, is the way we drive."

NELSON GENERALIZED that those who go through life with feelings of inadequacy can buy a powerful, fast sports car and feel as though they are projecting a new image to the world around them. Those who feel perfectly adequate can drive a practical, economical car because it is no threat to how they feel about themselves.

So now there are all these people with various internal needs and desires placed in a powerful, artificial extension of themselves. What happens? They hit the road and face driving conditions the same way they do social conflicts, contends Nelson. When they're cut off by another car, they view it as a personal attack, feeling justified in protecting themselves by fighting back with another unsafe maneuver.

Our driving styles, Nelson says, are merely continuations of our personalities, similar in style to our other areas of social interaction. For instance, if we are aggressive in our dealing with others, then we'll be aggressive on the roadways. If we are passive and slow at the office, chances are that we're the same behind the wheel.

Our competition with one another extends to driving. "There's always that impatient driver behind the car doing the speed limit, tailgating and thinking, 'Don't you know you can go 40 in a 35!'" said Nelson.

There always will be those who love a challenge. They drive recklessly because they're confident that their four-wheel-drive can handle the road no matter what the weather conditions.

"We like to assume that we're all functioning at a logical, rational level of understanding," Nelson said. "However, no one is really totally rational — we have bouts of it from time to time, but in general, humans are subjective beings. Everyone has a different reality and different perception."

There also is a type of pecking order on the highway, Nelson observed. Those same human traits and characteristics that are present in the office are on the roadway, as well.

Picture the man driving his new Rolls-Royce impressing the middle-class family in their humble Chevette, as he proudly passes them by. Then there's the intimidation that the Pinto driver feels as the big semi zooms up behind him and around.

"This pecking order is merely an extension of the winner/loser approach to life," he said.

So what is the psychologist's answer to improving bad driving habits?

"Court-ordered driving classes don't get to the root of the problem within an individual's driving," Nelson said. "The key is for people to find peace within themselves — not to feel personally attacked if someone does something on the road they don't like."

UNDERSTANDING OTHERS, not burdening ourselves with unrealistic expectations, and avoiding the win/lose approach to life will contribute to a more rational driving style, Nelson said.

"Everyone has the right to be on the roadway — to get to where they're going. We need to feel that we are all winners."

DEAR ABBY

Woman has second thoughts about remarriage

By ABIGAIL VAN BUREN

Van Buren

DEAR ABBY: I am a 25-year-old, self-supporting woman, divorced for three years. I was 18 when I married my childhood sweetheart, but as you have often said, "You can't change anybody but yourself," so I ended the marriage when I realized I couldn't change him. Fortunately we had no children.

I am now seeing a very special man. He's 29 and has never been married. Of course there's a problem or I wouldn't be writing to you. He wants to marry me, but before introducing me to his parents, he asked me not to mention the fact that I had been married.

Abby, I don't think divorce is anything to be ashamed of, but, of course, I respected his wishes. I feel very uncomfortable. I care a great deal for this man, but he has gone down in my estimation because of his request.

Am I wrong? And what should I do about it? Also, what is your opinion of him? — UNCOMFORTABLE

DEAR UNCOMFORTABLE: You are not wrong. I think you should tell him how you feel. Divorce is not a "crime." His asking you not to mention it to his parents should tell you that he is still an adolescent where his parents are concerned. And he's not entirely honest.

DEAR ABBY: What do you think of a Mohawk haircut on an 8-year-old boy? The parents stated that it was the boy's decision to which they agreed.

It is my feeling that these parents have done their son a grave injustice, as he is a very sensitive child and has been experiencing some problems at school because of this conspicuous haircut. I understand that the school counselor was critical of it and so informed the parents, who strongly resented his disapproval.

Having observed the negative reaction of both adults and youngsters, I can't imagine how parents would knowingly subject their child to this type of scorn.

You seem to have your head on straight, Abby. What is your opinion? — CURIOUS IN STOUGHTON, MASS.

DEAR CURIOUS: I assume that these parents love their son as much as I love mine, and you love yours — if you have one. They must have their reasons for allowing their son to have the kind of haircut he wanted, and since they did not ask me, I'm quite content to sit on the sidelines and observe without comment.

DEAR ABBY: My company is considering transferring me to another town. Therefore, I will have to sell my house and relocate. We have maintained our home in good condition, but our next-door neighbors have not. The front of their house has a couple of problems that give it an unsightly appearance. I'm afraid that the poor appearance of their house will hurt my chances for selling our house.

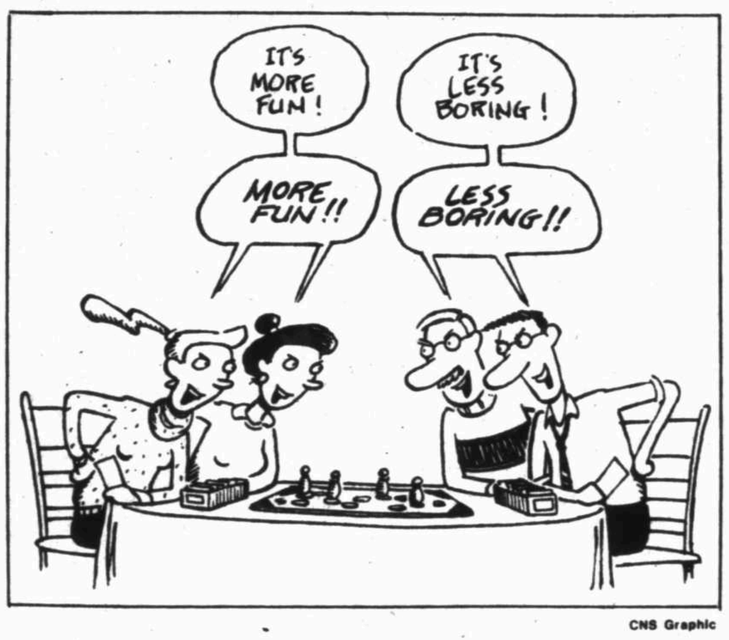

The appearance of their house could be improved significantly at the cost of $150 and a day's labor. I am willing to pay for the improvements and do the work. Is there any way to tactfully make the offer to do the work? To date we have gotten along fine, but I am concerned about insulting them. Any suggestions? — CONCERNED SOUTHERNER

DEAR SOUTHERNER: One of the few things I learned in Geometry I: "The shortest distance between two points is a straight line," so take the direct approach. Go straight to your neighbors and tell them exactly what you have told me. And don't worry about "insulting" anybody. They'll be getting an offer they can't refuse.

ASI is new 'name of the game'

By MARY ANN DADISMAN

Here's the challenge: We give you an advertising slogan. You tell us what product it represents. Ready?

The slogan is: "Fresher breath. Whiter teeth." Think about it.

Hmmm. Gotta be something like mouthwash, right? Or toothpaste.... Ahhh. Let's see ... Colgate?

No.

Crest?

No.

Listerine?

No.

Gosh, this is tough. Ummmm ... Pepsodent?

Nope.

OK. You win. What is it?

Milk Bone dog biscuits! Cute, huh?

In the world of board games, this may prove the next hot number. The "Third Game" as toy manufacturers refer to it. The one that will follow on the mega-hit heels of Trivial Pursuit and Pictionary.

It's called Adverteasing — made by Cadaco Games in Chicago — and it has all the essential elements of a best-selling board game: It's fun, it's affordable and it has ASI.

Adult Social Interaction. These are the catchwords. This is what separates today's board games from the ones you remember: Monopoly, Clue, Risk. It indicates a game that offers something more than Boardwalk. A game that sparks conversation. Encourages people to "connect." Makes you laugh.

"The board industry has changed," said Waymon Whittman, president of Cadaco Games. "It started with Trivial Pursuit, which set all kinds of precedents. No other game has sold so well in a single season."

AS A result of that success, and the popularity of games such as Pictionary and Scruples, game-makers came to appreciate the tremendous potential in the adult game market. That market, says Whittman, "is the broadest there is."

Why have adults taken so to these new games? Well, they got married for one thing. And they started having kids. Baby-boomers, who make up the bulk of the adult game market, finally got tired of discos and drinking and decided to settle down.

"I think," said Whittman, "there has been a return in this country to past social values."

Finances, too, have had an impact.

Jean and Larry are both in their early 30s. They have been married four years and recently moved into a new home with their 9-month-old son.

"Now that everyone is buying a house and having babies," said Jean, no one has the money to spend on a night on the town. "It's easier to buy a six-pack of beer and play a game at home with friends than spring for dinner out."

Jean and Larry play a lot of Trivial Pursuit. Someone brought the game to a big party they hosted soon after they married.

"That's when we really got hooked on it," said Jean.

As much as they play the game, she much prefers other games such as Scrabble or Sorry. Scruples, a game that encourages players to reval their inner feelings, was popular for a time, but they found some of their married friends refused to play with their spouses.

"Some take it very seriously," Jean laughed.

Besides the economy of it, game-playing has proved a great ice-breaker, she said.

"WHEN LARRY'S brother first brought his fiancee for dinner, it was easier to make conversation over a game of Trivial Pursuit. Even with friends from work," said Jean, "you can only talk about the job so much. We have dinner, sit around and talk for a while and when there's a lull in the conversation someone says, 'Well, gosh, let's play a game.'"

Pictionary and Win, Lose or Draw, plus the junior versions for children, lead the pack of popular games, with Adverteasing an up-and-comer in the areas in which it was test-marketed.

Submitted by a game inventor and his wife in Washington, D.C., Adverteasing was immediately given the in-house test by Cadaco.

"We're a small company," explained Whittman, and the in-house test consists of about four people finding an empty office, closing the door and sitting down to play. It took only 90 minutes for them to realize they had a winner on their hands. "From the day we started, we were confident we had the 'Third Game,'" he said.

They were so confident, Cadaco hurried the game into early production. A big company such as Milton Bradley might spend a year getting a game such as Adverteasing into the market. Cadaco was so sure it had a winner, it had the game out in 60 days. Now, said Barbara Allen, a marketing specialist with Cadaco, they're working on a junior version for kids.

IF ADVERTEASING does prove to be the "Third Game" following Trivial Pursuit and Pictionary into the board game hall of fame, it can expect to ride the wave of popularity about three years, said Whittman. "That's the traditional toy cycle."

But unlike other toys, such as the hugely popular Star Wars toys or Masters of the Universe, board games level off and then maintain a certain longevity in the toy market.

"It will enjoy a certain movement for a number of years," Whittman predicted. "It will become a staple ... like Trivial Pursuit. It still has good sales, not like the first year, but still good."

And what of the future? What will be the "Fourth Game"? Whittman chuckled. "I wish I knew," he said.

Highway noise can be reduced

STATE COLLEGE, Pa. (AP) — Earth berms on either side of a highway cut noise levels in nearby neighborhoods better than barrier walls, a researcher says.

"These are even more effective if they are covered with grass or other vegetation because the carpet of plants absorbs the sound," said Sabih Hayek, a professor of engineering science and mechanics. Without vegetation, the berms simply reflect most of the sound back onto the roadway.

Most trees increase noise to neighborhoods near busy thoroughfares because sound is reflected off leaves, he said. "Fir trees will work better because their needles do not reflect sound. In fact, they absorb sound."

Artificial walls of concrete, fiberglass or wood reflect noise back onto the roadway or over the barrier, said Hayek, whose research was sponsored by the National Cooperative Highway Research Program of the Transportation Research Board, representing 50 state highway departments.

"It is possible to cut as much noise as you want using noise barriers," Hayek said, "however costs increase dramatically with the increase in desired noise reduction." A 15-foot-high wall costs $200 to $250 a foot to build.

"We have tested noise barriers covered with materials that absorb sound, but the added cost of construction is not economical compared with the slight increase in noise reduction achieved with absorbent barriers," he said.

Expert says ancient Egyptian burial ground 'misunderstood'

VALLEY OF THE QUEENS, Egypt (AP) — This quiet, bone-dry ravine of death, overshadowed since antiquity by the Valley of the Kings just over the hills, slowly is shedding its mystery.

And with the mystery, its name.

Ancients called the valley Ta-Set Neferu, the Place of Beauty. To the Arabs it was Gates of the Ladies. Egyptologists and guidebooks perpetuate the homage to entombed royal women: the Valley of the Queens.

"It's wrong. This valley has been misunderstood and misnamed by all Egyptologists," said Christian LeBlanc, field director for a continuing 17-year French-Egyptian project to record and study its history.

"We should be calling it the Valley of the Royal Children. They were here first, but the valley became tied only to the queens and named by tradition rather than history."

Season after archaeological season, LeBlanc's team has scoured the sloping, dusty hillsides dotted with cave-like tombs to find the origins of a sequence of burials that would last almost 2,000 years. Tombs were used repeatedly, as late as the Christian era when pharaonic designs sometimes were plastered over and crosses painted on.

LeBlanc said the first burials were princes and princesses of ancient Egypt's 18th dynasty, a 243-year renaissance when, after a period of decline, pharaohs and their kin once again lived and died like kings.

That dynasty ended in 1307 B.C., and Ramses I, founder of the 19th dynasty, changed tradition by burying his queen Sat-Re here.

LeBlanc said it's unclear why he did or why the practice continued. In addition to queens, royal children still were buried here, and concubines who cared for them and pharaohs' mothers.

Paintings in some of the tombs show Hathor, the goddess of women and love, emerging from a grotto that dominates the valley. LeBlanc said perhaps this indicates that religion brought the ancients here, because Hathor's realm also included the cemeteries on what is called the West Bank across the Nile from present-day Luxor.

The 18th dynasty, when the graveyard for royal children began, was a time when queens traditionally shared their pharaoh's tombs in the Valley of the Kings. Many of ancient Egypt's greatest rulers were buried there, along with the young pharoah Tutankhamun, whose treasure-filled tomb was discovered by Howard Carter in 1922.

That discovery brought international fame to the Valley of the Kings. Hundreds of other royals and officials also were buried on the West Bank. But to the world, the glory of the pharaohs meant the Valley of the Kings — not the Valley of the Queens, the Valley of the Monkeys or the Tombs of the Nobles.

For tourist agencies, the Valley of the Queens became an afterthought, a place to fill a half-hour after an exhausting visit to the Valley of the Kings.

When the joint expedition began, 78 burial places had been found in the limestone hillsides enclosing the valley. Today 98 are known.

"We couldn't understand the cemetery before, because we were working tomb-by-tomb," LeBlanc said. "Today, we've uncovered all the major tombs and have returned the valley to the way it would have looked when burials began.

"For the first time, we can write its history."

As LeBlanc talked, he and Fathy Hassanein, director of the Egyptian Antiquities Organization's National Documentation Center, walked through scores of excavators digging toward the valley's bedrock. The job at hand was almost done, another tomb uncovered from rubble that has obscured the cemetery for most of its existence.

An aim of the project is to restore tombs in the valley so that more can be opened to tourists. Fewer than six are now.

The valley's most beautiful tomb, the fabulous burial chambers of Ramses II's powerful queen Nefertari, is among those so deteriorated that they remain off-limits. More than half its paintings of the elaborately dressed and coiffured queen have been destroyed by natural forces.

LeBlanc said one source for the valley's history has been tidbits left by workers who built and decorated the tombs. For generations they lived in a village inside the valley. Their records, on papyrus, provided the team not only with answers but with mysteries.

Workers recorded the construction of tombs for Queen Isis Nefret, one of Ramses II's many wives, and a queen named Duat-Iny-Pet.

LeBlanc said they might have been same person, but "where are they?"

He also is intrigued by a lack of burial objects or pieces of the queens' mummies.

"This is strange," he said. "Did those who came afterwards destroy them?" He added that it could mean another royal cache exists, perhaps mummies of queens and children.

Typical of the tales LeBlanc has faced in rewriting a new history for the valley is the story of a mummified fetus inside the tomb of 9-year-old prince Amon-Hir-Khopshef, son of Ramses III.

Local guides tell fascinated visitors that Ramses' queen became so distraught over the death of their son that she miscarried and the mummies of both Amon-Hir-Khopshef and the fetus were entombed.

The story is nonsense, Leblanc said.

Early this century, the Italian excavator Ernesto Schiaparelli found the fetus in a rubbish pile outside the Valley of the Queens. It was Schiaparelli, not ancient priests, who placed it inside the prince's empty sarcophagus.

Today, the mummified fetus is so popular a tourist attraction that it has its own tiny case.

Museum pays tribute to 'Lady' with the Lamp'

LONDON (AP) — Kate Prinsley admits she underestimated Florence Nightingale, the mother of modern nursing, before becoming curator of the world's first museum of Nightingalia.

"I always thought she was very dull, a simpering Victorian," said Ms. Prinsley, whose forte was museums, not medicine. "I had no idea that she was, I think, a very shrewd woman, a real operator. I had no idea she was quite so tough."

For those with only faded schoolbook recollections of "The Lady with the Lamp," the Florence Nightingale Museum has a tale to tell.

Opened three months ago, it recounts, often in her own words, how a coddled girl defied her parents for a career in which she laid the foundations of modern nursing and instituted public health reforms that changed hospitals worldwide.

Her work in statistics still amazes bureaucrats. She became an expert on India without ever going there. She wrote 200 books and major papers, and kept working into her 90th, and last, year.

"She was much more than a nurse," says Patricia Mowbray, a Nightingale expert. "The horrors of the hospitals would have gone on unchanged if she'd been just a nurse."

The museum is at London's St. Thomas' Hospital, home of the nursing school Nightingale founded in 1860. Among items on display are her medicine chest and a replica of the lamp she carried in the Crimean War hospitals where she did her most famous work improving conditions for the wounded and sick.

"What a comfort it was to see her pass," one soldier wrote. "We could kiss her shadow as it fell and lay our heads on the pillow again content."

Born in 1820, the moody Florence was interested in the sick from an early age. But nice girls did not become nurses in those days. The profession was considered disreputable. Her parents refused to let her take it up, and she studied nursing in secret.

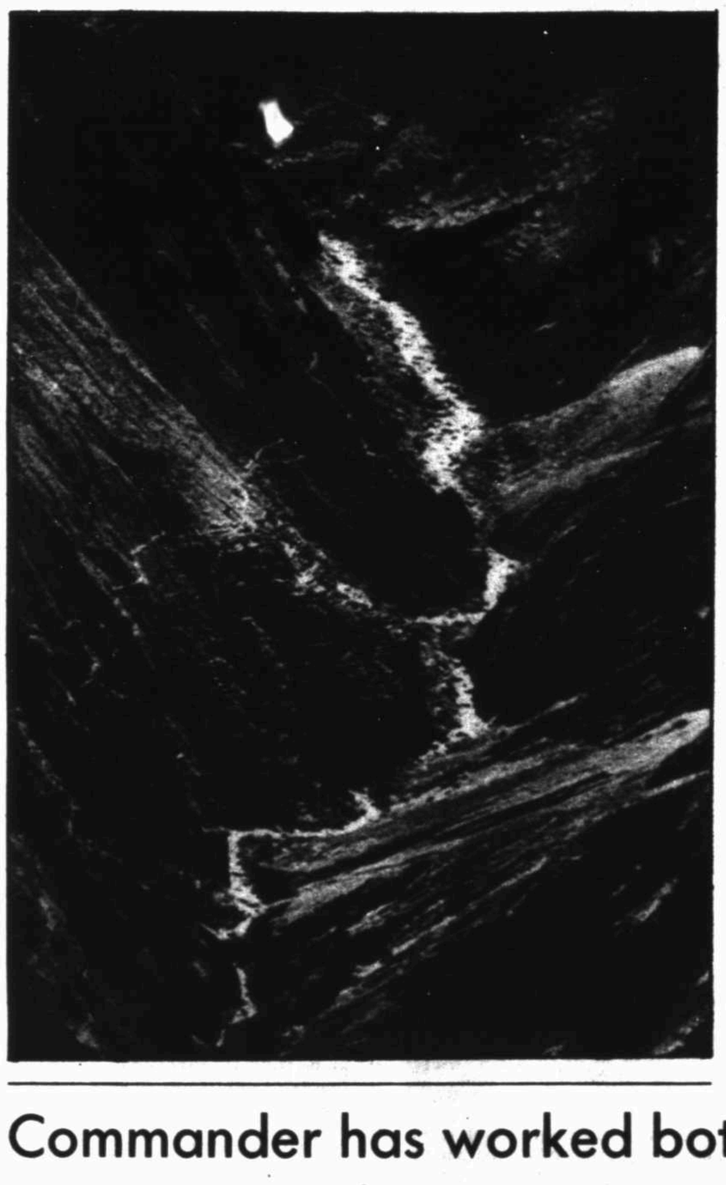

"Trust me, help me...Give me your blessing," she pleaded in a letter to her family. They did not reply.

Not until she was 33 did she get a real nursing job, as administrator of a small London hospital called the Institution for the Care of Sick Gentlewomen in Distressed Circumstances.

Nightingale reorganized it so thoroughly that when word of the horrendous conditions at the Crimean warfront reached England, she was asked to lead a nursing expedition.

"Not a sponge, nor a rag of linen, not anything have I left," she wrote in 1854 soon after her arrival at the dank Barrack Hospital in Scutari, Turkey.

But within a month she had organized proper kitchens, repaired many of the four miles of wards, ordered soap and a screen for operations because, she said, when a soldier due for an amputation "sees his comrade die today under the knife, it diminishes his chances." The museum recreates the scene.

World's deepest canyon lost in time

COLCA CANYON, Peru (AP) — From a condor's perch on this gorge in southern Peru you could look down on 10 of New York's World Trade Center towers stacked end on end.

The 60-mile-long Colca Canyon formed by the Colca River is the deepest land gorge on Earth, according to the Guinness Book of World Records.

This mysterious land of desert-dry moonscapes, exotic vegetation, active volcanoes and scattered pre-Columbian ruins is just now emerging from obscurity.

The canyon and surrounding Colca Valley are home to thousands of Indians, descendants of pre-Inca tribesmen who settled here 3,000 years ago.

"The whole history of Peruvian man is summarized in this startling landscape, which until only a few years ago was incommunicado with the rest of Peru," wrote the Peruvian novelist Mario Vargas Llosa in the foreword to the recently published "Discovering The Colca Valley," one of the few books on the region.

Terraced fields painstakingly carved from the slopes still yield corn and potatoes, the Indians' traditional staples. Ancient irrigation canals keep the land productive.

Some farms and hamlets rest precariously on canyon ledges, giving the appearance of defying gravity or tempting fate.

Most Indians still build their homes from adobe or rocks and rely on the wool of their alpaca herds for clothing.

They share these cloud-swept highlands with Andean condors and scores of rare flora and fauna, such as giant cactuses and the guanaco, an elusive cousin of the llama.

From surrounding mountain ridges, the Colca plummets 14,339 feet to the Colca River, according to Guinness. The World Trade Center in New York is 1,350 feet high.

The opposing lower wall descends 10,607 feet, nearly double the depth of Arizona's Grand Canyon.

Spanish conquistadors reached the Colca in the mid-1500s. They built churches and towns atop Indian villages, and then left, said Mauricio de Romana, one of the authors of "Discovering The Colca Valley."

Americans Robert Shippee and George Johnson led an expedition into Colca and published an article in the January, 1934, issue of National Geographic, calling it "a lost valley of the Incas."

It was a brief interlude in the obscurity of the Colca, whose wonders stayed forgotten until a gravel road was forged in the mid-1970s, linking it with Arequipa, 115 miles south.

Arequipa, Peru's second largest city, is 545 miles southeast of Lima.

"To the surprise of Peruvians and foreigners alike, this important setting, full of history and culture, appeared to the world," Romana said in an interview.

The road brought change to the Indians' traditional self-sufficient lifestyle, tourists and spreading fame.

The Guinness book recorded the Colca's depth for the first time in the mid-1980s, Romana said.

The road now carries travelers on a rugged five-hour journey in the shadow of the Andes' majestic spine, across the barren and cold altiplano and skirting volcanic cones.

The canyon rim offers a bird's eye view of walls plunging thousands of feet to the rushing Colca River and of condors gliding on thermal winds over farms and villages.

The most dramatic places are several days farther by foot and mule and are seen by just a hearty handful of the 10,000 to 15,000 tourists who reach the Colca yearly, according to Romana.

Anthony Holley, an Arequipa guide, said some visitors are discouraged because they cannot easily reach the deepest zone.

The arduous journey by road, a shortage of lodgings and generally unsafe conditions signal some of the major problems facing Peruvian tourism.

In the last several years Peru has been hit by spreading social and economic chaos, fueled by its worst recession of the century.

Tourism officials say the country does not have the money to invest substantially in tourism infrastructure or even protect what already exists.

But officials say the Colca so far seems to have been spared from a recent upsurge in highway banditry and the bloody guerrilla insurgency plaguing many other areas of the country.

Romana, a director of the Colca Foundation, which seeks to preserve the zone, said the arrival of the modern world has not yet had a serious impact on the Colca or its people.

Commander has worked both sides of Afghan civil war

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) — Tujan Khalid says he feels more comfortable in the mountains, where for nearly a decade he and 800 Moslem guerrillas battled the Soviet-backed government.

But now the rebel commander is plying his own brand of politics in Afghanistan, where shifting military fortunes sent the once-Marxist government seeking support among groups it once considered enemies.

Khalid joined the resistance at age 24, following firebrand rebel leader Gulbuddin Hekmatyar.

When the Soviet Red Army left Afghanistan, Khalid switched his allegiance and pledged to intercede with other guerrilla commanders to help try to stop the jihad, or holy war.

He says it is no longer justified since the government, once hostile to Moslem tenets, is now an active backer of the faith.

"This cannot be called jihad. This is not according to Islam, to continue war and bloodshed," says the bearded Khalid, dressed in a turban and robe. "We are all brothers. We belong to Afghanistan."

With the Afghan armed forces left to fight alone, the government of President Najib has come under intensive military pressure, with guerrillas encircling the eastern city of Jalalabad and fighting around the southern towns of Kandahar and Khost.

Thousands of reservists have been called for military duty and shipments of Soviet arms and ammunition stepped up. The United States, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and China are arming and training the guerrillas.

Political and military analysts say they believe the government forces will be able to hold the cities against the divided, ill-prepared guerrillas. However, they add, there is little prospect for the government winning the war.

Najib is trying to create a new political image aimed at strengthening his government's support at home. That policy took on a new urgency with the final departure of the Soviet troops on Feb. 15.

On May 21, Najib launched a new drive to try to end the 11-year-old war, offering deals to a dozen guerrilla commanders, including three of the best known and most organized commanders — Ahmed Shah Masood, Ismail Khan and Abdul Haq.

The 43-year-old president offered them full military rank within the Afghan army, said they could keep their weapons and promised autonomy in the regions they control. But his offer was rejected within 24 hours.

"They made a big mistake," said Khalid, who had come to Kabul to attend a meeting of the Loya Jirgah, the centuries-old tribal council in Afghanistan, where Najib made the offer. "I hope they will reconsider. I do not want to see our country being cut into pieces."

Diplomats and government officials say the government has had some success in opening secret talks with the guerrillas since the Soviet departure. At least one commander is known to have made contact with the government and one Pakistan-based guerrilla leader is reported to have been talking with the government for several months.

Arkansas advances as trick play nixed

OMAHA, Neb. (AP) — Tony Gilmore doubled in the go-ahead run in the eighth inning after an umpire overruled a trick pickoff play as Arkansas eliminated North Carolina from the College World Series with a 7-3 victory Sunday night.

The win kept Arkansas, 51-15, alive in the modified double-elimination tournament. North Carolina, which lost its CWS opener to Florida State, finished with a 41-18-1 record.

With the game tied 3-3, Greg D'Alexander led off the Arkansas eighth with a single that chased North Carolina starter Michael Hoog, 3-5. Jim Calhoon sacrificed D'Alexander to second.

The Tar Heels thought they had picked off D'Alexander with a hidden-ball trick when second base umpire Ron Graham called the runner out. But home plate umpire Bruce Ravan indicated that he had called time, negating the out.

"I called time to clean the plate," Ravan said. "The catcher asked me if time could be put back in play. I said, 'Not until the pitcher takes the rubber with the ball in his hand.' "

Florida St. 4, Wichita St. 2

OMAHA, Neb. — Unbeaten Clyde Keller pitched a four-hitter and Bob Reboin singled in the go-ahead run in the seventh to lift top-seeded Florida State to a 4-2 victory over Wichita State in a College World Series winners' bracket game Sunday night.

The victory advances Florida State, 54-16, to a meeting Wednesday night against the winner of an elimination game Tuesday between Wichita State, 64-16, and Arkansas, 51-15.

Keller, 13-0, pitched his fifth complete game of the season, retiring the last 11 Shockers he faced.

Power Train rumbles to win

RUIDOSO DOWNS, N.M. (AP) — Power Train won the Grade I $357,172 Kansas Futurity on Sunday in the first jewel of the Quarter Horse 2-year-old Triple Crown, edging favored Strawberry Silk by a head.

Deadly Dart was third by a nose in a tight race that saw 1½ lengths separating the first eight horses.

Power Train, owned by Pheenix Shaw and Sylvia Shaw Pitman of Jacksonville, Fla., had suffered from a virus as recently as two weeks ago, and Strawberry Silk had been the 4-5 favorite.

Power Train, the 10th and final qualifier for the Kansas Futurity, broke from the outside in the 10th post position. It was the first Kansas Futurity win for all connected with Power Train, who was trained by Iris Buchanan and ridden by Howard Pierce.

The winner paid $17.20, $5.80 and $4.80. Second place paid $2.80 and $2.60, while show paid $4.80.

Fernandez upsets Sabitini

PARIS (AP) — Last year, a wave of teen-agers headed by Steffi Graf and Gabriela Sabatini washed over the red clay courts at Roland Garros.

Twelve months later, the youth movement is getting even stronger.

While Steffi Graf remains on course for a third straight women's title, Sabatini was beaten Sunday by a player two years her junior.

Mary Joe Fernandez, a 17-year-old American with braces on her teeth and a ribbon in her hair, upset the second seed 6-4, 6-4 to move into the quarterfinals against No. 10 Helen Kelesi.

It was Fernandez' fourth straight win over Sabatini.

"I've played her many times," Sabatini said. "I think it's mental."

Fernandez was joined in the quarterfinals by five other teen-agers, including 15-year-old Monica Seles, a Yugoslavian now living in the United States.

Seles, the only unseeded player left in women's singles, beat Jo-Anne Faull of Australia 6-3, 6-2. Seles will next meet Manuela Maleeva, at 22 the oldest woman left in the draw.

Graf's next opponent is Conchita Martinez, a 17-year-old Spaniard who advanced with a 6-0, 6-1 victory over Katerina Maleeva of Bulgaria. Another 17-year-old Spaniard, Arantxa Sanchez, beat Amanda Coetzer 6-3, 6-2 to reach the quarterfinals.

Graf continued to steamroll her opposition Sunday, routing Italian qualifier Silvia la Fratta 6-2, 6-1. Graf, seeking her sixth consecutive Grand Slam title, has lost only nine games in four matches.

While the youth movement is primarily on the women's side, teen-agers also are making their mark in the men's competition.

Jim Courier, 18, upset fellow U.S. teen-ager Andre Agassi 7-6, 4-6, 6-3, 6-2 in a delayed third-round match Sunday while unseeded American Jay Berger advanced to the quarterfinals of a Grand Slam event for the first time.

Berger beat Thierry Tulasne of France, 3-6, 6-2, 6-0, 6-3.

Also advancing were second-seeded Boris Becker, No. 3 Stefan Edberg and No. 11 Alberto Mancini.

Becker reached the quarterfinals here for the second time in three years by beating Guillermo Perez-Roldan of Argentina 3-6, 6-4, 6-2, 4-6, 7-5 in a match that lasted almost 4½ hours.

Becker had to save a match point at 4-5 in the fifth set to edge Perez-Roldan and set up a meeting with Berger.

Jays would like to nest in Fens

Associated Press

Junior Felix and his Toronto teammates would like to return to Fenway Park as soon as possible.

Felix hit a two-run homer with one out in the 12th inning Sunday as the Blue Jays rallied from a 10-0 deficit for a 13-11 victory over Boston, extending their winning streak over the Red Sox at Fenway Park to 12 games.

In the three weekend games at Boston, Felix was 8-for-16 with 11 RBIs. He also had an inside-the-park grand slam.

"Yes, I'd like to come back here," Felix said. "I don't know the name of the pitcher. I just ask what he throws and (Manager) Cito (Gaston) tells me."

The pitcher was Dennis Lamp, who wasn't surprised at all that the Blue Jays rallied.

"When you play for 12 years, you see a few of these," Lamp said. "When I was pitching in Wrigley Field, we had a lot of these."

Tom Lawless led off the 12th with a single off Lamp, 0-1, the fifth Boston pitcher. Nelson Liriano sacrificed, and Felix followed with his fourth homer, a drive into the bleachers in right-center field.

Athletics 4, Indians 0

Dave Stewart, 10-2, became the AL's first 10-game winner by allowing three hits in seven innings as Oakland beat visiting Cleveland in a fight-marred game.

Stewart and Cleveland catcher Andy Allanson exchanged punches in a bench-clearing brawl after the top of the seventh. Allanson was hit by a Stewart pitch with two out and a man on second. The two exchanged words before being restrained by umpires and teammates. At the conclusion of the inning, tempers flared again as Stewart and Allanson fought between the mound and second base. Both players were ejected.

Angels 5, Royals 1

Bert Blyleven, 6-2, allowed one run in eight-plus innings and Jack Howell hit a two-run homer as California beat Kansas City in Anaheim.

Blyleven, 6-2, was three outs away from his 57th career shutout when Bo Jackson led off the ninth inning with his 13th home run.

Orioles 7, Tigers 4

Randy Milligan hit a three-run homer and Phil Bradley added a two-run shot as Baltimore beat Detroit to complete a four-game sweep at Tiger Stadium. The Orioles, first in the AL East, have won seven straight and 12 of their last 13 games.

White Sox 2, Twins 1

Jerry Reuss allowed three hits in six innings in his first start since May 1 and Harold Baines homered, leading Chicago past Minnesota at Comiskey Park.

The White Sox, who broke an 11-game home losing streak Saturday night, won two in a row for the first time since May 13-14 against Baltimore.

Bobby Thigpen, the fourth Chicago pitcher, worked the ninth for ninth save.

Yankees 12, Brewers 9

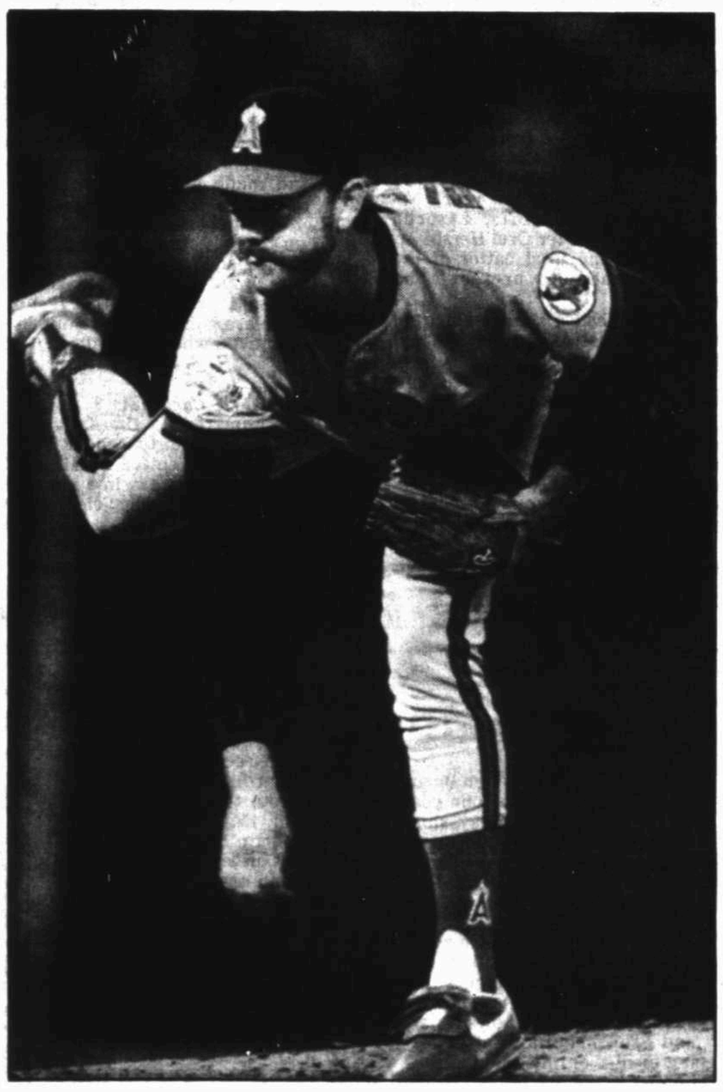

Jesse Barfield hit two home runs and Deion Sanders hit his first major-league homer, leading New York past Milwaukee at County Stadium.

Robin Yount hit a three-run homer off Jimmy Jones, 1-1, to move the Brewers within 10-7 in the sixth. Mel Hall and Steve Balboni also homered for the Yankees, who were shut out Saturday night.

Mariners 2, Rangers 1

Ken Griffey Jr. hit a tie-breaking homer in the seventh inning and Randy Johnson combined with three relievers on a four-hitter as Seattle beat Texas as the Kingdome.

Johnson, 2-0, allowed three hits and an unearned run in seven innings to win his Kingdome debut and second AL start since being acquired from Montreal on May 25. The 6-foot-10 left-hander struck out six, walked three and hit a batter.

Angels widen first place lead

By TED BATTLES

Midland's Angels added a full game cushion to their Texas League West Division lead Sunday, by sweeping a doubleheader from the San Antonio Missions to take a 1 1/2 game edge into the six-game showdown series beginning tonight in Wichita, Kan., against the pursuing San Diego Padres farmhands.

The only drawback is that while the Angels were huffing and puffing to win the last three games and the series over the Missions Sunday, Wichita was at home resting for the invasion of the division leaders and probably will have Andy Benes ready to fire at Midland either tonight or Tuesday.

Benes, it may be recalled, has been a New York Times crossword puzzle to Angel batters this year. Midland hasn't scored off the 1988 No. 1 free agent draft choice this season, although they have gotten a hit or two.

With Bob Rose going 4-for-4 and Chris Cron and Hedi Vargas knocking in five runs between them, the Angels beat the Missions 7-1 in the opener Sunday and lefthander Frank DeMichele, winner Vinicio Cedeno, Gary Buckels and Luis Merejo combined to hold San Antonio to four hits in a 5-0 nightcap win.

It was the third shutout of the season for the Halos, two of which have been combination efforts.

AT ONE time in the series, the tailspinning Angels trailed the Missions three games to one.

Rose vaulted to the Texas League batting lead with six hits in seven trips on the night. His first inning single in the opener was followed by Hedi Vargas' double into the left field corner, providing a precarious 1-0 lead for starter Robert Hernandez.

John Orton singled in the fourth and Scott Cerny's hit drove him home.

HERNANDEZ lost his no-hit bid with one out in the fifth when Dan Henley singled after Mike White reached first on an error. The 6-4 righthander from New York was out of the game when Juan Bustabad's routine grounder found its way through a charging leftside and the run scored.

Luis Merejo came on to retire the side and get the win and Gary Buckels nailed down his 10th save by pitching the final 1 1/3 innings while the Angel bats clinched it.

First, Chris Cron's eighth home run behind Rose's third hit, made it 4-1 in the fifth and the Angels tacked on three more in the sixth as Vargas delivered a two-run double.

Cerny's leadoff single in the second game and Rose's fifth straight hit gave Midland 1-0 lead against Tony Arnold, making his first start of the year, in the second game. Otto Gonzalez connected for his first homer to launch the second and a walk to Reed Peters, Gary DiSarcina's triple and Cerny's single added two more runs in the fourth off reliefer Gordie Hershiser.

George Wolf/Reporter-Telegram

Midland Angel Chris Cron hit his eighth homer as the Angels swept two from the San Antonio Missions Sunday in final games of homestand.

Cedeno, who relieved in the third, won it with 2 2/3 innings of one hit, three strikeout innings while Buckels and Merejo contributed an inning apiece.

Series hero wins three, leaves field on stretcher

GRAND JUNCTION, Colo. (AP) — When San Jacinto College won the National Junior College World Series, pitcher David Evans had to be carried off the field on a stretcher.

His performance was worthy of being triumphantly atop his teammates' shoulders. Evans won three games and appeared in a fourth before a line drive bruised his leg in the seventh inning of Saturday night's 22-4 championship victory over Northeastern Oklahoma A&M.

The Gators have won a record four national titles in five years.

"This is what we worked for all season," Evans said. "We've been playing hard and it finally came true. We made the dream come true."

In 20 innings, Evans allowed just four earned runs, 11 hits, and struck out 28. Evans, 18-1, was named the tournament's most valuable player and outstanding pitcher.

San Jacinto, 61-10, led Northeastern Oklahoma 6-1 after three innings, 11-1 after six and 18-1 after seven, but tournament rules require that the championship game go the full nine innings.

Other games in the double-elimination tournament can end early if a blowout develops.

"It got out of hand," Northeastern Oklahoma Coach Bill Mayberry said. "You can't take anything away from San Jac. They came in ranked No. 1 and they proved it."

Startling discoveries fail to shake Missions' pitching coach

Battles

The disturbing discovery was made during routine research and the sleuth couldn't wait to get out to Angels Stadium and alert the San Antonio Missions pitching coach of the fait accompli, unnerving as it might be.

Claude Osteen was found lecturing one of his proteges just outside the Missions' locker room.

Considering the imperative nature of the disclosure to be made, there was no choice.

"Claude!" he was rudely interrupted, "Did you realize that you are 50 years old."

OSTEEN took the disclosure with without any visible alarm, calming the distraught informer. "I'm not 50, yet, not until August."

"But what happened. Beginning with the 1984 issue, I started pulling Baseball Registers and had to go all the way back to 1977 before I found you listed,"

That seemed to surprise him. "My last year was 1976. I began coaching in 1977."

"But where have the years gone? It seems like yesterday that I'd see you in Mesa, Ariz., talking to the Ho-Hokam clubhouse attendants in the media press room before the game like you'd known them for eons."

"We always stopped in Arizona for a week before going to the coast for the Freeway Series."

"And all the Dodgers Arizona games were sellouts. But this is 1989. What happened to all those years? I always thought of you and Don Sutton as contemporaries," the issue was pursued.

Well, almost. Actually, Osteen's era included the Koufax, Drysdale years. "One year when Sandy and Don couldn't settle their contracts until after the season started, I actually got to pitch the opening game. With those two around, it was a rare honor."

THE HARRIED informer wasn't finished with his startling disclosures. So identified with the Dodgers is Osteen, it had been forgotten that isn't where Claude started. Maybe he had forgotten those early years, too.

"Did you know you pitched for the Washington Senators? It's possible you may have played in Griffith Stadium, one of my favorite oldtime ball parks."

"I only played in Griffith the last two weeks of the 1961 season after coming over from Cincinnati. The next year we moved into the new stadium (now RFK). But those were the expansion Senators," noted Claude. "The team that became the Texas Rangers."

He went on, "The old Senators moved to Minnesota and the owner Clark Griffith couldn't show his nose in Washington or he would have been arrested. He left leaving a lot of hard feelings, broken contracts and leases."

Those three seasons with the Senators-to-be-Rangers cost Claude a 200-win career. He was 1-1 in two weeks, 8-13, 9-14 and 15-13, not bad, but not what it would have been with the Dodgers. Osteen finished with 189 victories.

Osteen recalled what it was like in those days with Washington. "I remember one game in Fenway, we had an 8-0 lead with two out in the eighth, no one on and Boston scored nine runs to beat us.

OSTEEN'S job with the Missions is to ready pitchers for the Dodgers and he admits his club is handicapped.

"The other clubs are using some veteran players, but we are going with all young prospects. That makes a big difference."

Mike Pitz, who started against Midland Friday night, is a good example of the task Sutton faces.

As a rookie out of the University of Pacific, Pitz was 17-8 and eight complete games for Bakersfield, Class A California League, major league promise?

Two seasons later, he is struggling and, until Friday, hadn't had a start all season.

What happened in those two seasons?

"This is AA ball and it's a big jump from A ball. Pitz' problem is that he has got to learn to relax. The other night he got off to a bad start, then turned in three good innings because he relaxed.

"At the AA level, you can't just throw the ball, you've got to think of what and where you are throwing."

Somehow it was comforting the way Claude took it, the revelation that he was 50 and had pitched for the Washington Senators, but I wasn't about to stretch my luck by telling Osteen he had been born in Caney Springs, Tenn.

Soul-saving new act for Foreman

Murray

Overweight? Have trouble bending down to tie your shoes, do you? Clothes too tight? Wheeze when you climb stairs? Hard to get in and out of cars? Feet hurt from carrying around all that blubber?

Don't worry about it. Have another taco. Load up on chocolate. Buy real whipped cream.

Here's what you do: Go down to the nearest gym, buy a jump rope, work out on the light bag a couple of minutes, spar around with a couple of guys fatter than you are. Don't overdo it.

And we'll see about getting you a shot at the heavyweight championship of the world at $10 or $12 million a pop.

You think that's farfetched? Well, tell me, have you had a good look at George Foreman lately?

Maybe you saw George's "bout" with a pug named Bert Cooper in Phoenix Thursday night. If you didn't see it, don't worry. Put on a Three Stooges cassette and watch it. Same thing. Everything but the seltzer bottle and a pneumatic blonde. A Professor Larbermacher skit was never funnier.

BERT COOPER didn't come to fight. He had trouble escaping blows that came at him with the speed and trajectory of an iceberg.

George Foreman made his fight like a guy waiting for a bus. If it was outdoors, pigeons would have lit on him. Guys have moved faster in checkout lines at the market.

Far be it from me to say that Bert Cooper was there only to disappear at some convenient moment but it's interesting that the Arizona Athletic Commission announced even before the fighters had left the ring that they were holding up Cooper's purse, $17,000. The suspicion persists this was not the only cash coming Cooper's way for his contribution to the comedy skit.

After all, what we're doing with George Foreman here is trying to persuade the public to disregard its eyes and trust the promoters that what they're seeing is a devastating primal force and not a fat old party who throws punches like a shotputter or a guy who has forgotten to let go of a bowling ball.

NOW, QUITTING in your corner is considered quite manly in certain sections of the world. It's perfectly acceptable in Britain, for example. But custom calls for you to have absorbed a nosebleed or two, maybe a knockdown, before you call it a night. Cooper underwent two rounds of unseemly scampering and then, when he quit between rounds, was the only person in the arena not surprised by the action. As soon as the fight was called, he leaped off his stool with a broad smile and rushed over and embraced Foreman who semed the least bit embarrassed but, maybe, relieved.

Even in his prime, which was a long time ago, it was touch and go whether George Foreman could fight at top pitch for more than five rounds. He never had to. He first came into public consciousness as the Olympic heavyweight champ, master of the quick knockout and the three-round fight at most.

He came into public view at a time when some other Olympic athletes were waving black-gloved fists at their country's flag and anthem on victory stands, and George endeared himself to the traditionalists by carrying a miniature American flag in his gloves to the ring. He stood stiffly at attention as they played the national anthem and they carried his Russian or German opponents out by the heels.

AS A pro, he had only two fights that went the distance. He was a pulverizing puncher, he had arms like pythons and fists like paving blocks but his style was as uncomplicated as a slow freight on an uphill grade.

Unfortunately, he was made to order for Muhammad Ali. Ali could always throw the switch on those big slow-freight types and he derailed Foreman for good in a predawn fight in Kinshasa in 1974. When Foreman got knocked down in Round 8, Ali had him too exhausted to have a chance to get up at 10.

It was really the only fight that George ever lost. There was a gavotte with Jimmy Young he lost by decision just before he retired in 1977 but it was the knockout by Ali in Africa that drove George out of the ring and into a pulpit. He became, of all things, a preacher.

George hasn't gotten his old act together for his assault on the title, he's got a new one. The old Foreman, while affable enough, was generally a monosyllabic, reclusive character who made Gary Cooper seem garrulous. The new one has borrowed techniques he used to despise, those of Ali. When the two fought in Zaire, Ali was full of bombast, boast, psych – the usual shticks of an Ali prefight promo. Foreman locked himself in his room and slept.

THE NEW Foreman is wiser. He's on his way to one more big score which can put the ministry of the Rev. George on its way to saving souls by the million and George is onto it. His postfight utterances after he had disposed of Cooper were in the best oratorical traditions of Ali, Hulk Hogan, William Jennings Bryan.

"I am the hope of every man over 40," boomed George. "I am the hope of everyone over 50, 60! I am fighting for old men everywhere. They see me and they know everything is possible."

He's also the hope of every guy who can't tighten his belt any more.

But the pugilistic practice of dusting off an old, out-of-shape champion to take on the current holder is not new. In 1910, Jim Jeffries was five years retired. But the gimmick then was that America had a black champion. Jeffries was convinced that he had a holy mission to correct this menace.

The pathetic phrase, "the Great White Hope," was born but the reluctant Jeff was pounded into a pulp on the Fourth of July by the Great Black Hunk, Jack Johnson, who appeared to be enjoying himself immensely doing it.

George may be the Great Fat Hope. If he could somehow win the title, he could set dieting back 50 years. But of course, he could set pugilism back to John L. Sullivan.

Houston Astros pitcher Bob Knepper puts tag on Dodgers John Shelby in play at the plate in third inning of Saturday night's "longest" game. Houston won the seven hour, 14 minute marathon 5-4 in 22 innings.

Go home? Davis just sleeps at park

HOUSTON (AP) — Glenn Davis, the Houston Astros' first baseman, had the perfect solution after the Astros' record 7 hour 14 minute game with the Los Angeles Dodgers ended at 2:50 a.m. local time Sunday night.

Instead of going home and returning for Sunday's 1:30 p.m. start, he slept in the trainer's room at the Astrodome.

Houston won the game 5-4 in 22 innings, a contest that ended with Los Angeles third baseman Jeff Hamilton on the mound and Fernando Valenzuela, who pitched Friday night, at first base. Hamilton took the loss, only the second non-pitcher in 26 years to get a decision — St. Louis' Jose Oquendo lost in the 19th last year.

"I was excited about getting to pitch but that doesn't mean much when you lose," Hamilton said. "I'm mad about losing but I still can't believe I was out there. I've alway wanted to pitch."

It was the longest night game ever played, one in which the Dodgers used every player on their 24-man roster except Tim Belcher, who started Sunday's game, in which the Astros beat the Dodgers 7-6 in 13 innings. Houston did not use pitchers Bob Forsch and Mike Scott, who won Sunday, and injured Kevin Bass.

The previous record was 7:04, on Sept. 11, 1974, when St. Louis beat the New York Mets 4-3 in 25 innings.

The Dodgers used nine pitchers and the Astros seven. Orel Hershiser, scheduled to start Monday for the Dodgers, went seven innings.

The game matches up with other classics, starting with the 1920 Brooklyn-Boston game.

The longest American League game was a 25-inning contest between Milwaukee and the White Sox at Chicago on May 8, 1984, won by Chicago 7-6 when the game was completed on May 9, which consumed a total time of 8:06. The AL, unlike the National, has 1 a.m. curfew.

The longest National League game lasted 7:23 between San Francisco and the Mets York — 23 innings in the second game of a doubleheader on May 31, 1964.

Scott hero in 12-inning shortie

Associated Press

The Houston Astros brought their long weekend to a successful finish by borrowing a trick from Los Angeles manager Tom Lasorda.

When the Dodgers ran out of pitchers in Game 4 of last year's National League playoffs, Lasorda turned to ace starter Orel Hershiser, who retired the final batter of the 12-inning game to preserve the victory.

Houston faced a similar situation Sunday. The Astros and Dodgers had played 22 innings the night before, were tied 6-6 after 12 innings and were out of pitchers.

In came Mike Scott, the 13th pitcher used by Houston in two games and the winner on Friday night. Not only did he work a scoreless inning, he also drove in the winning run with a sacrifice fly for a 7-6 victory, the Astros' 10th in a row.

"When you are losing, you find ways to lose games but we're finding ways to win," said Scott, 9-3.

The Dodgers pounded starter Bob Forsch for five runs in the first inning, and made it 6-0 in the third. Louie Meadows' grand slam keyed Houston's comeback.

"When they got ahead 6-0, we were on the bench saying 'there's no way these guys are going to beat us,'" Scott said. "We've got that feeling that we are going to figure out a way to win even when we're down 6-0."

Cubs 11, Cardinals 3

Chicago homered six times, twice each by Shawon Dunston and Ryne Sandberg, and one apiece by Mitch Webster and Vance Law, in a game marred by a brief bench-clearing brawl.

Chicago's Mark Grace charged the mound when brushed back by St. Louis reliever Frank DiPino in the top of the fifth inning and was ejected.

Mets 4, Pirates 3

Pinch-hitter Mark Carreon led off the bottom of the seventh inning with a tie-breaking home run and New York beat Pittsburgh for its fourth straight victory.

Carreon connected against reliever Bob Kipper, 0-2, for his second home run this season, both as a pinch hitter. Pittsburgh lost its fourth consecutive game.

Expos 7, Phillies 4

Otis Nixon had three RBIs and Mike Fitzgerald added two run-scoring doubles as Montreal swept a three-game series in Philadelphia, sending the Phillies to their 11th straight loss.

The slide matches the Phillies' longest losing streak since they dropped the final 11 games of the 1985 season. They've lost 15th of their last 17 games.

Braves 6, Giants 3

Darrell Evans' three-run homer highlighted a four-run fifth and Dale Murphy had three RBIs as Atlanta avoided a sweep at home by the Giants.

Reds 5, Padres 3

First baseman Jack Clark's wild throw with the bases loaded allowed two runs to score as Cincinnati won its fourth straight and completed a sweep of the Padres at Riverfront Stadium.

It did, however, vote to form a committee that would study the postseason bowl structure. In addition, the CFA voted to submit legislation to next January's NCAA convention that would restore the 30 per year and 95 total limit on football scholarships (the current limit is 25-95).

Track

PROVO, Utah — Louisiana State won the men's and women's NCAA Outdoor Track and Field Championships Saturday, the first time ever a school has swept national titles in the same year.

Dawn Sowell of LSU won the 100-meter dash and helped in the 400 relay to complete a three-title performance. Her 10.78 seconds in the 100 made her the third-fastest performer in history behind world-record holder Florence Griffith-Joyner and Evelyn Ashford.

LSU finished with 86 points to second-place UCLA's 47, the biggest winning margin since women became part of the meet in 1982.

Rowdon paces Carp

TOKYO (AP) — Wade Rowdon, formerly with the Triple-A Rochester team, singled home a tie-breaking run in a four-run eighth inning rally, leading the Central League's Hiroshima Toyo Carp to a 7-4 victory over the Yokohama Taiyo Whales at Akita Sunday.

In the Pacific League, a three-run home run by Greg "Boomer" Wells in the third inning led the front-running Orix Braves to a 6-2 victory over the Lotte Orions at Nishikyogoku.

Wells, formerly with the Minnesota Twins, now has 15 homers.

McDonald expensive, but coach says he's worth it

OMAHA, Neb. (AP) — Ben McDonald will cost the Baltimore Orioles a lot of money. Louisiana State University Coach Skip Bertmans says the right-hander is worth every penny.

"Ben will be the highest paid pitcher in the history of the draft," Bertman said.

Baltimore, picking first in today's major league draft, is expected to make McDonald the No.1 choice.

McDonald, 14-3, set a Southeastern Conference record for strikeouts this season with 198. He's on every All-America team, and Baseball America named him the Outstanding Player in college baseball.

Bertman said McDonald, 6-foot-7 and still maturing, will be more effective as a professional pitcher than he has been as an amateur.

"First, the wooden bats in the pros won't propel the ball as far, particularly on those good pitchers who go inside and outside," he said.

"Second, big leaguers, and even the minor league hitters, will swing at pitches that are just outside the strike zones," he said. "The walk is a valuable tool in college, but the pros don't make any money walking.

"Third, defensively, the pros will make plays that college teams won't make."

"It's harder for Ben to win now than it will be in pro ball. I'm not saying the bigs, but in pro ball," he said.

"In college, Ben throws 70 percent fastballs and challenges all of the hitters," he said. "When he gets into pro ball, when he can pitch more, use all of his pitches, he'll be even more effective."

He said McDonald has the fastball, an excellent curve, two changeups and a fork ball.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Make a benevolent gesture and you will win a friend for life. Your work environment may be a bit difficult to take at times. Patience is a virtue. Changes are in the wind.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): You are moving into a position where you will be able to advance more quickly. Making peace with a former romantic or business partner will benefit both of you. Let bygones be bygones.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): You may be feeling uncertain about a relationship or your financial position. Do not let your imagination run away with you. Be open to helpful suggestions. Team effort is the key to success.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Make sure you know what you are doing today. By responding to domestic needs personally, you will get better results. Devote more time to joint ventures. Partner may require more guidance.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): If unhappy with the way partners or family members have been treating you, confront them. They may be reacting to something you said or did. Adopt a forgive-and-forget attitude.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): A relationship reaches a crossroads sooner than you expected. If it is lasting romance you are looking for, reach out to someone who shares your interests. Be your own sweet self.

ANSWERS TO WEEKLY BRIDGE QUIZ

Q.1—Both vulnerable, as South you hold:
♠J8762 ♡Void ◇KQ653 ♣954
The bidding has proceeded:

North	East	South	West
1 ♡	Pass	1 ♠	Pass
2 ♡	Pass	?

What action do you take?
A.—Surely there must be a better spot to play the hand, but you you are caught on the horns of a dilemma. You can't rebid such a shabby spade suit, and a bid of three diamonds would be forcing to game. Pass. Even if partner gets doubled, we're not sure you should bail out.

Q.2—Both vulnerable, as South you hold:
♠QJ5 ♡J6 ◇A10 ♣AQ9872
The bidding has proceeded:

North	East	South	West
1 ♡	Pass	2 ♣	Pass
2 ♡	Pass	?

What do you bid now?
A.—With a sound opening bid facing a known opening, you want to be in game, and three no trump looks like the logical bid. Don't rebid three clubs—that shows a sub-minimum two-over-one response with little more than a long club suit.

Q.3—Neither vulnerable, as South you hold:
♠875 ♡K32 ◇K5 ♣AQJ62
The bidding has proceeded:

South	West	North	East
1 ♣	Pass	1 ♠	Pass

What do you bid now?
A.—With a balanced minimum and stoppers in the unbid suits, one no trump is clear cut. Despite a ruffing value, raising spades on three low cards would be too encouraging, and a rebid in clubs normally promises six of them in this sequence, or a better five-card suit than you have.

Q.4—Neither vulnerable, as South you hold:
♠875 ♡K32 ◇K5 ♣AQJ62
The bidding has proceeded:

South	West	North	East
1 ♣	Pass	1 ♠	Pass
1 NT	Pass	2 ◇	Pass

What do you bid now?
A.—You have already described a balanced minimum, so there is no to need to repeat the message. Since partner must have at least five spades, all you should do for the moment is take preference to partner's first-bid suit. Bid two spades.

Q.5—Neither vulnerable, as South you hold:
♠Void ♡95 ◇QJ109762 ♣J1063
The bidding has proceeded:

North	East	South	West
1 ♠	Dbl	?

What action do you take?
A.—You have a hand that will produce nothing on defense but about six tricks with diamonds as trump. Jump to three diamonds. Over an opposing takeout double, a jump shift is preemptive, not strength-showing.

Q.6—Both vulnerable, as South you hold:
♠K1052 ♡63 ◇KJ94 ♣742
The bidding has proceeded:

North	East	South	West
1 ◇	Pass	1 ♠	Pass
2 ♠	Pass	?

What action do you take?
A.—You have a hand worth just one bid, and you've already shot your bolt! Even though your side-suit values in partner's suit enhance the worth of your hand, those assets do not warrant a forward-going action opposite a minimum opening bid. Pass.

'Robbins' Broadway' wins 6 Tonys; 'Heidi Chronicles' gets best play

NEW YORK (AP) — "Jerome Robbins' Broadway" dominated the Tonys with six awards, and Wendy Wasserstein's Pulitzer Prize-winning "The Heidi Chronicles" won for best play.

Miss Wasserstein, whose play is about a girl of the 1960s becoming a woman of the 1980s, lifted her Tony aloft Sunday night and said, "For women playwrights, I think this is great for all of us."

Robbins, receiving a Tony as best director of a musical, said, "I suppose as director I have to thank the choreographer."

He was ineligible in the choreography category because the dances are re-creations of 15 memorable numbers from nine hit shows of previous seasons.

That award went to "Black and Blue," which won three Tonys.

In addition to director, "Jerome Robbins' Broadway" won Tony Awards for best musical; actor in a musical — Jason Alexander; featured actor — Scott Wise; featured actress — Debbie Shapiro; and lighting design.

Robbins, who has been choreographing for the New York City Ballet in recent years, decided to notate his Broadway dances for the Lincoln Center library, then decided they could be re-created on stage.

Pauline Collins, remembered as a saucy maid in PBS-TV's "Upstairs, Downstairs," won the best dramatic actress award for "Shirley Valentine," a one-woman play.

Christine Baranski won featured actress for her portrayal of a flustered guest at a party without a host in Neil Simon's farce "Rumors."

• • •

NEW YORK (AP) — TV stars Delta Burke and Gerald McRaney spent a reported $250,000 on a storybook wedding in May, but neither was seeking romance when they met at a publicists' luncheon in March 1987, according to People magazine.

"I figured I'd turn into the crazy woman down the street with all the dogs and a stack of newspapers so deep you can't find the body for days. And then I met him, and it's so weird, but right off the bat you knew," Burke, 32, of the CBS show "Designing Women," said in this week's issue.

McRaney, 42, of the old CBS show "Simon & Simon," was separated but still married to his second wife when he met Burke.

"I was not looking for a wife," he said. "I'd decided 'never again' for me. I wasn't angry or bitter about anything. I just thought I wasn't very good at it."

• • •

INDIANAPOLIS (AP) — When you're Evan Bayh, the governor of basketball-crazed Indiana, you better have a hoop out in the driveway.

Less than five months after moving into the governor's residence, Bayh had maintenance workers set up a pole and backboard to enable him to practice shooting.

"It's part of our heritage and it's one of the positive things we have to offer the country — physical fitness," Bayh said.

"I like to play basketball, shoot basketballs and shoot two-on-two," said Bayh, at 33 the nation's youngest governor. "I don't need a collapsible rim. No one has confused me with Michael Jordan yet."

CAPE TOWN, South Africa (AP) — Poet and author Richard Moore Rive, many of whose works were banned in South Africa, was found bludgeoned and stabbed to death in his home Sunday, police said. He was 59.

Rive, head of the department of English at Hewat College in the mixed-race township of Athlone, wrote poems and novels about the plight of the "coloreds," South Africans of mixed racial heritage.

His novel "Buckingham Palace: District Six," about the bulldozed multiracial neighborhood in the heart of Cape Town, had been made into a play and was to premiere June 16 at Cape Town's Baxter Theater. Another of his best known works was "Writing Black."

• • •

VICKSBURG, Miss. (AP) — B.B. King reminisced during his return to his native state with a BBC crew preparing a documentary on the bluesman's life.

"When I would play a gospel song people would pat me on the back...when I played a blues song they would give me a tip," King said.

King met with the British Broadcasting Corp. crew Saturday at the Delta Point River Restaurant to tape an interview that will be included in an hourlong program of the documentary series "Omnibus."

King and the crew had planned to meet privately at the restaurant, but word of his appearance spread quickly.

• • •

DALLAS (AP) — The Dallas nightclubs that helped launch Edie Brickell and New Bohemians have become too small for the band's hometown audience.

The rock group, which got its start in clubs in Dallas' stylish Deep Ellum neighborhood, left Sunday for Europe, where they will open for Bob Dylan during his overseas tour.

A capacity crowd cheered the New Bohemians during a performance Friday night at the 2,400-seat Bronco Bowl.

"This is weird being back home and being here," said Ms. Brickell of the venue. "But it's great to be back. We're excited."

The six-member band's debut album "Shooting Rubberbands at the Stars" has sold two million copies since its release last August. Their first single, "What I Am," reached Billboard's Top 10.

Lower interest eases recession fears

By PETER T. KILBORN
New York Times News Service

WASHINGTON — Interest rates have begun to decline across much of the economy, reducing the probability of the recession some economists have been predicting but also perhaps fanning the fires of inflation.

The latest slippage in rates came Friday, after the government released an unemployment report that indicated a slowing economy.

The Veterans Administration cut its top mortgage rate to 10 percent, from the 10.5 percent it set in December, and Southwest Bank in St. Louis cut its prime lending rate to 11 percent, from the 11.5 percent that all banks set in February.

Wall Street also witnessed uncommonly large declines in market rates on government and corporate bills and bonds.

"I don't think we've seen the bottom of interest rates yet," said Norman Ture, a private consultant here and a former senior official in the Reagan administration. "We're in the middle of a movement. Unless the economy gets extremely ebullient, it's difficult to see anything that's going to send rates back up."

On Friday, the rumor sweeping the markets was that the Federal Reserve, the institution that wields more influence over the economy and interest rates than any other, would move soon to push short-term rates down.

The talk was that the Fed was about to cut its influential 9¾ percent federal funds rate, the rate on overnight and short-term bank loans, after pushing it up three percentage points through February in a year of inflation-fighting increases.

Lower interest rates usually give the economy a lift by making it easier for people and businesses to borrow, and thus to spend. But the greater spending can also feed inflation by putting pressure on wages and prices.

For now, many economists anticipate little added inflation risk because of the economy's relatively slow growth, of 2 to 3 percent, even though some others see the seeds of higher inflation in figures like April's 5.1 percent overall unemployment rate, the lowest in 15 years.

In general, market rates had slipped about half a percentage point, mostly starting in April, and on Friday alone some slipped by more than a tenth of a percentage point.

Top banks lower prime

NEW YORK (AP) — Several major banks lowered their prime lending rates half a percentage point to 11 percent today, responding to the decline of interest rates on financial markets.

Citibank, the nation's largest bank, was the first to announce it had lowered its prime lending rate half a percentage point to 11 percent.

Several other big banks, including Chase Manhattan Bank, Morgan Guaranty Trust Co., Manufacturers Hanover Trust Co. and Bankers Trust Co., quickly followed suit.

Today's decline was the first drop in the prime rate — used as a base for a variety of other interest rates, including those on consumer loans — since Feb. 2, 1988. On that day, the prime fell 0.25 percentage points to 8.5 percent, but it later began a climb that ended today.

Fed may reduce interest

New York Times News Service

NEW YORK — The buying frenzy that capped last week's bond trading was spurred by the perception that the latest employment figures provided convincing evidence that economic growth had slowed and that the Federal Reserve would soon address this situation by reducing interest rates.

"In light of the employment and other data indicating that the economy is moderating, we can expect the Federal Reserve to start easing in the next week or two," said David M. Jones, chief economist at Aubrey G. Lanston & Company, a major dealer in government securities.

But Jones, like other market analysts, is not expecting any dramatic action by the Fed. "We don't expect anything more than a cut of 25 or perhaps 50 basis points in the federal funds rate," he said. "Anything more could weaken the dollar and revive inflation fears, among other problems."

The dollar was a major casualty of Friday's employment report, suffering one of its sharpest declines this year. The jobs report showed that only 101,000 non-farm jobs were created in May, the smallest gain since 84,000 in March 1986.

The dollar's plunge was all but ignored by bond investors, whose buying spree sent prices of Treasury and corporate debt securities soaring and long-term interest rates tumbling to their lowest level in 15 months.

The Treasury yield curve almost flattened amid signs that the return on 30-year bonds may soon again exceed those on two-year notes.

Late Friday, the benchmark Treasury long bonds, the 8⅞ percent issue due 2019 traded at a yield of 8.46 percent, compared with 8.49 percent for the 8¾ percent notes of 1991 and the discount rate of 8.36 percent on 90-day bills.

One week earlier, the yield on the long bond was 8.61 percent; two-year notes were yielding 8.69 percent, and the discount rate on the 90-day bills was 8.53 percent.

The federal funds rate, the bedrock cost of credit, closed Friday at 9 9-16 percent, after trading around 9¾ percent for most of the week.

The Fed funds rate is what banks charge each other for overnight loans. It is also roughly what dealers pay to finance their inventories of Treasury securities and, perhaps most important, the funds rate is most easily controlled by the Fed.

The only action taken by the Fed after the release of the employment data was a technical one: the draining of reserves from the banking system.

Outwardly, this would indicate the Fed was propping up short-term rates, rather than easing. But in this case, the central bank was draining reserves it had added to the banking system during the recent tax payment period to compensate for the outflow of funds that went from banks to Treasury accounts.

FHLBB wins judgement against S&L

New York Times News Service

WASHINGTON — A federal judge in New Orleans has awarded the Federal Home Loan Bank Board an $86 million judgment against former officers of the defunct Alliance Federal Savings and Loan Association of Kenner, La.

The agency said Friday that it was one of the largest judgments yet for the agency in its attempt to recoup losses it contends were caused by fraud and mismanagement in the savings and loan industry.

U.S. District Court Judge Adrian G. Duplantier found four former associates of Alliance and a former Jefferson Parish court clerk liable for damages that totaled $86 million.

They included Guy W. Olano Jr, former chairman of Alliance; Robert Newville, its former president; Stewart P. Kalterman, the former president of an Alliance subsidiary; Raoul A. (Skip) Galan, the parish clerk, and William H. Ryan, a Jefferson Parish real estate broker.

USX feels pressure of Icahn bid

New York Times News Service

USX Corp. is coming under pressure to consider a restructuring that could split the giant steel and energy company, industry analysts say, because it might otherwise face a hostile takeover bid from Carl C. Icahn.

Icahn, financier and chairman of Trans World Airlines, owns 11.4 percent of USX.

He spurred speculation about a bid last week when he sold his stake in Texaco Inc. for slightly more than $2 billion.

USX, which changed its name from United States Steel, has long disavowed any intention to sell its steel division, even as it moved into the energy business.

But if Icahn increases his stake in the Pittsburgh-based company, a restructuring will be likely, analysts said in interviews.

"A restructuring of USX is a distinct possibility now," said Chester S. Spatt, professor of economics and finance at the Carnegie Mellon University school of business.

"The big question now is one of timing. Some people believe it will come sooner, and the stock market's response suggests it might not be as soon."

In trading on the New York Stock Exchange on Friday, the company's stock fell 87.5 cents to $36.50, after rising Thursday on talk of a bid by Icahn.

Speculation mounted last week that Icahn might immediately seek to take over USX.

People in the industry say Icahn would favor breaking the company into two parts.

Three years ago, he made a $31-a-share takeover proposal that ended after USX announced a repurchase of 20 million of its shares.

If the steel unit is sold, analysts and industry officials said the separate steel and energy operations could operate profitably, despite some troubles.

Moreover, analysts and industry executives suggested that a spinoff of the steel unit is inevitable.

To a large extent, the company has gradually become more of an energy concern over the years.

USX last year derived 59 percent of its sales from oil and gas, with steel accounting for about a third and diversified operations making up the rest.

Report: American picks Texas for base

FORT WORTH, Texas (AP) — American Airlines will build a new $250 million maintenance base at Fort Worth Alliance Airport, say Texas legislators who are confident the airline was pleased with new tax legislation.

Speaking on condition of anonymity, legislators told the Fort Worth Star-Telegram, the airline is intending to construct the base at Alliance Airport instead of in Oklahoma City.

But the airline denies the report, with officials saying no final decision has been made about where to put the new facility.

"We are appreciative of how interested and cooperative local and state officials have been, but, the bottom line is, we haven't made a decision," said Al Becker, an American spokesman.

Bob Baker, American's senior vice president for operations, under whose supervision the maintenance base would fall, also said no promises were made by the airline in exchange for the legislation.

In exchange for passage of critical tax legislation, American Chairman Robert Crandall assured Gov. Bill Clements, Lt. Gov, Bill Hobby and legislative leaders that American would build the base in Fort Worth, several lawmakers told the Star-Telegram in Sunday's editions.

COMPUTER NOTES

Understanding the basics of booting

By DENNIS SEVER

Could you explain what "booting" the computer means?

Sever

Most modern computers use a startup technique called bootstrap loading or BOOTING for short. This technique was developed as the demands for more user memory and more sophisticated OPERATING SYSTEMS grew. For some time now the more powerful computers have used a Disk Operating System, (DOS), to provide the user with more flexibility and greater power.

The concept derived its name from the common rustic American phrase, "....pulled himself up by the bootstraps." The actual process somewhat follows this pattern, depending upon manufacturer and size of computer:

When the power is first applied to the computer the very tiny program automatically executes. This program stored on a chip or more commonly, two or three chips is usually referred to as the 'BOOT ROM', ROM meaning Read Only Memory. Among other things, this program causes a certain file, called a LOADER to be read into the computers' memory.

When the LOADER has been read into memory the BOOT ROM passes execution control to it.

The LOADER then reads the OPERATING SYSTEM into the computers' memory and transfers control to it.

Some personal computer systems offer a method to BOOT the computer without having to turn the power off and on. Usually this method is some multiple keystroke. This is called a WARM BOOT as opposed to a COLD BOOT which is accomplished by applying power to the computer. The significant difference between the two is that the COLD BOOT will usually include a series of diagnostic tests in the procedure prior to accessing the LOADER.

The WARM BOOT will only access the LOADER phase of the tiny program on the BOOT ROM.

When I do a CHKDSK command I get an entry called HIDDEN FILES. Why do I have hidden files and what are they?

The MS-DOS / PC-DOS operating systems have made provision for for a method of HIDING files on a diskette. The HIDING of these files only prevents some of the common DOS utility programs like COPY and DIR from seeing the files. This attribute of some files is used by software designers and engineers to prevent the corruption of multiple file programs, and sometimes for copyright protection.

Crude oil prices still heading up

From Staff and Wire Reports

Crude oil prices continued upward today, opening 30 cents above Friday's close of $20.14, which followed a 34 cents jump from Thursday's close of 19.80.

The 64 cent increase in two days comes in the midst of OPEC talks in Vienna, where oil ministers are negotiating on the impossible task of bringing higher oil prices into the world market, while increasing production quotas and holding the line on overproduction.

Hisham Nazer of Saudi Arabia, who has led the fight to hold oil prices moderately low, said he would like to see oil prices increase in the second half of the year.

To achieve higher prices OPEC must set production quotas everyone can live with

NEW YORK (AP) — The stock market swept ahead to new post-crash highs Friday, responding to employment statistics that raised hopes for an easier Federal Reserve credit policy and lower interest rates.

Intelligent building

This model and diagram show a 12-story, $35 million dollar TRON "intelligent building" that incorporates more than 10,000 microcomputers. It will be the most advanced computerized building in the world when it's completed in Ichihara, east of Tokyo. TRON, short for The Real-time Operating System Nucleus, created by Japanese computer scientist Ken Sakamura, may possibly be a new computer standard but, at the same time, may become a new unfair trade barrier.

Video game wars hit the streets

New York Times News Service

CHICAGO — The battle for the $3.5 billion home video game market is moving away from home.

At the Consumer Electronics Show here two of the industry's top companies, Nintendo and the Atari Corp., introduced portable handheld video games that they hope will sweep the nation this fall.

While pricing and marketing strategies differ, both the Nintendo and Atari devices pack the power of full-size home video games into pocket-sized units.

And both companies proclaim the identical ambition for their newest high-technology toys: to make them a mainstream addiction, doing for games and puzzles what the Sony Walkman did for music.

"The guy out fishing, the businessman on the airplane, the kid on the schoolbus, we think they'll all like it," said Peter Main, vice president for marketing at Nintendo.

The two products are Nintendos's Game Boy and Atari's Portable Entertainment System.

In both name and appearance, Nintendo's Game Boy resembles a Walkman (a pure coincidence, Nintendo says). The small, paperback book-size unit has a 2½-inch diagonal screen, and headphones for stereo sound.

Credit card-size cartridges slip in the back, allowing the unit to play potentially limitless numbers and types of games. It will sell for $89.95, including one game cartridge. Additional cartridges will cost about $20.

Atari's Portable Entertainment System has more high-technology features, with a slightly larger screen, full-color graphics (the Game Boy is black and white), and a sleeker design that fits the grip of the hands.

The on-screen images move faster than Nintendo's Game Boy, and interlinking cables allow up to 16 people, each holding their own unit, to play at once. (The Game Boy can be played by one or two.)

The Atari System will sell for $149.95 with one cartridge. Additional cartridges will cost between $25 and $35.

"Even though they are both video games, they are completely different mediums, like having a home stereo and a transistor radio," said Sean McGowan, a New York consultant to investment firms that follow the toy and retail industries.

Beyond their potential as a marketing phenomenon, the two handheld units mark a milestone in the revival of the video game industry.

In the early 1980s, Atari was the leader in the electronic games industry, with its innovative products forging the way to what became a $3 billion-a-year industry by 1982. The next year, though, consumers grew bored with the games and sales dropped to around $200 million.

Nintendo, based in Japan, then stepped in and rebuilt the industry single-handedly, and now has roughly 80 percent of the home video game market.

Atari's handheld video game system is among the very first products that industry analysts say present a potential threat to Nintendo's dominance in the video game field.

For the first time, Nintendo finds itself somewhat on the defensive as a competitor brings a product that is admittedly in many ways technologically superior to the Game Boy.

"It's like using the Ferrari to get to the corner grocery store," says Bill White, Nintendo's director of advertising, of the Atari product. "We think it's really a bit more than players want and need."

But Sam Tramiel, Atari's president, retorts: "I'd rather drive a Ferrari to the corner grocery store. Who wouldn't rather have a Ferrari than a Toyota? But our price is not comparable to a Ferrari."

Sega of America and the NEC Corp. have also introduced new products including 16-bit home video games, with more computing power (and thus better graphics) than the 8-bit Nintendo system.

Nintendo insists that the Game Boy is ideally positioned to succeed, despite its somewhat less flashy appearance than the Atari system. The Game Boy, Nintendo executives say, is intended to broaden the market for video games beyond teen-agers, Nintendo's consumer testing, for instance, revealed a strong desire among parents for a system that allowed them to learn to play the games without embarrassment.

"The older group wanted a system where their mistakes were not magnified on a 26-inch television screen," said Main. The privacy of the handheld games, he said, allows the parents to "build up their interest and confidence before they challenge their 12-year-old."

Even more important, Nintendo executives emphasize that the design of a game — and not necessarily technological wizadry — is the crucial factor that sells video games.

Analysts agree that Nintendo's success in the home video game market thus far has been a result of the consistently high quality of its software, more than its hardware.

The company also uses shrewd marketing, advertising the games before their release and pulling them off the market at the first sign of a downturn.

Ice cream parlor chain tries again

BOSTON (AP) — Bailey's, the venerable chain of ice cream parlors where the hot fudge sundae was invented, is trying to make a comeback under new ownership after a disastrous experiment in yuppie marketing.

Last year, five of its seven stores closed, including the landmark location in Cambridge's Harvard Square, where the mahogany paneling and marble table tops were ripped out for a pizzeria.

The 116-year-old chain's former owner, Joey Crugnale, admits he goofed in trying to remake Bailey's as an upscale spot for people in their 20s and 30s.

"It was a mistake from the beginning," he said. "But I'm not ashamed of it. I learned a lot from it."

Michael Mazzaferro, one of three brothers who bought the business in November for an undisclosed price, said he hopes to reopen stores in Boston and Cambridge within the next few years.

"I think the company lost its focus and it became more of a luncheon stop as opposed to an old-fashioned candy store and ice cream parlor," he said. "We want to restore it to its roots."

The Mazzaferro family, which has been making candy in Massachusetts since the 1950s, already is turning out Bailey's fudge at the rate of 20,000 pounds a year.

That would gladden the heart of Sarah Dow, the bookkeeper to founder John Bailey. When he retired in 1900, she became the shop's owner and took a gamble that made dessert history.

"She put 6 ounces of ice cream in a 5-ounce dish and poured one and a half ounces of hot fudge on top of it, and it dripped down onto the silver dish," Frank Wyman Jr., a former Bailey's owner, said with reverence. "Beautiful concept. Beautiful product."

Later, Bailey's supplied mail-order chocolates to Theodore Roosevelt, Calvin Coolidge and John F. Kennedy. Joseph Kennedy Sr., the late president's father, was among the many Boston brahmins who kept his candy preferences on record at the flagship store on Temple Place, at the edge of the Boston Common.

Shortly after Crugnale bought the chain in January 1987 for a reported $1.5 million, he announced plans to open more than 100 stores throughout New England in seven or eight years.

But one of his first moves was to decide there was "just no future" in the old-fashioned menu of sandwiches like chopped ham and pickles, peanut butter and bacon, and datenut bread and cream cheese.

Although "little old ladies" who had been faithful customers for decades implored him to reconsider, Crugnale said, he held firm.

The entrepreneur, 37, had made a fortune with a yuppie, trendy, gourmet ice cream chain called Steve's and a yuppie, trendy, gourmet pizza chain called Bertucci's.

So he ignored the old ladies and pulled the same trick with Bailey's.

It didn't work.

When Crugnale sold the chain to the Mazzaferros last fall, it was down to two stores, both in the suburbs.

Crugnale, who had built Steve's Ice Cream from one store to a national chain of 26 before selling out in 1983, says he was probably overconfident when he took over Bailey's.

"I thought I was superman — I did Steve's, I could do anything," he said.

Though humbled by his failure with Bailey's, Crugnale has made a roaring success of Bertucci's, now a chain of 12 pizzerias in Massachusetts and Rhode Island.

"Bailey's was a business we shouldn't have been in," he said. "Bertucci's is one I'm much more comfortable with."

900 numbers add twist to toll calls

New York Times News Service

When it's midnight and your computer crashes or you need a quick stock tip, who you gonna call?

Not Ghostbusters ... Try a 900 number.

Within the next few months, information ranging from PC programming to legal advice will be available over this new type of phone service, which until now has been identified only with late-night "chat" lines and "Dial-A-Porn."

The new 900 lines are really souped-up versions of 800 customer service numbers used by everyone from airlines and brokerages to the Internal Revenue Service.

But they come with a twist. The answers won't be toll-free anymore.

No-cost-to-consumer 800 numbers have been a highly lucrative service for the telecommunications industry, ringing up almost $6 billion in revenues last year alone. They account for roughly 11 billion calls a year — 26 percent of all business calls, according to the San Francisco Consulting Group, a market research firm.

However, since the new 900 lines offer subscribers the chance to pass some of the phone costs to their customers, some service-oriented companies will be tempted to switch to 900 lines to cut costs and stay competitive in their own products and services.

"I think 900 will wind up cannibalizing some of the 800 business, particularly service calls where there's a value content," said Robert Morris, a telecommunications industry analyst at Goldman Sachs & Co.

"I'll call the Federal Communications Commission on an 800 number, and I may take up hours of people's time there," he said. "It would make a lot of sense to make those people available on 900 numbers."

Other observers say that instead of taking business away from 800 lines, the 900 lines could add billions of dollars more to phone company coffers and spawn a cottage industry of new information providers.

The new 900 numbers also promise to make television more participative by letting television viewers interact with game shows and live broadcast events.

Because the systems handling 900 calls are more sophisticated than those handling 800 numbers, they can receive more calls at once and obtain more demographic information about callers. That will enable companies to more tightly "focus" their marketing strategies.

However, the new numbers pose a dilemma for many service-oriented companies, whose customers have grown used to getting help with a free telephone call. Businesses subscribing to 800 lines typically pay a flat monthly fee plus usage charges, depending on how long the incoming phone call lasts.

For such organizations, "profit margins are shrinking and they're looking where they can to share that expense with their customers," said Eileen Arbues, a product manager for 800 and 900 services with MCI in San Francisco. MCI will offer its version of 900 service in the fourth quarter.

USX

But USX's steel division, which was plagued by steep losses for much of this decade, has become profitable again following the shutdown of some operations, stronger demand and restrictions on foreign imports.

With the renewed profitability, analysts said, USX would have less trouble finding buyers for the steel operations.

Still, many suggested that USX would be forced to sell the steel business piecemeal, to employees or in a public offering, since there are unlikely to be many buyers for the entire steel operation, which is the nation's largest.

The steel division was the best-performing segment within USX last year, reporting operating income of $501 million and producing 39 percent of USX's profits last year.

Nonetheless, the steel unit's operating profit of $33 for each ton of steel in the first quarter of this year is considered low compared with competitors like Inland and Bethlehem, which earned profits of $46 and $51 a ton in the first quarter, respectively.

A spinoff of the steel company would leave USX as primarily an energy concern with two major operations: Marathon Oil, which it acquired for $6 billion in 1982, and Texas Oil and Gas, which was purchased in 1986 for $3 billion in stock.

Analysts said the properties operated by those units would enable USX, as an energy concern, to operate profitably but with some difficulties.

"Without steel it would be at least an average energy company," said Philip L. Dodge, analyst with Nomura Securities International.

"Marathon is a strong company, and Texas Oil and Gas has grown rapidly but has had problems because of the weak natural gas prices."

Marathon owns some of the richest oil reserves and has a solid position in the North Sea Brae complex.

But many analysts contend that the lack of profitability at Texas Oil and Gas could hurt the company's prospects under a restructuring.

Gas prices dropped following the acquisition of Texas Oil and Gas, and the unit has yet to post a profit under USX.

A number of analysts predict that a restructuring is not imminent because the tax benefits that USX derives from the staggering losses its steel unit had a few years ago are far too valuable to give up.

"Normally, USX would pay $400 million in taxes, but the tax-loss carry-forwards allow it to pay a relatively low amount of taxes," said George J. Gaspar, analyst with Robert W. Baird & Co. in Milwaukee.

"When the tax loss is utilized — they run out in the fourth quarter of 1990 — there will be a strong mandate to split this company up," Gaspar said.

RATES

Mortgage rates, many closely tied to market rates, started ebbing in mid-April.

The average conventional 30-year mortgage had just hit a peak of 11¼ percent, and by the end of May it was down to 10½ percent.

"That's a meaningful decline," said Lyle E. Gramley, chief economist at the Mortgage Bankers Association of America. "And we have forecasts showing a further decline in the second half, to 10 percent."

In fact, a minority of lenders around the nation are already offering mortgages for less than the 10 percent the Veterans Administration just announced.

The 12 Fed decision makers who determine interest-rate policy have been equally divided over which is the greater evil — inflation or a recession — but Friday's unemployment report, despite the low rate, showed a decline in the nation's creation of new jobs.

This may be enough to persuade the Fed that the economy has cooled sufficiently to keep inflation at bay and that it can turn its attention to fighting a recession.

The Fed and its chairman, Alan Greenspan, are also under quiet pressure from the Bush administration to keep the economy growing through a seventh consecutive year without a relapse.

In a speech in Paris on Thursday, Treasury Secretary Nicholas F. Brady said inflation, which monetary authorities like the Fed fight by raising interest rates, "remains moderate and contained."

Economists say rates can still come down a bit because the economy seems to be slowing a little, which means there is less demand for credit.

Moreover, the Fed's efforts against inflation seem to be paying off, at least in stopping the rise.

Inflation was 4.4 percent in 1987 and 1988, and early this year, when the Fed was still pushing rates up to slow it, some economists saw it heading beyond 6 percent. But now inflation may be simmering down.

"We're essentially in a 5-percent-inflation economy," said M. Kathryn Eickhoff, a consultant in New York who is a protege and former associate of Greenspan. "I don't see it accelerating. And I don't see it decelerating, except slowly over several years."

WORLD IN BRIEF

Food dropped over Sri Lanka

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka (AP) — Air force helicopters dropped food parcels today to thousands of villagers stranded by mudslides and floods that killed at least 200 people during the weekend, officials said.

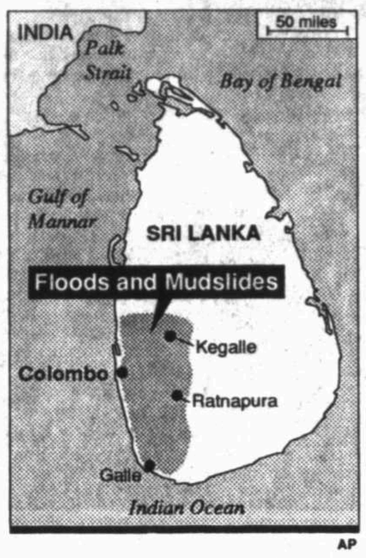

More than 100,000 people left homeless by the monsoon-triggered devastation sought shelter in schools, churches and Buddhist temples, police and relief workers reported.

At least eight inches of rain fell Saturday, causing deluges of earth and water in valleys that wind through the southwest corner of the island — from Kegalle in the central hills, south to Ratnapura and down to Galle on the Indian Ocean coast.

Air force commander Walter Perera said helicopters dropped 35,000 food parcels in the Kegalle and Ratnapura districts Sunday and today and pilots were directing navy and fishing boats to pick up marooned people.

In the coconut and rubber plantation districts around Kegalle, 45 miles northeast of Colombo, searchers had recovered 165 bodies from the mud, according to Ratna Jayasinghe, assistant director of social services.

She said her office was looking after 52,000 refugees.

Fishing boat, ship collide

TOKYO (AP) — A small, Japanese squid-fishing boat collided with a 4,531-ton Soviet cargo ship today in the Sea of Japan, and four crewmen from the squid boat were missing, the coast guard said.

Katsuhiro Muto of the Maritime Safety Agency's office in Niigata, northwestern Japan, said the four missing included the skipper of the No. 23 Horyo-maru. The boat capsized shortly after the collision.

There were no reports of injuries among 28 crewmembers aboard the Soviet Raychikhinsk, he said. The Soviet vessel was heading for Hiroshima from Vanino, a Soviet port, carrying 5,300 tons of coal, Muto said.

The collision occurred about 30 miles west of Sado Island, about 160 miles northwest of Tokyo, Muto said.

Three coast guard patrol boats and two aircraft were searching for the missing Japanese, the official said.

The cause of the collision was under investigation. The sea was reported calm at the time of the accident.

Argentina still hungry

BUENOS AIRES, Argentina (AP) — Food rioting is over, at least for now, but hunger persists in this country blessed with some of richest farmland on earth — the pampas — and many more cows and sheep than people.

Rosario, the city hit hardest by unrest last week that claimed 14 lives, is surrounded by dairies but a quart of milk costs about 2 percent of a typical worker's monthly salary.

"We have everything — meat, fish, cereals. The food is here," says sociologist Carlos Flood. "It's not like the country doesn't have food. The problem is distribution."

For most Argentines, grocery prices that go up several times a day have far outstripped wage increases, reflecting up to 80 percent inflation in May alone. On an annual basis, that amounts to a staggering 115,583 percent.

For the poor, almost every austral, the unit of national currency, that doesn't go to rent, clothes, school or transportation is spent on food. Nothing is saved.

Edmundo Cerpa, a 44-year-old building porter, used to buy meat several times a week for his family of eight. "Now, if I did that, my whole salary wouldn't last half the month," he said.

For working three, 32-hour shifts a week, Cerpa earns 9,343.50 australs a month, or $47 at the current exchange rate of about 200 to 1.

"I do the shopping," the stocky, gray-haired father of four boys and two girls says, adding, "There are some things I never buy, like deserts, grated cheese, butter. I buy less meat than before, and no fish or chicken," which cost more than beef.

Bhutto due to visit U.S.

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan (AP) — Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto, who took office in November, is making a crucial visit to the United States for talks expected to center on Afghanistan, nuclear weapons development and the heroin trade.

The visit, beginning today, is to include talks with President Bush, Secretary of State James A. Baker III and congressional leaders.

Before she left Pakistan, Mrs. Bhutto said she would discuss "economic and military aid and the question of narcotics control, which is an urgent issue on our list of priorities."

"The primary message of the visit and the talks will be that freedom has returned to Pakistan. It is not only a success for the people of Pakistan but for all those who believe in freedom," she said.

Mrs. Bhutto, 35, became prime minister and the first woman as the head of government of a Moslem nation after general elections in November.

The elections were held after President Mohammed Zia ul-Haq, Pakistan's military strongman for 11 years, was killed in a plane crash in August that also claimed the life of the U.S. ambassador.

Investigators have said the plane was sabotaged but no specific details have been disclosed or any suspects named.

Braque painting stolen

PARIS (AP) — A Georges Braque painting worth an estimated $3 million has been stolen from the National Museum of Modern Art at the Pompidou Center, museum officials said Sunday.

The picture, "L'Estaque, l'embarcadere" ("The Wharf at L'Estaque") was taken late Thursday morning or early that afternoon from a display room, museum Director Jean-Hubert Martin said.

It was not known exactly how the thief got the work out of the museum, which occupies two floors of a modernist building erected in 1977. Martin said security procedures were being reviewed.

The 14-by-19 inch painting was the first fauvist painting acquired by the National Museum of Modern Art in 1946. Painted in 1906, it shows a scene at the small Mediterranean port of L'Estaque near Marseille.

Braque, who lived from 1882-1963, was a leader of the fauvist movement distinguished by bright colors and distorted forms.

Many wives are beaten

MEXICO CITY (AP) — More than 60 percent of Mexico City's housewives are beaten by their husbands or lovers, a study by the Federal District Attorney General says.

The study, reported Sunday by the liberal daily La Jornada, found that in two out of three cases, the husband or lover had been drinking when he struck his mate. In half of the cases involving alcohol, the domestic violence began during discussions about money, the study said.

La Jornada described the study as the first of its kind and said the interviews upon which it is based on were carried out over a nine-month period in every section of Mexico City, home to 19 million people.

The study said that the high incidence of wife beating was linked to Mexico's "machismo," the culture of aggressive male dominance.

Women at the lower end of the socio-economic scale tend to be the victims of domestic most often, but the problem also affects the middle and professional classes, the study found.

WHO sees wider, faster spread of AIDS

By JAYNE GARRISON

WORLD

MONTREAL — World health officials predict that the AIDS epidemic will spread wider and faster in the 1990s than it did this decade, particularly in Third World countries.

As many as 15 million people may become infected with the human immunodeficiency virus that causes AIDS in the coming decade — triple the spread during the 1980s — unless international prevention efforts are improved or a vaccine or cure is found, said Dr. Johnathan Mann of the World Health Organization to 11,000 specialists at the Fifth International Conference on AIDS. The conference opened here Sunday.

"The epidemic is continuing, volatile and it remains unstable," Mann told reporters earlier. "The decade of the '90s will be worse, and perhaps much worse, than the decade of the 1980s," he said.

Mann's stark prediction is based on his organization's survey of AIDS experts worldwide and their best guesses of future spread in their countries.

Each nation may have different experiences. For example, Canadian health officials are expected to report this week that the epidemic has reached a plateau in Canada, which has 2,736 reported cases of AIDS.

But Thailand has seen HIV infection among drug users in Bangkok soar from 1 percent in late 1987 to over 40 percent today. And in Brazil, the percentage of AIDS cases among drug users soared from 3 percent to 13 percent in one year, mostly because more users are injecting cocaine, Mann said.

Because HIV can hide in the body for two to 10 years before causing AIDS, Mann said the 1990s will be doubly hard-hit: There may be widespread new infections, and many infected in the 1980s will get sick in the 1990s.

As a result, he predicted a tenfold rise in actual AIDS cases during the '90s — from an estimated 500,000 in 1989 to over 5 million by the year 2000.

The worst news he gave specialists hoping for optimism is that new infection may spread to three times as many people in the next decade — an indication that global education, counseling and prevention efforts lag far behind the progress of the deadly virus.

"Around the world, there is evidence of growing complacency among some and growing fatalism among others," Mann said. He called it an "epidemic of social, cultural and political reaction and response ... as important to our future as the virus itself."

A full third of the new infections and cases of AIDS he forecasts for the 1990s could be prevented, he said, through strong global and national prevention efforts.

The World Health Organization hopes to help establish AIDS programs in all the world's 187 nations by the end of 1989. Although that is a huge leap from the beginning of the '80s, when there were no AIDS programs and an estimated 100,000 people were infected, Mann noted they vary greatly in effectiveness.

Those that work best, he said, involve community organizations — gay groups, churches, drug-abuse clinics — trusted by people at risk from unprotected sex or intravenous drug use.

To reach other populations in other cities and countries, Mann called for AIDS services to be integrated into all health and social services.

This is the first international AIDS conference that focuses equally on how AIDS touches the lives of people, as well as on research.

Zambian President Kenneth Kaunda, the keynote speaker, addressed both issues. His son died of AIDS in 1986, and he leads a country that has reported 1,296 cases of AIDS, with probably twice as many cases unreported.

"If you, our scientists, fail to find a cure in good time," he told delegates, "the AIDS epidemic will develop ... into a soft nuclear bomb on human life. Silent. No explosion. But just as devastating in the destruction of the human body."

Just a little over 10 years ago, he noted, world health officials passed a declaration calling for basic health care for all people by the year 2000. Now, he said, AIDS threatens to reverse every gain made in his country toward lower infant mortality.

The opening of the conference was delayed for more than an hour as a man who said he had AIDS took the stage along with about 200 activists, and demanded that the group listen to their 10-part manifesto. Conference organizers agreed, but after the reading about 40 members of the activist group AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power remained on the platform during the opening session.

Solidarity candidates seem headed for landslide victory

WARSAW, Poland (AP) — Partial unofficial returns today in Poland's first democratic election since World War II indicated a strong Solidarity victory in the new Senate and the possible rejection of top communist officials in the lower house of Parliament.

However, the early returns tabulated by the Solidarity Citizens Committee still represented a tiny fraction of the more than 16 million votes cast Sunday, and a final official count was not expected until Wednesday.

There were no reports of a Communist Party candidate getting into the 100-member Senate, raising the possibility of a Solidarity sweep in the first freely elected legislative chamber in the East bloc.

The state-controlled media were maintaining a complete silence on voting results from Sunday's election, only reporting turnout figures. Members of the Communist Party and Solidarity kept counting the votes today.

On Sunday, a government spokesman pledged to "accept every result" of the balloting, which communist authorities agreed to in historic April accords that reinstated the Solidarity union after a seven-year ban.

The economy is a shambles, and the communists badly needed the opposition's cooperation if it is to be revived.

The election for the Senate and the existing lower house, the Sejm, was carried out in an atmosphere of calm and exhilaration for many people happy to be casting a meaningful vote after decades of ballots containing only Communist Party-approved candidates. Turnout, however, was lower than expected.

With 72 out of 1,253 voting stations reporting, Solidarity candidates for the three Senate seats from Warsaw were leading handily. The Solidarity tallies indicated all had obtained more than 70 percent of the valid votes cast.

The numbers were similar in the races for the 460-member Sejm, where the 161 Solidarity candidates permitted faced opposition only from other non-party independents, some of whom were sympathetic to the government.

In the southern city of Krakow, with about half the precincts reporting, Solidarity's Senate candidates led all others for the two seats, drawing in 83 percent and 74 percent of the vote, the Solidarity campaign there said.

Soviet Congress seeks calm in strife-torn Uzbekistan

MOSCOW (AP) — The Soviet Congress today appealed for an end to bloodshed in Uzbekistan, where one deputy said thousands of homes were set ablaze in ethnic rioting that claimed at least two lives.

Tass said authorities imposed a curfew in several areas of the Central Asian republic after two days of rioting between Uzbeks and the minority Turk-Meskhetis. It said there were deaths, but did not give a number.

The deputy from the region, Rakhmatullah Akhmetov, said he had been told two people had died and "thousands and thousands of homes are burning" in his home city of Fergana.

Akhmetov, in an interview before today's session of Congress, said a dispute in a market prompted the violence, which he blamed on "extremist forces."

During the session, President Mikhail S. Gorbachev read a proclamation saying: "We, people's deputies of the USSR, call upon those involved in ethnic clashes to turn to the voice of reason and stop the bloodshed."

"Think about all the innocents who are threatened — women, children and old people. And stop, prevent injustice from being committed," it said.

The appeal was broadcast live to the nation as part of the Congress' proceedings.

Iran's new leader was key figure in revolution

By ED BLANCHE

NICOSIA, Cyprus (AP) — President Ali Khamenei, who apparently will serve as Iran's caretaker leader following the death of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, has played a key role in the Islamic revolution.

Khamenei lacks a strong power base, however, and it appears that he does not have the religious rank or the political clout to permanently succeed Khomeini, who died Saturday.

Instead, Khamenei is expected to rule until power struggles are played out and the new leadership emerges.

In the ever-shifting alliances in the Tehran hierarchy, the 49-year-old Khamenei now is aligned with one-time rival, Parliament Speaker Hashemi Rafsanjani.

The two are considered pragmatists and Khamenei supports Rafsanjani's efforts to renew ties with the West as a way to end Iran's isolation and help the country's massive reconstruction efforts following the Iran-Iraq war.

Iran's radical fundamentalists want tighter state control of the economy, but Khamenei has strong support among the Bazaaris, the wealthy merchant class, and favors wider free enterprise.

Although the powers of the presidency have been seriously eroded in the perpetual political in-fighting between rival factions in Tehran over the last few years, the soft-spoken cleric retains wide popularity and has close ties with the regular army.

Khamenei spent three years in prison or internal exile under the late Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi for his revolutionary activities.

He was seriously wounded, along with 100 others, in June 1981 when a bomb hidden in a cassette tape recorder exploded while he was delivering a sermon in a Tehran mosque. His right arm and hand are still disabled and he walks with a cane.

The bombing was blamed on the Mujahedeen Khalq, or People's Holy Warriors, who assassinated President Mohammad Ali Rajai and Prime Minister Javar Bahonar along with scores of other officials when the radicals turned on their former revolutionary allies in 1980-81.

Khamenei rarely indulges in the fiery rhetoric of other Iranian leaders. But he refused treatment in the United States for the injuries he suffered in the assassination attempt because he argued that he couldn't say "Death To America!" while enjoying its hospitals.

When he did finally visit the United States in 1987, he addressed the United Nations Security Council to defend Iran's widely criticized insistence on continuing the Iran-Iraq war. He denounced the United States for its intervention in the gulf, then solemnly delivered a sermon on Islam.

Khamenei is chairman of the Supreme Defense Council, which devised Iranian strategy during the eight-year war, and is a member of most of the key councils and assemblies in Iran.

He was a member of the Revolutionary Council that governed Iran in the early days of the revolution. Before he was elected president he was Friday Prayer leader in Tehran, a key political platform.

His political power base was badly eroded in 1987 when Khomeini disbanded the Islamic Republic Party, the main clerical group Khamenei headed, on grounds it was no longer needed.

Khamenei was born into a religious family in the northeastern city of Mashhad, a hotbed of revolutionary fervor during the struggle against the shah.

Like many other Iranian leaders, Khamenei studied Islam under Khomeini in the early 1960s when the ayatollah was a teacher at the seminary in Qom, south of Tehran.

Khomeini called him "the strong arm of Islam ... a rare person who shines like the sun."

But they crossed swords in 1988, when Khamenei questioned the power of government over Islamic teachings. Khomeini slapped him down publicly by declaring the government was supreme since it had extraordinary powers because it was acting on behalf of Islam.

Later they apparently settled their differences.

Khamenei's second four-year term as president expires in October and the constitution forbids him from running again. Rafsanjani is the only declared candidate and Khamenei has endorsed him.

Khamenei, often called the "poet president" because of his passion for literature, was elected Iran's third President in 1981 to succeed Rajai.

He is the author of several religious books and has translated several others.

The gray-bearded Khamenei, usually clad in brown robes of a hojatoleslam, a middle-ranking cleric below an ayatollah, sees the Iranian revolution as the catalyst that "revived and stimulated the thinking of Moslems about Islam everywhere."

Bush demands Iran release U.S. hostages

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush said today he would make no overtures to the new regime in Iran and demanded the release of hostages held by what he said has been "a terrorist state."

Bush told a White House news conference he was "not sure yet" about the implications of the change in Tehran with the death of the Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini and the naming of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khamenei to succeed the man who led Iran's fundamentalist revolution.

The United States broke ties with Iran a decade ago after the U.S. embassy was overrun. The diplomats taken hostage then were not released until January 1981, 444 days later.

Bush, in a clear signal to Tehran, said "there is a way for the relationship to improve, and that's for the release of the American hostages."

But the president ruled out any overtures to the new government, with which the United States has broken virtually all commercial ties. "Absolutely not," Bush said. "They have been a terrorist state."

The State Department's Office for Counter-Terrorism lists nine Americans as hostages in Lebanon, as well as three Britons, an Irishman, an Italian and a Belgian. All the Americans are believed held by pro-Iranian factions.

"As soon as we see some move away from oppression and extremism of that nature we will review our relationship," Bush said.

On Sunday, the White House expressed hope that after Khomeini's death Iran would adopt "a responsible role" in the world community.

The White House hope was echoed by former president Jimmy Carter, whose administration was hurt by the 1979 seizure of American hostages from the U.S. embassy in Tehran. Carter was conciliatory in comments made Sunday outside his church in Plains, Ga.

Widespread condemnation prompted by China's attack

By LARRY THORSON
Associated Press Writer

Government and religious leaders in many countries condemned the military attacks on pro-democracy protesters in China, and the Hong Kong stock exchange plunged today in a sign of growing nervousness over the turmoil in Beijing.

There were calls for a United Nations session and a ban on U.S. military sales to China, and Chinese people in many countries protested the heavy casualties in the Chinese army's assaults Sunday and today on crowds of students and other civilians in Beijing.

World leaders including President Bush, British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and Pope John Paul II expressed dismay and concern at the violence, which had a particularly strong impact on China's neighbors such as Hong Kong and Taiwan, where huge sympathy demonstrations were held.

"The stability of China is important for peace and stability on the Korean peninsula and the rest of Asia," a Foreign Ministry spokesman in South Korea said today. The spokesman said Seoul hopes the situation "can be resolved peacefully."

The Hong Kong stock market suffered its worst fall since the 1987 worldwide market collapse. The Hang Seng Index of blue chips lost 581.77 points in the day's trading, closing at 2,093.61.

China's fast economic growth in recent years has been an important tonic for Asian countries, and the chance of prolonged turmoil in China was a setback to the confidence that had been building as the region seemed more tranquil with progress in Sino-Soviet relations and in Indochina.

"A China with large sections of her people, including her best educated, at odds with the government, means trouble," said Singapore's Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew. "China could create problems for herself and her neighbors."

Hong Kong, a British colony, is to revert to Chinese rule in 1997 under a Sino-British treaty, and the violence in Beijing has made its 5.7 million people deeply nervous about their future.

About 200,000 people rallied Sunday in Hong Kong to denounce the killings, and many people wept as they watched televised reports from Beijing.

In Taiwan, 100,000 protesters marched in the three largest cities today and share prices plunged. The stock market index ended at 9,120.54 points, down 455.44 points, the largest single-day fall in the market's 27-year history.

The market drop was prompted by concern the $2.7 billion trade with the mainland would suffer, analysts said. Trade between Taiwan and China through third parties was permitted by Taiwan's governing Nationalists two years ago, although the government still bans official contacts between the governments.

In Britain, Foreign Secretary Sir Geoffrey Howe summoned a senior Chinese diplomat to a meeting today.

Meanwhile, David Howell, a legislator in Mrs. Thatcher's Conservative Party, urged her to seek new assurances from Beijing on Hong Kong's future. "Having got a treaty with a government that can shoot people down like this, we must have a reassurance that the spirit of the treaty stands," Howell said.

The treaty calls for Hong Kong to be able to keep its freewheeling socioeconomic lifestyle after China takes over.

Australian Prime Minister Bob Hawke protested by canceling a planned October visit to China, and his foreign minister, Gareth Evans, summoned the Chinese ambassador today for consultations.

"We had admired the restraint that had been demonstrated by the Chinese government until the weekend and were shocked at the extent to which that restraint has now been abandoned," Evans said afterward.

In Washington, President Bush came under pressure from both ends of the political spectrum to cut military aid to China, and there was mixed reaction to his condemnation of the violence.

Fellow Republican Mickey Edwards, an Oklahoma congressman, said Bush's response was "a pretty puny reaction to the murdering of innocent civilians, whose only crime is to want the same freedoms we in the West take for granted."

Republican Sen. Jesse Helms of North Carolina and Rep. Stephen Solarz, a New York Democrat, urged Bush to cut U.S. military aid in retaliation for the Chinese army actions.

In West Germany, Labor Minister Norbert Bluem said there should be a special session of the United Nations on the assault.

"A government that scorns human life and tramples on human rights must reckon with contempt from all civilized states," Bluem said in a statement.

In an unusual move, the normally neutral Swiss government summoned the Chinese ambassador to condemn the "brutal" use of force.

Sympathy protests hit other Chinese cities

BEIJING (AP) — In Shanghai and other Chinese cities, people blocked rails and roads and held funeral marches to protest the army's massacre of pro-democracy protesters in Beijing.

Foreign sources in Shanghai, China's biggest city, said students on Sunday lay down on train tracks to protest the military invasion of Beijing that resulted in hundreds and perhaps thousands of deaths.

All public transportation in the city of 12 million was stopped today after people moved public buses and other barricades into intersections.

Students have called for a general strike but it was unclear how many people were staying off the job.

"It's pretty chaotic," said one American on conditon of anonymity.

Police did not interfere, and so far there was no substance to rumors that martial law would be declared and troops would enter the city.

As in Beijing, there were long lines at food stores as the transportation tie-up prevented farmers from getting produce to the market.

In the southern provincial capital of Changsha, more than 1,000 students sat down on several tracks at the railway station, stopping some trains from entering or leaving. The demonstration ended in the evening, an American teacher there said on condition of anonymity.

Students today set up barricades at both ends of a bridge over a river dividing the city, stopping all vehicle traffic.

Sources in the northeast city of Shenyang said 2,500 students from various universities held a funeral march through the city Sunday to mourn those shot by troops in Beijing. There were also banners informing local residents about events in the capital.

The official media have come out with statements praising the military action in Beijing, but have said nothing about the extent of civilian casualties.

Sources said another 10,000 people held a funeral march in the northeast city of Changchun.

News magazines change cover stories at deadline

NEW YORK (AP) — Time and Newsweek magazines scrapped their cover stories just prior to their publishing deadlines to devote the space to the slaughter of student demonstrators in China over the weekend.

The two weekly news magazines were both preparing to publish their June 12 issue when Chinese troops stormed Tiananmen Square in Beijing, killing at least 500 people who had been demanding political and social change in China.

"Our colleagues in the newspaper business can be forgiven for occasionally thinking there is something leisurely about putting a magazine together that comes out only once a week," wrote Time publisher Robert L. Miller in the issue that goes on sale Monday. "This is rarely true, and it certainly wasn't last week."

Peter McGrath, foreign news editor at Newsweek, said the decision to change the cover story was made at about 11:30 a.m. Saturday. Its rival, Time, said in a prepared statement that it changed its cover story at midnight Saturday.

The magazines normally start running the presses about midnight, magazine officials said.

"We had three people on the scene (in China) and we relied on their advice ... the long-awaited crackdown was happening," McGrath said. "A cover story is an important statement for a magazine. You go with the best news story you have."

Burned-out shells litter streets

BEIJING (AP) — The burned-out shells of armored personnel carriers, tanks and buses litter Beijing's streets. Some still burn, spewing black smoke into the late spring sky.

Morgues and hospital overflow with hundreds of bodies. Doctors emerge from operating rooms splattered with blood.

Soldiers with AK-47 automatic rifles man strategic locations around the inner city. Troop trucks cruise the streets, firing indiscriminately into crowds of passers-by.

Women and men weep together. The wheels of government propoganda machines spin with fury, churning out shrill statements justifying the brutal crackdown of a movement for freedom.

Less than 72 hours has passed since troops entered the city, in effect putting the capital under military dictatorship.

It started with the pitter patter of jogging feet. It was early Saturday, and thousands of young unarmed recruits were moving into the city on foot.

A wall of tens of thousands of citizens met the soldiers as they marched from the east and north toward Tiananmen Square.

"Please go back, we don't need you here," said one high school teacher.

The soldiers, some crying, retreated and were escorted out of the city by jubilant residents.

The jubilation was short-lived.

At 2:10 p.m. Saturday at Liubu Intersection, near Tiananmen Square, riot police used tear gas for the first time in Beijing in Communist China's 40-year history.

The riot squad beat dozens mercilessly. Citizens threw back rocks.

Meanwhile, thousands of troops moved in near the Great Hall of the People on Tiananmen Square and occupied the street. Tens of thousands of people surrounded them, chanting "Long live democracy."

Fights broke out as soldiers grabbed students, brought them into their ranks and beat them with sticks.

Citizens, their faces and chest bloodied, were taken away on bicycles. By early evening the unarmed troops had withdrawn into government buildings.

As the sun set Saturday, an armed contingent of the People's Liberation Army marching in from the west, supported by tanks and armored carriers, began the bloody assault.

Automatic weapons fire crackled over the bridge at Muxidi, a gateway to the inner city. Flames rolled through two buses blocking the bridge. Tear gas cannisters boomed.

The crowd, collecting rocks and sticks, chanted, "Fascists, fascists."

"He's gone, we've lost him," one medic yelled as a man with a bullet hole in his chest gurgled and shook.

"This is China, this is my country," screamed another man as he pointed down the street where soldiers crouched and fired from the shadows.

After two hours of fighting the troops broke through, their olive green helmets shining eerily under the street lamps of Changan Avenue.

Tear gas cut the air. Soldiers leveled their guns at crowds, killing scores.

Citizens threw their bodies in front of armored personnel carriers. The carriers that stopped were boarded.

Some soldiers were beaten. Others escaped. One was hung, naked and burned, from a bus, his officer's cap placed cockeyed on his head.

Early Sunday, soldiers closed in on Tiananmen Square, where thousands of students, remnants of a seven-week movement for democracy, readied to make a final stand.

"Protect the students, protect the students," yelled a worker. A bullet pierced his leg.

Dozens more were killed as the troops, backed by armored personnel carriers, moved into the square.

The bulk of the troops prepared to sweep away the students, who had occupied the square since May 13. Official broadcasts ordered them to leave immediately.

Frightened, the students huddled together near the center of the square, around the Monument to Revolutionary Martyrs. After swearing an oath to their struggle, they decided to withdraw peacefully.

The most vicious action followed.

An armored personnel carrier, cruising quickly up Changan Avenue, crushed at least seven students under its treads.

In the square, troops knocked down the students' tent city and scrubbed away slogans for freedom. A tank rolled over the Goddess of Democracy, a 33-foot statue that had been a focal point of protest.
