Austin. — Millions for welfare, billions for water, and trillions for wages. These three "W's" point up the money problem presently facing the State.

Final decision, of course, rests with those who eventually pay the bill — the people of Texas. Their decision as to whether they are willing to foot the bills with additional taxes will come thru the ballot when they vote for or against constitutional amendments at the special election on August 5.

As for welfare . . . the welfare groups face a do-or-die effort to boost the welfare benefits ceiling from $60 million to $80 million a year. If that amendment fails, as a similar one did last November, the Legislature will have no opportunity to re-submit the increase before 1971. That means that benefit payments to the ever-growing list of recipients will decrease accordingly.

As for water . . . a massive statewide campaign is shaping up to sell Texans on a $3.5 billion revenue bond program that will be needed to bankroll the nation's largest state water development plan. A constitutional amendment on the August 5 ballot would authorize bonds — to be repaid by water users — to take care of the state's share of a $9 billion Texas Water Plan . . . the largest and boldest of its kind ever proposed.

As for wages . . . legislators and legislative leaders have a special interest in amendments to increase their salaries and to provide for annual sessions. Under one amendment the lieutenant governor and the speaker could be paid up to half the governor's salary ($50,000). Senators and representatives could be paid as much as district judges receive from state funds ($18,000 a year). Legislators already have passed an act raising their own pay. But it goes only from the present $4,800 to $6,800. Even this raise is subject to passage of the amendment.

TO DO OR NOT TO DO — Gov. Preston Smith is keeping to himself his decision on calling the Legislature back into session.

His "D-Day" is June 22, a Sunday. That's the last day for him to sign, veto or let become law without his signature, the $2.8 billion spending bill and the $61.9 million teacher pay bill.

Smith said if he signs the budget measure, the teacher pay raise "is dead" because there is not enough money for both.

Governor surprised teachers by criticizing the teacher pay bill. Earlier he had been critical of the Legislature's decision to vote a one-year appropriations bill instead of the traditional two-year bill.

Smith has expressed some distaste for approval of at least two of the revenue measures — a Department of Public Safety fund transfer and a $10 optional building use fee on students.

Smith is receiving many complaints about the appropriations bill as passed by the Legislature. College people are unhappy because funds for organized research were reduced.

Not enough money was put into the budget for the schools for mentally retarded children and for the new community mental health-mental retardation centers, according to the Texas Association for Retarded Children.

Joe Day Jr., president of the association, objected because the bill provided money for planning a new state school in the Houston area while the Board for Mental Health and Mental Retardation had requested that new schools be built at El Paso, the Rio Grande Valley and Northeast Texas.

A last-minute change also reduced the allocation for air pollution control work by $60,000 a year.

Lt. Gov. Ben Barnes hopes that the governor will let the appropriations bill become law. He thinks that a year's wait will show that smaller taxes will be needed than than if the Legislature levied them this year.

EDUCATION — Members of the Coordinating Board for State Colleges and Universities decided to wait until its next meeting to take action on a request by Texas A&M to expand its forestry program into a full undergraduate - graduate program.

Board gave El Paso permission to go ahead with its junior college election. Sen. Joe Christie, head of the college steering committee, made the final presentation to the board — and got a nod from the members and a congratulatory handshake from Chairman Tom Sealy.

Consideration of a common calendar for all state-supported colleges was put off until the next meeting.
